Boris Goldovsky, Frederic Cohen and Felix Wolfes will hold auditions for the opera department next Saturday and Sunday mornings, March 15 and 16, from 9 to 12 o'clock in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, an accompanist will be provided. Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston 15, Mass. at least two days in advance. As already announced, the Center will open its six weeks' session under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. on June 30.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

MAR 8 - 1947

Boston Symphony To Introduce Cantata by 24-year-old Pianist

BOSTON, March 7-(AP)-The Boston symphony orchestra, noted for introducing new music to America, starts today the fullest introductory program in its 66-year history for any single work—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performaces in nine days for the biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Foss, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer:

"This work alone would keep your name alive."

The eight consecutive introductory performances—at Smith College, Yale, New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn—establish a new record for a New work by the orchestra. It played first for the nation the latest works of such Americans as Roy Harris and Aaron Copeland and the Russians, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff.

Foss was born in Berlin, came to this country at the age of 15 and studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and with composer Paul Hindemith at Yale.

His father is Martin Foss, Professor of Philosophy at Haverford College, Haverford, Pa., and his mother, a painter, Hilda Foss.

The young composer's first work to be played by the Boston symphony was performed when he was 20, his symphonic "The Prairie" to the poem by Carl Sandburg.

IE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1947

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were Ellabelle Davis, soprano, and the chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A minor No. 3 Op. 44 .... Rachmaninoff
"The Song of Songs," Cantata .... Foss
Symphony of Psalms .... Stravinsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

At the start of yesterday's concert Dr. Koussevitzky made a brief speech and then asked the audience to rise in memory of Bentley Warren, former President of the Trustees, whose death will be mourned by all friends of the Boston Symphony. Then followed the unusual program listed above.

Rachmaninoff's 3rd Symphony, which was composed in 1936, but not played in Boston until yesterday, is a thoroughly disappointing work. Although Rachmaninoff's style had crystallized many years before, he had proved as late as 1934 in the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini that he could still write brilliantly effective music. But the Rhapsody has a solo piano in it and the 3rd Symphony has not. There's the rub.

It has always seemed to me that Rachmaninoff's music will live or die with and through the instrument of which he himself was so consummate a master. Without the piano his scores sound ineffective, disjointed and, in the last analysis, dull. The 3rd Symphony is perhaps the worst of these non-pianistic works. When it is not dull it verges on the trashy, and at that let us leave it.

Mr. Lukas Foss, the young official pianist of the orchestra, won an ovation for the first performance anywhere of his Cantata, "The Song of Songs," and so did Miss Ellabelle Davis, the soprano soloist, who very ably displayed her fine voice and musicianship in it.

With the brashness of youth Mr. Foss has essayed the task of setting the glorious love poetry of the Song of Songs to music. His musical score is clear and melodious, dramatic or lyrical according to the gist of the text and orchestrated with intelligence. As music, pure and simple, it is an attractive score, but as a setting of the Biblical text it leaves a great deal to be desired.

The composer is quoted as saying that the music "strives for an even greater presentation of the spirit of the word," which I take to mean the poem as it is written down in the King James version. But in order to make the poetry fit his musical scheme he has been obliged to chop and change, and repeat the verses so that in the end you wonder why he bothered to set this particular text. Almost anything that would fit the moods of the music, even vocalise, might have served his purpose, especially as it was necessary to follow the printed words to know what Miss Davis was singing. In the final prayer the repetitions of the first two lines—and possibly something in the way Miss Davis sang them—reminded me of nothing so much as a Negro Spiritual.

In short, Mr. Foss has written a musical composition first and a setting of a poetical text a long way second. The best part of the Cantata is the second movement, which is a charming musical piece. But, granting all Mr. Foss' talents, I should not call this work a complete artistic success.

That is just what Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms is, a thoroughly fused and conceived musical work on the Latin text of the Psalms. I have always felt that the last movement, in particular (the 150th Psalm in praise of God), is one of the most moving things in modern music. I thought this when I first heard it 17 years ago and have not changed my mind. The entire Symphony, indeed, bears up well through the years.

The program book let us down badly by not printing the text or at least a translation. It is hard to catch choral enunciation of Latin and harder to translate it and still listen to the music. The chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe and the orchestra, minus the high strings, combined under Dr. Koussevitzky to give us an excellent performance of this extraordinary work.

Next week the orchestra will be out of town. For the concerts of March 21-22 Bruno Walter will conduct the following program: Corelli's Concerto Grosso in G minor, Wagner's "Siegfried" Idyl and Mahler's 4th Symphony.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

MAR 9 - 1947

Boston Symphony Will Premiere New Foss Work

NEW HAVEN, March 8—The first radio performance anywhere of Lucas Foss' "Song Of Songs" will be presented over Station WWVA and ABC by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Woolsey Hall here on Tuesday, March 11, from 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., EST.

The ABC performance will be one of several given the work by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra within the span of a few days. Its world premiere was on March 7 in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the work was repeated there the following night. Following its radio premiere here, it will be heard in Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and again on March 15.

Soloist in the composition will be Ellabelle Davis, American Negro soprano, for whom the work was especially commissioned by the League of Composers, the major 1946-47 commission by this group. Foss, 23 years old, is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Song of Songs," described as a Biblical solo cantata, was written last summer. It is the fourth commission to have been executed within a year by Foss, former Guggenheim and Pulitzer Fellowships winner.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

MAR [illegible] - 1947

Bigger Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to 12. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall, by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, Aug. 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular weekend series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant directhe Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be tor. As in the past, the faculty of offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are these during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constituting membership in the society.

For further information about the Festival, the Music Center and the Friends, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 to "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass. For living accommodations in the Berkshires, letters may be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Mass.

The complete schedule for the Festival concerts follows:

Extra concerts (music of Bach and Mozart (respectively), Sunday afternoon, July 13 and 20;

Series A: Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24-26-27;

Series B: Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2-3;

Extra concert (to include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony), Tuesday evening, Aug. 5;

Series C: Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7-9-10.

This Clipping From MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
MAR 9 1947

The Reading Glass

THE right to publish without permission a biography of a living person "of public or general interest" was upheld last week by New York Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, who refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's "Koussevitzky," a biography of the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra.

The decision was the first of its kind in New York state, and is particularly important because of the volume of publishing done here. The finding is not final, because at week's end Dr. Koussevitzky appealed it and obtained an interim injunction until Mar. 14, when the appellate division will hear the case.

The conductor had charged that Smith's book, the first publication of the new firm, Allen, Towne & Heath, invaded his, Koussevitzky's, right of privacy.

Justice Shientag said in his decision: "The right of privacy . . . does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character. The book clearly is not fictional.

"Most people know that a great conductor's work with his orchestra is not altogether carried on in an atmosphere of sweetness and light. The author evidently knows that, too, and loses no opportunity to inform his readers about it. The author gives his personal estimate of the plaintiff's place in musical history. . . . Depreciation and praise vie with each other for utterance."

Justice Shientag ruled that Koussevitzky's "prominent achievements as a musician bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest."

* * *

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
MAR 9 - 1947

The Boston Symphony Has 'Song Of Songs' In Its Radio Debut

The first radio performance anywhere of Lukas Foss' "Song of Songs" will be presented over WTJS-ABC by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, Conn., on Tuesday, March 11, at 7:30-8:30 p. m.

The WTJS-ABC performance will be one of several given the work by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra within the span of a few days.

Its world premiere will be on March 7 in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the work will be repeated there the following night. Following its radio premiere at New Haven, it will be heard in Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and again on March 15.

Soloist in the composition will be Ellabelle Davis, American Negro soprano, for whom the work was especially commissioned by the League of Composers, the major 1946-47 commission by this group. Foss, 23 years old, is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Song of Songs," described as a Biblical solo cantata, was written last summer. It is the fourth commission to have been executed within a year by Foss, former Guggenheim and Pulitzer fellowships winner.

Miss Davis, to whom Foss dedicated the work was selected by the League of Composers to premier it because she was regarded as "The outstanding American singer of the year." The cantata is in four movements of 23 minutes duration and four utterances of the Queen of Sheba provide the text.

Miss Davis, a native of New Rochelle, N. Y., has been soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Minneapolis Symphony, Indianapolis Symphony and other orchestras and also has given recitals in leading cities. In August, 1945, she was heard at the Palace of Fine Arts in Mexico City and followed this with six more concerts there within four weeks. Last summer, Miss Davis sang the title role in Verdi's "Aida" with the Opera Nacional in the same city, the first American Negro to be starred by a major opera company.

Foss was [illegible] of Paul Hindemith, Felix [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky. He [illegible] Curtis Institute and also with teachers of the Paris Conservatoire. His orchestral works have been played by many orchestras and he is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the March 11 broadcast with the "Symphony No. 5" of Schubert.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 10 1947

MUSIC CENTER AUDITIONS IN N. Y. THIS WEEK

Tryouts Announced for Admission to Berkshire Student Orchestra

It was reported today that auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's Student Orchestra and Opera Dept. will be held in New York this week by members of the center's faculty.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold auditions for instrumentalists Wednesday morning and early afternoon in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, as follows: Violin and viola, 10 a. m.; cello, double bass, harp, 11; woodwinds, noon and brass at 1 p. m. Auditions for tympanists will be held Wednesday aftenoon at 6.30 backstage at Carnegie Hall.

On Saturday and Sunday mornings, Boris Goldovsky, Frederic Cohen and Felix Wolfes will hold auditions for the opera department from 9-12 in the Chamber Music Hall. An accompanist will be provided.

Applicants are requested to notify Thomas Perry Jr., Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, Boston 15 at least two days in advance.

The Center will open its six-week session under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Tanglewood, Lenox, on June 30.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 10 1947

Bernstein Is Presented In Triple Role

Here With Rochester As Composer, Soloist And Its Conductor

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, was presented in the last of the Bushnell Afternoon Concert Series Sunday. The program:

Symphony in B Flat Major (B&H 102) — Haydn
Facsimile (ballet) — Bernstein
Danzon Cubano — Copland
Piano Concerta No. 1 in C Major — Beethoven
(Mr. Bernstein, pianist)

The day seems likely to come when we shall gather our gaping grandchildren about us and tell them of how we were there when Leonard Bernstein first appeared in Hartford.

Patting little 5-years-old Amadeus on the head, we shall say, "Why, he hardly looked any bigger than you!"

It requires no special, Sibylline prescience to recognize that Mr. Bernstein is on the way to becoming one of the country's important conductors. Standing there yesterday, leading the excellent Rochester Philharmonic, he looked almost painfully young for his 29 years. Yet authority, and creation of a kind, marked all he did. Already he has the personal tutelage of the great leader of the Boston Symphony behind him, which is something like being sired by Jove. And in his manner of conducting, his gestures and attitudes, probably not too unconsciously, he is a very Koussevitzky, Jr. Almost everything the "old man" does, he did too. Yesterday some of it was purely emotional reaction to the music, with no conductorial meaning. Some was wishful thinking, unheeded by the orchestra. But mainly it was cogent, confident conducting, not imperious, but full of firm do-as-I-say, without which any aspiring leader will fail.

Yet the music which this Koussevitzkian-style conducting made was curiously different, technically, from the Boston master. Its precision and clarity were nearer that of an earlier mentor, Artur Rodzinski. Dr. Koussevitzky prefers the broader device, the melded tone. Whether Mr. Bernstein will yet come to these, or whether he will follow the Rodzinski way, which is fundamentally the crystalline Toscanini way remains to be seen.

The music which Mr. Bernstein made might be called, technically fine-petaled, and as such would be completely in keeping with his interpretation. At this point, he is at the Shelley stage as an interpretor. Everything is poetic, slightly soulful in an Ariel way. Yesterday his own "Facsimilie" and Copland's "Danzon Cubano" were nervously rather than dramatically presented. What appeared to be more genuinely characteristic of Mr. Bernstein were the Haydn, the Beethoven and the Prokofieff excerpt. Sweet, almost feminine, was the Haydn, while there was tiptoeing through the tulips in the Concerto. Still, some delicacy, some ringleted hair looks good, traditionally at least, on a young man's music, better than Faustian or Barnum pretensions. Let us hope that Mr. Bernstein will retain the best of his poetic aspects, in means and content. Music can use it.

If he retains it at the level of his piano performance in the Concerto, we shall have much to be happy about. It was beautifully neat, poised, cool. I personally feel the writing has more esprit, rather than one of the two, shorter, more pristine ones, is to be logically chosen. Nevertheless, Mr. Bernstein's version was full of quality and elegance.

This Berstein Trismegistus also gave us his "Facsimile," but to some disadvantage. Ballet music without dance is a clock without face or hands. Yesterday it was hard to know what emotional time it was in these pictures at a psychiatric exhibition. And the piece itself, though skilfully made bar by bar, seemed really a dull pretension, a cadenza for a slow movement in one of the longer Shostakovich symphonies.

The orchestra itself played very nicely, in fact, in the classical items quite handsomely. It should be impeccable, of course, after schooling under Messrs. Iturbi and Beecham. Being a small orchestra, some of the over-all impressions were not exactly king-size, but except for momentary vagaries in woodwind and brass, they were stimulatingly done.

T.H.P.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAR 10 1947

WRITES MUSICAL HISTORY: Lukas Foss, 24, Boston composer, makes last-minute notations on the score of his symphonic work "The Song of Songs" which will be performed eight times in nine days in various Eastern cities starting tonight in Boston. This sets a musical record in the history of new compositions tried out by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work was inspired by the Biblical "Song of Solomon." (AP Photo).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
MAR 10 1947

Benjamin Britten is composing his third opera, a co[illegible], based on de Maupassant's story, Le Rosier de Madame H[illegible] premiere planned for London in July.

(Can't understand why the Met never put on his [illegible] Grimes. I caught it the end of last summer at Koussevitzky's delightful Berkshire Music Festival. Unlike most operas, its tragic hero [illegible] a plain 19th century English fisherman. The action was as [illegible] as any tough whodunit thriller and I can still hear the chorus' [illegible] drawn-out warning wail P-E-T-E-R G-R-I-M-E-S. The music, to [illegible] at least, was exciting—and caused a good deal of heated discussion [illegible] music circles at the time. It brought down the house at the Festival. What's more, one is able to follow every line—it's in English.). . . .

* * *

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
MAR 11 1947

Public Figure.

Serge Koussevitzky's loss of his suit against a publisher for an unauthorized biography of himself is not so significant as the principle involved. The Boston Symphony Orchestra charged that the book written by Moses Smith and published by the new firm of Allen, Towne & Heath was an invasion of privacy. In handing down his decision, the Judge ruled that Dr. Koussevitsky was well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny and that the privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography was fictional or novelized in character.

The Judge's nine-page opinion answered Dr. Koussevitsky's allegation that the book contained false, misleading and damaging statements by saying that the conductor "must be left to his remedy at law as to any matters . . . which are shown to be libelous." It would appear therefore as though the plaintiff may have acted unwisely in not filing a libel suit in the first place, if he felt that he had a case.

Continuing his opinion, the Judge said: "Curiously enough, although there are many deprecatory statements they seem invariably followed by ameliorate observations or unreserved praise . . . There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency, or that takes the book out of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest."

This seems also to concur with extralegal opinion by reviewers throughout the land. Whereas many of them have questioned the merits of the author's critical approach to Dr. Koussevitsky's career with the Boston Orchestra, they have not denied his right to use that approach if he wanted to.

We feel inclined to believe that if the book had been entirely complimentary, Dr. Koussevitsky never would have regarded it as anything but an invasion of his privacy but would have accepted it all as the gospel truth. Nothing can be so outraged as a wounded [illegible]

[130]

This Clipping From
NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MAR 10 1947

Music

Rights of Privacy

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S $500,000 libel suit [redacted] Smith, author of the book, Koussevitzky, and the publishing firm of Allen, Towne and Heath indirectly involves everyone who writes or publishes books or articles dealing with any living celebrity.

In granting a court order restraining publication and distribution of the book, New York Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag predicted that the suit will establish a precedent indicating whether a biography may be published without the consent of the subject. The range of Koussevitzky's legal objections suggests, however, that the controversy may involve other and broader considerations than the one pointed out by Justice Shientag. The suit rests on three charges—that the book is libelous, in that it depicts the conductor's life and career "falsely and wrongfully"; that the publication of the text without Koussevitzky's consent constitutes a violation of the "rights-of-privacy" law, designed to protect individuals from the unauthorized use of their names for commercial purposes; and that the inclusion of unauthorized photographs constitutes a similar infringement.

Although I have read the book, I am not entitled to venture an estimate of its accuracy and critical perspective, lest I seem to be prejudging questions which will come before the court. But this very requirement of silence on my part, and on the part of others who might like to review the book, emphasizes the most far-reaching issue raised, or at least implied, by Koussevitzky's suit: Has a critic (and Smith is a recognized professional music critic with many years' experience on Boston papers) the right to express opinions about the professional—not the personal—aspects of an artist's career without asking the artist's permission to do so? If Smith has made errors of fact or interpretation which discredit Koussevitzky, his book will in due course be found libelous. Much subtler and more subject to debatable evaluation are the author's opinions about Koussevitzky's merits and deficiencies as a musician. If the court should find that Smith's critical judgments—as distinct from statements of alleged fact and analyses of actions and motives—amounted to violations of Koussevitzky's "rights of privacy," all independent musical criticism would be threatened, and with it all uninfluenced reviewing of books, plays, paintings, movies and phonograph records.

Any outcome of Koussevitzky's suit which even hinted at restraint upon free and reputable critical expression would more than counterbalance all the notable achievements of the Boston conductor's long and distinguished American career. Unhampered critical give-and-take is a fundamental requisite of the democratic growth of the arts. A continuing demonstration of competence—a matter of Olympian ease for Koussevitzky—should provide a more attractive answer to all slurs, real or fancied, than a repressive court action.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 11 1947

MUSIC AUDITIONS TO BEGIN

Trials for the Berkshire Student Orchestra Start Tomorrow

Auditions for instrumentalists for the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center will be held tomorrow morning in Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. Tympanists will be heard the same day at 6:30 P. M. back stage at Carnegie Hall.

Auditions for singers for the center's opera department will be heard by Boris Goldovsky, Frederic Cohen and Felix Wolfes in the chamber hall next Saturday and Sunday mornings.

The center will be opened for a six-week season this summer at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 11 1947

MISS RUSSELL'S NIECE ON RADIO TOMORROW

Miss Ellabelle Davis of New Rochelle, N. Y., famed negro opera singer, who, will be heard as soloist with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow night at 8.30 over Station WSPR and the ABC network, is the niece of Miss P. J. Russell of Hancock St., this city.

Miss Davis' performance tomorrow will be in the world premiere presentation of "The Song of Songs," a Biblical solo cantata by Lukas Foss. Miss Davis has also appeared with the Indianapolis Symphony, the New York Philharmonic Symphony, and more recently in a recital at Jordan Hall, Boston.

MAR 11 1947

'Anecdotes of the Famous:

Suffering

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has long boasted that he can look at any stage photograph of himself, no matter how old, and tell by the expression on his face, what composition he was conducting when the picture was taken.

One night at his home, he was showing a friend his photo album. The friend paused to scrutinize one photograph, in which Koussevitzky, with a fierce and pained look on his face, was leading the orchestra.

"I think I can tell what you were conducting here," guessed the friend brightly. "It must have been something emotional. Was it a Beethoven symphony?"

"No," said Koussevitzky. "As a matter of fact, it was a gay and tuneful Strauss waltz."

"But why the pained expression?"

"Oh, that," laughed Koussevitzky. "I had a toothache that night."

WATSEKA [illegible]
IROQUOIS [illegible]
MAR [illegible]

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

There are 108,202 miles of urban transit routes in the United States, over which 89,240 subways, street cars and buses are operated.

IDAHO FALLS, IDAHO
EVENING POST-REGISTER
MAR 11 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 11 1947

'Blue Monday' Program Played In Greene Hall

Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin Conducting, Features Tragic Works, But With Customary Mastery; Lukas Foss, Miss Davis Win Ovation

"Accent on anguish"—so one might summarily describe the program with which ~~the Boston~~ Symphony orchestra continued ~~the Smith college 1947 concert~~ course in John M. Greene hall Monday evening. For, the three-part offering was so predominently tragic that one experienced the sensation of having read too long at a sitting of laments and of elegies, becoming surfeited of sorrow, and feeling poignant need of a gay, lyric poem to break the mood.

There was no lack of musicianship here, Dr. Koussevitzky's veteran performers responding gratifyingly to conduction of Concert Master Richard Burgin on the podium. But, with the program selection we would quarrel, feeling a personal urgency, as the evening waned, for some small presentation of music as an instrument of joy and light. This was music to try men's souls, to send them home in solemn soliloquy, not with singing hearts and quickened tread. Too many browns and grays, and deep purples, in this picture, and not a smidgin of ciel blues, forest greens, and rosy pinks. Too much of heavy winter; no sign of spring.

Brand New Cantata Unwrapped

This was the rather general feeling, too, as we sensed it, for young Lukas Foss' "Song of Songs," written especially for the featured solo artist, Ellabelle Davis, who sang it well, exhibiting a consistently pleasing soprano voice, with tones well focused; florid passages performed easily, minus over-accentuation. We hope to hear her again one day, in a program of lyrics to afford better display of the power and versatility assocated with her name. Foss' handling of the Song of Solomon poetry, as he made it conform to his musical setting, dressed it too tediously in repetition. For the orchestra it is a good composition, and Foss guest-conducted it admirably. For the singer it has some limitations.

The accomplished young musiian (who will not have his 25th birthday until next August), chief pianist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, was commissioned by the League of Composers to write this Biblical solo cantata, his fourth commission to have been executed within a year. The work had its premiere last Friday evening at Symphony hall, Boston.

The cantata, of essentially melodic nature, is set for soprano and full symphony orchestra (with the exception of two horns, a trombone, and the bass tuba, which have been omitted from the scoring.) Conceived as a hymn of love, its music in following the Song of Solomon lyrics, King James version, essays to run the gamut of amorous expression, from the ecstasy of love's fulfillment to the tragedy of unrequited passion, culminating in a note of religious transfiguration.

The initial movement, bordering on the pastoral, opens with the passage, "Awake, O North Wind," which serves as an introduction to what is to follow, with a subtle fugue for the orchestra weaving freely around the vocal line.

Second Movement Best Music

In the second, and best movement of the cantata, set around the phrase, "Come, My Beloved," Mr. Foss has reverted to the "da capo aria" form, popular in the Bach period, but generally passed once-over-lightly by later composers.

In operatic recitative vein, movement three is linked by orchestral interlude to movement four. Inspired by church music of the early 17th century, and with "Set Me as a Seal Upon Thy Heart" as his theme, the composer has in the final phase of his newest work emphasized simple religious fervor. Mr. Foss, the orchestra, and Miss Davis were accorded a hearty ovation for their performance of the cantata, which gave Northamptonites opportunity to make personal acquaintance with the brilliant young composer who created his first works at the age of 15 years and who has since been composing almost without interruption.

The orchestra opened its program with a change in schedule, offering Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in lieu of the listed Schubert No. 5 in B-flat major. This "old acquaintance" was renewed favorably, and gave pleasure in its familiarity, and in the company's facile reading of it with notable purity.

Tchaikovsky Fourth Played Stirringly

But Conductor Burgin and the orchestra gave their most brilliant performance in the concluding Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony. Especially enjoyed were its passages wherein the 'cellos sang out in grievous lament, against the comparatively quiet passion of the earlier movements; and the scherzo, part three, where pizzicato language italicized the sorrow in different manner, affording temporary surcease from the heavy, induced melancholia that is the Tchaikovsky forte.

The symphony offered, in its robust finale, a zestful playing that pulled with the savagery of ocean undertow at emotions already weakened by impassioned dramatics of foregone pieces, and shattered the senses with a series of smashing climaxes attained via frenzied approaches. This is a difficult work to perform and conduct. Burgin and company left nothing lacking. We can still feel reverberations!—E. C. B.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It has been a great treat to have Bruno Walter again as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra (he was here for a week in 1923), and it has been an added treat to hear him in the music of Bruckner and Mahler, composers who are not for every conductor or even for every listener, but who find in Mr. Walter, and by common consent, their most sympathetic, most eloquent, most inspired interpreter.

At the concerts of this week Mr. Walter is playing the Mahler Fourth, with Desi Halban as soprano soloist. Previously we had heard the entire symphony but once, in March, 1945, and the last two movements three years before, both times from Richard Burgin. In view of the fact that New York has been hearing the work at intervals since 1904, the various conductors of the Boston Symphony may be said to have been singularly remiss. For the Fourth is a masterpiece, though not without its flaws.

The trouble with both Bruckner and Mahler is that they never could learn that enough is better than a feast. Even trifling cuts in the first and third movements of the Fourth Symphony would make it a work of unqualified delight, in spite of the fact that the four movements offer little contrast. They are all on the leisurely side, the only measures approaching real excitement occurring in one of the variations in the third. Hearing this division yesterday, as set forth berg" variation land (compose Spring," perf

---

Koussevitzky
Symphony Orc
Lotte Walte half of her fat ing of Mahler's
Samuel Chotzi sented Arturo two awards in (for his album phony No. 98, of Weber's " ture), and God Columbia Rec received the a mann for her bert's "Schoen cycle.
Other award best Quartet with Milton K a Mozart quin ese and Rob duet from "Tr
Ansermet and harmonic for vinsky's "Petr the best forei year, and to t or Prokofiev' Hebrew Theme Society was g he most ente
f the year.
Louis Unterm
f the procee Kolodin of Th spoke on beha five critics th tions. The din by Frederick the Review o distributed b hundred reco
the country.

IN THE

must include the name natures will be withheld should be brief and to Koussevitzky an

Editor:
Now that I have o
Bernstein and Serge
Symphony
too would like to add current critics—music volving around wheth an over-enthusias Bulletin's critics views sour grapes—remnants ate days with Lennie that recently "Sir G chestra in the quiet, d manner which befits and which inevitably music. It is especially when Bernstein conduc phony, the euphonious gratifying, even though tion may have been of acter. I feel that every to give each piece of mu interpretation rather th stereotyped pattern, of others.
To draw a simile, vitsky conducted th efficiently as a We his favorite steed;
to the ranch, rode the effort, more tenseness ciseness and compete er. After all, since serves as our criteri modes and method nie" do a terrific Providence.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 11 1947

RECORD ARTISTS RECEIVE AWARDS

In the presence of leading figures in the record and music field, the first annual recorded music awards were made at a dinner in the Hotel Plaza last night. The field of recorded music from opera to song was covered, with each winner receiving a framed plaque of a record in gold, with appropriate details beneath it.

Among those who were on hand to take their own prizes were Ezio Pinza (for an album of Mozart arias), Eugene Ormandy (for the Brahms violin concerto in which Joseph Szigeti was soloist), Wanda Landowska (Bach's "Goldberg" variations) and Aaron Copland (composer of "Appalachian Spring," performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra).

Lotte Walter accepted on behalf of her father for his conducting of Mahler's fourth symphony. Samuel Chotzinoff of NBC represented Arturo Toscanini, who won two awards in the orchestral field (for his album of Haydn's symphony No. 98, and a single record of Weber's "Freischuetz" overture), and Goddard Lieberson of Columbia Recording Corporation received the award to Lotte Lehmann for her recording of Schubert's "Schoene Muellerin" song cycle.

Other awards went to the Budapest Quartet for its recording, with Milton Katims, violinist, of a Mozart quintet; to Licia Albanese and Robert Merrill for a duet from "Traviata"; to Ernest Ansermet and the London Philharmonic for a version of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," considered the best foreign recording of the year, and to the Nowinski sextet for Prokofiev's "Overture on a Hebrew Theme." The Concert Hall Society was given an award for the most enterprising repertory of the year.

Louis Untermeyer was in charge of the proceedings, and Irving Kolodin of The New York Sun spoke on behalf of the jury of five critics that made the selections. The dinner was sponsored by Frederick Kugel, publisher of the Review of Recorded Music, distributed by more than two hundred record dealers through the country.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 12 1947

IN THE DAY'S MAIL

must include the name and address of the writer, natures will be withheld upon specific request, should be brief and to the point.—Ed.

Koussevitzky and Bernstein

Editor:

Now that I have observed both Leonard Bernstein and Serge Koussevitzky conduct ~~the Boston~~ Symphony here at Providence, I too would like to add my two cents to the current critics—music lovers controversy revolving around whether "Lennie" is simply an over-enthusiastic acrobat or whether the Bulletin's critics views were just a bunch of sour grapes—remnants of his "undergraduate days with Lennie at Harvard." It is true that recently "Sir Gay" conducted his orchestra in the quiet, dignified and majestic manner which befits an old master like him and which inevitably results in heavenly music. It is especially true, however, that when Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony, the euphonious results were equally gratifying, even though his methods of direction may have been of a more youthful character. I feel that every conductor should try to give each piece of music his own individual interpretation rather than try to follow a set, stereotyped pattern, according to the example of others.

To draw a simile, I might say that Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra as calmly and efficiently as a Western rancher would ride his favorite steed; Bernstein, being a visitor to the ranch, rode the strange steed with more effort, more tenseness, but with the same preciseness and competency as the horse's owner. After all, since only the ultimate result serves as our criterion, why quibble about modes and methods—besides doesn't "Lennie" do a terrific "Left, face!"

Providence. PAUL FAIRBROOK.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 11 1947

Ellabelle Davis Gives Excellent Performance in Smith Concert

By Willard M. Clark

Northampton, March 10—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, appeared in John M. Greene Hall tonight as part of the Smith College concert course. The concert also offered an opportunity to view the recently redecorated hall. It is very white, very bright and very modern. Its excellent acoustics do not appear to have been affected by the changes.

The novelty on the program was the performance of a Biblical solo cantata for soprano and orchestra by Lukas Foss, pianist of the orchestra and a first rate composer-conductor. Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was the soloist and Mr. Foss conducted the work. Based upon "The Song of Solomon," Mr. Foss calls the cantata "The Song of Songs."

Mr. Foss has written a powerful and dramatic work. Modern in idiom, it is at times oriental in color, vigorous in rhythm and skilfully constructed. The demands upon the singer are enormous. Difficult intervals, long phrases and tricky rhythms are everywhere. That Miss Davis met every demand superbly testifies to her fine musicianship, her splendid technical equipment and the range and color of the voice.

The concert opened with a magnificent reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. It was a full-bodied performance in the best tradition of this great orchestra. Mr. Burgin conducted easily with that touch of individuality always to be noted wher he steps upon the podium.

The final number, which we did no hear, was the Fourth symphony o Tschiakowsky.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 12 1947

Koussevitzky Biog Suit Cues Right to Depict Celebs Sans Permission

Lengthy treatment of the moot subject of unauthorized biographical works and how far they can go, which N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Schientag handed down last week in denying an injunction to music conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will have important repercussions in show biz, legalites believe. The subject recently came to the fore in the film industry when Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt raised strong objections to Metro's picturization of President Roosevelt in "The Beginning or the End." Advice of her lawyers against bringing a suit parallels Justice Shientag's ruling which decided the point for the first time in the state.

Koussevitzky's plaint was that his rights of privacy were invaded by the publication, advertisement and distribution of "Koussevitzky," biog written by Moses Smith, Boston critic. In laying down the rule-of-thumb which producers in every media can follow, the court lifted the veil of obscurity which had befogged treatment of living persons in radio, pix and legit, it's said.

Standard outlined by the court was summed up as follows:

"The right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character. An examination of the book complained of clearly shows that it is not fictional. That it may contain untrue statements does not transform it into the class of fiction." Justice Shientag then went on to say that any false depictions could be the subject of a libel action but not the basis of a damage action under the civil rights laws.

Opinion pointed up the distinction between persons whose duties or jobs have a public interest and those who live strictly private lives. Those in the public eye are subject to treatment by any of the media, court noted, and applying the test to Koussevitzky said: "The plaintiff in this case during the greater part of his life has been and continues to be an important public figure. His prominent achievements as a musician bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest."

Court's ruling, if upheld on appeal, leaves no doubt that Hollywood may limn a prominent figure with or without consent providing the depiction sticks to the facts and leaves out details of private life which are ordinarily none of the public's business, industry attorneys now conclude. Any advertising or exploitation which is confined to the film will also be free from the taint of invasion of private life under the same rules of conduct, it's believed.

KOUSSEVITZKY BOOK REMAINS UNDER BAN

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag denied yesterday a motion to vacate an interim stay he signed last Tuesday, restraining the publication and delivery of a biographical book entitled "Koussevitzky." The book was written by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, and was scheduled for release today by the publishing concern of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

The stay will remain in effect until Justice Shientag acts on an application for a temporary injunction, won by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who charged that the book was an unauthorized biography of himself and an invasion of his civil rights.

Morris Ernst, counsel for the publisher, in seeking to have the stay vacated, argued that such action was "unknown in literary history."

"This is not nearly as complicated as you make it," Justice Shientag replied. "I didn't enjoin the publishing field in general in granting this interim stay, I simply enjoined one publisher. Koussevitzky contends that this book constitutes a violation of his rights of privacy. There was enough basis to grant the stay. I granted it."

In seeking the stay, Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern, said the publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, and that the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under the direction of Bruno Walter was divided into two parts; a superb second half and something not quite up to that in the first period.

Beethoven's sixth (Pastorale) Symphony was the not too successful undertaking, in that it suffered from a highly subdued, even suppressed, exposition of rhythmic and dynamic features. The incredibly light and airy texture maintained throughout lost its effect through a tempi (especially in the second movement) that was andante without the con moto. In other words it dragged even in the vigorous sections.

But the same master's Third Symphony (Eroica) was another story. In it the elements of fire and majesty were combined with glowing results. But there was more than that. Unlike improvisatory jazz, symphonic music, by its very nature, must necessarily sound premeditated in its interpretative conception and physical execution of detail and general structure. There are the notes themselves, the explicit directions of the composer and the historical and traditional data that play a part in shaping the conductor's performance. Therefore, in the case of very familiar music such as a Beethoven's "Eroica," a veteran concert-goer gets most of his fun out of anticipation of what is to happen in the music and how the effect will be achieved.

But oddly enough that wasn't the case at yesterday's concert. There was a quality of spontaneity in the performance, that on logical reflection, seemed impossible and yet the actual impression of it remained very strong. Perhaps the explanation is in the fact that Bruno Walter brought such a vast quantity of fresh vibrancy and concentration to the shaping of each measure and phrase that the mind tended to linger with the notes as they were played instead of leaping ahead to what was to come. The whole effect of the new passages, therefore, was one of surprise and delight.

Mr. Walter has again shown that he has a way with the Boston Symphony that no other conductor this season has emulated. There seems to exist a mutual affinity or magnetism—call it what you like—between the orchestra members and the conductor that is surpassed only when Dr. Koussevitzky himself is on the podium. That vital exchange seems to be the quality most responsible for distinguishing this guest conductor from others we have had.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 12 1947

Last Night's Concert

By E. C. R.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

The seventh and concluding concert of the current Woolsey Hall series was heard last evening in Woolsey Hall, with the presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. After his recent month's vacation, Mr. Koussevitsky was at his technical best. Outstanding was the performance of the "Song of Songs" which its composer calls a "Biblical Cantata," which had its first performance by this orchestra in Boston last week. Mr. Foss, composer, is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has composed other successful numbers.

Before the concert began there was an announcement to the effect that a change would be made in the program in that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" would take the place of the programmed "Symphony No. 5 in B flat Major." This was greeted by exclamations of "Ohs" and "Ahs" of delight from the audience for this popular and familiar favorite. In all of Schubert's music there is a haunting and unutterable loveliness, an exquisite blending of tenderness, sweetness and purity, yet with strength, nobility and grandeur.

The composer of "The Song of Songs" chose his text from "The Song of Solomon." The first of the four movements was a fugue combined with the variation form; the second movement an aria, musically speaking; and the fourth, a "Prayer," was the loveliest of all. Ellabelle Davis, young Negro soprano, sang the solo part in this Foss composition, with outstanding clarity and understanding. She appeared in a beautiful red gown, trimmed with gold sequins. Although obviously nervous she sang with smooth vocalization, gaining poise as the song progressed. She evidenced genuine musical feeling. It is of interest to note that Miss Davis was born in New Rochelle, New York, and developed her voice through local church and community singing. After the completion of this number the composer appeared and received the acclaim of an enthusiastic audience.

Last night, again, the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made available to not only the many local folks who wanted to attend Woolsey Hall but could not procure seats, but to untold numbers who listened in at their radio at 8:30 to hear this justly famous organization.

After intermission "Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 44," by Sergei Rachmaninoff, was heard. Rachmaninoff never relinquished his early artistic convictions and his music is identified with the great nationalist movement in Russia. His compositions today sound like a voice out of the past, based on Russian literature, folk songs and legends; the music of the church, the color and feeling unmistakably Russian. This Symphony gave evidence of his masterful command of the orchestra and his ability to sustain, in the difficult large forms, a lofty inspiration. Sombre, lyrical, defiant, it was a work wholly representative of the Slavic genius. The second movement opened with harp, oboe, and violin issuing a call to the English horn, bassoon, and the rest of the strings. This solo part is repeated throughout the movement giving it a light, almost ethereal air, intermingled with the wide variety of moods expressed.

Particularly because it was the final concert of the season the audience seemed reluctant to leave Woolsey Hall, and bring to a close this most successful season of outstanding music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 11 1947

RECORD ARTISTS RECEIVE AWARDS

In the presence of leading figures in the record and music field, the first annual recorded music awards were made at a dinner in the Hotel Plaza last night. The field of recorded music from opera to song was covered, with each winner receiving a framed plaque of a record in gold, with appropriate details beneath it.

Among those who were on hand to take their own prizes were Ezio Pinza (for an album of Mozart arias), Eugene Ormandy (for the Brahms violin concerto in which Joseph Szigeti was soloist), Wanda Landowska (Bach's "Goldberg" variations) and Aaron Copland (composer of "Appalachian Spring," performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra).

Lotte Walter accepted on behalf of her father for his conducting of Mahler's fourth symphony. Samuel Chotzinoff of NBC represented Arturo Toscanini, who won two awards in the orchestral field (for his album of Haydn's symphony No. 98, and a single record of Weber's "Freischuetz" overture), and Goddard Lieberson of Columbia Recording Corporation received the award to Lotte Lehmann for her recording of Schubert's "Schoene Muellerin" song cycle.

Other awards went to the Budapest Quartet for its recording, with Milton Katims, violinist, of a Mozart quintet; to Licia Albanese and Robert Merrill for a duet from "Traviata"; to Ernest Ansermet and the London Philharmonic for a version of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," considered the best foreign recording of the year, and to the Nowinski sextet for Prokofiev's "Overture on a Hebrew Theme." The Concert Hall Society was given an award for the most enterprising repertory of the year.

Louis Untermeyer was in charge of the proceedings, and Irving Kolodin of The New York Sun spoke on behalf of the jury of five critics that made the selections. The dinner was sponsored by Frederick Kugel, publisher of the Review of Recorded Music, distributed by more than two hundred record dealers through the country.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 12 1947

IN THE DAY'S MAIL

must include the name and address of the writer, natures will be withheld upon specific request, should be brief and to the point.—Ed.

Koussevitzky and Bernstein

Editor:

Now that I have observed both Leonard Bernstein and Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony here at Providence, I too would like to add my two cents to the current critics—music lovers controversy revolving around whether "Lennie" is simply an over-enthusiastic acrobat or whether the Bulletin's critics views were just a bunch of sour grapes—remnants of his "undergraduate days with Lennie at Harvard." It is true that recently "Sir Gay" conducted his orchestra in the quiet, dignified and majestic manner which befits an old master like him and which inevitably results in heavenly music. It is especially true, however, that when Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony, the euphonious results were equally gratifying, even though his methods of direction may have been of a more youthful character. I feel that every conductor should try to give each piece of music his own individual interpretation rather than try to follow a set, stereotyped pattern, according to the example of others.

To draw a simile, I might say that Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra as calmly and efficiently as a Western rancher would ride his favorite steed; Bernstein, being a visitor to the ranch, rode the strange steed with more effort, more tenseness, but with the same preciseness and competency as the horse's owner. After all, since only the ultimate result serves as our criterion, why quibble about modes and methods—besides doesn't "Lennie" do a terrific "Left, face!"

Providence. PAUL FAIRBROOK.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 11 1947

Ellabelle Davis Gives Excellent Performance in Smith Concert

By W[illegible] M. Clark

Northampton, March 10—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, appeared in John M. Greene Hall tonight as part of the Smith College concert course. The concert also offered an opportunity to view the recently redecorated hall. It is very white, very bright and very modern. Its excellent acoustics do not appear to have been affected by the changes.

The novelty on the program was the performance of a Biblical solo cantata for soprano and orchestra by Lukas Foss, pianist of the orchestra and a first rate composer-conductor. Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was the soloist and Mr. Foss conducted the work. Based upon "The Song of Solomon," Mr. Foss calls the cantata "The Song of Songs."

Mr. Foss has written a powerful and dramatic work. Modern in idiom, it is at times oriental in color, vigorous in rhythm and skilfully constructed. The demands upon the singer are enormous. Difficult intervals, long phrases and tricky rhythms are everywhere. That Miss Davis met every demand superbly testifies to her fine musicianship, her splendid technical equipment and the range and color of the voice.

The concert opened with a magnificent reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. It was a full-bodied performance in the best tradition of this great orchestra. Mr. Burgin conducted easily with that touch of individuality always to be noted when he steps upon the podium.

The final number, which we did not hear, was the Fourth symphony of Tschiakowsky.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 12 1947

Koussevitzky Biog Suit Cues Right to Depict Celebs Sans Permission

Lengthy treatment of the moot subject of unauthorized biographical works and how far they can go, which N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Schientag handed down last week in denying an injunction to music conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will have important repercussions in show biz, legalites believe. The subject recently came to the fore in the film industry when Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt raised strong objections to Metro's picturization of President Roosevelt in "The Beginning or the End." Advice of her lawyers against bringing a suit parallels Justice Shientag's ruling which decided the point for the first time in the state.

Koussevitzky's plaint was that his rights of privacy were invaded by the publication, advertisement and distribution of "Koussevitzky," biog written by Moses Smith, Boston critic. In laying down the rule-of-thumb which producers in every media can follow, the court lifted the veil of obscurity which had befogged treatment of living persons in radio, pix and legit, it's said.

Standard outlined by the court was summed up as follows:

"The right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character. An examination of the book complained of clearly shows that it is not fictional. That it may contain untrue statements does not transform it into the class of fiction." Justice Shientag then went on to say that any false depictions could be the subject of a libel action but not the basis of a damage action under the civil rights laws.

Opinion pointed up the distinction between persons whose duties or jobs have a public interest and those who live strictly private lives. Those in the public eye are subject to treatment by any of the media, court noted, and applying the test to Koussevitzky said: "The plaintiff in this case during the greater part of his life has been and continues to be an important public figure. His prominent achievements as a musician bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest."

Court's ruling, if upheld on appeal, leaves no doubt that Hollywood may limn a prominent figure with or without consent providing the depiction sticks to the facts and leaves out details of private life which are ordinarily none of the public's business, industry attorneys now conclude. Any advertising or exploitation which is confined to the film will also be free from the taint of invasion of private life under the same rules of conduct, it's believed.

KOUSSEVITZKY BOOK REMAINS UNDER BAN

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag denied yesterday a motion to vacate an interim stay he signed last Tuesday, restraining the publication and delivery of a biographical book entitled "Koussevitzky." The book was written by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, and was scheduled for release today by the publishing concern of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

The stay will remain in effect until Justice Shientag acts on an application for a temporary injunction, won by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who charged that the book was an unauthorized biography of himself and an invasion of his civil rights.

Morris Ernst, counsel for the publisher, in seeking to have the stay vacated, argued that such action was "unknown in literary history."

"This is not nearly as complicated as you make it," Justice Shientag replied. "I didn't enjoin the publishing field in general in granting this interim stay, I simply enjoined one publisher. Koussevitzky contends that this book constitutes a violation of his rights of privacy. There was enough basis to grant the stay. I granted it."

In seeking the stay, Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern, said the publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, and that the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 12 1947

Last Night's Concert

By E. C. R.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

The seventh and concluding concert of the current Woolsey Hall series was heard last evening in Woolsey Hall, with the presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. After his recent month's vacation, Mr. Koussevitsky was at his technical best. Outstanding was the performance of the "Song of Songs" which its composer calls a "Biblical Cantata," which had its first performance by this orchestra in Boston last week. Mr. Foss, composer, is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has composed other successful numbers.

Before the concert began there was an announcement to the effect that a change would be made in the program in that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" would take the place of the programmed "Symphony No. 5 in B flat Major." This was greeted by exclamations of "Ohs" and "Ahs" of delight from the audience for this popular and familiar favorite. In all of Schubert's music there is a haunting and unutterable loveliness, an exquisite blending of tenderness, sweetness and purity, yet with strength, nobility and grandeur.

The composer of "The Song of Songs" chose his text from "The Song of Solomon." The first of the four movements was a fugue combined with the variation form; the second movement an aria, musically speaking; and the fourth, a "Prayer," was the loveliest of all. Ellabelle Davis, young Negro soprano, sang the solo part in this Foss composition, with outstanding clarity and understanding. She appeared in a beautiful red gown, trimmed with gold sequins. Although obviously nervous she sang with smooth vocalization, gaining poise as the song progressed. She evidenced genuine musical feeling. It is of interest to note that Miss Davis was born in New Rochelle, New York, and developed her voice through local church and community singing. After the completion of this number the composer appeared and received the acclaim of an enthusiastic audience.

Last night, again, the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made available to not only the many local folks who wanted to attend Woolsey Hall but could not procure seats, but to untold numbers who listened in at their radio at 8:30 to hear this justly famous organization.

After intermission "Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 44," by Sergei Rachmaninoff, was heard. Rachmaninoff never relinquished his early artistic convictions and his music is identified with the great nationalist movement in Russia. His compositions today sound like a voice out of the past, based on Russian literature, folk songs and legends; the music of the church, the color and feeling unmistakably Russian. This Symphony gave evidence of his masterful command of the orchestra and his ability to sustain, in the difficult large forms, a lofty inspiration. Sombre, lyrical, defiant, it was a work wholly representative of the Slavic genius. The second movement opened with harp, oboe, and violin issuing a call to the English horn, bassoon, and the rest of the strings. This solo part is repeated throughout the movement giving it a light, almost ethereal air, intermingled with the wide variety of moods expressed.

Particularly because it was the final concert of the season the audience seemed reluctant to leave Woolsey Hall, and bring to a close this most successful season of outstanding music.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under the direction of Bruno Walter was divided into two parts; a superb second half and something not quite up to that in the first period.

Beethoven's sixth (Pastorale) Symphony was the not too successful undertaking, in that it suffered from a highly subdued, even suppressed, exposition of rhythmic and dynamic features. The incredibly light and airy texture maintained throughout lost its effect through a tempi (especially in the second movement) that was andante without the con moto. In other words it dragged even in the vigorous sections.

But the same master's Third Symphony (Eroica) was another story. In it the elements of fire and majesty were combined with glowing results. But there was more than that. Unlike improvisatory jazz, symphonic music, by its very nature, must necessarily sound premeditated in its interpretative conception and physical execution of detail and general structure. There are the notes themselves, the explicit directions of the composer and the historical and traditional data that play a part in shaping the conductor's performance. Therefore, in the case of very familiar music such as a Beethoven's "Eroica," a veteran concert-goer gets most of his fun out of anticipation of what is to happen in the music and how the effect will be achieved.

But oddly enough that wasn't the case at yesterday's concert. There was a quality of spontaneity in the performance, that on logical reflection, seemed impossible and yet the actual impression of it remained very strong. Perhaps the explanation is in the fact that Bruno Walter brought such a vast quantity of fresh vibrancy and concentration to the shaping of each measure and phrase that the mind tended to linger with the notes as they were played instead of leaping ahead to what was to come. The whole effect of the new passages, therefore, was one of surprise and delight.

Mr. Walter has again shown that he has a way with the Boston Symphony that no other conductor this season has emulated. There seems to exist a mutual affinity or magnetism—call it what you like—between the orchestra members and the conductor that is surpassed only when Dr. Koussevitzky himself is on the podium. That vital exchange seems to be the quality most responsible for distinguishing this guest conductor from others we have had.

CRANSTON, R. I
HERALD
3/13/47

TUNING FORK ◆ ◆ by Hugo Norden

Moses Smith's new biography of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Serge Koussevitzky seems to keep getting out of and into trouble. The noted conductor is at the moment written about more than any other American musician. On the market is one biography that he likes, and the other one by Moses Smith that he does not like. In addition to all this, he is planning his own autobiography.

In the meantime, the 'unauthorized' book is getting a great deal of priceless publicity and most everybody knows what is in it anyway. The more Koussevitzsky battles the book the more famous it will be, and there are already enough copies in circulation so that it is quite possible to get the information.

Somehow, the fight that Koussevitzsky has put up against this book does not seem to increase his stature either as a musician or as a man. If he can produce good music, what does it matter that some rather unpleasant episodes of his life have come out into the open? There is, perhaps, not a figure in public life today—or in any other day, for that matter whose career has not included some events he would prefer to forget. To oppose the exposition of such facts is a little silly.

* * *

Speaking of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last week the program over the radio ended a little too soon so the announcer had to pad out the time with some talk about the Vaughan Williams symphony that had just been played. In a learned and sepulchral tone of voice he explained how the symphony was based on 'model' scales. Of course, what he meant was 'modal' scales. Just another case of what the listening public sometimes fails to realize: that the fellows who do the talking over the radio more often than not do not know what they are talking about. They merely read a script prepared by somebody else.

* * *

A rather comical situation happened a few weeks ago at a formal and well-mannered college concert. A fellow came in late and a little absent-mindedly. As a result he found himself in the middle of the hall with a lighted cigar in his mouth. It was with the greatest difficulty that could think of some way to dispose of the cigar without attracting still more attention.

* * *

A witty student in composition was assigned the task of writing a vocal fugue on a Biblical text. The chosen passage contained the phrase "blessings without measure", so when he wrote the music for this part of it, he omitted all measure lines.

The professor suggested that although the blessings couldn't be measured, the piece would have to be if he wanted a mark on it; and added slyly that the music was hardly so good that its virtues couldn't be measured.

Apparently students never seem to realize that the professors all were young once too. Even in elementary school the youngsters think the teachers miss their petty pranks. As if the teachers didn't know twice as many tricks as the kids do!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 13 1947

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Another program of 20th century music was presented in Carnegie Hall last night. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were responsible for this one. The three works played had all been composed within the last 12 years.

Lukas Foss' "The Song of Songs," a cantata for soprano and orchestra, had its first New York performance. The text came from "The Song of Solomon." It was somewhat abbrevated and apparently subject to Bostonian refinement. The music was surprisingly conservative.

Foss has plenty of talent. His ability to create atmospheric music is evident in all of the four movements. His ability to handle musical prosody remains a stumbling block. The text is better set than his others, but he still does strange things with the English language.

The work opens with a pleasant fugal chatter among the woodwinds. There is a disproportionate time spent on some of the text, but the general effect is good. The second movement catches the fancy. It trips along in a winding English country-dance style. When its light-heartedness gives way to the drama of the third movement and the "prayer" of the fourth, inspiration appears to lag a bit.

* * *

The demand for a flexible soprano voice was admirably met by Ellabelle Davis. When she soared into the high reaches of the second movement she achieved a purity and a velvety quality of exceptional texture. Her lower register was less satisfying in the third movement, but the Negro quality of the spiritual-like finale showed again the lovely quality of her voice.

Martinu's Concerto Grosso and Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony completed the program. The former held its own on further acquaintance. Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera played the piano parts with conspicuous success. The Rachmaninoff sounded old-fashioned and dull despite Koussevitzky's efforts to give it all the Bostonians could.

There is no need to expound on how they played.

* * *

Daniza Ilitsch, a young Yugoslav soprano, made an auspicious debut as Desdemona in Verdi's "Otello" at the Metropolitan last night. Her voice has quality and power. She has a good dramatic sense. The combination made her performance of more than ordinary interest.

In the last act she gave the impression of an outstanding newcomer. The reservations on changes of register and unfocused tones did not diminish the fact she has the potentialities to be an attraction at the Met.

MAR 13 1947

GENE HAMILTON

ONE OF THE busiest announcers on the networks today is Gene Hamilton. He lists the Boston Symphony, "Professor Quiz" and "It's Your Business" among his ABC announcing chores.

MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS
MAR 13 1947

Book Freedom—The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, can control music with a wave of his baton, but literature is another horse. So ruled our Judge Bernard Shientag when the Boston band leader sought to stop a book just published about himself by a Boston music critic, Moses Smith. Koussy wanted the book withdrawn because he hadn't authorized it. The judge says writers need no authorization to write on subjects within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny. Koussy says that invades his privacy. Since when are famous characters entitled to privacy? That's a luxury only the rest of us can enjoy.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 13 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith. Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc. $4.00.

By HAROLD A. VON ARX
Brooklyn College

For many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been an outstanding feature of the musical life of America. Much of the credit for its excellence must be given to its great conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has led the orchestra since 1924.

Unorthodox Method

He was born in Vishny-Volotchok in 1874. After the customary early vicissitudes of great musicians, he learned to play the double-bass in order to be admitted to the Philharmonic School in Moscow. He became a virtuoso on this ungainly instrument. His first marriage ended in a divorce in 1905, whereupon he married an extremely wealthy woman. Financial independence freed him from his solo and orchestral work so that he had the opportunity to devote himself to conducting. His preparation for this career was quite unorthodox, and he succeeded, as Smith says, "not by virtue of, but in spite of, his method." He virtually began at the "top"; hiring a pianist to play for him while he practiced using the baton, then engaging musicians to play under his leadership. Soon he had his own orchestra, and he was subsequently invited to act as guest conductor for important Russian orchestras.

From the beginning, he performed the works of unknown composers, like Scriabin, and later established a publishing house devoted to bringing new talent before the public. His fame spread throughout Europe; he was conducting a series of concerts in Paris when he was selected to come to America to direct the Boston Symphony. In America, he has continued to evince his interest in the works of young composers, as we can readily see by the number of compositions by American musicians that he has played. His dream of an American "Academy" has been partially fulfilled by the tremendous success of the Berkshire Festivals.

Amateurish Style

Moses Smith's biography is marred by several factors. The style is amateurish and pedestrian. There are so many insignificant details that no event stands out very prominently. There are amazing statements like, "Russian music, particularly opera, had greater vitality than German, Italian or French" (in 1906). Anyone who had heard the Boston Symphony must have been impressed by its superb tone quality. Smith gives Koussevitzky his proper share of credit for this achievement.

Dr. Koussevitzky is suing the publishers of this book in an attempt to prevent its publication because he says it "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career." Without attempting to evaluate the merits of his plea, we may safely say that he does deserve a better tribute from America than this book.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR
MAR 13 1947

Ellabelle Davis Wins Acclaim Of Critics in 'Song of Songs'

Miss Ellabelle Davis, of 89 Horton Avenue, soprano, appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall in New York City last night singing the solo part in "The Song of Songs" composed for orchestra and voice by Lukas Foss, a League of Composers' commission. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Using as its text four passages from the biblical book, the cantata is dedicated to Miss Davis who was singled out by the League in 1946 as the "outstanding American singer of the year."

According to the New York critics, Miss Davis' work last night was apparently the saving grace of the composition, which had its New York premiere. The composition was given its world premiere in Boston on Friday and will be heard again tonight in Philadelphia, with Miss Davis singing.

Virgil Thomson of the New York Herald Tribune said:

"If Ellabelle Davis had not been present to charm us all in the solo part with her lovely voice and perfect musicianship, I am afraid the whole number would have fallen pretty flat."

He said the "piece as a whole, though clearly the work of a gifted composer, is instrumentally stiff, vocally ungrateful and harmonically rather a jumble."

Olin Downes, of the New York Times wrote:

"We do not feel that Lukas Foss' setting of verses of the King James version of the "Song of Songs" need long detain us. He had as his interpreter of the text Ellabelle Davis. The sensuous beauty of her voice constituted a feature of the occasion".

Douglas Watt, of the New York Daily News said:

"The performance had the benefit of an exquisite voice belonging to Ellabelle Davis and reminding me somewhat, in its even and beautiful texture, of that of the late Ruby Elzy. The second of the four sections, concerning itself with vines and tender grapes, was charming, contrasting a kind of country-dance theme in the orchestra with a folksong-like air for voice."

Miss Davis will return to New York tomorrow, appearing in th rk at the Brooklyn Academ Music and on Saturday
Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 13 1947

Music

New Cantata Heard at Carnegie

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Serge Koussevitzky's diversi program found many friendly teners at the Boston Symph
Orchestra's concert in Carn Hall last evening. The list cluded the Rachmaninoff Th
Symphony, Martinu's Conce
Grosso for Chamber Orches and the first local performance
"The Song of Songs," a solo c tata in four movements, for prano and orchestra by Lu Foss, with Ellabelle Davis to s the vocal part.

Composed in 1935, the Ra maninoff Third is far from be the equal of the Second, wh was completed in 1906. The m recent piece has a certain gen air about it, even in those broo ing moments that are always b ing discovered in Rachmaninof music. Further, is has an orche tration a la Hollywood, you mig say, which would be a dilute co bination of Debussy, Ravel, K telanetz, etc., with every so of a fillip or two of the Rachma noff simplicity.

The symphony was extrem well performed. Dr. Koussevit drawing the bow across the chestra, so to speak, with a sw and power that couldn't help ting the results it did.

Mr. Foss, a considerably talen ed young man—he is sever months shy of 25—has written cantata which does not entirely
I believe, fit either the sense o the sounds of the Biblical text
"The Song of Solomon." Abou the sense, there is the sort of mood in the opening stanza, "Awake, O North Wind," that has the effec of an invocation.

The third stanza, and consequently the third movement, i better realized with the wailing and the grieving quality of the music.

The fourth movement may properly claim a distinction of some kind or other by the unconventional type of the melody.

About the sounds of the text, the pure music of the King James version, Mr. Foss does all he can, apparently, to break their continuous prosodic flow. He has the soprano singing measures of inter[illegible], sometimes a Handelian, coloratura. But in order to keep the singer going on and on, he writes more and more music around snatches of verbal phrases, instead of around the whole lines with their graceful, phonetic beauty.

Certainly there must be other devices than the now archaic one of repeating, for reasons of brevity of text, one vocalized vowel or a pair of syllables or words until they stuff the ear with monotony.

Miss Davis sang with purity of tone and expression. Her florid work was really something. I did think, though, that her voice did not come through consistently in dynamic or color balance with the orchestra.

The evening's best, for this reporter, at least, was the Martinu Concerto Grosso—Mr. Foss and Bernard Zighera at the two pianos
—a fine, precision-work score, which teems with vitality, particularly the concluding Rondo

THE JEWIS
TIMES BROOKLINE
3/13/47

Auth
By K

By ENID

Current contro facts and comm in the propose publication on vitzky that has brows of musi ruffled the com Boston Symph
conducto
author one bit,
"pretty careful book."

Moses Smith,
sic critic of the
at the same time peared first with phony in 1924, watched the enough can career and ject so thorou
Continued

vitzky has n charges.

Dr. K that the book privacy.
sevitzky,
Heath, Inc., N raphy was for publicatio Its sale and up at first w of the New entertained porary inju Shientag's d on March 4, temporary i the book.

Since that mediate stay cation and sued by Ass Cohn of the New York S
fect until M pellate Divis peal by Dr
Justice S

Comme charges, who watch reer in Bo the Boston
the Boston explains th possible very caref tention to terial in newspapers man I rea sible to and I ha over caref fore it w cation," h

"Biogra in the p definite p sists, "for enjoyment the subje

Accord critic ing in Mr. expr book geth any abou worl

SERGE Kouss
phony conductor, preme court askin lication of a new
by Moses Smith. book had invaded ized and "falsely his life and musi

But Justice B plea, ruling that put him well wit est and scrutiny.
book dealt almo ductor's musical privacy statute ized biography alized.

The decision
New York state

Public figure both major and look possible realize they some of it p meant. The interest and sequences.

THE JEWISH WEEKLY
TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS
3/13/47

Author Unruffled By Koussevitzky

By ENID GREER

Current controversy over the facts and comments included in the proposed biographical publication on Serge Koussevitzky that has arched the eyebrows of music lovers and ruffled the composure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, doesn't bother the author one bit, because he was "pretty careful in writing the book."

Moses Smith, who became music critic of the Boston American at the same time Koussevitzky appeared first with the Boston Symphony in 1924, feels that he has watched the conductor closely enough during his entire American career and researched the subject so thoroughly that Koussevitzky has no ground for his charges.

Continued on Page Four

(Photo by Samuel Cooper)

MOSES SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky has charged that the book invades his right of privacy. Entitled simply "Koussevitzky," (Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., New York,) the biography was originally scheduled for publication on February 15. Its sale and distribution was held up at first while Justice Shientag of the New York Supreme Court entertained arguments for a temporary injunction. In Justice Shientag's decision, handed down on March 4, he refused to grant a temporary injunction restraining the book.

Since that decision an intermediate stay restraining publication and delivery has been issued by Associate Justice Albert Cohn of the Appellate Division in New York State to remain in effect until March 14 when the Appellate Division will hear an appeal by Dr. Koussevitzky from Justice Shientag's ruling.

Commenting on the conductor's charges, newspaperman Smith, who watched Koussevitzky's career in Boston from his posts on the Boston Evening American and the Boston Evening Transcript, explains that he sifted out all the possible evidence and weighed it very carefully, giving special attention to previously printed material in books, magazines and newspapers. "As a newspaper man I realize fully that it is possible to make libelous mistakes, and I had the manuscript gone over carefully by an attorney before it was submitted for publication," he remarks.

"Biographies of prominent men in the public eye serve a very definite purpose," the author insists, "for they provide increased enjoyment and understanding of the subjects in question."

According to the author, a music critic has been recognized as having a pretty well established place in our civilization. "The critic," Mr. Smith says, "has a right to express a responsible opinion. The book was not hastily thrown together, nor is it debunking in any way. It is a serious work about an important figure in the world today. Koussevitzky is a big man and has had a big career; ar although I disagree with him certain artistic grounds, I thir the public will have a better a preciation of the conductor's i terpretation of music through b ography."

As to the biography being u authorized, the author explain "at first Dr. Koussevitzky agree to help me in the work but afte I had spent months doing pe sonal research and had gotten th help of other researchers, it be came apparent to me that I coul not rely on the conductor's a sistance. So I went ahead on m own. I never intended to hav any strings attached to the worl I would not have undertaken it o that premise."

The biography in question based on previously printed ma terial, personal interviews wit friends of the conductor, M Smith's own observation of Kous sevitzky and contacts with hin 'Only one chapter of the book de parts from this objective ap proach,'" the author declares, "an I feel as a critic that I have ever right to include that section in th biography."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 13 1947

Ellabelle Davis, Soloist, In Foss' 'Song of Songs'

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The talents of a 24-year-old American composer, a text from the Old Testament, a young Negro soprano, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, joined forces last night for a musical event of uncommon interest. "The Song of Songs," called by the composer, Lukas Foss, "Second Biblical Solo Cantata for Soprano and orchestra," had its first New York performance at Carnegie Hall with Ellabelle Davis as soloist.

Mr. Foss has set his text of excerpts from "The Song of Solomon" against an intricate but expressive orchestral background which never interferes with the emotional expression of the voice.

Not until the final movement does he utilize melodic fragments which derive from the traditional Jewish liturgical style, and then through their subtle use they seem to be present by implication. The work is singable and emotionally stirring. But its approach is fresh like a salt wind from Mr. Foss' Boston habitat, where he is official pianist of the visiting orchestra. There is no overweight or ponderousness.

Miss Davis with glowing high notes and some stunning soft tones also in the top register accomplished a superb performance of the solo portion with the orchestra achieving the same high quality.

URBANA, ILL.
COURIER
MAR 14 1947

SERGE Koussevitzky, famed Boston Symphony conductor, filed suit in New York supreme court asking an injunction to stop publication of a new biography "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith. The conductor claimed the book had invaded his privacy, was unauthorized and "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career.

But Justice Bernard Shientag denied the plea, ruling that Koussevitzky's achievements put him well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny. The jurist noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

The decision was the first of its kind in New York state.

Public figures in the world of the arts, both major and minor, are disposed to overlook possible invasions of privacy since they realize they have profited from publicity, some of it perhaps in dubious taste if well meant. They are "within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and must take the consequences.

THE EVENING BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Friday, March 14, 1947

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs Boston Orchestra in Forum Concert

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

THE one and only Boston Symphony made its single Philadelphia appearance of the season at the Academy of Music last night before a very large and enthusiastic audience.

The Philadelphia Forum is to be thanked for securing this wonderful group and its equally amazing leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston conductor gave an excellently balanced program, which featured two novelties as far as Philadelphia was concerned, and one symphony which is familiar to all.

The program opened with Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Scored for strings, woodwinds, and two pianos, Martinu's work proved a fascinating composition.

The first movement is filled with rhythmic movement, while the second is an extended melody of considerable beauty in the lower strings which is always expressive. The concluding section is lively and full of polyphonic activity with much elaborate ornamentation by the pianos. These latter instruments were brilliantly played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera.

Mr. Foss, who is 25, was further and most impressively emphasized by his "Song of Songs," a Biblical Cantata for Soprano and Orchestra. Born in Berlin, the young composer was brought up in the United States. He has taken his text from the King James version of "The Song of Solomon" and has divided it into four distinct parts. The cantata is scored for full orchestra with a very extended and demanding solo for soprano voice.

Last night, Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was entrusted with this difficult job. The vocal line makes great demands on the singer's range and also insists that she sing both very loud and very soft. Miss Davis met these requirements superbly, singing with impeccable musicianship and with much feeling for the text and phrase.

Her voice is a handsome instrument, not flawlessly equalized in all its registers, yet capable of many lovely and subtle effects. At times her vocal line was quite instrumental.

To go back to Mr. Foss' piece, despite the fact that some of the sections seemed to lack compactness and to meander and repeat themselves, the music is on a pretty grand and imposing level. It is written with great skill in its orchestration and with unimpeachable sincerity and depth of feeling. The effect it made was decidely impressive.

The second half of the program was all Koussevitzky. Here the Russian conductor unleashed the vehemence and intensity of his extraordinary temperament in a memorable performance of the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony.

He conducted with unflagging enthusiasm and threw himself heart and soul into his work. Such magnanimity and expenditure of self cannot help but generate a very definite reaction from an audience. Playing the final movement at a very high voltage, the distinguished conductor was the recipient of an ovation which was punctuated by loud "Bravos!"

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
MAR 14 1947

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs Boston Orchestra in Forum Concert

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

THE one and only Boston Symphony made its single Philadelphia appearance of the season at the Academy of Music last night before a very large and enthusiastic audience.

The Philadelphia Forum is to be thanked for securing this wonderful group and its equally amazing leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston conductor gave an excellently balanced program, which featured two novelties as far as Philadelphia was concerned, and one symphony which is familiar to all.

The program opened with Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Scored for strings, woodwinds, and two pianos, Martinu's work proved a fascinating composition.

The first movement is filled with rhythmic movement, while the second is an extended melody of considerable beauty in the lower strings which is always expressive. The concluding section is lively and full of polyphonic activity with much elaborate ornamentation by the pianos. These latter instruments were brilliantly played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera.

Mr. Foss, who is 25, was further and most impressively emphasized by his "Song of Songs," a Biblical Cantata for Soprano and Orchestra. Born in Berlin, the young composer was brought up in the United States. He has taken his text from the King James version of "The Song of Solomon" and has divided it into four distinct parts. The cantata is scored for full orchestra with a very extended and demanding solo for soprano voice.

Last night, Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was entrusted with this difficult job. The vocal line makes great demands on the singer's range and also insists that she sing both very loud and very soft. Miss Davis met these requirements superbly, singing with impeccable musicianship and with much feeling for the text and phrase.

Her voice is a handsome instrument, not flawlessly equalized in all its registers, yet capable of many lovely and subtle effects. At times her vocal line was quite instrumental.

To go back to Mr. Foss' piece, despite the fact that some of the sections seemed to lack compactness and to meander and repeat themselves, the music is on a pretty grand and imposing level. It is written with great skill in its orchestration and with unimpeachable sincerity and depth of feeling. The effect it made was decidely impressive.

The second half of the program was all Koussevitzky. Here the Russian conductor unleashed the vehemence and intensity of his extraordinary temperament in a memorable performance of the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony.

He conducted with unflagging enthusiasm and threw himself heart and soul into his work. Such magnanimity and expenditure of self cannot help but generate a very definite reaction from an audience. Playing the final movement at a very high voltage, the distinguished conductor was the recipient of an ovation which was punctuated by loud "Bravos!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 14 1947

'Song of Songs' Has Premiere; Illitsch Debut

By DOUGLAS WATT

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

An unusually affecting piece of new music was heard last night at Carnegie Hall where Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were packing them in, as usual. It was "The Song of Songs," a cantata for soprano and orchestra by the young composer-pianist Lukas Foss, and it was the local premiere.

Composed last year. "The Song Of Songs" has a sturdy lyrical quality. Its unassuming loveliness, heightened by a graceful and soaring vocal part, never falters throughout its half-hour length.

The performance had the benefit of an exquisite voice belonging to Ellabelle Davis and reminding me somewhat, in its even and beautiful texture, of that of the late Ruby Elzy. The second of the four sections, concerning itself with the "vines" with "tender grapes," was charming, contrasting a kind of country-dance theme in the orchestra with a folksong-like air for voice.

Debut at the Met.

Daniza Illitsch, Yugoslavian soprano who arrived in this country just a few weeks ago, made her American debut last night at the Met as Desdemona in a performance of Verdi's "Otello."

A roly-poly and cheerful-looking young singer, Miss Illitsch displayed a voice of ample volume but remarkably uneven quality. For the most part, it was an expressive but rather coarse voice, especially in the lower register.

The duet at the end of the first act, with Ramon Vinay as Otello, went along well enough. In the second-act quartet, Miss Illitsch had a grating tone. I missed the third act to hear the new Foss work at Carnegie Hall. Back for the fourth, I found her long solo in the bed-chamber good in some places and woefully bad in others.

Leonard Warren, as Iago, seemed to me far and away the best member of the cast. Vinay's tenor simply isn't dramatic enough to carry the name-role convincingly. Fritz Busch conducted; a bit too loudly, at times, I thought.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 14 1947

The New Records

By IRVING KOLODIN.

One of the authentic novelties of the year is now available with Decca's importation from its English affiliate of Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings." It also brings to attention the much-admired English tenor, Peter Pears, and another member of the horn-playing Brain family, this one Dennis. The composer is his own conductor.

"Serenade for etc," is a singularly prosaic title for a work of this one's poetic objective. Britten has poetic texts from such authors as Cotten, Tennyson, Blake, Jonson and Keats, each complementing the other in atmosphere, and woven them into a consecutive pattern. It is, in effect, a song cycle on the scale of Mahler, with texts written by various individuals.

There is some impressive music in the sequence—notably the setting of Tennyson's "The Splendor Falls on Castle Walls," the Blake "Elegy" and the Jonson hymn—but some also that fails to match the task Britten set for himself. Perhaps when I have heard the Keats setting a few more times it will mean more to me than it does thus far.

All of it, however, makes absorbing occupation for the remarkable Pears, who is the possessor not only of an uncommon high tenor voice but also the artistry to go with it. His diction throughout is fastidious and his ability to handle the coloratura writing of the Jonson "Hymn" is notable in these days of singers who prefer the even tenor for their ways. Brain is also a virtuoso on his instrument, and the reproduction of it is a special treat for those who love fine French horn playing but rarely have the opportunity to hear it at this length. Britten's direction is fluent and the reproduction of the total sound is of the quality Decca has led us to expect (Decca album EDA 7).

Others by Contemporaries.

Victor's contribution to this batch of works by contemporaries is a stunning "Prelude and Allegro" by Walter Piston for organ and orchestra. I use the word "stunning" in a quite literal sense, for the work is plainly meant for a ceremonial occasion, possessing a kind of Handelian energy along with that forthright directness which is as distinctive of Piston as anything he possesses. It is also delivered with impressive sonority by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky's direction, and E. Power Biggs contributes more dynamic organ playing than he customarily does to Bach. The recording, as the foregoing adjectives imply, does well by all concerned (Victor 11-9262).

Aram Khatchurian, who seems to be this year's Shostakovitch, is in again, this time with a ballet suite from his lengthy work "Gayne," performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra directed by Efrem Kurtz. Though this is plainly a more practical job of composition than either the Britten or the Piston, it is likely to double the sales of the two combined, for it is eminently in the "Prince Igor" local color tradition of Russian writing, tossed off with facility and considerable charm. Khatchurian could probably add a few chapters to Rimsky's famous treatise on orchestration right now, and he's still a growing boy, musically. Efrem Kurtz does the score in his best "Gaite Parisienne" manner and the orchestra plays riotously well. Better wait till your neighbors are out to play the "Dance of the Kurds," it's that loud. (Columbia album 664).

The Lighter Side.

Those others, like myself, who missed Boyd Raeburn and his orchestra on their first time around (it was during the war) will benefit from Musicraft's reissue of some sides made for a no-longer available label. The first to reach me are "Interlude" and "March of the Boyds," and I had to get up and check the record to make sure I hadn't put on a new Duke Ellington which was in the same box. That suggests something about Raeburn (the side was "Interlude"), but shouldn't be interpreted as condemning him. It's an Ellington manner, but with plenty of individuality too. The recording is good, the surfaces not so good. (Musicraft 489).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1947

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Ellabelle Davis, soprano. The program:
Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra ....Bohuslav Martinu
Pianists: Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera
The Song of Songs, Cantata for soprano and orchestra............Lukas Foss
First Performance in New York
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, Op. 44..................Rachmaninoff

One Good Piece

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave the first New York performance of a four-movement work for soprano and orchestra, "The Song of Songs," by Lukas Foss, a League of Composers' commission.

* * *

The text of this cantata (what there is of it, for even Handel at his most repetitive never overworked so shamelessly as Mr. Foss has done a few brief phrases) is out of the Biblical "Song of Solomon." The four movements are well contrasted in character without any one of them being striking for expressive power. The most satisfactory in melodic material is the second, a sort of old-English style hornpipe. The rest, though they contain a few near-Eastern references, are neutral in character; and their themes, though appropriate enough to musical development in the imitative contrapuntal manner, are neither unusually picturesque nor very good for song.

The piece as a whole, though clearly the work of gifted composer, is instrumentally stiff, vocally ungrateful and harmonically rather a jumble; being full of facile contradictory dissonances where clean intervals would be acoustically more advantageous both to the voice and to the sentiment of the text, which is in every way straightforward. There are a few excellent moments, and the general conception has amplitude; but the work drags from a lack of pointed and apt musical ideas. If Ellabelle Davis had not been present to charm us all in the solo part with her lovely voice and perfect musicianship, I am afraid that the whole number would have fallen pretty flat.

* * *

Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony fell even flatter, the conductor just managing to get off the stage after one return before the meager applause died away. It is a long piece, loosely sewn together out of bits of piano-style improvisation, souvenirs from the memory of a great and cultured musical personality. One by one these have sentimental appeal. Together they make a sort of scrapbook, better suited to inattentive radio listening then to formal concert presentation.

* * *

The evening's one first-class piece was Martinu's Concerto Grosso (for two pianos and, in Wednesday's version, a rather large small orchestra). This has animation, style and ingenuity. Its harmony is original, its instrumentation skillful, its melodic content first-class and its rhythm no end invigorating. Its performance was impeccable, particularly stylish being the execution of the piano parts by Lukas Foss, composer of "The Song of Songs," and Bernard Zighera. The orchestra was in form for this piece. The others did not sound so well, because they are not so well written. No orchestra can make a fine effect with poor musical ideas and an unbalanced score, not even the Boston Symphony; and both the other scores were like that.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 15 1947

Boston Symphony Plays to Capacity Academy Audience

A capacity audience attended last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, with the program featuring "Song of Songs," a new cantata for soprano and orchestra by Lukas Foss.

Ellabelle Davis was soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducted. It was the fourth concert of the season by the Boston group in the borough, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee for the concerts. The orchestra's closing appearance in Brooklyn will be April 11.

A representative group of borough residents attended the program. Seated in Box 1 were Mr. and Mrs. H. Haughton Bell, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Spiker and Prof. and Mrs. Russel Niles. Mrs. Dean C. Osborne's Box 2 was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, who entertained Mr. and Mrs. George H. Dayton, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Bresuchaud, Mrs. James Fawcett, and James McLaren.

Review on Page 12

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's Box 3 was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Mathieu and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Henry.

The following members of the Brooklyn Women's Club occupied Box 4: Mary E. Tuthill, president; Mrs. B. Parks Gooden, Mrs. William E. Howes, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Lois Pinney Clark, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Harry Wilbur Cross and Mrs. Henry J. Nauer.

In Box 5 were Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Kathryn Parker, Joan Long and Carol Johnson; Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Mrs. Henry V. Raymond, and Emma Jessie Ogg.

Box 7 was used by members of the United Nations Secretariat, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony concerts. Seated in Box 8 were officers from the Naval Base Station in Brooklyn, who were guests of the Brooklyn Institute.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 15 1947

Koussevitzky's Appeal Argued Before Court

Appellate Division Weighs Its Decision on Barring Biography of Conductor

After two hours of arguments on how free is a free press to discuss the life of a living person, the Appellate Division reserved decision yesterday on an appeal by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to suppress a biography of him written by Moses Smith, a Boston music critic.

Dr. Koussevitzky was appealing a decision made by Justice Bernard L. Shientag, of Supreme Court, that the "right of privacy" statute did not apply to the book "Koussevitzky." Justice Shientag refused to grant Dr. Koussevitzky an injunction to prevent publication and distribution of the book.

The defendants named by Dr. Koussevitzky were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers; Arco Publishing Company, distributors; and Mr. Smith. Appearing yesterday for the defense, Mrs. Harriet F. Pilpel told the court:

"If Dr. Koussevitzky prevails, every other public figure, on the naked assertion of his own complaint, will be able to preclude the public from access to any facts about himself which he wishes to withhold from their scrutiny.

"Since every person would have a complete monopoly over the facts of his own life, no independent non-fiction dealing with contemporary matters would be possible. Exposes would be a thing of the past.

When Mrs. Pilpel said the book could not be enjoined, Presiding Justice Francis Martin asked: "You mean there is no remedy for a man who is attacked in a book and his character assaulted?"

Mrs. Pilpel said he could sue for libel, and Justice Martin said he was "shocked" to learn there was no other remedy.

Henry Root Stern, attorney for Dr. Koussevitzky, asked that Justice Shientag be overruled, and took the position that civil law provide that any living person in New York whose name is used for the purposes of trade, without his consent, "may restrain the use thereof and recover damages."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY PLEA HEARD

Decision Reserved on Appeal From Shientag Ruling

The Appellate Division reserved decision yesterday after two hours of argument on an appeal from a ruling by Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag that Serge Koussevitzky's right of privacy had not been violated by "Koussevitzky," a biography by Moses Smith, Boston music critic. The Boston Symphony conductor sought to enjoin publication and distribution and named as defendants, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors.

The Court also reserved decision on a motion by Dr. Koussevitzky to continue an ad interim injunction pending decision on the appeal.

Justice Shientag held that the right of privacy did not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography was fictional or novelized a character.

Mrs. Harriet F. Pilpel, defense attorney, argued that "Biographies always have been a part of a free press" and that "if Dr. Koussevitzky should prevail here, every other public figure will be able to preclude the public from any facts about himself he chooses to withhold from scrutiny.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 15 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY APPEALS

New York, March 14.—(AP)—The Appelate Division today reserved decision on an appeal by Serge Koussevitzky from a Supreme Court ruling which had refused to enjoin publication and distribution of the book, "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith, Boston music critic. The court also reserved decision on Koussevitzky's motion to continue a previously obtained interim injunction pending decision on the appeal.

MISS ELLABELLE DAVIS' noted soprano, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Davis, 89 Horton Avenue, receives the congratulations of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor of the Boston Symphony with which Miss Davis has been soloist this week. Lukas Foss, composer of the "Song of Songs," biblical cantata for orchestra and voice which was written especially for Miss Davis, looks on. The soprano sang last night in Philadelphia, the sixth performance of the work since last Friday. Tonight she will sing in Brooklyn and tomorrow returns to Carnegie Hall.

Composers' Prize Singer Has a Great Big Week

Closeup
March 12, 1947

By MARY BRAGGIOTTI

Ellabelle Davis is right in the midst of what are probably the most richly satisfying nine days of her career, to date. And her career has had far beyond the average share of satisfactions in the last few years, too.

Between last Friday and next Saturday she is singing eight times with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—an honor in itself. Koussevitzky has never given a soloist such a long, unbroken run. To make her cup run over, she is singing new music dedicated to her and commissioned especially for her by the League of Composers, which named her "the outstanding American singer of the year."

Lukas Foss, brilliant 24-year-old American composer and pianist with the Boston Symphony, wrote the music. He calls it a "Biblical solo cantata." In four movements, the 23-minute cantata for lyric soprano and orchestra has as its text four utterances of the Queen of Sheba, taken from the "Song of Songs" of the Old Testament.

A Sparkling Queen of Sheba, She Has Also Been an Aida

The singer on whom these honors are lavished (and she is returning the compliment by thrilling her audiences and inspiring rave reviews) is a dark-skinned young woman, as the Queen of Sheba should be, with long, sparkling eyes and a really ravishing smile that seems to encompass the whole world—not a mere kingdom. Sheba is the second dark beauty she has portrayed. The first was the heroine of "Aida" which she sang last summer in Mexico City's Palacio de Bellas Artes, with Ramon Vinay in the leading tenor role.

Miss Davis, breaking into the big, humorous smile, admits to three particular fancies: singing, sewing and nice clothes. It used to be the sewing that got her the nice clothes—she was adept at copying slick magazine fashions. Now it has to be the singing. The only time she has for needlework these days is on the train or plane between singing engagements, and she uses it to crochet squares for a bedspread.

Although she has worked hard for her success, Ellabelle Davis is by no means a Cinderella. The daughter of a grocery store owner, she was born and brought up in New Rochelle. She still thinks nostalgically of the daily penny's worth of candy her father used to give her—more whenever she went behind the counter and sold for him.

Also a Queen of Swat—In Ball Games With the Boys

She also likes to think of the baseball games in the streets of New Rochelle. She could outrun the fleetest boy and was quite a queen of swat, too. She regrets that she never learned to understand football because every Saturday, when the high school games were played, she was in New York taking a singing lesson.

Her father sang in the choir and her sister is a piano teacher—but her mother, she says, has never been able to carry a tune. Baby Ellabelle used to sing herself to sleep before she could talk. Just about as soon as she was able to express herself she said she wanted to be a singer. With her family's help, she started taking singing lessons during her high school years. After graduation she took a dressmaking course so she could finance her own vocal studies.

For a while she did—sewing in New Rochelle and New York. But the going was hard.

In 1941 came the lucky break. Ellabelle was recommended as a seamstress to Louise Crane, daughter of the late Winthrop Murray Crane, former governor of Massachusetts and twice U. S. Senator. It so happened that Miss Crane was interested in new musical talent, that she was running the Coffee Concerts at the Museum of Modern Art and that she became enchanted by her young seamstress' voice when she heard her singing "Depuis le Jour" one day over her sewing.

Post Photo by Mellor

ELLABELLE DAVIS got her start by singing herself to sleep.

A Seamstress is Told She'd Better Stop Sewing

"Miss Crane thought I should stop sewing," says the singer, "and since then she has been a very great help to me."

The first time Miss Davis was heard publicly in New York was in the 18th Century opera, "The Chaplet," at one of her sponsor's Coffee Concerts in 1941. She not only sang in it but also danced the minuet. Her first Town Hall concert was in the fall of 1942.

"Scared? Oh, my!" she remarks in retrospect. "That's when everybody shivers, I guess—at the first New York concert."

Miss Davis feels, however, that a good shiver before a concert or opera appearance does more good than harm. She's glad that, with all her mounting experience, she can still get the jitters before singing. They've worked well for her in her subsequent Town Hall recitals, in her two transcontinental tours (this season she has sung with seven major symphony orchestras, besides giving solo recitals) and in her many Latin-American appearances. And she hopes they'll stand by her throughout this week, including this evening and the afternoon of Mar. 15, when she sings "The Queen of Sheba" at Carnegie Hall.

As to Marrying—She's "Looking, Just Looking"

Miss Davis still lives in New Rochelle with her parents, next door to the house she was born in. She has no particular theories for or against career girls marrying, nor can she speak from experience.

"I'm looking," she says gaily, "just looking!"

She has a small but growing collection of African musical instruments at home but, between singing and language lessons, she's not there much to admire them. At home or on tour, she likes to go to bed early whenever possible and think about her songs. Also, she likes to get up late—except on occasional summer mornings, when she arises at six to play tennis before the heat of the day.

She finds that the best way to get music off her mind for relaxation is to read magazines, go to the movies or play bridge. She enjoys milk and good food, including the Chinese. She learned to like wine in Mexico—starting with a party given for her at the U. S. Embassy after "Aida."

Ellabelle Davis is planning a European concert tour for the spring of 1948. But her aspirations extend even farther ahead than that.

"I hope some day," she says earnestly, "to be able to help aspiring artists; that is, to do what Miss Crane did for me—and what Roland Hayes did, too. He helped me a lot. I want to do it because I know what it means. You can't start a career all by yourself."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 15 1947

Boston Symphony Offers Foss' Work; Ellabelle Davis Soloist

By JOHN BALL, JR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fourth concert in its present Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. As is usual when this orchestra appears here, the hall was pack-jammed with "standing room only" available.

The main feature of the evening's concert was the appearance of Ellabelle Davis as the soloist in Lukas Foss' new work, "The Song of Songs," for soprano and orchestra. The score was commissioned especially for Miss Davis by the League of Composers and was composed during the past Summer in New England. The composer's talents are wide; he has appeared successfully as a conductor and is the official pianist of the Boston Symphony in the bargain.

The music itself is in the form of a solo cantata and is based on passages from the "Song of Solomon". The mood of the work is both modern and ancient, there are implications of Eastern mysticism in the score and not a little of both Bach and Handel. During the second movement the celebrated "Jesu Joy of Man's Desiring" was discernible even to the oboe obbligato. Similarly a few of the long passages for the solo soprano follow closely the oratorio style of Handel. Despite these visible signs of ancestry, the work is distinctly modern in feeling without indulging in acid dissonance to make this point clear. It did not impress as a great achievement, but rather as a listenable one which the audience obviously found good in this regard.

A few weeks ago we made reference to Miss Davis in one of the "Music's Overtones" columns. At that time we remarked that since we had not been privileged to hear this lady sing, comment on her vocal art would have to be withheld. We have now heard Miss Davis and we withhold very little. She is gifted with an excellent voice which she uses with taste and distinction. Happily Miss Davis has plenty of sheer power in reserve which she calls upon only rarely. As a result she never gives the impression of straining and was able to negotiate the sometimes wicked intervals with accuracy and expert control. We understand that she does a very fine "Aida"; before too long we would like to hear her in that famous role.

The program opened with a performance of the Schubert "Fifth Symphony" which was fully up to the high standard of both the orchestra and its conductor. The concluding work of the evening, following the Foss cantata, was the Rachmaninoff "Symphony No. 3". This opus does not flow with the same lyrical beauty that distinguishes so much of the late great pianist's music. Rachmaninoff gives the impression that he is speaking through a troubled mind. There are moments of great beauty and others of grim uncertainty. Dr. Koussevitzky led his men through the pages of the score with a sure hand and revealed all that there was to hear. From the standpoint of orchestral playing the Boston was truly itself last night, which is perhaps almost as good a notice as it is possible to give.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 15 1947

Court Holds Decision On Koussevitzky Plea

New York, March 14.—(AP.)—The Appellate Division today reserved decision on an appeal by Serge Koussevitzky from a Supreme Court ruling which had refused to enjoin publication and distribution of the book, "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith, Boston music critic.

The court also reserved decision on Koussevitzky's motion to continue a previously obtained interim injunction pending decision on the appeal.

Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, charged in his suit that the book invaded his right to privacy. Named as defendants were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers; Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors; and Smith.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 15 1947

Decision Reserved On Koussevitzky Plea

NEW YORK, Saturday (AP)—The Appellate Division yesterday reserved decision on an appeal by Serge Koussevitzky from a Supreme Court ruling which had refused to enjoin publication and distribution of the book, "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith, Boston music critic.

The court also reserved decision on Koussevitzky's motion to continue a previously obtained interim injunction pending decision on the appeal.

Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, charged in his suit that the book invaded his right to privacy. Named as defendants were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers; Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors; and Smith.

Press Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 16 1947

Koussevitzky's Appeal Argued Before Court

Appellate Division Weighs Its Decision on Barring Biography of Conductor

After two hours of arguments on how free is a free press to discuss the life of a living person, the Appellate Division reserved decision Friday on an appeal by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to suppress a biography of him written by Moses Smith, a Boston music critic.

Dr. Koussevitzky was appealing a decision made by Justice Bernard L. Shientag, of Supreme Court, that the "right of privacy" statute did not apply to the book "Koussevitzky." Justice Shientag refused to grant Dr. Koussevitzky an injunction to prevent publication and distribution of the book.

The defendants named by Dr. Koussevitzky were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers; Arco Publishing Company, distributors; and Mr. Smith. Appearing for the defense, Mrs. Harriet F. Pilpel told the court:

"If Dr. Koussevitzky prevails, every other public figure, on the naked assertion of his own complaint, will be able to preclude the public from access to any facts about himself which he wishes to withhold from their scrutiny.

"Since every person would have a complete monopoly over the facts of his own life, no independent non-fiction dealing with contemporary matters would be possible. Exposes would be a thing of the past.

When Mrs. Pilpel said the book could not be enjoined, Presiding Justic Francis Martin asked: "You mean there is no remedy for a man who is attacked in a book and his character assaulted?"

Mrs. Pilpel said he could sue for libel, and Justice Martin said he was "shocked" to learn there was no other remedy.

Henry Root Stern, attorney for Dr. Koussevitzky, asked that Justice Shientag be overruled, and took the position that civil law provide that any living person in New York whose name is used for the purposes of trade, without his consent, "may restrain the use thereof and recover damages."

[136]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
THE PEOPLE'S VOICE

MAR 15 1947

Ellabelle Davis and Koussivitsky Premiere New Work at Carnegie

Ellabelle Davis, the distinguished American soprano will be the featured soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, when New York gets an initial hearing of 24-year-old Lukas Foss' cantata entitled The Song of Songs at Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening, March 12 and again Saturday afternoon, March 15.

The Song of Songs is the major 1946-47 commission by the League of Composers and is a biblical solo cantata designed especially for and a tribute to Miss Davis. Dr. Koussevitzky, in an unprecedented move throughout his long association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as conductor, engaged Miss Davis for not less than eight performances of the work. The world premiere was played at Boston's Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, March 7. In addition to the two performances in New York and two in Boston, Miss Davis also performed the work in Northampton, Mass. on Monday, March 10 and in New Haven the following evening. Philadelphia heard the work Thursday evening, March 13 and Brooklyn, Friday, March 14 at the Academy of Music. The New Haven performance was broadcast coast-to-coast over the ABC network.

The Song of Songs uses as its text four passages from the biblical book, the cantata, written by Mr. Foss during the summer of '46, represents the 70th commission by the League of Composers to an outstanding contemporary musician and honors the 25th anniversary of the League. It bears a dedication to Miss Davis, who was singled out by the League as "The outstanding American singer of the year" and the composer's choice of the classic utterances of the queen of Shebas as lyrics is a further gesture to the singer in that both she and the Old Testament Queen are descendants of the same race.

LUCAS FOSS AND ELLABELLE DAVIS. (Ben Greenhaus foto).

Although Miss Davis is appearing for the first time with Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, she has been soloist during the past three seasons with many of the country's other leading Symphonic aggregations, including the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the NBC Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Minneapolis Symphony, Indianapolis Symphony, Denver Symphony and the Erie Philharmonic. Miss Davis has also filled more than 30 recital engagements during the 194 47 season following her news-ma ing operatic debut as Aida in Me ico City last summer when she b came the first American Neg ever to have been starred by major opera company of the worl

The Song of Songs is the four commission to have been execut within a year by Lukas Foss w is a former Guggenheim a Pulitzer fellowship winner.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MAR 16 1947

Music

By Felix Borowski.

New Biography of Serge Koussevitzky Seems Careful Study of Musical Genius

One of the great defects of biography in the 19th century was the inability of its writers to see their subject in the round, and to write about him with impartiality. In most cases their essays were in the nature of hero-worship, and facts which militated against the subject's moral character, or the worth of his activities, either were toned down or totally ignored, and but little effort was made to establish a critical appraisal of his work. The earlier biographies of Mozart and Wagner—to take only two great composers—were sadly inefficient, and conveyed an entirely false impression of their character, and often of their art.

Two Earlier Works

These reflections are suggested by the biography of Serge Koussevitzky by Moses Smith, recently published by Allen, Towne and Health, New York, in spite of Mr. Koussevitzky's appeal to the New York courts to suppress it. The author, it may be stated, was well able to undertake this work, for he was connected successively as music critic with three Boston newspapers—the Post, Evening American and Evening Transcript—thus coming into personal touch with Koussevitzky himself, and with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and others connected directly or indirectly with it.

There have been earlier works on the gifted Boston conductor. One, by Koussevitzky's friend, Arthur Lourie, was published 16 years ago. The other, by the erudite musicologist, Hugo Leichtentritt, was brought out last year. What of value there may be in both books largely is discounted by the terms of fulsome panegyric which the authors apply to the character and accomplishments of their hero.

Fascinating to Read

Mr. Smith, ready as he should be, to perceive the superlative gifts of Koussevitzky, has not been blinded by them, and made unable, like many another admirer, to see him as he truly is, nor his achievements as they really are.

The account of Koussevitzky's artistic adventures in his own country as well as in America makes fascinating reading, and Mr. Smith clearly has gone to great trouble in his efforts to clarify some of the legend which grew up around them, and to offer facts instead. A large part of the book, of course, deals with the conductor's connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is with it that an American reader's interest undoubtedly will be centered.

It was from Paris, and not from Russia, that Koussevitzky was called to Boston as successor to Pierre Monteux. Mr. Smith recalls that his inability to speak and understand English was a serious drawback, but another—perhaps more serious—was the indefiniteness of his baton technique. "The learning," says the author "was hard and slow. Without the devotion, sympathy and foresight of his wife and the understanding and ability of Burgin, the concertmaster, Koussevitzky would probably not have lasted more than a couple of seasons in Boston. Even with their help, however, he could not have remained had he not possessed exceptional gifts."

Genius and Weaknesses

The conductor's genius and his weaknesses Mr. Smith discusses in a final chapter—"A Critical Summing Up." He declares that "the principal end of Koussevitzky's feverish, unrelenting drive has been beauty of orchestral tone"; but he adds that "by making an end, instead of means, of beautiful tone, Koussevitzky often underemphasizes the third attribute of a conductor, which is the correctness and force of his interpretation of the music."

Withal the Boston director's critic has to declare that "whatever his faults, none the less, Koussevitzky must be regarded, even as an interpreter, as one of the great conductors of our time." Few, we believe, will disagree.

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 15 1947

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

IN RECOGNITION of Koussevitzky's service to American composers they gave him a testimonial dinner a year ago, and more recently the League of Composers gave a concert in his honor which provided him with the opportunity for some of the portentous pronouncements that he loves to make and that tend to get out of control—like "The supreme goal of the composer is to conquer time—to be in the past, in the present, and in the future, to convey the infinity of thought, emotion, and ideal, symbolizing eternity."

A little closer to earth was his contention that "no matter how much is done for the composer—it is not enough! Because the composer is the ever-living source, the life-giving oxygen without which music cannot exist." And his statement later on that "in music a score completed at the desk of the composer is only the beginning of the work to be accomplished; its fulfillment demands the cooperation of an auxiliary energy and a body of active and organized forces." The two statements complement each other: the composer is the source of what is brought to fulfillment by an auxiliary energy. And this means more than it appears to mean.

Its meaning is revealed by a letter from a musician who was able to listen to Koussevitzky's recording of Copland's "Appalachian Spring" with the score, and who is indignant about "the cuts (disgraceful), the bad playing (surprising), and the conductor's liberties with the score: at one place the music races twice as fast as the composer indicates. . . . To thousands of listeners that music will sound as Koussevitzky plays it, not as Copland conceived it." Koussevitzky once characterized a critic who had demanded obedience to the composer's score as a man who "doesn't want the music to be alive"; and from his changes of slow to fast (and fast to slow, also) in Copland's "Appalachian Spring" it is evident that he means those words about the music of living as well as dead composers. One cannot do enough for the composer; and the conductor doesn't do enough for him when he merely plays his music: Koussevitzky's own "cooperation" in its "fulfillment" has ~~been~~ imposition of changes in the shape of the work and its character and meaning that the composer has had to accept if he wanted it performed.

Did Mr. Copland, in his speech at that testimonial dinner he helped to arrange, say that grateful as the composers were to Koussevitzky for his performances of his altered versions of their works they would be even more grateful for performances of their own versions? Or did he realize that this would be an appeal for a humble and enlightened conception of the performer's relation to the composer that Koussevitzky already had shown himself to be incapable of?

This Clipping From LUBBOCK, TEXAS
AVALANCHE

MAR 16 1947

Gag For Newspapers?

AN alarming precedent, insofar as publishers are concerned, has been posed by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Claiming that his privacy has been invaded, the noted baton expert has sued the author and publishers of his allegedly unauthorized biography and has asked for a court injunction against the publishing and distribution of the book. His attorneys, moreover, have notified newspapers that they would publish reviews of the book at their "peril and risk."

If the injunction is granted and upheld, a dangerous precedent will have been set. The results might be to stop all but authorized personal publicity. It might apply to lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen and presidents.

We trust that Mr. Koussevitzky will accept the annoyances of fame and reconsider his legal action.

NEW YO
TIMES

MAR 16 1947

STRAVINSKY WORK FEATURES CONCERT

Harvard, Radcliffe Groups Aid the Boston Orchestra in 'Symphonie de Psaumes'

With the exception of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall consisted of works played here by the same forces earlier this week. These were Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, and Lukas Foss' cantata, "The Song of Songs," with Ellabelle Davis, soprano, as the accomplished soloist.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," one of its composer's most deeply impressive creations was given with the assistance of a large chorus composed of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The masterpiece based on excerpts from the Psalms received a revelatory reading in which the choral and orchestral elements of the score were fused in masterly fashion, and the intentions of the work most sympathetically and reverentially disclosed.

If the double fugue of the second movement of the symphony remained cryptic for most listeners, the rest of the music was profoundly eloquent and stirring, as Dr. Koussevitzky discoursed it. The originality and power of the opus were strikingly disclosed, and the composition in its entirety was led to an overwhelmingly effective close.

In general, symphonic composers have found final movements difficult to handle in such a way that they will not sound anti-climactic. But in the "Symphonie de Psaumes" Stravinsky has provided a concluding division that forms the crown of the composition as an entity. And he has done this in a manner completely his own.

His own, too, in this finale, is the idea of making only the central section of a setting of so joyful a text as the "Laudate Dominum" exultant. Yet nothing in the symphony is as affecting as the solemn, sustained mood with which this great exhortation to praise the Lord comes to its termination in this work.

Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] hardly have given the great [illegible] pages a more significant [illegible] ing unfoldment, and it [illegible] point that the concert [illegible] height of interpretive [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
THE PEOPLE'S VOICE

MAR 15 1947

Ellabelle Davis and Koussivitsky Premiere New Work at Carnegie

Ellabelle Davis, the distinguished American soprano will be the featured soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, when New York gets an initial hearing of 24-year-old Lukas Foss' cantata entitled The Song of Songs at Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening, March 12 and again Saturday afternoon, March 15.

The Song of Songs is the major 1946-47 commission by the League of Composers and is a biblical solo cantata designed especially for and a tribute to Miss Davis. Dr. Koussevitzky, in an unprecedented move throughout his long association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as conductor, engaged Miss Davis for not less than eight performances of the work. The world premiere was played at Boston's Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, March 7. In addition to the two performances in New York and two in Boston, Miss Davis also performed the work in Northampton, Mass. on Monday, March 10 and in New Haven the following evening. Philadelphia heard the work Thursday evening, March 13 and Brooklyn, Friday, March 14 at the Academy of Music. The New Haven performance was broadcast coast-to-coast over the ABC network.

The Song of Songs uses as its text four passages from the biblical book, the cantata, written by Mr. Foss during the summer of '46, represents the 70th commission by the League of Composers to an outstanding contemporary musician and honors the 25th anniversary of the League. It bears a dedication to Miss Davis, who was singled out by the League as "The outstanding American singer of the year" and the composer's choice of the classic utterances of the queen of Shebas as lyrics is a further gesture to the singer in that both she and the Old Testament Queen are descendants of the same race.

LUCAS FOSS AND ELLABELLE DAVIS. (Ben Greenhaus foto).

Although Miss Davis is appearing for the first time with Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, she has been soloist during the past three seasons with many of the country's other leading Symphonic aggregations, including the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the NBC Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Minneapolis Symphony, Indianapolis Symphony, Denver Symphony and the Erie Philharmonic. Miss Davis has also filled more than 30 recital engagements during the 1946 47 season following her news-making operatic debut as Aida in Mexico City last summer when she became the first American Negro ever to have been starred by a major opera company of the world.

The Song of Songs is the fourth commission to have been executed within a year by Lukas Foss who is a former Guggenheim and Pulitzer fellowship winner.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MAR 16 1947

Music

By Felix Borowski.

New Biography of Serge Koussevitzky Seems Careful Study of Musical Genius

One of the great defects of biography in the 19th century was the inability of its writers to see their subject in the round, and to write about him with impartiality. In most cases their essays were in the nature of hero-worship, and facts which militated against the subject's moral character, or the worth of his activities, either were toned down or totally ignored, and but little effort was made to establish a critical appraisal of his work. The earlier biographies of Mozart and Wagner—to take only two great composers—were sadly inefficient, and conveyed an entirely false impression of their character, and often of their art.

Two Earlier Works

These reflections are suggested by the biography of Serge Koussevitzky by Moses Smith, recently published by Allen, Towne and Health, New York, in spite of Mr. Koussevitzky's appeal to the New York courts to suppress it. The author, it may be stated, was well able to undertake this work, for he was connected successively as music critic with three Boston newspapers—the Post, Evening American and Evening Transcript—thus coming into personal touch with Koussevitzky himself, and with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and others connected directly or indirectly with it.

There have been earlier works on the gifted Boston conductor. One, by Koussevitzky's friend, Arthur Lourie, was published 16 years ago. The other, by the erudite musicologist, Hugo Leichtentritt, was brought out last year. What of value there may be in both books largely is discounted by the terms of fulsome panegyric which the authors apply to the character and accomplishments of their hero.

Fascinating to Read

Mr. Smith, ready as he should be, to perceive the superlative gifts of Koussevitzky, has not been blinded by them, and made unable, like many another admirer, to see him as he truly is, nor his achievements as they really are.

The account of Koussevitzky's artistic adventures in his own country as well as in America makes fascinating reading, and Mr. Smith clearly has gone to great trouble in his efforts to clarify some of the legend which grew up around them, and to offer facts instead. A large part of the book, of course, deals with the conductor's connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is with it that an American reader's interest undoubtedly will be centered.

It was from Paris, and not from Russia, that Koussevitzky was called to Boston as successor to Pierre Monteux. Mr. Smith recalls that his inability to speak and understand English was a serious drawback, but another—perhaps more serious—was the indefiniteness of his baton technique. "The learning," says the author "was hard and slow. Without the devotion, sympathy and foresight of his wife and the understanding and ability of Burgin, the concertmaster, Koussevitzky would probably not have lasted more than a couple of seasons in Boston. Even with their help, however, he could not have remained had he not possessed exceptional gifts."

Genius and Weaknesses

The conductor's genius and his weaknesses Mr. Smith discusses in a final chapter—"A Critical Summing Up." He declares that "the principal end of Koussevitzky's feverish, unrelenting drive has been beauty of orchestral tone"; but he adds that "by making an end, instead of means, of beautiful tone, Koussevitzky often underemphasizes the third attribute of a conductor, which is the correctness and force of his interpretation of the music."

Withal the Boston director's critic has to declare that "whatever his faults, none the less, Koussevitzky must be regarded, even as an interpreter, as one of the great conductors of our time." Few, we believe, will disagree.

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 15 1947

Sun
ELVYN
AL
THE Rome
k: N
ERL
AY'S
-15-47

usic

B. H.
HAGGIN

OGNITION of Koussevitzvice to American composers him a testimonial dinner a d more recently the League ers gave a concert in his h provided him with the for some of the portentous ents that he loves to make d to get out of control—like he goal of the composer is time—to be in the past, in and in the future, to con-ty of thought, emotion, and lizing eternity."
oser to earth was his con-
"no matter how much is the composer—it is not ause the composer is the ource, the life-giving oxy-which music cannot exist."
atement later on that "in e completed at the desk of r is only the beginning of be accomplished; its fulnands the cooperation of an ergy and a body of active ted forces." The two statelement each other: the com-source of what is brought nt by an auxiliary energy.
eans more than it appears to

Its meaning is revealed by a [illegible] from a musician who was able to listen to Koussevitzky's recording of Copland's "Appalachian Spring" with the score, and who is indignant about "the cuts (disgraceful), the bad playing (surprising), and the conductor's liberties with the score: at one place the music races twice as fast as the composer indicates. . . . To thousands of listeners that music will sound as Koussevitzky plays it, not as Copland conceived it." Koussevitzky once characterized a critic who had demanded obedience to the composer's score as a man who "doesn't want the music to be alive"; and from his changes of slow to fast (and fast to slow, also) in Copland's "Appalachian Spring" it is evident that he means those words about the music of living as well as dead composers. One cannot do enough for the composer; and the conductor doesn't do enough for him when he merely plays his music: Koussevitzky's own "cooperation" in its "fulfillment" has ~~been~~ imposition of changes in the shape of the work and its character and meaning that the composer has had to accept if he wanted it performed.

Did Mr. Copland, in his speech at that testimonial dinner he helped to arrange, say that grateful as the composers were to Koussevitzky for his performances of his altered versions of their works they would be even more grateful for performances of their own versions? Or did he realize that this would be an appeal for a humble and enlightened conception of the performer's relation to the composer that Koussevitzky already had shown himself to be incapable of?

This Clipping From LUBBOCK, TEXAS
AVALANCHE

MAR 16 1947

Gag For Newspapers?

AN alarming precedent, insofar as publishers are concerned, has been posed by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Claiming that his privacy has been invaded, the noted baton expert has sued the author and publishers of his allegedly unauthorized biography and has asked for a court injunction against the publishing and distribution of the book. His attorneys, moreover, have notified newspapers that they would publish reviews of the book at their "peril and risk."

If the injunction is granted and upheld, a dangerous precedent will have been set. The results might be to stop all but authorized personal publicity. It might apply to lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen and presidents.

We trust that Mr. Koussevitzky will accept the annoyances of fame and reconsider his legal action.

NEW TIM
MAR

STRAVINSKY WORK FEATURES CONCERT

Harvard, Radcliffe Groups Ai the Boston Orchestra in 'Symphonie de Psaumes'

With the exception of Strav sky's "Symphonie de Psaume the program presented by the B ton Symphony Orchestra, und Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday a ernoon at Carnegie Hall consis of works played here by the sa forces earlier this week. Th were Rachmaninoff's Third Sy phony, and Lukas Foss' canta
"The Song of Songs," with El belle Davis, soprano, as the acco plished soloist.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie Psaumes," one of its compos most deeply impressive creation was given with the assistance of large chorus composed of the Har vard Glee Club and the Radcliff Choral Society. The masterpiec based on excerpts from the Psalms received a revelatory reading i which the choral and orchestra elements of the score were fused i masterly fashion, and the inten tions of the work most sympatheti cally and reverentially disclosed.

If the double fugue of the sec ond movement of the symphony remained cryptic for most listen ers, the rest of the music was pro foundly eloquent and stirring, as Dr. Koussevitzky discoursed it. The originality and power of the opus were strikingly disclosed, and the composition in its entirety was led to an overwhelmingly effective close.

In general, symphonic composers have found final movements dif ficult to handle in such a way that they will not sound anticlimac tic. But in the "Symphonie de Psaumes" Stravinsky has provided a concluding division th forms the crown of the composi as an entity. And he has done is in a manner completely his o
His own, too, in this fi , is the idea of making only central section of a setting of yful a text as the "Laudate inum" exultant. Yet nothing symphony is as affecting as olemn, sustained mood with this great exhortation to the Lord comes to its term on in this work.

Dr. Koussevitzky hardly have given the ting pages a more ching unfoldment it is point that the concert height of interpretive . S.

vitzky and his Rachmanino which also ha the Bostonian pened the p mer recept ed in the ea of the Ha Radcliffe
ned by G. with the d and last n, Igor S nie des Ps first time n presented ky since its nance in 1 r more recen other orche t of these y Symphony eheard yes impressive ing the es spirit of th ent passage communica ongueurs—y have been usual length ding the tim anging the stra and th

rus. But, this, this stri k has its ch are often contribute t object. Th ed on the T ned the most nicative. Th nirable, both rumental pl
Miss Da
s cantata, fact that k every nig s, except f ductor an pted and hmanino

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

MAR 16 1947

Hague

Solomon's Song Sung by Miss Davis at Carnegie

PM Reviews

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; soloist, Ellabelle Davis, soprano; Wednesday evening at Carnegie Hall.

Symphony in A minor, No. 3 . . . Rachmaninoff
Concerto Grosso . . . . . Martinu
The Song of Songs, for Soprano and Orchestra . . . . . . Lukas Foss
(First N. Y. performance)

Because of the intrinsic interest of the rest of his program, I suppose one may excuse Dr. Koussevitzky for exhuming and trying to breathe life into the moribund measures of Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony Wednesday evening.

His efforts to lend wings to this earthbound and notably uninspired product of the distinguished Russian composer-pianist's latter years only succeeded in making the usually impeccable Boston instrumentalists overplay and sound rather like a second-rate band. For none of the work's musical ideas seemed worthy of development or capable of sustaining more than fleeting interest. The threadbare cliches of day before yesterday have seldom sounded so dreary and disaffecting.

* * *

By contrast, Bohuslav Martinu's taut, sinewy and animated Concerto Grosso, for two pianos and chamber orchestra, seemed a veritable masterpiece. And a brightly rewarding piece it is—clear of form, economical yet vivid of speech, melodically and harmonically absorbing, rhythmically alive. It was brilliantly performed, especially by the two pianists, Bernard Zighera and Lukas Foss.

And the same Mr. Foss' biblical cantata for soprano and orchestra, The Song of Songs, though no great shakes itself, at least served to introduce to Carnegie Hall audiences the lovely voice and noteworthy musicianship of Ellabelle Davis, for whom the work was composed on commission from the League of Composers.

* * *

Divided into four movements, The Song of Songs, uses as its text four passages from the Bible's Song of Solomon. The music is facile and pleasant, and skilfully composed; but, for the most part, its expressive content is negligible. Rarely does it heighten the mood or project the poetry or meaning of the lyrics.

Ellabelle Davis, soloist with the Boston Symphony.

The first section, Awake. O north wind, attains a certain pastoral feeling with its high-lying vocal line pitted against much activity in the orchestra's woodwinds. The second, Come, my beloved, is lively and very pretty in sound, but little else; and the third, a sort of operatic recitative, does little to capture the emotional intensity of the passage which begins:

> By night on my bed
> I sought him whom my soul
> loveth:
> I sought him, but I found him > not.

The concluding section, a repetitious setting of Set me as a seal upon thine heart, has something of the quality of a Negro spiritual, and is more gratefully written for the voice. Here the purity and appeal of Miss Davis' high notes and the quietly devotional manner of her singing were especially affecting.

* * *

Daniza Ilitsch Makes Debut as Desdemona

Meanwhile, at the Metropolitan, Yugoslavian soprano Daniza Ilitsch was making her American debut as Desdemona in Verdi's Otello. Since Met curtains always rise on the dot, I was able to hear the first act before going up to Carnegie; and I returned in time for the fourth.

In her duet with Othello at the end of Act I, Miss Ilitsch displayed a big, dramatic soprano voice, which she used skilfully and with considerable effect. Her top tones were clear and attractive, particularly when she sang softly. When she sang loudly—and she could be heard out in Broadway if she tried—she mouthed and warbled a bit disconcertingly. But this may have been due to debut nervousness. For, in the last act, her Willow Song and Ave Maria were finely and movingly sung, and her prophetic, impassioned scream of Emilia, addio had a hair-raising effect.

I am sorry that I couldn't hear more. Margaret Carson, who presides graciously over the Met's press department, tells me that Miss Ilitsch's third act was "sensational." Coming from her, that is high praise. For, unlike most press agents, she is not easily impressed. She hears them all sing night after night, and is usually tougher to please than some of the critics.

* * *

As Othello, Ramon Vinay lent considerable lyric fervor to the first-act love duet, but had neither quite the voice nor the dramatic sense for the big moments of the final scene. As on other occasions Leonard Warren's Iago was more convincing in voice than in action

Fritz Busch, who conducted won my undying admiration by turning and shouting, "Please. Please!" in an effort to silence the applause-goons who tried to stop the show after Miss Ilitsch's last-act Prayer. The tense, dramatic spell that Verdi has so skillfully woven in the orchestra before Othello's fateful entrance was broken anyway; but if more conductors would employ similar tactics, the growing habit of Met audiences—particularly at Italian operas—of sabotaging the continuity of the music with ill-timed applause might be cured.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 16 1947

Boston Symphony

'The Song of Songs' Is Heard at Carnegie Concert

Lukas Foss's "The Song of Songs" completed its eight-day run in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon, when it was presented for the third time here and the second in Carnegie Hall with Ellabelle Davis as soprano soloist. It had been introduced to Boston on March 7, and in the mean time has been performed in Northampton, New Haven and Philadelphia, as well as in New York. There was ardent applause yesterday for the composer, the talented young Negro singer, and for Dr. Koussevitzky and his instrumentalists.

Rachmaninoff's third symphony, which also had been performed by the Bostonians last Wednesday, opened the program, and won a warmer reception that it had received in the earlier concert. Members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, sang with the orchestra in the third and last work of this program, Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie des Psaumes." This was the first time that this work had been presented here by Dr. Koussevitzky since its first New York performance in 1931, but it has had four more recent local productions by other orchestras—the most recent of these was by the New York City Symphony fourteen months ago.

Reheard yesterday, it revealed an impressive eloquence, reproducing the essential atmosphere and spirit of the texts in its most cogent passages. It also had its less communicative measures and its longueurs—an impression which may have been enhanced by the unusual length of the concert, including the time required for rearranging the seating of the orchestra and the entrance of the chorus. But, with due allowance for this, this striking and individual work has its diluted episodes, which are often ingenious, but do not contribute to the main expressive object. The first movement, based on the Thirty-eighth Psalm, seemed the most consistently communicative. The performance was admirable, both in regard to the instrumental playing and the singing. Miss Davis's voice, in the Foss cantata, fared well despite the fact that she had sung this work every night for the last eight days, except for Sunday, and the conductor and orchestra gave a devoted and intent account of Rachmaninoff's last symphony.

F. D. P.

Two Novelties at Symphony Concerts

Ferrucio Tagliavini, new tenor of the Metropolitan Opera in its Boston season, March 20-29.

Shadow, Pas de Deux Classique, Rodeo.

The company will be at the Boston Opera House for the entire week and will give six evening performances and a matinee on Saturday.

Foss Cantata, Rachmaninov Symphony Heard

By L. A. Sloper

For the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky submitted a list consisting of Rachmaninov's Third Symphony, in A minor; Lukas Foss' "The Song of Songs," second Biblical cantata, for soprano and orchestra, and Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes." The Rachmaninov symphony had its first Boston performance yesterday; the Foss cantata, its first anywhere. Ellabelle Davis was the soloist in the cantata, and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society furnished the chorus for the Stravinsky number.

This was not a very cheerful concert. It is well known that the Russians work hard over both their sorrows and their joys, and the treatment of Biblical texts by Messrs. Stravinsky and Foss tends to fill the listener with gloom rather than with exaltation. There is more true religious feeling in Vaughan Williams' Fifth Symphony, heard last week, than in either of these works. Stravinsky and Foss give us the outer shell; Vaughan Williams the inner essence.

* * *

"The Song of Songs" seems to be the thirty-first work written by its brilliant young composer, now 25, in 10 years. It is a very competent work, sparsely scored in the manner of his teacher, Hindemith, and also recalling Copland. The light scoring leaves the solo voice free for soaring or for recitative. There is a good deal of repetition of musical phrases which are more dramatic than melodic. The ancient Hebrews, like the ancient Scythians, were not noted for their gentility, and there is some justification for using such an idiom for them as Honegger employed for the first of those races and Prokoviev for the second. Foss' music is barbaric but not forceful, and yet he does succeed to a degree in conveying the mood and spirit of the text he has set.

* * *

Much of course depends upon the soloist in a work of this type. Miss Davis brought to her task a voice of considerable natural beauty, with a good deal of body and power when it was freely used, which was rarely. Most of the way, the production was constricted and the tone too weak for easy hearing in a large hall. Faulty methods or an unease caused by a first major appearance may have been responsible. It is probable that the singer will give a better account of herself when she has sung the music in public oftener. She will have plenty of opportunity, since the piece is going to be presented seven times within a week.

The new work had an impressive popular success, with several recalls for composer, conductor, and soloist.

The Stravinsky symphony, so far the most enduring of the works commissioned for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, 1930-31, was also well received, although the length of the program had discouraged some listeners. Yet its final measures, designed evidently to give a celestial impression, sound merely formal today.

Rachmaninov's Third Symphony, which opened the concert, is just what you expect: a well-made symphony in the Russian manner, melodious, intense, and unoriginal. Throughout it, one remembers how much better Tchaikovsky said the same thing. This work served chiefly to remind us again of the tonal glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

MAR 17 1947

Current Comment

That Suit's Serge

Mr. Koussevitzky's biography is off to a good start, regardless of its merit, now that it's had $500,000 worth of free publicity in news columns.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 17 1947

MUSIC

Song of Solomon—and Foss

Never before in its history had the Boston Symphony performed a new work eight times in nine days. Nor had more than a few contemporary composers ever before been assured of that many performances in so short a time. Yet this was the schedule begun last week for "The Song of Songs," the second biblical solo cantata written by 24-year-old Lukas Foss. Composed for soprano and orchestra, "The Songs of Songs" was commissioned by the League of Composers for Ellabelle Davis, the fast-rising Negro soprano.

"The Song of Songs" had its world première in Boston on March 7. Convinced of its merit and without waiting for a verdict by the critics, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony, programmed the cantata for performances in Boston, Northampton, Mass., New Haven, Conn., New York, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn—and also for broadcast nationally this week over ABC. "You will be dead," Koussevitzky said, shaking a paternal finger at Foss, "but this work will live."

The Boston critics, however, were not nearly so sure that "The Song of Songs" would live as long as Koussevitzky thought. That great talent and promise had been shown, they were all agreed. But on the finished product, they split. Cyrus Durgin of The Globe liked it best. "The most important thing about 'The Song of Songs' is its beauty of emotional expression," he wrote. "From first to last this is a song, and that is unusual in music today." But Warren Storey Smith of The Post thought that "only here and there did Mr. Foss seem to capture the real spirit of the text." Alexander Williams of The Herald felt that the composer "has written a musical composition first and a setting of a poetical text a long way second."

International

Ellabelle Davis as "Aïda" in Mexico

All agreed, however, that Miss Davis had used her big soprano voice in the fullest expression the music allowed. A Queen of Sheba this time, the former seamstress from New Rochelle, N. Y., portrayed another dusky heroine last summer when she sang Aïda in Mexico City. Last year, the League of Composers named Miss Davis "the outstanding American singer of the year"—an honor which led to the Foss commission.

Symphonist in Solitude: Foss chose the King James version of "The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's" only after rejecting the modern poetry he scanned for a suitable subject. In the Bible, he says, "almost everything screams for music."

Foss first won national recognition at 21, when the Boston Symphony presented his symphonic piece, "The Prairie." Although he was born in Berlin, he considers himself an American in training and development because he came to this country when he was 15 and became a citizen as soon as possible.

For the last two years Foss has held the post of chief pianist for the Boston Symphony—a job which brings him financial security, yet leaves him with plenty of time to compose. Creative work, he believes, calls for absolute solitude. Hence, he is still a bachelor.

Besides his talents as a composer and pianist, Foss is also a conductor and teacher. He would like to write for the theater, because he thinks that a musician should be flexible. Many of his musical colleagues, he feels, are too limited in their interests. "A specialist," he quipped, "is a man who does everything else worse."

Ruth Orkin

Foss: The Bible . . . "screams for music"

HARRISONBURG, VA.
NEWS-RECORD

MAR 18 1947

The Philharmonic

A battle between the conductor and board of directors of a symphony orchestra is, under ordinary circumstances, of purely local concern. But the controversy which has lately resulted in a change of leaders for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is of broader interest. The Philharmonic is not only the oldest but one of the greatest American symphony orchestras. By virtue of the fact that its Sunday afternoon concerts have been broadcast over a national network for many years it has an audience which now extends over the greater part of the United States.

This larger audience is not particularly well-informed on the details of the scrap which led to the resignation in mid-season of Arthur Rodzinski as the orchestra's conductor and it would probably find it difficult to judge them if it did. But it has every reason to be deeply concerned over the decision of the Philharmonic's management to go back to the system of splitting the chore of leading the orchestra among five different conductors.

Great symphony orchestras are not made or maintained this way. The Boston Symphony is one of the world's finest because it has been trained and disciplined by a single great conductor over a long period of years. The Philadelphia Orchestra is another, brought to its musical apogee by Leopold Stokowski and maintained at the same high level by Eugene Ormandy, his successor.

Under a mediocre conductor and later under a series of temporary ones, the New York Philharmonic declined. Rodzinski, in his three years as conductor, brought it back to the top rank of symphony orchestras. It would be unfortunate to permit it to go into another period of decline for lack of the type [illegible] leadership it deserves.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 17 1947

Koussevitzky Does Stravinsky Score

The Boston Symphony made one of its important contributions to the musical season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky directed a performance of Igor Stravinsky's monumental "Symphonie des Psaumes." Not since it was new in 1931 has the orchestra which brought this work into existence done it here (though others have), and it was a profound experience to have it delivered with such technical mastery and artistic devotion. Certainly the closing "Laudate" (beautifully sung by the combined Radliffe and Harvard Glee clubs) is as sublime a musical utterance as this century has produced.

The Stravinsky was preceded by a repetition of Lukas Foss's "Song of Songs," first presented on Wednesday evening. It was again nobly interpreted by Ellabelle Davis, soprano, who made a glowing, vibrant thing of it with her uncommon voice and artistry. The work was again played with fine skill by the orchestra, and soloist, conductor and composer shared many bows at the end. The concert began with the third symphony of Rachmaninoff, also a repetition on this visit.

I. K.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 18 1947

Contemporary Comment

By RUTH G. DAVIS

There were hundreds that packed the Academy of Music on Friday evening and it was good to see faces that we hadn't seen at the previous concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether it was the fact that the program of the fourth concert had a special interest or whether it was other circumstances, we don't know. We do know, however, that a few of the ladies present had had a busy day. Mrs. Tremper Longman, who had been at the School Settlement fashion show earlier in the day, had rushed to Manhattan for dinner and then returned for the concert. We saw her first in a smart black suit with a tricky black blouse with two red and white stripes and a becoming feathered hat. She had assisted in giving out the fashion show's special prizes, which little Margot Moore drew out of a wire barrel. However, in the evening Mary Longman was in a new costume, a becoming purple shade. The concert also offered an opportunity to tell Mrs. Leonard Moore how much we like the navy wool suit, shadow striped with red, she modeled in the fashion revue, and she confided that she also liked it very much, but what pleased her most was the fun that went on backstage, and the wonderful co-operation of Abraham & Straus. Mrs. Charles Podmaniczky, another model in the fashion show, also attended the concert.

Others Seen

Another person it was good to see at the Boston Symphony concert was Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, wife of the late former Borough President. We also noted Mrs. Clarence Waterman applauding until her hands were red, accompanied by her son, musician Vincent Waterman, who wore a pleased expression on his face.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had given her niece, Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, her box for the evening. So Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair were hosts to Mr. and Mrs. George H. Dayton, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Breuchaud, Mrs. James Fawcett and James McLaren.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Haughton Bell, also box holders, entertained their guests at dinner at their home, 28 Grace Court. In their party were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Spiker of Southport, Conn., and Prof. Russell Niles, assistant dean of the law school at New York University.

Among others seen in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. C. W. Baxter, Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mrs. Frank Butterworth, Mrs. Mary C. Draper, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mrs. William B. Parker with her daughter, Miss Kathryn Parker, and Miss Joan Long.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Bruno Walter chose a wholly classical program of the kind he does superlatively well for his final concerts as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It consists of two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

In such music Mr. Walter is probably unexcelled by anyone, and it is doubtful that these two symphonies could be more beautifully or more authoritatively played than they were yesterday. Once again it was a matter of consummate technical mastery joined with a strong temperament, a fine mind and a great heart.

The technical aspects of Mr. Walter's conducting have been pointed out here during his previous concerts this season. These consist of a very keen ear for both richness and clarity of sound, so that no matter how many instruments are playing, or how loud, everything can be heard.

These aspects also consist of a prodigious working knowledge of the orchestra, and an ability to secure what he wants with a maximum of effect and a minimum of effort. Mr. Walter is always vigilant that every nuance, time value or other detail be observed. Consequently there are no loose ends, no fuzzy places in a Walter performance. All goes along with precision and order.

In the final analysis, however, it is not so much technic as it is understanding of a composer's style and sympathy for his music that really produces a great performance. Technic is the necessary means to the end, but that is all. Here it is that Mr. Walter's extraordinary powers are seen in proportion.

It is the most profound understanding that makes his Beethoven "sing," that makes every tempo right, and gives the entire performance the sense of structure and the emotional power that Walter readings of the classics always have. Furthermore, there is a certain mellowness, a sense that Mr. Walter has been playing this music in just such a way for a long time, that adds the final touch of authority.

When yesterday's concert was over, Mr. Walter received applause and cheers such as no other guest conductor within my memory has enjoyed. He was recalled to the stage time and again. Plainly his four weeks have made a deep impression on the public. It is to be hoped he will be invited back again next season.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 21st regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. [illegible] ..... Beethoven
"Pastoral"
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Op. [illegible] ..... Beethoven
"Eroica"

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

After a week of concentrated opera, for a reviewer at least, it is rather a refreshing experience to hear a concert devoted entirely to Beethoven symphonies. To judge by the applause from yesterday's audience there was no objection in general to a program that was [illegible] exactly on the venturesome [illegible]. But then Bruno Walter is [illegible] conductor who cares to stray [illegible] far from the beaten track. He [illegible] partial to Strauss among living composers, but for unfamiliar music [illegible] generally goes to the symphonies [illegible] Bruckner and Mahler.

If the field of his repertoire, judging from his four weeks with the Boston Symphony this year, is not wide, he at least gives very high value in the interpretations of the better-known works. His experience and knowledge of the classical and romantic composers of Austria and Germany is so profound and his ability to impart his conceptions to the orchestra under his command so great that we in the audience are privileged to listen and reflect.

Neither the Pastoral nor the Eroica Symphony has been neglected at these concerts. Together with the 5th and the 7th they are the most frequently played of all Beethoven. Our task in the audience, then, was merely to sit back and absorb the beautifully exact and yet singing performances which were never fevered or harassed on the one hand nor lethargic on the other. This was Beethoven playing of great distinction.

Bruno Walter leaves us after the concert tonight. His four weeks with the orchestra have been thoroughly rewarding occasions. The Boston public, having been too long without the opportunity to appreciate his talents until this season, will give him a warm welcome back whenever he chooses or is asked to come.

Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct an all-Brahms concert, presenting the Variations on a theme of Haydn, the Alto Rhapsody and the 4th Symphony.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 17 1947

MUSIC

Song of Solomon—and Foss

Never before in its history had the Boston Symphony performed a new work eight times in nine days. Nor had more than a few contemporary composers ever before been assured of that many performances in so short a time. Yet this was the schedule begun last week for "The Song of Songs," the second biblical solo cantata written by 24-year-old Lukas Foss. Composed for soprano and orchestra, "The Songs of Songs" was commissioned by the League of Composers for Ellabelle Davis, the fast-rising Negro soprano.

"The Song of Songs" had its world première in Boston on March 7. Convinced of its merit and without waiting for a verdict by the critics, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony, programmed the cantata for performances in Boston, Northampton, Mass., New Haven, Conn., New York, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn—and also for broadcast nationally this week over ABC. "You will be dead," Koussevitzky said, shaking a paternal finger at Foss, "but this work will live."

The Boston critics, however, were not nearly so sure that "The Song of Songs" would live as long as Koussevitzky thought. That great talent and promise had been shown, they were all agreed. But on the finished product, they split. Cyrus Durgin of The Globe liked it best. "The most important thing about 'The Song of Songs' is its beauty of emotional expression," he wrote. "From first to last this is a song, and that is unusual in music today." But Warren Storey Smith of The Post thought that "only here and there did Mr. Foss seem to capture the real spirit of the text." Alexander Williams of The Herald felt that the composer "has written a musical composition first and a setting of a poetical text a long way second."

International
Ellabelle Davis as "Aïda" in Mexico

All agreed, however, that Miss Davis had used her big soprano voice in the fullest expression the music allowed. A Queen of Sheba this time, the former seamstress from New Rochelle, N. Y., portrayed another dusky heroine last summer when she sang Aïda in Mexico City. Last year, the League of Composers named Miss Davis "the outstanding American singer of the year"—an honor which led to the Foss commission.

Symphonist in Solitude: Foss chose the King James version of "The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's" only after rejecting the modern poetry he scanned for a suitable subject. In the Bible, he says, "almost everything screams for music."

Foss first won national recognition at 21, when the Boston Symphony presented his symphonic piece, "The Prairie." Although he was born in Berlin, he considers himself an American in training and development because he came to this country when he was 15 and became a citizen as soon as possible.

For the last two years Foss has held the post of chief pianist for the Boston Symphony—a job which brings him financial security, yet leaves him with plenty of time to compose. Creative work, he believes, calls for absolute solitude. Hence, he is still a bachelor.

Besides his talents as a composer and pianist, Foss is also a conductor and teacher. He would like to write for the theater, because he thinks that a musician should be flexible. Many of his musical colleagues, he feels, are too limited in their interests. "A specialist," he quipped, "is a man who does everything else worse."

Ruth Orkin
Foss: The Bible . . . "screams for music"

HARRISONBURG, VA.
NEWS-RECORD

MAR 18 1947

The Philharmonic

A battle between the conductor and board of directors of a symphony orchestra is, under ordinary circumstances, of purely local concern. But the controversy which has lately resulted in a change of leaders for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is of broader interest. The Philharmonic is not only the oldest but one of the greatest American symphony orchestras. By virtue of the fact that its Sunday afternoon concerts have been broadcast over a national network for many years it has an audience which now extends over the greater part of the United States.

This larger audience is not particularly well-informed on the details of the scrap which led to the resignation in mid-season of Arthur Rodzinski as the orchestra's conductor and it would probably find it difficult to judge them if it did. But it has every reason to be deeply concerned over the decision of the Philharmonic's management to go back to the system of splitting the chore of leading the orchestra among five different conductors.

Great symphony orchestras are not made or maintained this way The Boston Symphony is one of the world's finest because it has been trained and disciplined by a single great conductor over a long period of years. The Philadelphia Orchestra is another. brought to its musical apogee by Leopold Stokowski and maintained at the same high level by Eugene Ormandy, his successor.

Under a mediocre conductor and later under a series of temporary ones, the New York Philharmonic declined. Rodzinski, in his three years as conductor, brought it back to the top rank of symphony orchestras. It would be unfortunate to permit it to go into another period of decline for lack of the type of leadership it deserves.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 17 1947

Koussevitzky Does Stravinsky Score

The Boston Symphony made one of its important contributions to the musical season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky directed a performance of Igor Stravinsky's monumental "Symphonie des Psaumes." Not since it was new in 1931 has the orchestra which brought this work into existence done it here (though others have), and it was a profound experience to have it delivered with such technical mastery and artistic devotion. Certainly the closing "Laudate" (beautifully sung by the combined Radliffe and Harvard Glee clubs) is as sublime a musical utterance as this century has produced.

The Stravinsky was preceded by a repetition of Lukas Foss's "Song of Songs," first presented on Wednesday evening. It was again nobly interpreted by Ellabelle Davis, soprano, who made a glowing, vibrant thing of it with her uncommon voice and artistry. The work was again played with fine skill by the orchestra, and soloist, conductor and composer shared many bows at the end. The concert began with the third symphony of Rachmaninoff, also a repetition on this visit.

I. K.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 18 1947

Contemporary Comment

By RUTH G. DAVIS

There were hundreds that packed the Academy of Music on Friday evening and it was good to see faces that we hadn't seen at the previous concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether it was the fact that the program of the fourth concert had a special interest or whether it was other circumstances, we don't know. We do know, however, that a few of the ladies present had had a busy day. Mrs. Tremper Longman, who had been at the School Settlement fashion show earlier in the day, had rushed to Manhattan for dinner and then returned for the concert. We saw her first in a smart black suit with a tricky black blouse with two red and white stripes and a becoming feathered hat. She had assisted in giving out the fashion show's special prizes, which little Margot Moore drew out of a wire barrel. However, in the evening Mary Longman was in a new costume, a becoming purple shade. The concert also offered an opportunity to tell Mrs. Leonard Moore how much we like the navy wool suit, shadow striped with red, she modeled in the fashion revue, and she confided that she also liked it very much, but what pleased her most was the fun that went on backstage, and the wonderful co-operation of Abraham & Straus. Mrs. Charles Podmaniczky, another model in the fashion show, also attended the concert.

Others Seen

Another person it was good to see at the Boston Symphony concert was Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, wife of the late former Borough President. We also noted Mrs. Clarence Waterman applauding until her hands were red, accompanied by her son, musician Vincent Waterman, who wore a pleased expression on his face.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne had given her niece, Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, her box for the evening. So Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair were hosts to Mr. and Mrs. George H. Dayton, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Breuchaud, Mrs. James Fawcett and James McLaren.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Haughton Bell, also box holders, entertained their guests at dinner at their home, 28 Grace Court. In their party were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Spiker of Southport, Conn., and Prof. Russell Niles, assistant dean of the law school at New York University.

Among others seen in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. C. W. Baxter, Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mrs. Frank Butterworth, Mrs. Mary C. Draper, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mrs. William B. Parker with her daughter, Miss Kathryn Parker, and Miss Joan Long.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Bruno Walter chose a wholly classical program of the kind he does superlatively well for his final concerts as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It consists of two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

In such music Mr. Walter is probably unexcelled by anyone, and it is doubtful that these two symphonies could be more beautifully or more authoritatively played than they were yesterday. Once again it was a matter of consummate technical mastery joined with a strong temperament, a fine mind and a great heart.

The technical aspects of Mr. Walter's conducting have been pointed out here during his previous concerts this season. These consist of a very keen ear for both richness and clarity of sound, so that no matter how many instruments are playing, or how loud, everything can be heard.

These aspects also consist of a prodigious working knowledge of the orchestra, and an ability to secure what he wants with a maximum of effect and a minimum of effort. Mr. Walter is always vigilant that every nuance, time value or other detail be observed. Consequently there are no loose ends, no fuzzy places in a Walter performance. All goes along with precision and order.

In the final analysis, however, it is not so much technic as it is understanding of a composer's style and sympathy for his music that really produces a great performance. Technic is the necessary means to the end, but that is all. Here it is that Mr. Walter's extraordinary powers are seen in proportion.

It is the most profound understanding that makes his Beethoven "sing," that makes every tempo right, and gives the entire performance the sense of structure and the emotional power that Walter readings of the classics always have. Furthermore, there is a certain mellowness, a sense that Mr. Walter has been playing this music in just such a way for a long time, that adds the final touch of authority.

When yesterday's concert was over, Mr. Walter received applause and cheers such as no other guest conductor within my memory has enjoyed. He was recalled to the stage time and again. Plainly his four weeks have made a deep impression on the public. It is to be hoped he will be invited back again next season.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 21st regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 in F major [illegible] Beethoven
"Pastoral" [illegible]
Symphony No. 3 in E flat [illegible] Beethoven
"Eroica" [illegible]

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

After a week of [illegible] opera, for a reviewer at least, it is rather a refreshing experience to hear a concert devoted entirely to Beethoven symphonies. [illegible] by the applause from the audience there was no objection in general to a program that [illegible] exactly on the venturesome. But then Bruno Walter is [illegible] conductor who cares to [illegible] far from the beaten track. [illegible] partial to Strauss among [illegible] posers, but for unfamiliar [illegible] generally goes to the [illegible] Bruckner and Mahler.

If the field of his [illegible] judging from his [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] not wide, he at least [illegible] value in the interpretations of the better-known works. His experience and knowledge of the [illegible] and romantic composers of Austria and Germany is so [illegible] his ability to impart [illegible] to the orchestra [illegible] mand so great that [illegible] ence are privileged [illegible] reflect.

Neither the Pastoral [illegible] Eroica Symphony has [illegible] glected at these concerts [illegible] with the 5th and the 7th [illegible] the most frequently played [illegible] Beethoven. Our task in [illegible] ence, then, was merely to [illegible] and absorb the beautifully [illegible] and yet singing performances which were never [illegible] harassed on the one [illegible] lethargic on the other. [illegible] Beethoven playing [illegible] tinction.

Bruno Walter leaves [illegible] after the concert tonight. His four weeks with the orchestra have been thoroughly rewarding [illegible]. The Boston public, having been [illegible] without the opportunity to appreciate his talents until this season, will give him a warm welcome back whenever he chooses or is asked to come.

Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct an all-Brahms concert, presenting the Variations on a theme of Haydn, the Alto Rhapsody and the 4th Symphony.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

FM Interest Rapidly Grows

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
Radio, Drama, Music Editor

As glorious music pours out for six continuous hours without interruption from 3 p.m. until 6 p.m. each day over WAFM, the WAPI frequency modulation station atop Red Mountain (94.3 on your dial), interest in Birmingham continues to grow in FM broadcasting, according to local music dealers who find it impossible to keep stocked on FM attachments and radios.

The demand has increased 100 per cent in the past month since the daily programs have been on the air and listeners to private sets or to FM radios of the downtown radio dealers who are inviting the public to come in and listen to FM—whether sets are available or not.

Boon to FM is the promise of a new moderate-priced radio set that is expected to be on the market shortly, the installation of FM network centers throughout this part of the country, and the eventual working out with Petrillo the return to pickup of standard broadcast network shows by FM stations.

Meanwhile, here is a typical program of music you'll hear static-free over WAFM. The program begins at 3 p.m., but because most of it will be over by the time you read your evening paper, let's start at 6 p.m.:

6 P.M., Golden Moments of Melody—"Casey Jones" (Newton), "La Cucaracha (Mexican folk song), "Dance of the Spanish Onion" (Rose), "John Peel" (hunting song), "Sleepy Lagoon" (Coates), "My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean (college song), "Deep Night" (Henderson), "Old MacDonald Had a Farm" (folk song), "Easy to Love" (Porter).

6:30 P.M., Dinner Serenade: Harry Horlick Orchestra — "Suite Dansante Russe" (Russian folk song), "Summer Evening" (Waldteufel), "Szeretnelek" (Hungarian folk song), Valse Trieste" (Berger), Viennese Bonbons" (Strauss), "The Waltz Dream" (O. Straus), "Waltz in C Sharp Minor" (Chopin), "Wedding Dance" (Strauss), "The Yankee Princess" (Kalman), "You and You" (Strauss).

7 P.M.—Starlight Soiree.

7:30 P.M., Album Leaves—(Selections from light operas, musical comedies and motion pictures).

8 P.M., Concert Hall of the Air: London Philharmonic Orchestra, Artur Schnabel, pianist; Philadelphia Orchestra — "Piano Concerto No. 2, in B Flat (Beethoven), "Paphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2 (Ravel).

* * *

BRUNO WALTER WILL conclude his guest conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's WSGN-ABC's broadcasts when the ensemble returns to Symphony Hall at Boston for its Tuesday program at 7:30-8:30 p.m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will conduct the remaining broadcasts March 25 in Providence, R. I., April 1 in Cambridge, Mass.; April 8 in Hartford, Conn., and April 15 and 22 in Symphony Hall, Boston. For his final broadcast appearance Dr. Walter has chosen Corelli's "Christmas Concerto" for harpsichord and string orchestra as the opening number. The symphony will be the "Haffner" in D-Major, No. 35, composed by Mozart in July, 1782, as a serenade but later revised. The work came into the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1885. Dr. Walter conducted it in 1909 and several times subsequently. Following the Mozart score, Dr. Walter will present the "Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, composed as a birthday present for his wife, Cosima.

WSGN TELLO-TEST FANS:
The answer is
GEORGE WASHINGTON.

SPECIAL PREVIEW presentation of probable congressional committee action on the tense Greek situation has been scheduled for the WTNB-WJLD Mutual American Forum on the Air tonight at 8:30. Question posed on tonight's program will be "What is the Solution to the Problem in Greece?" Scheduled witnesses include two outstanding Greco-American leaders: Solon G. Vlasto, Greek publisher and supporter of the current Greek government; and Andre Michalopoulos, spokesman for the opposition Greek political faction. The congressional radio committee will be composed of Sen. Glen H. Taylor, of Idaho; Rep. John M. Vorys, of Ohio, and Rep. Jacob K. Jarvis, of New York City.

* * *

WHAT DO WE know about Canada? What do Canadians know about us? Radio listeners will learn the answer when WTNB and Mutual premier the novel International Quiz between an American and a Canadian team of experts tonight at 9:30. Alister Cooke, for the U. S., and Don Fairbairn for Canada—quiz masters—will fire a variety of questions at the experts, ranging from history, geography and politics to sports and slang terms. Bill Corum, famous sports writer, and John Bredner, history professor at Columbia, will comprise the U. S. team.

* * *

WITH A SIGH OF RELIEF the radio editor learns that thousands of listeners now may stop worrying over "Who's Mrs. Hush?" and just settle down to enjoy good listening. Seldom has a program brought as many queries to this desk. Station WBRC, which carried the NBC Ralph Edwards program, to local theater managers—and everyone who might (and didn't) know the identity of the mystery voice.

She is, of course, Clara Bow, the "It" girl of the screen of yesterday, who is now Mrs. Rex Bell.

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN-NEWS
MAR 19 1947

SIDNEY SKOLSKY

Hollywood Is My Beat

Fade Out, Fade In

RECENTLY THERE appeared in the papers a story that Serge Koussevitzky sued to stop publication of a book about himself called "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, a former music critic. This item both amused and puzzled me. It showed clearly a big difference between writing a book about a person and making a picture about a person.

Any author, if he so desires, can write a biography about any person that he may select. This author can also mention and discuss other characters who are part of his main subject's career, and do so without their permission.

The movies are entirely different. No one can tell on celluloid the biography of a celebrity without permission from the person or his representatives. And other people who figure in the career of the main subject cannot be mentioned without their permission.

This is an important and vital difference. It accounts for a main fault in the majority of screen biographies, and that is that they alwa; glorify the subject, and also do the same for any other celebrity depicted in the picture.

The publication of a biography is seldom given to the subject or his representatives for their approval. Authorized biographies, as a rule, are generally looked upon in disfavor. I don't know why it is that an author can write a book about a celebrity but cannot write a movie, except with authorization. I realize, of course, that a movie reaches a larger audience, and that a movie shows the person instead of merely words about him. But that difference must be taken into account because of the functions of both mediums. I am told that a movie biography is an invasion of a person's privacy, but so is the written biography.

I don't believe there will be different and completely honest screen biographies until this issue is clarified and corrected. I would like to know from some reputable movie lawyer why the movies can't do what the book publishers do, and what is sometimes even done on the stage.

The motion pictures work under wraps, and then are criticized as if they had the same freedom and opportunities as a book, or even a play.

Koussevitzky and Bernstein

3/21/47

Editor:

Now that I have observed both Leonard Bernstein and Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony ~~here at Providence~~, I too would like to add my two cents to the current critics—music lovers controversy revolving around whether "Lennie" is simply an over-enthusiastic acrobat or whether the Bulletin's critics views were just a bunch of sour grapes—remnants of his "undergraduate days with Lennie at Harvard." It is true that recently "Sir Gay" conducted his orchestra in the quiet, dignified and majestic manner which befits an old master like him and which inevitably results in heavenly music. It is especially true, however, that when Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony, the euphonious results were equally gratifying, even though his methods of direction may have been of a more youthful character. I feel that every conductor should try to give each piece of music his own individual interpretation rather than try to follow a set, stereotyped pattern, according to the example of others.

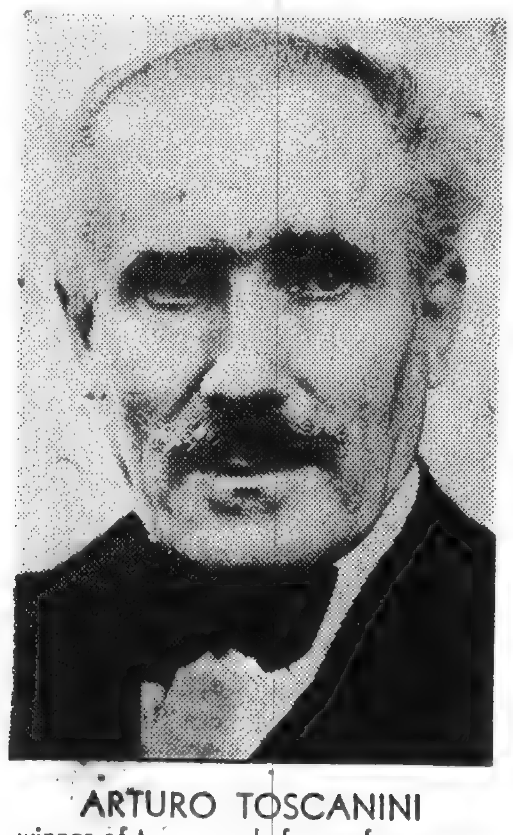
To draw a simile, I might say that Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra as calmly and efficiently as a Western rancher would ride his favorite steed; Bernstein, being a visitor to the ranch, rode the strange steed with more effort more tenseness, but with the same preciseness and competency as the horse's owner. After all, since only the ultimate result serves as our criterion, why quibble about modes and methods—besides doesn't "Lennie" do a terrific "Left, face!"

Providence. PAUL FAIRBROOK.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES
MAR 20 1947

MUSIC ON RECORDS

BY REED HYNDS



ARTURO TOSCANINI
winner of two awards for performances on records.

Oscars For Discs

THE FIRST awards for fine recordings in the field of serious music have been made at a dinner in New York. They cover production in 1946. Among the winners in a dozen categories were Arturo Toscanini, Serge Koussevitzky, Ezio Pinza, Lotte Lehmann, Bruno Walter, Licia Albanese and Robert Merrill.

While it may be some time before these awards attain a wide esteem, or have a stimulating effect on the industry, their inauguration seems an excellent idea. Perhaps the award-giving agency should have a wider base, but in any case a start has been made. The "Oscars," incidentally, consisted of handsome framed trophies bearing a gold embossed reproduction of each record given recognition.

The awards were sponsored by the magazine, Review of Recorded Music, together with 200 record dealers throughout the country. Heading the jury was Irving Kolodin, editor of the magazine and of the music department of the New York Sun, who is known as an outstanding authority on records.

Here are the selections:

SYMPHONY—A tie between Haydn's Symphony No. 98, with Toscanini conducting the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra (Victor), and Mahler's Symphony No. 4, with Bruno Walter conducting the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra (Columbia).

CONCERTO—Brahms' Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. (Columbia).

ORCHESTRAL—(single)—Weber's "Der Freischutz" Overture, with Toscanini conducting the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

PROGRAM MUSIC—Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring," with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

OPERA—(album)—Mozart Operatic Arias, Ezio Pinza. (Columbia).

OPERA—(single)—"Ah! Dite alla giovine," from Verdi's "La Traviata," Albanese and Merrill. (Victor).

INSTRUMENTAL—Bach's Goldberg Variations, Wanda Landowska (Harpsichord). (Victor).

VOCAL—(album)—Schubert's "Die Schone Muellerin," Lotte Lehmann. (Columbia).

CHAMBER MUSIC—(album)—Mozart's Quintet in C. (K. 515), Budapest String Quartet, with Milton Katims, viola. (Columbia).

CHAMBER MUSIC—(single)—Prokofieff's Overture on a Hebrew Theme," with William Nowinski of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and his Sextet. (Disc).

"MOST ENTERPRISING REPERTORY"—Concert Hall Society.

"BEST FOREIGN RECORDING"—Stravinsky's Petrouchka Suite, with Ernest Ansermet conducting the London Philharmonic Orchestra. (Decca).

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony concerts this week are definitely an occasion, for at them guest conductor Bruno Walter presents the Fourth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. The soprano soloist for the last movement is Viennese Desi Halban, making her Boston debut. The other two pieces on the program, already performed last Tuesday, are the "Christmas" Concerto by Corelli and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll."

Thanks to the efforts of Richard Burgin, when he has conducted Mahler's Fourth Symphony is not precisely unknown here, although its performances have been infrequent. But the important thing, where the music of Mahler is concerned, is that no musician has a greater knowledge of it nor more sympathy for it than Bruno Walter.

First as disciple, then as a colleague and an intimate friend of Mahler, Mr. Walter ultimately became the composer's greatest prophet. To him fell the responsibility and honor of first performing, after Mahler's death, "Das Lied von der Erde" and the Ninth Symphony. Without exaggeration, it may be said that everything in the way of profound comprehension and special knowledge of Mahler's musical idiom is possessed, and uniquely so, by Bruno Walter.

As the Fourth is the shortest and the lightest in texture of all nine Mahler symphonies, so it is the most untroubled. The grotesquerie which pervades it is naive and serene rather than demonic. Yet, as in all Mahler, melancholy lies just beneath the surface. And over the whole symphony hovers that nervous restlessness which is expressed by a constant flow of counterpoint, from instrument to instrument of the entire orchestra.

Mr. Walter brought to the Symphony what may be assumed to be a peculiarly Viennese quality, soft and songful. His performance had an especial tenderness which I never had happened to come across with Mahler before. Responding magnificently to his wishes, the orchestra played with a dazzling virtuosity and an incomparable richness of tone. Miss Halban's light voice is especially suited to the solo of the last movement. Mahler's desire was that the singer should sound like a child expressing delight at the wonders of Heaven. This Miss Halban accomplishes admirably.

Through the afternoon the orchestra performed with extraordinary clarity, as much in Corelli and the "Siegfried Idyll" as in Mahler. For its part, the audience was uncommonly enthusiastic, not least of all for Mahler.

[140]

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

MAR 21 1947

Woman's New York

Leonard Bernstein Strikes Fire When He Conducts Orchestras

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, Mar. 20—The dearest wish of any orchestral musician is to become conductor of a great symphony orchestra. This offer is sure to be made to Leonard Bernstein, brilliant, 28-year-old composer, conductor and concert pianist. Yet many of his friends say that when the offer comes Bernstein may not take it. His career in music is so spectacular that to limit himself to a conductor's scope might seem too confining to this gifted fellow. Only seven years ago he was still a student majoring in music at Harvard. At this moment he is guest conductor for the Rochester Symphony Orchestra. In about three weeks he sets sail on a triumphant tour of Palestine, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Austria, England and France where he will conduct the leading orchestras.

Alice Hughes

It was in November, 1943, that Leonard Bernstein drank up the spotlight of fame when, without notice, he guest-conducted for Bruno Walter. The music critics hauled out their best 75 per cent adjectives, and since then he has been constantly showered with invitations and offers that older conductors covet. Bernstein seems to prefer variety of expression. He composed a creditable symphony named for the prophet Jeremiah. He wrote the rollicking ballet music for Fancy Free and Fac-simile.

On the Town, composed by Bernstein, was a smash hit on Broadway a few seasons ago. For our City Center he acts as musical director. When he pleases he can guest-conduct for nearly any symphony band he pleases. Once in a while Hollywood calls him. When pictures reach the high level he sets, Bernstein's name as composer is certain to appear in films. When he is in the mood he gives a piano concert and audiences scream until he plays Beethoven's First and also the Ravel Concerto.

This versatile young musician is almost too quick-silvery to pin down to any one job, even though Serge Koussevitzky, head of the Boston Symphony, nurses the fond dream that when he finally abandons his magic baton, Lenny (as his friends call him) will take over. Lenny conducts the Boston once a year at least, and the men like to play under him. In the words of the music critics, he "strikes fire."

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MAR 22 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, supplied the Herald Tribune critic with his second opportunity to cut patterns for the boys on the outside pages. Koussevitzky asked for a court injunction to prevent a man named Moses Smith from publishing his biography of the conductor. "Mr. Koussevitzky is not the only first-class conductor in the world, though he is one of the best," Mr. Thomson wrote. "Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity apotheosis that has already begun, would [illegible] value in posing before an already worshiping universe without the customary habiliment of one human weakness." Koussevitzky's lawsuit, Mr. Thomson went on, added just that element to the picture of himself that the composer wanted to create.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MAR 21 1947

Skolsky's Hollywood

Screen Biographies Need Subjects' Okay

By Sidney Skolsky.

HOLLYWOOD, March 20.

RECENTLY there appeared in the papers a story tha Serge Koussevitzky sued to stop publication of a bool about himself ~~called~~ "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, a former music critic. This item both amused and puzzled me It showed clearly a big difference between writing a book about a person and making a picture about a person.

Sidney Skolsky.

Any author, if he so desires, can write a biography about any person that he may select. This author can also mention and discuss other characters who are part of his main subject's career, and do so without their permission.

The movies are entirely different. No one can tell on celluloid the biography of a celebrity without permission from the person or his representative. And other people who figure in the career of the main subject cannot be mentioned without their permission.

This is an important and vital difference. It accounts for a main fault in the majority of screen biographies, and that is that they always glorify the subject, and also do the same for any other celebrity depicted in the picture.

The publication of a biography is seldom given to the subject or his representatives for their approval. Authorized biographies, as a rule, are generally looked upon in disfavor. I don't know why it is that an author can write a book about a celebrity but cannot write a movie, except with authorization.

* * *

I REALIZE, of course, that a movie reaches a larger audience, and that a movie shows the person instead of merely words about him. But that difference must be taken into account because of the functions of both mediums. I am told that a movie biography is an invasion of a person's privacy, but so is the written biography.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 23 1947

MUENCH: Charles Muench, French conductor, flew back to Paris ten days ago with contracts to reappear next season with three of the six major orchestras he conducted while on his first visit to this country. He also had contracts to appear for the first time on his return with the Cleveland Orchestra and the Minneapolis Symphony. The three orchestras that re-engaged him were the Boston Symphony, the Montreal Concert Symphoniques and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which has signed him for six of its twenty-eight weeks. One of the works he will play with the Philharmonic will be Arthur Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," which has not yet been heard in this country. Based on a text by Claudel, it requires singing and speaking parts, and children's and adult choruses.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 20th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Desi Halban, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in G minor No. 8..Corelli
A Siegfried Idyl..................Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in G major......Mahler

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was memorable for the ingratiating performance of Mahler's 4th Symphony, perhaps the best possible introduction to the works of that composer. Under the expert guidance of Mr. Walter, who is probably the world's leading interpreter of Mahler, the 4th Symphony yesterday could be regarded as an acid test. Rest assured that if you did not care for this you will never succumb to Mahler's genius at all.

The performance was marred only by a false entry of the second violins in the first movement, but otherwise all was serenity, eloquence and a lyrical gaiety according to the utmost demands of the score. For a long work that has, when you come to reflect on it, astonishingly little variety of mood Mahler has yet contrived a work that is never tedious. In some of his other symphonies he did not escape this fault There is, of course, variety of pace though not widely so, and volume but there is throughout a complete unity of spirit. The tender, child-like gaiety of the finale is at one with the ineffable peace of the slow movement and equally the other movements with each other.

Mahler is a composer whose name is too frequently coupled with that of Bruckner. Actually it should be possible to form independent judgments of the music of either composer without having both of them thrown at you like a pair of Siamese twins. This 4th Symphony is one of Mahler's happiest and least troubled creations. Its intimate charm is something very special among musical compositions, and a fine performance of it is something to cherish.

Mr. Walter was fortunate in his choice of a singer, as we were lucky to have him as interpreter of this music. Miss Halban sang the music of the finale simply, gracefully and clearly. As was to be expected, under the circumstances it was a performance without exaggeration or parody, in the spirit in which Mahler conceived it.

The program began, as it did last Tuesday, with Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto and Wagner's Siegfried Idyl. The former is a particularly fine example of the concerted music of the late 17th and early 18th centuries. It was ideal for the Boston Symphony's strings, with the harpsichord continuo in the trustworthy hands of Mr. Erwin Bodky.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyl was most persuasively performed yesterday, with the exception of one slip in a horn solo. Cosima's birthday music is rather a delicate flower in the concert hall and requires just the right handling for its bloom to make the best effect. Again Mr. Walter was just the man to turn this trick.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Walter will end his stay with the orchestra by playing Beethoven's 6th and 3rd Symphonies.

Boston Plays 2 New Works

By Samuel L. Singer

Two compositions new here and the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony comprised the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky conducted last night, in its annual concert presented by the Philadelphia Forum at the Academy of Music.

The local premieres were by two living composers. One was "The Song of Songs," Biblical cantata by Lukas Foss, 24-year-old Berlin-born American composer, with Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano soloist in this composition for the eighth time in nine days. The other was a Concerto Grosso by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer, for two pianos and chamber orchestra. Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were at the keyboards.

In Modern Idiom

Both works were in the 20th-century idiom harmonically, but here the similarity ended. The cantata, 23 minutes long, uses selections from the Song of Solomon. It is unusual in that the orchestral writing contrasts with rather than complements the vocal portions.

The solo part has a certain seductiveeness and languor, and melodic appeal, while the orchestration throughout is bold and sharp, especially in the purely instrumental passages.

Singer Impressive

The work scored a great success, and Miss Davis enlarged on the impression she made with the Philadelphia Orchestra last November. In vocal flexibility and interpretive power she projected well the varying moods of the Biblical passages.

The Martinu work, not one of his best, is a concerto grosso in spirit rather than substance. Using modern harmonies and a vigorous scoring in the two fast movements, it frankly entails no formal development. The slow movement featured a broad melody for the strings, while the finale alternated passages between the orchestra and the pianos.

Mar 5 ~~Ledger~~ Herald

Koussevitzky Loses Suit to Bar Biography

NEW YORK, March 4 (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

[illegible] 22 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

[illegible]

LAST [illegible] Carnegie H[illegible] [illegible] we[illegible] which three [illegible] chestras provid[illegible] premières. The Ph[illegible] -Sym-phony, directed by Leo[illegible] Stokows[illegible] introduced a "Hymne [illegible] Grand O[illegible] chestre," by Olivier Mes[illegible], a curre[illegible] French composer whose music has had much circulation hereabouts. T[illegible] Messiaen method of composition, it a[illegible] pears, involves "non-retrograda[illegible] rhythms" and "modes of limited tra[illegible] position," but one doesn't have to be [illegible] initiate in such matters to enjoy [illegible] work. The short "Hymne" proved [illegible] be atmospherically impressive and glo[illegible] ingly scored, and the chances are th[illegible] we'll be hearing more of the Messia[illegible] output presently. Vincent d'Ind[illegible] "Symphony for Orchestra and Pia[illegible] on a French Mountain Song," a rel[illegible] tively uncommon item, was included [illegible] this program. It is extremely likabl[illegible] and it was played ingratiatingly [illegible] the orchestra and Robert Casadesus, th[illegible] evening's soloist. Mr. Casadesus al[illegible] furnished some superb piano work [illegible] Franck's "Symphonic Variations." Fo[illegible] good measure, the Philharmonic offere[illegible] Ravel's "La Valse" and two of M[illegible] Stokowski's adroit orchestral transcrip-tions—one of an Albeniz piano suit[illegible] and the other of Debussy's "Soirée dan[illegible] Grenade." Mr. Stokowski conducte[illegible] everything masterfully.

THE Boston Symphony's novelt[illegible] was "The Song of Songs," a sol[illegible] cantata for soprano and orchestra, com-posed by the versatile young musicia[illegible] Lukas Foss. Mr. Foss has used a tex[illegible] from "The Song of Solomon," some-times as a point of departure for musi-cal developments and sometimes a[illegible] poetry to be sung. Although there are places where the words become secondary in importance to the music, the work has distinction and resourcefulness, and the third movement, which is a recitative, is compellingly dramatic. The soloist was Ellabelle Davis, whose singing was one of the finest achievements of the season, and Serge Koussevitzky's conducting made the most of the orchestral patterns. Mr. Foss was also in evidence as one of the pianists (the other was Bernard Zighera) in Bohuslav Martinu's skillful and attractive "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony occupied half of the program; Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of it was sensitive and forceful, but as an entity, this symphony still doesn't seem to be as persuasive as many of its parts.

MAR 21 1947

Woman's New York

Leonard Bernstein Strikes Fire When He Conducts Orchestras

By ALICE HUGHES

Alice Hughes

New York, Mar. 20—The dearest wish of any orchestral musician is to become conductor of a great symphony orchestra. This offer is sure to be made to Leonard Bernstein, brilliant, 28-year-old composer, conductor and concert pianist. Yet many of his friends say that when the offer comes Bernstein may not take it. His career in music is so spectacular that to limit himself to a conductor's scope might seem too confining to this gifted fellow. Only seven years ago he was still a student majoring in music at Harvard. At this moment he is guest conductor for the Rochester Symphony Orchestra. In about three weeks he sets sail on a triumphant tour of Palestine, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Austria, England and France where he will conduct the leading orchestras.

It was in November, 1943, that Leonard Bernstein drank up the spotlight of fame when, without notice, he guest-conducted for Bruno Walter. The music critics hauled out their best 75 per cent adjectives, and since then he has been constantly showered with invitations and offers that older conductors covet. Bernstein seems to prefer variety of expression. He composed a creditable symphony named for the prophet Jeremiah. He wrote the rollicking ballet music for Fancy Free and Fac-simile.

On the Town, composed by Bernstein, was a smash hit on Broadway a few seasons ago. For our City Center he acts as musical director. When he pleases he can guest-conduct for nearly any symphony band he pleases. Once in a while Hollywood calls him. When pictures reach the high level he sets, Bernstein's name as composer is certain to appear in films. When he is in the mood he gives a piano concert and audiences scream until he plays Beethoven's First and also the Ravel Concerto.

This versatile young musician is almost too quick-silvery to pin down to any one job, even though Serge Koussevitzky, head of the Boston Symphony, nurses the fond dream that when he finally abandons his magic baton, Lenny (as his friends call him) will take over. Lenny conducts the Boston once a year at least, and the men like to play under him. In the words of the music critics, he "strikes fire."

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 22 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, supplied the Herald Tribune critic with his second opportunity to cut patterns for the boys on the outside pages. Koussevitzky asked for a court injunction to prevent a man named Moses Smith from publishing his biography of the conductor. "Mr. Koussevitzky is not the only first-class conductor in the world, though he is one of the best," Mr. Thomson wrote. "Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity ap[illegible] that has already begun, would [illegible] value in posing be[illegible] universe [illegible] of one h[illegible] law-suit, [illegible] just that element [illegible] himself that the composer wanted to create.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
MAR 21 1947

Skolsky's Hollywood

Screen Biographies Need Subjects' Okay

By Sidney Skolsky.

HOLLYWOOD, March 20.

RECENTLY there appeared in the papers a story that Serge Koussevitzky sued to stop publication of a book about himself called "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, a former music critic. This item both amused and puzzled me. It showed clearly a big difference between writing a book about a person and making a picture about a person.

Sidney Skolsky.

Any author, if he so desires, can write a biography about any person that he may select. This author can also mention and discuss other characters who are part of his main subject's career, and do so without their permission.

The movies are entirely different. No one can tell on celluloid the biography of a celebrity without permission from the person or his representative. And other people who figure in the career of the main subject cannot be mentioned without their permission.

This is an important and vital difference. It accounts for a main fault in the majority of screen biographies, and that is that they always glorify the subject, and also do the same for any other celebrity depicted in the picture.

The publication of a biography is seldom given to the subject or his representatives for their approval. Authorized biographies, as a rule, are generally looked upon in disfavor. I don't know why it is that an author can write a book about a celebrity but cannot write a movie, except with authorization.

* * *

I REALIZE, of course, that a movie reaches a larger audience, and that a movie shows the person instead of merely words about him. But that difference must be taken into account because of the functions of both mediums. I am told that a movie biography is an invasion of a person's privacy, but so is the written biography.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 22 1947

MUENCH: Charles Muench, French conductor, flew back to Paris ten days ago with contracts to reappear next season with three of the six major orchestras he conducted while on his first visit to this country. He also had contracts to appear for the first time on his return with the Cleveland Orchestra and the Minneapolis Symphony. The three orchestras that re-engaged him were the Boston Symphony, the Montreal Concert Symphoniques and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which has signed him for six of its twenty-eight weeks. One of the works he will play with the Philharmonic will be Arthur Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," which has not yet been heard in this country. Based on a text by Claudel, it requires singing and speaking parts, and children's and adult choruses.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 20th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Desi Halban, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in G minor No. 8. . Corelli
A Siegfried Idyl. . . . . Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in G major. . . . . . Mahler

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was memorable for the ingratiating performance of Mahler's 4th Symphony, perhaps the best possible introduction to the works of that composer. Under the expert guidance of Mr. Walter, who is probably the world's leading interpreter of Mahler, the 4th Symphony yesterday could be regarded as an acid test. Rest assured that if you did not care for this you will never succumb to Mahler's genius at all.

The performance was marred only by a false entry of the second violins in the first movement, but otherwise all was serenity, eloquence and a lyrical gaiety according to the utmost demands of the score. For a long work that has, when you come to reflect on it, astonishingly little variety of mood Mahler has yet contrived a work that is never tedious. In some of his other symphonies he did not escape this fault. There is, of course, variety of pace though not widely so, and volume but there is throughout a complete unity of spirit. The tender, childlike gaiety of the finale is at one with the ineffable peace of the slow movement and equally the other movements with each other.

Mahler is a composer whose name is too frequently coupled with that of Bruckner. Actually it should be possible to form independent judgments of the music of either composer without having both of them thrown at you like a pair of Siamese twins. This 4th Symphony is one of Mahler's happiest and least troubled creations. Its intimate charm is something very special among musical compositions, and a fine performance of it is something to cherish.

Mr. Walter was fortunate in his choice of a singer, as we were lucky to have him as interpreter of this music. Miss Halban sang the music of the finale simply, gracefully and clearly. As was to be expected, under the circumstances it was a performance without exaggeration or parody, in the spirit in which Mahler conceived it.

The program began, as it did last Tuesday, with Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto and Wagner's Siegfried Idyl. The former is a particularly fine example of the concerted music of the late 17th and early 18th centuries. It was ideal for the Boston Symphony's strings, with the harpsichord continuo in the trustworthy hands of Mr. Erwin Bodky.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyl was most persuasively performed yesterday, with the exception of one slip in a horn solo. Cosima's birthday music is rather a delicate flower in the concert hall and requires just the right handling for its bloom to make the best effect. Again Mr. Walter was just the man to turn this trick.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Walter will end his stay with the orchestra by playing Beethoven's 6th and 3rd Symphonies.

Boston Plays 2 New Works

By Samuel L. Singer

Two compositions new here and the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony comprised the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky conducted last night, in its annual concert presented by the Philadelphia Forum at the Academy of Music.

The local premieres were by two living composers. One was "The Song of Songs," Biblical cantata by Lukas Foss, 24-year-old Berlin-born American composer, with Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano soloist in this composition for the eighth time in nine days. The other was a Concerto Grosso by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer, for two pianos and chamber orchestra. Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were at the keyboards.

In Modern Idiom

Both works were in the 20th-century idiom harmonically, but here the similarity ended. The cantata, 23 minutes long, uses selections from the Song of Solomon. It is unusual in that the orchestral writing contrasts with rather than complements the vocal portions.

The solo part has a certain seductiveeness and languor, and melodic appeal, while the orchestration throughout is bold and sharp, especially in the purely instrumental passages.

Singer Impressive

The work scored a great success, and Miss Davis enlarged on the impression she made with the Philadelphia Orchestra last November. In vocal flexibility and interpretive power she projected well the varying moods of the Biblical passages.

The Martinu work, not one of his best, is a concerto grosso in spirit rather than substance. Using modern harmonies and a vigorous scoring in the two fast movements, it frankly entails no formal development. The slow movement featured a broad melody for the strings, while the finale alternated passages between the orchestra and the pianos.

Koussevitzky Loses Suit to Bar Biography

NEW YORK, March 4 (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 22 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Carnegie Debs

LAST week Carnegie H was a sort of perimental we in which three chestras provid premières. The Pl harmonic-Sy phony, directed by Leopold Stokow introduced a "Hymne pour Grand C chestre," by Olivier Messiaen, a curr French composer whose music has had much circulation hereabouts. T Messiaen method of composition, it pears, involves "non-retrograda rhythms" and "modes of limited tra position," but one doesn't have to be initiate in such matters to enjoy work. The short "Hymne" proved be atmospherically impressive and glo ingly scored, and the chances are t we'll be hearing more of the Messia output presently. Vincent d'Ind "Symphony for Orchestra and Pia on a French Mountain Song," a re tively uncommon item, was included this program. It is extremely likab and it was played ingratiatingly the orchestra and Robert Casadesus, t evening's soloist. Mr. Casadesus al furnished some superb piano work Franck's "Symphonic Variations." F good measure, the Philharmonic offer Ravel's "La Valse" and two of M Stokowski's adroit orchestral transcri tions—one of an Albeniz piano sui and the other of Debussy's "Soirée dan Grenade." Mr. Stokowski conducte everything masterfully.

THE Boston Symphony's novelt was "The Song of Songs," a sol cantata for soprano and orchestra, com posed by the versatile young musicia Lukas Foss. Mr. Foss has used a tex from "The Song of Solomon," some times as a point of departure for musi cal developments and sometimes a poetry to be sung. Although there ar places where the words become sec ondary in importance to the music, th work has distinction and resourcefulness, and the third movement, which is a recitative, is compellingly dramatic. The soloist was Ellabelle Davis, whose singing was one of the finest achievements of the season, and Serge Koussevitzky's conducting made the most of the orchestral patterns. Mr. Foss was also in evidence as one of the pianists (the other was Bernard Zighera) in Bohuslav Martinu's skillful and attractive "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony occupied half of the program; Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of it was sensitive and forceful, but as an entity, this symphony still doesn't seem to be as persuasive as many of its parts.

[141]

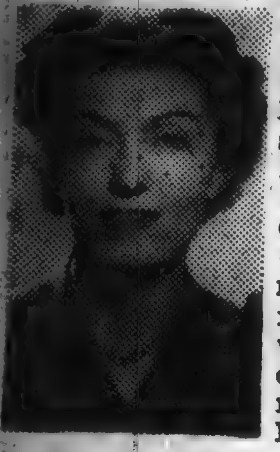
MAR 21 1947

Woman's New York

Leonard Bernstein Strikes Fire When He Conducts Orchestras

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, Mar. 20—The dearest wish of any orchestral musician is to become conductor of a great symphony orchestra. This offer is sure to be made to Leonard Bernstein, brilliant, 28 - year - old composer, conductor and concert pianist. Yet many of his friends say that when the offer comes Bernstein may not take it. His career in music is so spectacular that to limit himself to a conductor's scope might seem too confining to this gifted fellow. Only seven years ago he was still a student majoring in music at Harvard. At this moment he is guest conductor for the Rochester Symphony Orchestra. In about three weeks he sets sail on a triumphant tour of Palestine, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Austria, England and France where he will conduct the leading orchestras.



Alice Hughes

It was in November, 1943, that Leonard Bernstein drank up the spotlight of fame when, without notice, he guest - conducted for Bruno Walter. The music critics hauled out their best 75 per cent adjectives, and since then he has been constantly showered with invitations and offers that older conductors covet. Bernstein seems to prefer variety of expression. He composed a creditable symphony named for the prophet Jeremiah. He wrote the rollicking ballet music for Fancy Free and Fac-simile.

On the Town, composed by Bernstein, was a smash hit on Broadway a few seasons ago. For our City Center he acts as musical director. When he pleases he can guest-conduct for nearly any symphony band he pleases. Once in a while Hollywood calls him. When pictures reach the high level he sets, Bernstein's name as composer is certain to appear in films. When he is in the mood he gives a piano concert and audiences scream until he plays Beethoven's First and also the Ravel Concerto.

This versatile young musician is almost too quick - silvery to pin down to any one job, even though Serge Koussevitzky, head of the Boston Symphony, nurses the fond dream that when he finally abandons his magic baton, Lenny (as his friends call him) will take over. Lenny conducts the Boston once a year at least, and the men like to play under him. In the words of the music critics, he "strikes fire."

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MAR 22 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, supplied the Herald Tribune critic with his second opportunity to cut patterns for the boys on the outside pages. Koussevitzky asked for a court injunction to prevent a man named Moses Smith from publishing his biography of the conductor. "Mr. Koussevitzky is not the only first-class conductor in the world, though he is one of the best," Mr. Thomson wrote. "Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity ap[illegible] that has already begun, would [illegible] value in posing be[illegible] [illegible] universe [illegible] of one h[illegible] law-suit, [illegible] just that element [illegible] himself that the composer wanted to create.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MAR 21 1947

Skolsky's Hollywood

Screen Biographies Need Subjects' Okay

By Sidney Skolsky.

HOLLYWOOD, March 20.

RECENTLY there appeared in the papers a story that Serge Koussevitzky sued to stop publication of a book about himself called "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, a former music critic. This item both amused and puzzled me. It showed clearly a big difference between writing a book about a person and making a picture about a person.

Sidney Skolsky.

Any author, if he so desires, can write a biography about any person that he may select. This author can also mention and discuss other characters who are part of his main subject's career, and do so without their permission.

The movies are entirely different. No one can tell on celluloid the biography of a celebrity without permission from the person or his representative. And other people who figure in the career of the main subject cannot be mentioned without their permission.

This is an important and vital difference. It accounts for a main fault in the majority of screen biographies, and that is that they always glorify the subject, and also do the same for any other celebrity depicted in the picture.

The publication of a biography is seldom given to the subject or his representatives for their approval. Authorized biographies, as a rule, are generally looked upon in disfavor. I don't know why it is that an author can write a book about a celebrity but cannot write a movie, except with authorization.

* * *

I REALIZE, of course, that a movie reaches a larger audience, and that a movie shows the person instead of merely words about him. But that difference must be taken into account because of the functions of both mediums. I am told that a movie biography is an invasion of a person's privacy, but so is the written biography.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

[illegible] 1947

MUENCH: Charles Muench, French conductor, flew back to Paris ten days ago with contracts to reappear next season with three of the six major orchestras he conducted while on his first visit to this country. He also had contracts to appear for the first time on his return with the Cleveland Orchestra and the Minneapolis Symphony. The three orchestras that re-engaged him were the Boston Symphony, the Montreal Concert Symphoniques and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which has signed him for six of its twenty-eight weeks. One of the works he will play with the Philharmonic will be Arthur Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," which has not yet been heard in this country. Based on a text by Claudel, it requires singing and speaking parts, and children's and adult choruses.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 20th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Desi Halban, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in G minor No. 8. . Corelli
A Siegfried Idyl. . . . . Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in G major. . . . . Mahler

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was memorable for the ingratiating performance of Mahler's 4th Symphony, perhaps the best possible introduction to the works of that composer. Under the expert guidance of Mr. Walter, who is probably the world's leading interpreter of Mahler, the 4th Symphony yesterday could be regarded as an acid test. Rest assured that if you did not care for this you will never succumb to Mahler's genius at all.

The performance was marred only by a false entry of the second violins in the first movement, but otherwise all was serenity, eloquence and a lyrical gaiety according to the utmost demands of the score. For a long work that has, when you come to reflect on it, astonishingly little variety of mood Mahler has yet contrived a work that is never tedious. In some of his other symphonies he did not escape this fault. There is, of course, variety of pace though not widely so, and volume but there is throughout a complete unity of spirit. The tender, child-like gaiety of the finale is at one with the ineffable peace of the slow movement and equally the other movements with each other.

Mahler is a composer whose name is too frequently coupled with that of Bruckner. Actually it should be possible to form independent judgments of the music of either composer without having both of them thrown at you like a pair of Siamese twins. This 4th Symphony is one of Mahler's happiest and least troubled creations. Its intimate charm is something very special among musical compositions, and a fine performance of it is something to cherish.

Mr. Walter was fortunate in his choice of a singer, as we were lucky to have him as interpreter of this music. Miss Halban sang the music of the finale simply, gracefully and clearly. As was to be expected, under the circumstances it was a performance without exaggeration or parody, in the spirit in which Mahler conceived it.

The program began, as it did last Tuesday, with Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto and Wagner's Siegfried Idyl. The former is a particularly fine example of the concerted music of the late 17th and early 18th centuries. It was ideal for the Boston Symphony's strings, with the harpsichord continuo in the trustworthy hands of Mr. Erwin Bodky.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyl was most persuasively performed yesterday, with the exception of one slip in a horn solo. Cosima's birthday music is rather a delicate flower in the concert hall and requires just the right handling for its bloom to make the best effect. Again Mr. Walter was just the man to turn this trick.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Walter will end his stay with the orchestra by playing Beethoven's 6th and 3rd Symphonies.

Boston Plays 2 New Works

By Samuel L. Singer

Two compositions new here and the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony comprised the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky conducted last night, in its annual concert presented by the Philadelphia Forum at the Academy of Music.

The local premieres were by two living composers. One was "The Song of Songs," Biblical cantata by Lukas Foss, 24-year-old Berlin-born American composer, with Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano soloist in this composition for the eighth time in nine days. The other was a Concerto Grosso by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer, for two pianos and chamber orchestra. Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were at the keyboards.

In Modern Idiom

Both works were in the 20th-century idiom harmonically, but here the similarity ended. The cantata, 23 minutes long, uses selections from the Song of Solomon. It is unusual in that the orchestral writing contrasts with rather than complements the vocal portions.

The solo part has a certain seductiveness and languor, and melodic appeal, while the orchestration throughout is bold and sharp, especially in the purely instrumental passages.

Singer Impressive

The work scored a great success, and Miss Davis enlarged on the impression she made with the Philadelphia Orchestra last November. In vocal flexibility and interpretive power she projected well the varying moods of the Biblical passages.

The Martinu work, not one of his best, is a concerto grosso in spirit rather than substance. Using modern harmonies and a vigorous scoring in the two fast movements, it frankly entails no formal development. The slow movement featured a broad melody for the strings, while the finale alternated passages between the orchestra and the pianos.

Mar 5 1947 Herald

Koussevitzky Loses Suit to Bar Biography

NEW YORK, March 4 (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., the distributors.

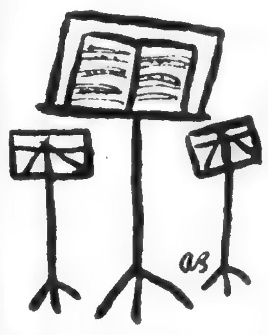
Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MAR 22 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Carnegie Debs



LAST week at Carnegie Hall was a sort of experimental week, in which three orchestras provided premières. The Philharmonic-Symphony, directed by Leopold Stokowski, introduced a "Hymne pour Grand Orchestre," by Olivier Messiaen, a current French composer whose music hasn't had much circulation hereabouts. The Messiaen method of composition, it appears, involves "non-retrogradable rhythms" and "modes of limited transposition," but one doesn't have to be an initiate in such matters to enjoy his work. The short "Hymne" proved to be atmospherically impressive and glowingly scored, and the chances are that we'll be hearing more of the Messiaen output presently. Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song," a relatively uncommon item, was included in this program. It is extremely likable, and it was played ingratiatingly by the orchestra and Robert Casadesus, the evening's soloist. Mr. Casadesus also furnished some superb piano work in Franck's "Symphonic Variations." For good measure, the Philharmonic offered Ravel's "La Valse" and two of Mr. Stokowski's adroit orchestral transcriptions—one of an Albeniz piano suite and the other of Debussy's "Soirée dans Grenade." Mr. Stokowski conducted everything masterfully.

THE Boston Symphony's novelty was "The Song of Songs," a solo cantata for soprano and orchestra, composed by the versatile young musician Lukas Foss. Mr. Foss has used a text from "The Song of Solomon," sometimes as a point of departure for musical developments and sometimes as poetry to be sung. Although there are places where the words become secondary in importance to the music, the work has distinction and resourcefulness, and the third movement, which is a recitative, is compellingly dramatic. The soloist was Ellabelle Davis, whose singing was one of the finest achievements of the season, and Serge Koussevitzky's conducting made the most of the orchestral patterns. Mr. Foss was also in evidence as one of the pianists (the other was Bernard Zighera) in Bohuslav Martinu's skillful and attractive "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony occupied half of the program; Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of it was sensitive and forceful, but as an entity, this symphony still doesn't seem to be as persuasive as many of its parts.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 23 1947

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Metropolitan Opera Could Be as Successful in Brooklyn as Texas

By JOHN BALL Jr.

In a few days the Metropolitan Opera, bag, baggage and [illegible], will pack up its gear and hit the road. This season the Met is fulfilling the heaviest schedule of out-of-town dates that it has ever booked. As far away as Texas people will have the opportunity to hear the famous Metropolitan singers, see the celebrated stage settings, and listen to the well-known chorus and orchestra. Throughout a good part of the nation the Met will bring opera to people who otherwise have little or no opportunity to witness first class performances of this type of music. The opera will appear in many important music-loving American cities, but not in Brooklyn.

It was not too many years ago that each Tuesday night during the season the Met dropped its nickel into the turnstile, so to speak, and came to the Academy of Music. There, on the stage of the opera house, the great Caruso sang, as did many another celebrated star of this great organization. On other evenings of the week the New York Philharmonic came to play for Brooklyn audiences, as did the New York Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Walter Damrosch. Still a fourth major organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also found it worth the while to come here to play

According to reliable report, of all of these four top attractions, the Boston Symphony was the only one which did not do exceptionally well in attracting patrons to its concerts. Part of this may be traced to the fact that the competition for available evenings and box office dollars was unusually heavy. Part, too, may be the fact that a certain amount of loyalty was felt for the New York orchestras as opposed to the admittedly excellent one from out of town. Despite this temporary setback, however, the Boston alone stuck it out with the result that today this famous organization is a complete sell-out in Brooklyn with standing room only available throughout the season. Not only are all of the tickets sold, but everyone comes to listen and to applaud. The music-wise audience which comes to the Boston concerts has the opportunity to hear much new and seldom performed music and, judging from the audience reactions visible during the past season, they are glad that such is the case.

It seems a fair supposition that if the former feeble contender for the Brooklyn listener has now grown into one of the most important concert series to be heard on this side of the river, then the Metropolitan, and for that matter the Philharmonic, too, should certainly have no trouble hanging out the S. R. O. sign which the Boston Symphony has kept so consistently on display. There are three million people here and this column maintains that there is as much musical appreciation and discernment here as in any other major city in the country.

A group of public-spirited men and women is now at work organizing the Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra. When this new musical institution has had an opportunity to prepare itself and is ready to offer its first series of concerts, there should be a large and ready audience waiting to attend. The project is long overdue and it goes without saying that the very best wishes of this column are with the sponsors in their most commendable work. We do not believe that the organization of this new orchestra will interfere in the least with the Boston Symphony Concerts. Similarly we feel that if the New York Philharmonic were to announce a Brooklyn series, the listeners would be ready for these concerts, too. Most certainly we are sure that if the Metropolitan were to take a page from its own successful history, and once more come to Brooklyn on a regular schedule, the self-same S. R. O. sign would demand overtime pay and the Academy of Music would respond once more, not only on Saturday nights, to the music which has grown immensely popular with each passing year.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 2 1947

Music

Boston Symphony Closes Season with Fine Presentation

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its final concert for this season last night at the Metropolitan Theater. Bruno Walter was guest conductor for a program of works by Mahler, Debussy and Strauss. Desi Halban, soprano, was assisting artist.

Mr. Walter has been widely acclaimed as the most outstanding interpretor of the works of Gustav Mahler, so his presentation of the Symphony No. 4 in G Major was one to be watched with more than usual attention. There was no doubt that Mr. Walter knew precisely what he wanted and that he had a workmanlike method of getting it. Moreover, the Boston Symphony men co-operated brilliantly, and in the final movement Desi Halban sang with finished artistry to fit into the overall conception.

At the end of the work the audience gave Mr. Walter what amounted to an ovation.

The Mahler Symphony No. 4 is an involved piece of music, with much more to it than could possibly be discussed here, but a few unusual items might be noted in passing. The movements are marked:

I. Bedächtig (Deliberately)
II. In Gemächlicher Bewegung (Leisurely)
III. Ruhevoll (Peacefully)
IV. Sehr behaglich (Very easily)

These simple indications conceal a whole philosophy, whether one agrees with it or not. The first movement is essentially lyric, while the second revolves around a device of having the concert-master revolve between two violins, the second one tuned one note high to create the impression of an ancient "fiddle." (Incidentally, this seemed to mystify a considerable portion of the audience, but Mr. Burgin carried it off with no apparent difficulty.)

The third movement is an intricate set of variations, while the fourth movement seems to be designed to explain the earlier movements, being based on a Bavarian folk-song, "Der Himmel hängt voll Geigen" (In Heaven Hang Many Fiddles) from the collection known as "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," material from which colored much of Mahler's earlier composition. In the final movement the voice is not treated as a solo in the usual sense, but rather as another instrument, to avoid the danger of having it appear that the work was a big build-up to a folk-song.

Desi Halban fitted into the above very well. Her voice was not too large (some thought not large enough), but it carried well. For the most part, the words e[illegible] the audience, but they were in [illegible] anyway. The artistry of the soloist was beyond question.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 23 1947

BIRTHDAY SALUTE

By VIRGIL THOMSON

ARTURO TOSCANINI will be eighty years old on Tuesday, March 25. The occasion is notable not merely for the fact that age has not withered nor custom staled his infinitely satisfactory musicianship, but also for the reminder that he is today, exactly as he has been for twenty years, the first conductor of the world. His primacy in the field of opera has been clear for nearer forty years, since his appearance at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1908, in fact. Since 1926, when he first conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, his mastery of the concert style has been equally unquestionable. From that day till now it has not been possible for any musician or musical observer to list the great living conductors of an age which has been glorious for great conducting without putting Arturo Toscanini's name squarely at the top.

* * *

The Dependability of Toscanini's Musical Instinct

HIS most remarkable quality as a public performer has always been his dependability. He never lets his audience down nor lets music down. When announced to appear, he appears. When he conducts any work, however familiar, unfamiliar, difficult of execution, facile of sentiment, no matter what kind of work or by whom, he knows the score and gives it as careful, as polished a reading as if his whole music life depended on that single work. It is this unusual dependability, indeed, that has given rise to the legend of his musical infallibility. Actually he misses the point of a piece, misunderstands a composer's thought as often as any other musician. Where he does not fail is in the ability to call forth on any platform the full resources of his own musical interest and attention. Music, any music, all music stimulates in him as automatically as in the proverbial circus horse the full functioning of his professional capacities.

Those capacities derive not only from a nervous stability superior to that of any of the other great living conductors but also from a musical instinct as simple and as healthy as that of a gifted child. Toscanini, and let us make no mistake about it, is a natural musician. His culture may be elementary, but his ear is true. He makes music out of anything. And the music that he makes is the plainest, the most straighforward music now available in public performance. There is little of historical evocation in it and even less of deliberate emotional appeal. It is purely auditory, just ordered sound and very little else. There is not even much Toscanini in it. For in spite of his high temperament, this musician is strangely lacking in personality.

* * *

The Contemporary Appeal of Abstraction

THAT is why, I think, he has based his interpretative routine on a literal as possible an adherence to musical texts. A respect for the written note and the adherence to any composer's clearly indicated intent have always been the procedure of first-class conductors of ensemble music. But the composer's expressive intent is more often than not far from clear; and musical notation, particularly as regards phraseology and rhythmic inflection, is extremely imprecise. Imagination and a deep historical culture are the classical approaches to the problem of invigorating the music of the past. Toscanini has no such culture to channelize his imaginative faculties. He is not in any sense an intellectual. He is not ignorant; he has heard, read and played vast quantities of music, and his mind is as sound as his body. But he has not the humane letters of a Beecham, a Reiner, a Monteux, the refined sensuality of a Stokowski, an Ormandy, the moral fervor and sense of obligation toward contemporary creation ~~of Kous-~~ sevitzky. He simply sticks as closely to the text as he can and makes music.

Actually, of course, he takes as many liberties with a text as any other executant. He neglects Beethoven's metronome marks, as everybody else does. He corrects a balance for clarity's sake. He speeds up a finale for general excitement. He has gravely falsified, moreover, the musical tradition of our time by speeding up the Mozart minuet movements to a point where all memory of the court dance has disappeared from them. What he does not do is to personalize his interpretations. He adds a great deal of excitement to any piece, but that excitement is of a purely auditory and cerebral, rather than of an expressive character. His appeal is thus deeply contemporary to an epoch which has accepted abstractions in art, in science and in politics as the source of its most passionate loyalties.

* * *

The Most Living of the Living

NOBODY else in our time has been so simple or so pure toward music as Toscanini. He will not loom large, I imagine, in the history books of the future, because he has mostly remained on the sidelines of the creative struggle. And music's history is always the history of its composition. Toscanini has radically simplified the technique of orchestral conducting, and he has given a straightforwardness to all interpretation in our time that cannot fail to facilitate the execution problem for living composers. But his involvement with the formation of our century's musical style, with the encouragement of contemporary expression in music, with the living composers, in short, whose work will one day constitute the story of music in our time, has been less than that of any of today's other orchestral great. He has honor and glory now, but by posterity his work will probably pass unremunerated.

That is why we must enjoy him and be thankful for him and cherish him. For when he leaves there will be little left save a memory and a few gramophone records; and these give hardly any idea of his electric powers as a public performer. By a miracle we have him with us still and, by a greater miracle, in full possession of his powers. That those powers are without peer in our time cannot be denied by anybody. That they will long be preserved to him and to us is the prayer of every living musician and lover of music.

This Clipping From ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
MAR 24 1947

Conductor To Sail On Triumphant Tour

By ALICE HUGHES

The dearest wish of any orchestral musician is to become conductor of a great symphony orchestra. This offer is sure to be made to Leonard Bernstein, brilliant, 28-year-old composer, conductor and concert pianist. Yet many of his friends say that when the offer comes Bernstein may not even take it. His career in music is so spectacular that to limit himself to a conductor's scope might seem too confining to this gifted fellow. Only seven years ago he was still a student majoring in music at Harvard. At this moment he is guest conductor for the Rochester Symphony orchestra. In about three weeks he sets sail on a triumphant tour of Palestine, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Austria, England and France where he will conduct the leading orchestras.

It was in November 1943 that Leonard Bernstein drank up the spotlight of fame when, without notice, he guest-conducted for Bruno Walter. The music critics hauled out their best 75 per cent adjectives, and since then he has been constantly showered with invitations and offers that older conductors covet. Bernstein seems to prefer variety of expression He composed a creditable symphony named for the said prophet "Jeremiah". He wrote the rollicking ballet music for "Fancy Free" and "Fac-simile".

"On the Town," composed by Bernstein, was a smash hit on Broadway a few seasons ago. For our City Center he acts as musi- can guest-conduct for nearly any symphony band he pleases. Once in a while Hollywood calls him. When pictures reach the high level he sets, Bernstein's name as composer is certain to appear in films. When he is in the mood he gives a piano concert and audiences scream until he plays Beethoven's First and also the Ravel Concerto.

This versatile young musician is almost too quick-silvery to pin down to any one job, even though Serge ~~Koussevitzky, head~~ of the Boston Symphony, nurses the fond dream that when he finally abandons his magic baton, Lenny (as his friends call him) will take over. Lenny conducts the Boston once a year at least, and the men like to play under him. In the words of the music critics, he "strikes fire."

* * *

This Clipping From WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD
MAR 25 1947

Boston Symphony at Providence for Broadcast Tonight

On its last tour of the current season, the Boston Symphony orchestra will conclude this year's series of ABC broadcasts from Providence, R. I., when Bruno Walter conducts the ensemble in the Metropolitan Theater tonight. The concert will be heard at 7:30 o'clock over KWNO.

Mahler's "Symphony No. 4" will comprise the broadcast program. Desi Halban, soprano, will be the soloist in the fourth movement, in which an old Bavarian folksong is used by the composer and the orchestra describes the various characters mentioned in the several verses.

The symphony was completed by Mahler in 1900 and was performed first at Munich on November 25, 1901, with Felix Weingartner conducting. It was introduced to this country by Walter Damrosch in 1904. The Boston Symphony orchestra played the last two movements on January 30, 1942, with Richard Burgin conducting. On March 23, 1945, the complete symphony was played, again under Burgin's direction.

[142]

This Clipping From BROOKLYN [illegible]
EAGLE
MAR 23 1947

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Metropolitan Opera Could Be as Successful in Brooklyn as Texas

By JOHN BALL Jr.

[illegible] a few days the Metropolitan Opera, bag, baggage and [illegible] will pack up its gear and hit the road. This season the [illegible] bringing the heaviest schedule of out-of-town dates that [illegible]. As far away as Texas people will have the [illegible] the famous Metropolitan singers, see the celebrated stage settings, and listen to the well-known chorus and orchestra. Throughout a good part of the nation the Met will bring [illegible] otherwise have little or no opportunity to witness [illegible] performances of this type of music. The opera will appear [illegible] music-loving American cities, but not in Brooklyn.

[illegible] many years ago that each Tuesday night during the season the Met dropped its nickel into the turnstile, so to speak, and came to the Academy of Music. There, on the stage of the [illegible] the great Caruso sang, as did many another celebrated star of this great organization. On other evenings of the week the New York Philharmonic came to play for Brooklyn audiences, as did the New York Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Walter Damrosch. Still a fourth major organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also found it worth the while to come here to play.

According to reliable report, of all of these four top attractions, the Boston Symphony was the only one which did not do exceptionally well in attracting patrons to its concerts. Part of this may be traced to the fact that the competition for available evenings and box office dollars was unusually heavy. Part, too, may be the fact that a certain amount of loyalty was felt for the New York orchestras as opposed to the admittedly excellent one from out of town. Despite this temporary setback, however, the Boston alone stuck it out with the result that today this famous organization is a complete sell-out in Brooklyn with standing room only available throughout the season. Not only are all of the tickets sold, but everyone comes to listen and to applaud. The music-wise audience which comes to the Boston concerts has the opportunity to hear much new and seldom performed music and, judging from the audience reactions visible during the past season, they are glad that such is the case.

It seems a fair supposition that if the former feeble contender for the Brooklyn listener has now grown into one of the most important concert series to be heard on this side of the river, then the Metropolitan, and for that matter the Philharmonic, too, should certainly have no trouble hanging out the S. R. O. sign which the Boston Symphony has kept so consistently on display. There are three million people here and this column maintains that there is as much musical appreciation and discernment here as in any other major city in the country.

A group of public-spirited men and women is now at work organizing the Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra. When this new musical institution has had an opportunity to prepare itself and is ready to offer its first series of concerts, there should be a large and ready audience waiting to attend. The project is long overdue and it goes without saying that the very best wishes of this column are with the sponsors in their most commendable work. We do not believe that the organization of this new orchestra will interfere in the least with the Boston Symphony Concerts. Similarly we feel that if the New York Philharmonic were to announce a Brooklyn series, the listeners would be ready for these concerts, too. Most certainly we are sure that if the Metropolitan were to take a page from its own successful history, and once more come to Brooklyn on a regular schedule, the self-same S. R. O. sign would demand overtime pay and the Academy of Music would respond once more, not only on Saturday nights, to the music which has grown immensely popular with each passing year.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 23 1947

BIRTHDAY SALUTE

By VIRGIL THOMSON

ARTURO TOSCANINI will be eighty years old on Tuesday, March 25. The occasion is notable not merely for the fact that age has not withered nor custom staled his infinitely satisfactory musicianship, but also for the reminder that he is today, exactly as he has been for twenty years, the first conductor of the world. His primacy in the field of opera has been clear for nearer forty years, since his appearance at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1908, in fact. Since 1926, when he first conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, his mastery of the concert style has been equally unquestionable. From that day till now it has not been possible for any musician or musical observer to list the great living conductors of an age which has been glorious for great conducting without putting Arturo Toscanini's name squarely at the top.

* * *

The Dependability of Toscanini's Musical Instinct

HIS most remarkable quality as a public performer has always been his dependability. He never lets his audience down nor lets music down. When announced to appear, he appears. When he conducts any work, however familiar, unfamiliar, difficult of execution, facile of sentiment, no matter what kind of work or by whom, he knows the score and gives it as careful, as polished a reading as if his whole music life depended on that single work. It is this unusual dependability, indeed, that has given rise to the legend of his musical infallibility. Actually he misses the point of a piece, misunderstands a composer's thought as often as any other musician. Where he does not fail is in the ability to call forth on any platform the full resources of his own musical interest and attention. Music, any music, all music stimulates in him as automatically as in the proverbial circus horse the full functioning of his professional capacities.

Those capacities derive not only from a nervous stability superior to that of any of the other great living conductors but also from a musical instinct as simple and as healthy as that of a gifted child. Toscanini, and let us make no mistake about it, is a natural musician. His culture may be elementary, but his ear is true. He makes music out of anything. And the music that he makes is the plainest, the most straighforward music now available in public performance. There is little of historical evocation in it and even less of deliberate emotional appeal. It is purely auditory, just ordered sound and very little else. There is not even much Toscanini in it. For in spite of his high temperament, this musician is strangely lacking in personality.

* * *

The Contemporary Appeal of Abstraction

THAT is why, I think, he has based his interpretative routine on a literal as possible an adherence to musical texts. A respect for the written note and the adherence to any composer's clearly indicated intent have always been the procedure of first-class conductors of ensemble music. But the composer's expressive intent is more often than not far from clear; and musical notation, particularly as regards phraseology and rhythmic inflection, is extremely imprecise. Imagination and a deep historical culture are the classical approaches to the problem of invigorating the music of the past. Toscanini has no such culture to channelize his imaginative faculties. He is not in any sense an intellectual. He is not ignorant; he has heard, read and played vast quantities of music, and his mind is as sound as his body. But he has not the humane letters of a Beecham, a Reiner, a Monteux, the refined sensuality of a Stokowski, an Ormandy, the moral fervor and sense of obligation toward contemporary creation ~~of Kous~~sevitzky. He simply sticks as closely to the text as he can and makes music.

Actually, of course, he takes as many liberties with a text as any other executant. He neglects Beethoven's metronome marks, as everybody else does. He corrects a balance for clarity's sake. He speeds up a finale for general excitement. He has gravely falsified, moreover, the musical tradition of our time by speeding up the Mozart minuet movements to a point where all memory of the court dance has disappeared from them. What he does not do is to personalize his interpretations. He adds a great deal of excitement to any piece, but that excitement is of a purely auditory and cerebral, rather than of an expressive character. His appeal is thus deeply contemporary to an epoch which has accepted abstractions in art, in science and in politics as the source of its most passionate loyalties.

* * *

The Most Living of the Living

NOBODY else in our time has been so simple or so pure toward music as Toscanini. He will not loom large, I imagine, in the history books of the future, because he has mostly remained on the sidelines of the creative struggle. And music's history is always the history of its composition. Toscanini has radically simplified the technique of orchestral conducting, and he has given a straightforwardness to all interpretation in our time that cannot fail to facilitate the execution problem for living composers. But his involvement with the formation of our century's musical style, with the encouragement of contemporary expression in music, with the living composers, in short, whose work will one day constitute the story of music in our time, has been less than that of any of today's other orchestral great. He has honor and glory now, but by posterity his work will probably pass unremunerated.

That is why we must enjoy him and be thankful for him and cherish him. For when he leaves there will be little left save a memory and a few gramophone records; and these give hardly any idea of his electric powers as a public performer. By a miracle we have him with us still and, by a greater miracle, in full possession of his powers. That those powers are without peer in our time cannot be denied by anybody. That they will long be preserved to him and to us is the prayer of every living musician and lover of music.

This Clipping From ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
MAR 24 1947

Conductor To Sail On Triumphant Tour

By ALICE HUGHES

The dearest wish of any orchestral musician is to become conductor of a great symphony orchestra. This offer is sure to be made to Leonard Bernstein, brilliant, 28-year-old composer, conductor and concert pianist. Yet many of his friends say that when the offer comes Bernstein may not even take it. His career in music is so spectacular that to limit himself to a conductor's scope might seem too confining to this gifted fellow. Only seven years ago he was still a student majoring in music at Harvard. At this moment he is guest conductor for the Rochester Symphony orchestra. In about three weeks he sets sail on a triumphant tour of Palestine, Czechoslovakia, Holland, Austria, England and France where he will conduct the leading orchestras.

It was in November 1943 that Leonard Bernstein drank up the spotlight of fame when, without notice, he guest-conducted for Bruno Walter. The music critics hauled out their best 75 per cent adjectives, and since then he has been constantly showered with invitations and offers that older conductors covet. Bernstein seems to prefer variety of expression He composed a creditable symphony named for the said prophet "Jeremiah". He wrote the rollicking ballet music for "Fancy Free" and "Fac-simile".

"On the Town," composed by Bernstein, was a smash hit on Broadway a few seasons ago. For our City Center he acts as musical guest-conduct for nearly any symphony band he pleases. Once in a while Hollywood calls him. When pictures reach the high level he sets, Bernstein's name as composer is certain to appear in films. When he is in the mood he gives a piano concert and audiences scream until he plays Beethoven's First and also the Ravel Concerto.

This versatile young musician is almost too quick-silvery to pin down to any one job, even though Serge ~~Koussevitzky, head~~ of the Boston Symphony, nurses the fond dream that when he finally abandons his magic baton, Lenny (as his friends call him) will take over. Lenny conducts the Boston once a year at least, and the men like to play under him. In the words of the music critics, he "strikes fire."

* * *

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
[illegible]

Music

Boston Symphony Closes Season with Fine Presentation

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its final concert for this season last night at the Metropolitan Theater. Bruno Walter was guest conductor for a program of works by Mahler, Debussy and Strauss. Desi Halban, soprano, was assisting artist.

Mr. Walter has been widely acclaimed as the most outstanding interpretor of the works of Gustav Mahler, so his presentation of the Symphony No. 4 in G Major was one to be watched with more than usual attention. There was no doubt that Mr. Walter knew precisely what he wanted and that he had a workmanlike method of getting it. Moreover, the Boston Symphony men co-operated brilliantly, and in the final movement Desi Halban sang with finished artistry to fit into the overall conception.

At the end of the work the audience gave Mr. Walter what amounted to an ovation.

The Mahler Symphony No. 4 is an involved piece of music, with much more to it than could possibly be discussed here, but a few unusual items might be noted in passing. The movements are marked:

I. Bedächtig (Deliberately)
II. In Gemächlicher Bewegung (Leisurely)
III. Ruhevoll (Peacefully)
IV. Sehr behaglich (Very easily)

These simple indications conceal a whole philosophy, whether one agrees with it or not. The first movement is essentially lyric, while the second revolves around a device of having the concert-master revolve between two violins, the second one tuned one note high to create the impression of an ancient "fiddle." (Incidentally, this seemed to mystify a considerable portion of the audience, but Mr. Burgin carried it off with no apparent difficulty.)

The third movement is an intricate set of variations, while the fourth movement seems to be designed to explain the earlier movements, being based on a Bavarian folk-song, "Der Himmel hängt voll Geigen" (In Heaven Hang Many Fiddles) from the collection known as "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," material from which colored much of Mahler's earlier composition. In the final movement the voice is not treated as a solo in the usual sense, but rather as another instrument, to avoid the danger of having it appear that the work was a big build-up to a folk-song.

Desi Halban fitted into the above very well. Her voice was not too large (some thought not large enough), but it carried well. For the most part, the words e[illegible] audience, but they were in [illegible] anyway. The artistry of the soloist was beyond question

---

This Clipping From WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD
MAR 25 1947

Boston Symphony at Providence for Broadcast Tonight

On its last tour of the current season, the Boston Symphony orchestra will conclude this year's series of ABC broadcasts from Providence, R. I., when Bruno Walter conducts the ensemble in the Metropolitan Theater tonight. The concert will be heard at 7:30 o'clock over KWNO.

Mahler's "Symphony No. 4" will comprise the broadcast program. Desi Halban, soprano, will be the soloist in the fourth movement, in which an old Bavarian folksong is used by the composer and the orchestra describes the various characters mentioned in the several verses.

The symphony was completed by Mahler in 1900 and was performed first at Munich on November 25, 1901, with Felix Weingartner conducting. It was introduced to this country by Walter Damrosch in 1904. The Boston Symphony orchestra played the last two movements on January 30, 1942, with Richard Burgin conducting. On March 23, 1945, the complete symphony was played, again under Burgin's direction.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON WBEC: The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be brought to Pittsfield radio audiences weekly on Tuesdays from 8.30 to 9.30 through Station WBEC. In the program which will high light the first day of broadcasting of Pittsfield's ABC radio station tomorrow, Bruno Walter will conduct the orchestra in Mahler's symphony No. 4 in G major. The program will originate in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence. Desi Halban, Viennese soprano, will accompany the orchestra in the fourth movement.

This Clipping From
BAYONNE, N. J.
TIMES

MAR 28 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitsky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which, he says, is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitsky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

Music Jottin

STANLEY C
the Berks which will ha sion at Tanglev from June 30 that he will b week to hold mission to the and Opera D will take place
Thursday. Violi
plicants at 9 a.m
double bass at 10:30, and bras
11. Opera auditi
The Music Cent direction of Serge

Mail order sale ropolitan Opera
the Opera House more than $50,0 sales open tomor singers who will a season opens Apr
Daniza Ilitsch, fro is to sing the title-
"Aida." The other
ence Quartararo, fr cisco, who will music of Countess
Mozart's "Marriage
April 24.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 26 1947

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Closes Season with Fine Presentation

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its final concert for this season last night at the Metropolitan Theater. Bruno Walter was guest conductor for a program of works by Mahler, Debussy and Strauss. Desi Halban, soprano, was assisting artist.

Mr. Walter has been widely acclaimed as the most outstanding interpretor of the works of Gustav Mahler, so his presentation of the Symphony No. 4 in G Major was one to be watched with more than usual attention. There was no doubt that Mr. Walter knew precisely what he wanted and that he had a workmanlike method of getting it. Moreover, the Boston Symphony men co-operated brilliantly, and in the final movement Desi Halban sang with finished artistry to fit into the over-all conception.

At the end of the work the audience gave Mr. Walter what amounted to an ovation.

The Mahler Symphony No. 4 is an involved piece of music, with much more to it than could possibly be discussed here, but a few unusual items might be noted in passing. The movements are marked:

I. Bedächtig (Deliberately)
II. In Gemächlicher Bewegung (Leisurely)
III. Ruhevoll (Peacefully)
IV. Sehr behaglich (Very easily)

These simple indications conceal a whole philosophy, whether one agrees with it or not. The first movement is essentially lyric, while the second revolves around a device of having the concert-master revolve between two violins, the second one tuned one note high to create the impression of an ancient "fiddle." (Incidentally, this seemed to mystify a considerable portion of the audience, but Mr. Burgin carried it off with no apparent difficulty.)

The third movement is an intricate set of variations, while the fourth movement seems to be designed to explain the earlier movements, being based on a Bavarian folk-song, "Der Himmel hängt voll Geigen" (In Heaven Hang Many Fiddles) from the collection known as "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," material from which colored much of Mahler's earlier composition. In the final movement the voice is not treated as a solo in the usual sense, but rather as another instrument, to avoid the danger of having it appear that the work was a big build-up to a folk-song.

Desi Halban fitted into the above very well. Her voice was not too large (some thought not large enough), but it carried well. For [illegible]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 26 1947

FELIX FOX

Concert Pianist Had Been Soloist With Symphony Orchestras

Felix Fox, concert pianist, who had been soloist with the New York, Boston and Philadelphia symphony orchestras, died in Boston on Monday after a brief illness. He was 70 years old.

Mr. Fox, who came to this country as a child, returned to Europe as a young man to study the piano. Among his teachers was Isidor Philipp, the Hungarian-French pianist. After a concert tour of Europe Mr. Fox toured this country. He was named Chevalier in the Legion of Honor for his services to French music.

EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW

MAR 26 1947

Accent On Youth

BOSTON — The official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the nation's top-flight symphonic groups, is 24-year-old Lukas Foss, a well-known composer despite his youth.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 26 1947

Felix Fox

Former Concert Pianist, 70, Had Music School in Boston

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, March 25.—Felix Fox, seventy, former concert pianist and teacher, died here today in Beth Israel Hospital, after a brief illness.

Mr. Fox, who had been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was conducted by Pierre Monteux, also appeared with the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia and Detroit Symphony Orchestras. He had been director of music at Miss Porter's School, in Farmington, Conn., and in recent years had a school here for piano instruction.

A native of Breslau, Germany, Mr. Fox came to the United States as a child. He settled in Boston in 1898 after touring the country. He was decorated by the French government for his services to music.

LOS ANGELES, CAL
SENTINEL
3/27/47

Ellabelle Davis Premieres 'Song Of Songs' With Boston Symphony

By Mildred Jovien

A radio premiére of major importance to the entire musical world featured the Boston Symphony orchestra over the ABC Network on Tuesday evening, March 11, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presented the first performance over the aid of "The Song of Songs," a Biblical solo cantata by the gifted 24-year-old American composer, Lukas Foss.

Soloist in the performance was the distinguished American Negro soprano, Ellabelle Davis, for whom the work was expressly commissioned by the league when it singled her out as "the outstanding American singer of the year."

"The Song of Songs," which bears a dedication to Ellabelle Davis, is a work using as its text four of the exquisite utterances of the Queen of Sheba from the biblical "Song of Songs" in the King James version of the Old Testament.

INSPIRATION FOR WORK

The artist who was the inspiration for the Foss "Song of S[illegible]" Ellabelle Davis, erstwhile seamstress of New Rochelle, New York, has during the past three seasons sprung from comparative [illegible] to a place at the very top among concert artists of the day. [illegible] her Town Hall debut which caused the critic of the New York Herald-Tribune to exclaim: "She has an innate musicality and sense of style found only in the true artist. She should soon occupy an important place in our musical life"; she was heard as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Indianapolis Symphony, as well as in recitals in several leading cities that won her encomiums from press and public.

During the 1946-47 season in addition to giving more than 40 recitals in leading United States cities, the soprano has appeared as soloist with seven major American orchestras, including, besides the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy, the Minneapolis Symphony under Mitropoulos, the Indianapolis Symphony under Sevitzky, [illegible] Symphony and the [illegible] monic.

This Clipping From
PONCA CITY, OKLA.
NEWS

MAR 27 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

By James Thrasher

THE AUTHOR and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantage of his position and reconsider his legal action.

[illegible] From PHILADELPHIA, PA.

MAR 1947

"SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY." By Hugo Leichtentritt. Pages, 199. $3.00. Harvard University Press.

A splendid record of the man and his great work in America, by Harvard's famous musicologist. Particularly noteworthy are Mr. Koussevitzky's valuable detailed notes on the performances of the works of American composers, to which he has always given primary recognition. This feature of the book, in itself, should have great appeal to the music lover.

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
POST

[illegible] 1947

PROKOFIEFF. "Symphony No
5," played by the Boston Sym phony Orchestra under Serg
Koussevitzky. (Ten 12-inch sides). This work was written by Prokofieff during a one-month period in 1944 and was played in Moscow for the first time in 1945. Some sections are light and tuneful, some are mournful and some are explosive. Many an average listener will find it highly interesting. Excellent performance and reproduction.

• • •

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

Music Jottings

STANLEY CHAPPLE, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, which will have a six week session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to Aug. 10, states that he will be in Chicago this week to hold auditions for admission to the Student Orchestra and Opera Department. These will take place at Orchestra Hall, Thursday. Violin and viola applicants at 9 a.m.; Violoncello and double bass at 10; Woodwinds, [illegible] instruments at [illegible] 1 to 4 p.m. The Music Center is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Mail order sales for the Metropolitan Opera Co.'s season at the Opera House now amount to more than $50,000. Box-office sales open tomorrow. Two new singers who will appear when the season opens April 21, will be Daniza Ilitsch, from Vienna, who is to sing the title-role in Verdi's "Aida." The other will be Florence Quartararo, from San Francisco, who will interpret the music of Countess Almaviva in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," April 24.

This Clipping From COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
MAR 30 1947

STANLEY CHAPPLE, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions for admission to the student orchestra and the opera department of the 1947 season this week in Chicago. The Music Center will have a six-week session at Tanglewood-Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All auditions will be held on Thursday, April 3, at Orchestra Hall (stage entrance) 220 S. Michigan-av, on the following schedule:

Orchestra instruments:
Violin and viola at 9 a. m.
Violoncello and contrabass at 10 a. m.
Woodwinds at 10:30 a. m.
Brass and other instruments at 11 a. m.
Opera department:
From 1 p. m. to 4 p. m.

Applications for admission to the Music Center should be made to Thomas D. Perry Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY'S 70-piece Symphony Orchestra under the direction of George Hardesty of the OSU School of Music faculty, will tour the state April 8-11, giving concerts at the high schools in Chillicothe, Fremont, Piqua and Osborn.

Featured wil be an original composition by an Ohio State University graduate music student, Jack Lee, whose composition, "The Voice of Aphrodite," is dedicated to two former OSU classmates killed in World

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On the theory that all's well that ends well, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, which marked the return of the chief conductor after his long winter holiday, was a great success. The final number was the Violin Concerto of Brahms, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. This greatest of violin concertos has received what might be called a definitive recording at the hands of Mr. Heifetz, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Yesterday that supreme accomplishment was renewed. You could find no better performance anywhere.

To work backwards, the preceding piece, heard for the first time in Boston, was the Fifth Symphony of Ralph Vaughan Williams. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the orchestral performance seemed to be unexceptionable. You could easily assume that everything was being done for the work that could be done for it. But the piece itself proved a rather dull affair.

Or rather, there is nothing in this latest symphony of the composer of the "London" and the "Pastoral" that we have not heard before. It is amiable; it is mellow, atmospheric, and obviously the work of a master craftsman. Any part of it would make an excellent accompaniment to a screen travelogue on the English countryside. But the four movements, offering little contrast of pace or mood, simply do not add up to an absorbing symphony. Composed during the war, it still goes its placid, its unruffled way. In that, and otherwise, it is typically British. Taking your cue from H. G. Wells' Britling, you might call this symphony "Mr. Williams Sees It Through."

As an afterthought Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced these numbers with the "Oberon" Overture of Weber, unheard at the regular concerts for many a year. In one respect, the choice was most unfortunate, since it made a third composition in the key of D major, and to present three works in the same tonality is not good program strategy. Also, it would have been much better if the conductor had let Weber go his own gait. Instead, the Overture was pointed up, streamlined, call it what you will. And because of this straining after effect it missed fire.

When the conductor came upon the stage the orchestra rose in greeting. Two or three members of the audience followed suit. The rest stayed put. And not until the end of the concert was there any evidence of real enthusiasm.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
MAR 30 1947

Music

By Max de Schauensee

THE successful appearances of the young 18-year-old pianist, Gary Graffman, with the Philadelphia Orchestra this past week are the result of the ceaseless work and painstaking effort of a highly worthwhile organization—the Rachmaninoff Fund, Inc.

This organization was set up in memory of the great pianist and composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff (1873-1943), with the sanction of his widow, by a group of distinguished musicians who wished to remember their former colleague. Vladimir Horowitz and Serge Koussevitzky, compatriots of the late composer-pianist, were elected to a sort of joint presidentship of the fund, whose purpose was to discover this country's most exceptional young pianist and to aid him on the road to a career of the first magnitude.

de SCHAUENSEE

Standards for auditions and competition were the highest ever set for an American musical contest in a nationwide search for exceptional talent. The country was divided into seven "regions" and applications were received from everywhere. The Philadelphia region comprised Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, the District of Columbia and New York City.

The first auditions were held last November, the contestants for the Philadelphia regional district being required to appear at that time, and to play in this city. A distinguished and eminently competent set of judges was secured and the auditions were held on N. Broad st. in Town Hall.

Two Survivors

ONLY two contestants were considered talented enough to appear in the national finals, originally scheduled for this spring in New York and now postponed until the spring of 1948. The talented "finds" were Graffman and Ruth Geiger, 23. Both these young people are now eligible to compete in the 1948 finals without further auditioning.

In recognition of his extraordinarily fine pianistic gifts, Graffman was booked to appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra at three concerts, the regular ones that took place this past Friday and Saturday and the broadcast over the nationwide Columbia Broadcasting System at 5 P. M. yesterday. In addition the young man will give recitals in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Thus the Rachmaninoff Fund, Inc., has really greased the wheels and started things in motion. Mrs. Sophia Yarnall Jacobs, chairman of the Philadelphia regional committee, announced recently that in addition to the postponed national finals, a new search for further talent would be made in the interim, and that a second piano contest sponsored by the Rachmaninoff Fund would take place at a date to be announced shortly. This will allow more young men and women pianists to take part in the competition.

Another Chance

VLADIMIR Horowitz, one of the fund's two presidents, said that after auditions were held in the first contest, the organization received many requests from pianists from all sections of the country to enter a subsequent contest.

"It is to allow an additional year for hard work and study that the fund is repeating the contest," said Mr. Horowitz. "It will also permit those who withdrew or who did not enter this year's contest because of lack of preparation, an opportunity to compete before they are beyond the funds' age limit, 17-26."

In an age when music is so commercialized—in fact, one of the biggest industries, one might say, of the country—it is salutary to know that an organization with such lofty ideals, entirely devoid of self-seeking, exists.

[redacted]
MAR 30 1947

Catching The Beat In Music World Today

BY INA WICKHAM

"I shall know but one country—America
"To it I owe my utter loyalty
"The ends I am at shall be for my Country
"My God and Truth."
—National Federation of Music Clubs Collect

JAMES C. PETRILLO has allocated $39,200 to the city of Philadelphia to be used to give the residents of that city free concerts this summer. The money has been given to the Philadelphia Musicians union to pay the musicians who participate in public concerts and who entertain veterans in hospitals. This is a portion of the money secured from royalties paid by the manufacturers of records, a matter of controversy for many months. The Musicians union has asked the mayor to permit the opening of the Labor Plaza so that the concerts may be given there.

THE MUSICIANS

. . . union has also asked the city to participate in musical education in Philadelphia and to provide entertainment for the music loving thousands. It is said that there is an old ordinance which provides that the city set aside sums for free band and other concerts. It is also said that for many years the city of Philadelphia provided these concerts but that no money has been appropriated for them since 1926. It will be interesting to see how the situation works out.

MANY TRIBUTES

. . . are being paid to Rachmaninoff this week for March 28 marked the fourth anniversary of the death of the great composer and April 2 will be the 74th anniversary of his birth. The tribute will take the form of performances of his work. The Philadelphia orchestra has already honored Rachmaninoff by giving an all-Rachmaninoff concert yesterday. Among the artists to pay tribute to the great Russian are Vladimir Horowitz, Artur Rubenstein and Jacha Heifetz, all of whom are including his compositions in their programs this week as will Serge Koussevitzky, Efrem Kurtz and Saul Caston and their orchestras.

This Clipping From DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT
MAR 30 1947

THE BERKSHIRE

. . . music center will hold auditions for admission to the student orchestra and the opera department for the 1947 season in Chicago on April 3rd. The auditions will be held in Orchestra Hall and orchestral instruments will be heard in the morning, violin and viola at 9 a. m.; cello and contrabass at 10; woodwinds at 10:30 and brass and other instruments at 11. The opera department will hold auditions from 1 to 4 p. m. Those who are selected at the audition will be privileged to attend the six weeks session of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood, Mass., from June 30-Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY BACK IN PROGRAM

Koussevitzky Offers Third of Rachmaninoff—Foss' Biblical Cantata Sung by Davis

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky returned last night with the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall. Reversing the originally planned order of his program he began his concert with Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony and ended it with a first New York performance of Lukas Foss' biblical cantata, The Song of Songs. Neither of these works commended themselves as music of the highest class. Their interest lay mainly in their presentation.

Rachmaninoff rated his Third Symphony highly. He once implied in a conversation with the writer that he felt this score had yet to be estimated at its real value. Presumably Dr. Koussevitzky shared this opinion. The symphony impresses one as an echo, at the best, of the same composer's Second Symphony, which came thirty years before the Third was composed, in 1937.

The Third has its moments of power and Rachmaninoffian gloom and a certain melodic curve, long associated with his style. For the greater part it is repetition and variation of earlier ideas, ideas fresher in their original form than in the score heard last night. The audience warmly applauded this performance. It can be said that at least the symphony was the vehicle for some splendid orchestral playing. On that score there was reason for enthusiasm, but the power and splendor of Rachmaninoff at his greatest lie in other scores.

We do not feel that Lukas Foss' setting of verses of the King James version of The Song of Songs need long detain us. He had as his interpreter of the text Ellabelle Davis. The sensuous beauty of her voice, when the music law well and practicably for it, constituted a feature of the occasion.

It cannot be said that Mr. Foss' music, which is trivial and mannered, deserved this investiture. The verses chosen by him for setting only served to emphasize the inequality of the poetry and the composition. The melodic line given the singer is labored and artificial. The orchestral gibmcracks which set off the song are mostly puerilities, having little or nothing to do with the inwardness of the text.

The most interesting score of the evening was Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra, an orchestration which included two pianos, played on this occasion by Mr. Foss and Bernard Zighera. We do not call this work music of the most original inspiration. It is music consciously made in emulation of the principles of the concerto grosso of the eighteenth century. There are solo and "tutti" passages, the march of line against line and mass, and a pervading rhythmical vigor. The writing is excellent, shapely of phrase, masterly in the march of part against part, and big polyharmonic chords that replace, in a new way, the "continuo" of the harpsichord of other days.

One relishes and admires all this, but cannot keep the feeling, at the same time, of a self-appointed problem, one carried out by the composer with conscience, ability, and invention; nevertheless, a problem, a species of stunt. Granting that, it is a fine job by a most substantially equipped musician and man of taste. The ending is especially brilliant. The composer was present. Singled out by Dr. Koussevitzky from the stage, he reaped long applause.

LIFT BAN ON BOOK ABOUT CONDUCTOR

Biography on Life of Koussevitzky Can Be Sold Again

EXPECT DECISION WILL BE APPEALED

Noted Leader Stated "Irreparable Harm" Would Result

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Justice Sheintag of the New York Supreme Court yesterday "vacated the stay," as the legal terminology has it, that he had placed on Moses Smith's biography of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers).

In response to Dr. Koussevitzky's plea that the book's circulation would do him "irreparable harm," Justice Sheintag enjoined its further distribution until he had a chance to consider the matter. Yesterday he handed down a nine-page decision to the effect that the book may now be freely sold, although it is understood that the case will be appealed.

The obvious comment on this situation is that far more copies will probably be sold than would have been had the Boston Symphony conductor not raised his objections. In the intervening time the case has been widely publicized, and you can run into people eager to buy the book who might have been indifferent toward it in the first place.

It is not the purpose of this article to question the rights of the judge's decision, but rather to examine the book itself with the view to discovering why it so greatly upset its subject.

Standing as Artist

In the first place, there are points of difference between Mr. Smith's biography and the earlier "official" one by Arthur Lourie. Perhaps the most conspicuous is the omission in the latter of any reference to Dr. Koussevitzky's first marriage to a ballet dancer, which ended in divorce.

Mr. Smith would also have us believe that Dr. Koussevitzky remained in the Jewish faith for some time after the age of 6, the date fixed by Lourie for his "conversion." It is a small matter, but Mr. Smith says that the conductor went to Moscow to pursue his studies in the Imperial Conversatory at the age of 17, whereas Lourie made it 14.

The seat of the trouble would seem to lie in Mr. Smith's approach to Koussevitzky's personality and to his standing as an artist.

Began at Top

Speaking of the late Mme. Koussevitzky, Mr. Smith says: "Her sympathy and understanding had helped him over difficulties caused by his emotional nature and defects of character." He tells that Dr. Koussevitzky has had encounters with his musicians, his associates and his relatives. And in treating of the artist he does not make him out as infallible, either as interpreter or as technician.

Whereas most great conductors have served a long and arduous apprenticeship, Dr. Koussevitzky, so to speak, began at the top. With the fortune placed at his disposal through his marriage to the wealthy Natalya Ushkov, he established his own orchestra—the summer tours with this organization down the River Volga form one of the most picturesque incidents in a highly colorful and dramatic career. But routine must be acquired sooner or later and Dr. Koussevitzky learned as he went along, even after coming to Boston in 1924.

That he reached the place that he now occupies and brought his orchestra to the position that it holds is, as Mr. Smith points out, all that really matters, even if there were slips and difficulties along the way. Nor does the conductor's biographer minimize his enormous service to the cause of modern music in general and of modern American music in particular.

Roughly, about half of the book treats of Dr. Koussevitzky's career before he came to Boston and the rest of it discusses his manifold activities here, not the least of which has been the establishment of the Berkshire Music Centre. As far as the conductor's reputation is concerned, it was made secure a long time ago.

KOUSSEVITSKY GETS WRIT AGAINST BOOK

Temporary Stay Granted on Conductor's Complaint That Biography Is Libelous

On the ground that a new biography of him is libelous and violates his privacy, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, won a court order yesterday restraining publication restraining publication and distribution of the book.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, in granting an interim stay pending determination of the musician's application for a preliminary injunction, indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were directed to submit briefs next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Moses Smith, a Boston music critic who is author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky," and the publishing concern, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., was filed in the complaint.

Concern's First Publication

The book, which was to have been distributed next Saturday, is the initial publication of the company, organized here last July. David Ewen, its editor and director, expressed "surprise" last night at Mr. Koussevitzky's action and reported that 3,000 copies of a first printing of 5,000 books had been distributed to booksellers. Howard Chipkin, lawyer and the company's secretary, appeared as defense counsel.

Should the court grant a temporary injunction, Mr. Ewen said, "every publisher in the country is in dire danger if he ever published a book about any living person, or for that matter a dead person whose family is alive or mentioned in the book."

Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, listed three points as basis for an injunction. He contended that publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, the "rights of privacy" law.

Publication of photographs in the book also constituts a violation of that law, he charged. Finally, he asserted, the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso, who almost since his advent in Boston twenty-three years ago has been the subject of adulatory comment in the musical world, set forth in an affidavit that he had declined to give Mr. Smith any information, advising that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Mr. Koussevitzky complained.

Reputation Seen Damaged

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging but very distinctly damaging, not only to my reputation but to my material resources."

"Furthermore," he continued "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. Ewen described the book as "not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." To restrain the right to publish it, he said, would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

The charge of libel, he went on, was less important than the question whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

Mr. Smith for almost twenty years was music critic for The Boston American and The Boston Transcript and more recently has been director of the Masterworks Division of Columbia Records.

MUSIC

Ha

Symphony Concert

The 18th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon"............Weber
Symphony in D major No. 5
Vaughan Williams
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D major Op. 77..........Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

No one who attended it will forget that concert in 1937 when Mr. Heifetz played both the Brahms and the 2nd Prokofieff Violin Concertos with the orchestra. Fortunately both those superb performances were recorded, and we have thus been able to refresh ourselves at will with that glorious musical experience. But fine as those records are they do not provide quite the thrill of an actual performance in the hall. That Mr. Heifetz and the orchestra renewed for us yesterday afternoon.

I suppose that years hence when the youth of that day will have prated of some current performance of the Brahms Concerto we shall shake our white locks and murmur: "Ah, but you never heard Heifetz and the Boston Symphony in it." Again, of course, we shall be able to bring out our treasured album, turn on the machine and rebuke youth for its presumption. Truly it was a noble performance yesterday, so assured, so fused and so eloquent, that gratitude to all the participants is about all that can be expressed for their having achieved it.

Back from his mid-winter vacation, Serge Koussevitzky was greeted yesterday with effusive applause. He then turned his attention to the latest symphony by Vaughan Williams, the most respected of living English composers. It is a poetic, introspective work, as a rule so quietly stating its message that it had yesterday a tendency to put people to sleep. Nevertheless it is worth staying awake for.

There is, perhaps, nothing very new about it. The modal harmonies, the peaceful lyricism, even the more vigorous bits, all these Vaughan Williams has said to us before; but there is no harm in that he gently insinuates them upon our ears again. It might be pointed out that this 5th Symphony is another case of the artist's being more prophetic than common mortals, in whose breast during the winter of 1943 when the symphony was composed the moods of optimism and peace on earth were not uppermost. Yet this is assuredly the spirit of the symphony. It is dedicated "without permission" to Sibelius, but the influence of that composer is not felt in its style or structure.

The Passacaglia I found exceedingly difficult to grasp technically, but I do not doubt that the theme announced by the cellos can somehow be traced throughout the movement. Possibly it is better to listen to it unintellectually. The slow movement is the loveliest of all, and the scherzo is far from a conventional essay in that genre. I do not imagine that the Vaughan Williams' 5th will ever replace his London Symphony in popularity, but it is still a thoughtful and far, from negligible work. The interpretation which Dr. Koussevitzky gave yesterday was both carefully conceived and singingly expressed.

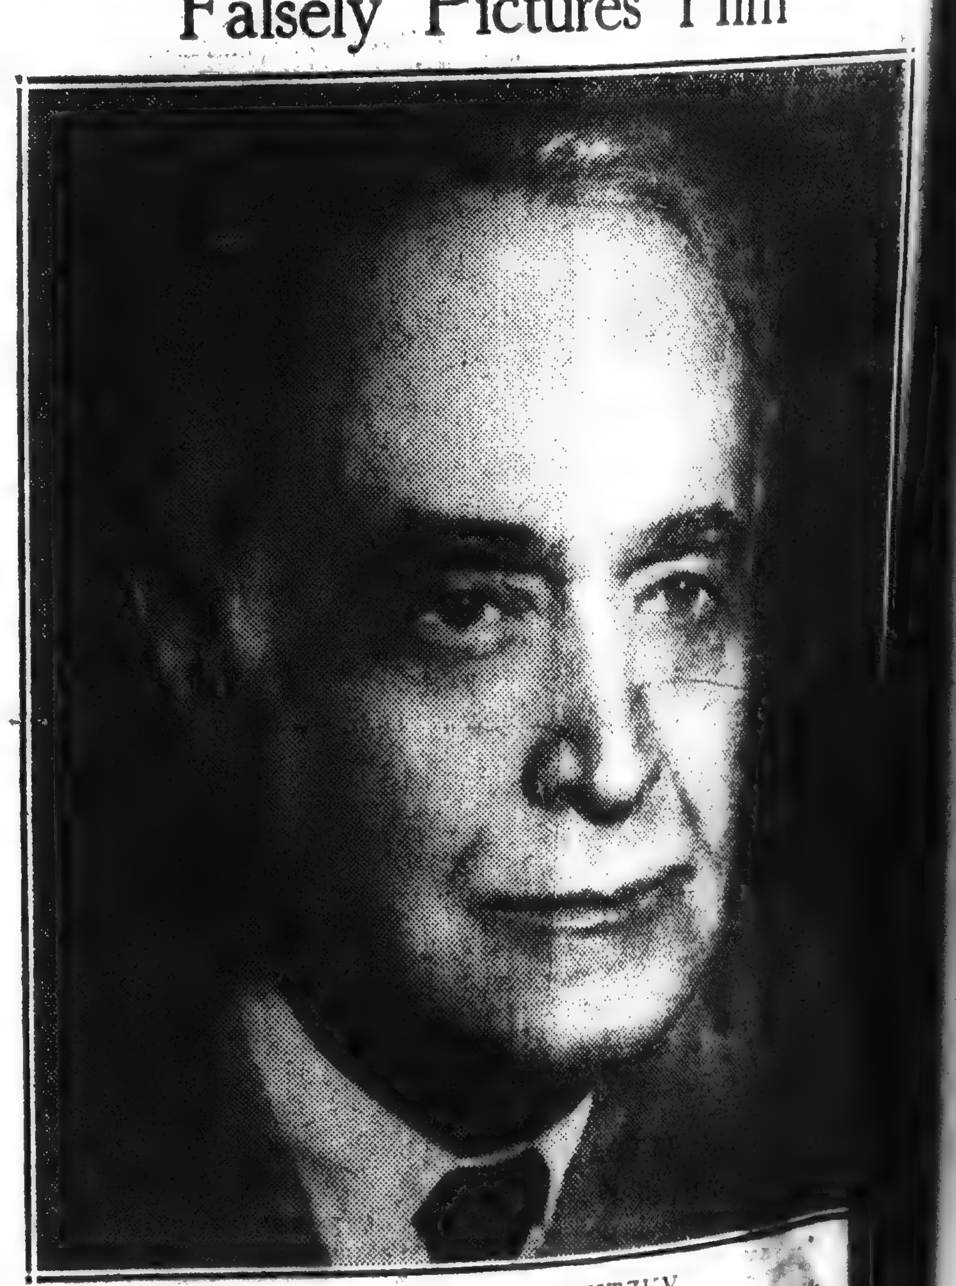
The concert opened with a rather fussed-up and uneven performance of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," not nearly so successful as that played at the Friends of the Boston Symphony meeting Wednesday. Better luck with it tonight!

The program next week offers Rachmaninoff's 3rd Symphony, Lukas Foss' Cantata, "The Song of Songs," and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

NOTED PIANIST—Vladimir Horowitz who will give his only recital of the season at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon.

JUDGE BANS BOOK ON KOUSSEVITZKY

Halts Publication Pending Study ---Symphony Head Says It Falsely Pictures Him



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Objects to book about him and obtains injunction against it.

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a temporary court order today restraining publication of a book which he said "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

Continued on Page 6—First Col.

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs Boston Orchestra in Forum Concert

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

THE one and only Boston Symphony made its single Philadelphia appearance of the season at the Academy of Music last night before a very large and enthusiastic audience.

The Philadelphia Forum is to be thanked for securing this wonderful orchestra and its equally amazing leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston conductor gave an excellently balanced program, which featured two novelties as far as Philadelphia was concerned, and one standard work which is familiar to all.

The program opened with Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Scored for strings, woodwinds, and two pianos, Martinu's work proved a fascinating composition.

The first movement is filled with rhythmic movement, while the second is an extended melody of considerable beauty in the lower strings which is always expressive. The concluding section is lively and full of polyphonic activity with much elaborate ornamentation by the pianos. These latter instruments were brilliantly played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera.

Mr. Foss, who is 25, was further and most impressively emphasized by his "Song of Songs," a Biblical cantata for Soprano and Orchestra. Born in Berlin, the young composer was brought up in the United States. He has taken his text from the King James version of "The Song of Solomon" and has divided it into four distinct parts. The cantata is scored for full orchestra with a very extended and demanding solo for soprano voice.

Last night, Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was entrusted with this difficult job. The vocal line makes great demands on the singer's range and also insists that she sing both very loud and very soft. Miss Davis met these requirements superbly, singing with impeccable musicianship and with much feeling for the text and phrase.

Her voice is a handsome instrument, not flawlessly equalized in all its registers, yet capable of many lovely and subtle effects. At times her vocal line was quite instrumental.

To go back to Mr. Foss' piece, despite the fact that some of the sections seemed to lack compactness and to meander and repeat themselves, the music is on a pretty grand and imposing level. It is written with great skill in its orchestration and with unimpeachable sincerity and depth of feeling. The effect it made was decidely impressive.

The second half of the program was all Koussevitzky. Here the Russian conductor unleashed the vehemence and intensity of his extraordinary temperament in a memorable performance of the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony.

He conducted with unflagging enthusiasm and threw himself heart and soul into his work. Such magnanimity and expenditure of self cannot help but generate a very definite reaction from an audience. Playing the final movement at a very high voltage, the distinguished conductor was the recipient of an ovation which was punctuated by loud "Bravos!"

This Clipping From Fredricksburg, Va.
Star
APR 2 - 1947

Of Interest To Red Seal Collectors:

PROKOFIEFF: Symphony No. 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Con.

Brokofieff wrote this symphony in a single month, during the summer of 1944, and conducted its premiere in January of the following year. Soviet newspaper correspondent Robert Magidoff, writing from Moscow shortly after the symphony was first played in that city, quoted Prokofieff as describing the work as "symphony about the spirit of man." In essence the "Fifth Symphony" is Prokofieff's ode to the end of the war, and its music reflects the joy occasioned by victory. While the music is no less modern than the composer's "Fourth Symphony," dedicated to the Boston Symphony, there is a full store of rich tonal color and superb melody almost romantic in character. Serge Koussevitky and the Boston Symphony have provided a superlative supplement to their equally fine RCA Victor recording of the same composer's "Classical Symphony."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As far as the Symphony concerts proper are concerned, the extensive commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms comes to an end this evening when Rudolf Firkusny repeats the performance of the first piano concerto that he offered yesterday afternoon. The remaining numbers of the current program are Bach's third suite for orchestra and Struss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Although Mr. Firkusny got a big hand at the end, the performance of the concerto was not quite everything that it might have been. For some reason, the orchestra did not get completely in tune with the piano and sensitive ears were bothered by this detail. The work itself is a curious one that comes to full realization only in an extraordinary interpretation. I can think offhand of only one that met that requirement, namely, Artur Schnabel's. He made you believe that the concerto was everything that Brahms tried to make it. Though still a young man, in the first movement he strove to out-Beethoven Beethoven, using the key and endeavoring to capture the spirit of the first movement of the latter's Ninth Symphony. In the Adagio he would achieve the serenity of Beethoven's later and greater slow movements. In the right hands, he can seem to do both of these things. Yesterday this listener, at least, received the impression of strivings unrealized. Nevertheless, Mr. Firkusny did a very capable job, musically and technically, and after the labored exuberance, if you can call it that, of the last movement he was, as said above, warmly applauded.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave us the fine suite of Bach, that of the celebrated air for the violin, no later than last season. It seemed then that the overture sounded a bit heavy. Yesterday it was just right. The tone poem of Strauss, which we had not heard for four years, though there was a warming up last Tuesday evening, is one of the most brilliant, the most sensational offerings of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. Musically, "Zarathustra" is uneven. There are radiant pages. There are also those which are banal, however, amusing they maybe to listen to; and you have the feeling that this attempt to put Nietzsche's philosophy into music was a tour de force of which even Strauss was not fully capable. But as a tonal show "Zarathustra" is hardly surpassed by anything in the orchestral literature. Every choir is put through its paces. And what paces.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 1 - 1947

Boston "Pops" Concerts Start On ABC April 29

Boston "Pops" Concerts will be heard over ABC network for the duration of the summer season. and perhaps longer, effective April 29. This will replace the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts. of which the popular concerts are the usual summer season programming. Broadcasts will be heard Tuesdays 8:30-9:30 p.m., EST, with Arthur Fiedler, conducting. Fiedler has presided over the concerts since 1930.

(Continued from Page 1)

Forthcoming series will come from Symphony Hall, Boston, and will be produced by William L. Marshall, with Gene Hamilton as announcer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1947

RACHMANINOFF FUND MAKES SOVIET GIFT

Andrei A. Gromyko, Soviet delegate to the United Nations, received yesterday a library of the recorded works of the late Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian-born pianist and composer, whose seventy-fourth birthday anniversary also was celebrated.

The records were presented by Olin Downes, music critic of THE NEW YORK TIMES, as executive chairman of the Rachmaninoff Fund. The ceremony took place in Mr. Gromyko's office at the headquarters of the Soviet delegation to the United Nations, 100 West Eighty-eighth Street.

Mr. Downes termed the composer, who died on March 28, 1943, "a man of genius whose art, honored by both Russia and America, is today a symbol of the spirit that unites musicians of the entire world." Mr. Gromyko said the recordings would be received with pleasure and interest by the Rachmaninoff Museum in Moscow.

The Rachmaninoff Fund, organized in 1943, aims to perpetuate the name and musical ideals of the late composer, conductor and pianist. Officers of the fund include Vladimir Horowitz, president, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, chairman of the artists' advisory committee.

The records were contributed by the RCA-Victor and Columbia Recording Companies.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 2 - 1947

Humor

Run, Don't Walk!

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, repeated last night in his interview over WBEC, the famous witticism of the late Philip Hale, Boston's renowned music critic. At this particular time all the major musical organizations are playing Brahms in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the great German composer's death. The works of Johannes Brahms for many years have been standard repertoire for symphony orchestras, string quartets and concert singers. But it has not always been so. During Brahms' lifetime, and for some time thereafter, many music-lovers had an active distaste for Brahms' music. In fact, it was so pronounced in Boston that Mr. Judd recalled Hale's celebrated sentence in a piece of musical criticism of this period. The reviewer observed that so many people left Symphony Hall in Boston during the playing of a Brahms work that the trustees should change the fire exit signs to read: "In case of Brahms, this way out."

RARE TRIBUTE GIVEN BRAHMS

Symphony Plays His Work on Anniversary

It was particularly appropriate that this week's Symphony concert was given on Thursday instead of Good Friday since it was 50 years ago, yesterday, that Johannes Brahms died.

The program selected by Serge Koussevitzky for this occasion: The "Academic Festival" Overture, Rhapsody for contralto solo. (Carol Brice) and Orchestra, Variations on a theme by Haydn and the Fourth Symphony, was the most brilliant tribute that could have been paid to the memory of a great composer. In this case, to claim that a man's most eternal monument is his work, is neither an unjustified exaggeration nor a verbal expedient. It is a simple and true statement of fact.

Anyone present at yesterday's concert who had doubted the truth of this in regard to Brahms must have experienced a quick change of mind during the concert. It was impossible to remain unaffected by Koussevitzky's dramatic reading of the Fourth especially. Purists may have taken exception to certain tempi, phrasing and other things, but the truth is that Dr. Koussevitzky does what he does so superbly and with such a distinguished flourish that there is no point in quibbling about it. It sometimes takes quite an effort to remember it, but there is never just one approach to music, even though some seem more valid than others. Yesterday, emotional content rather than line was emphasized. By the time Dr. Koussevitzky got through with the music he was limp—and so was the audience, but not so much that they couldn't stand up and cheer. It seems that the big news of a Koussevitzky concert is still Koussevitzky.

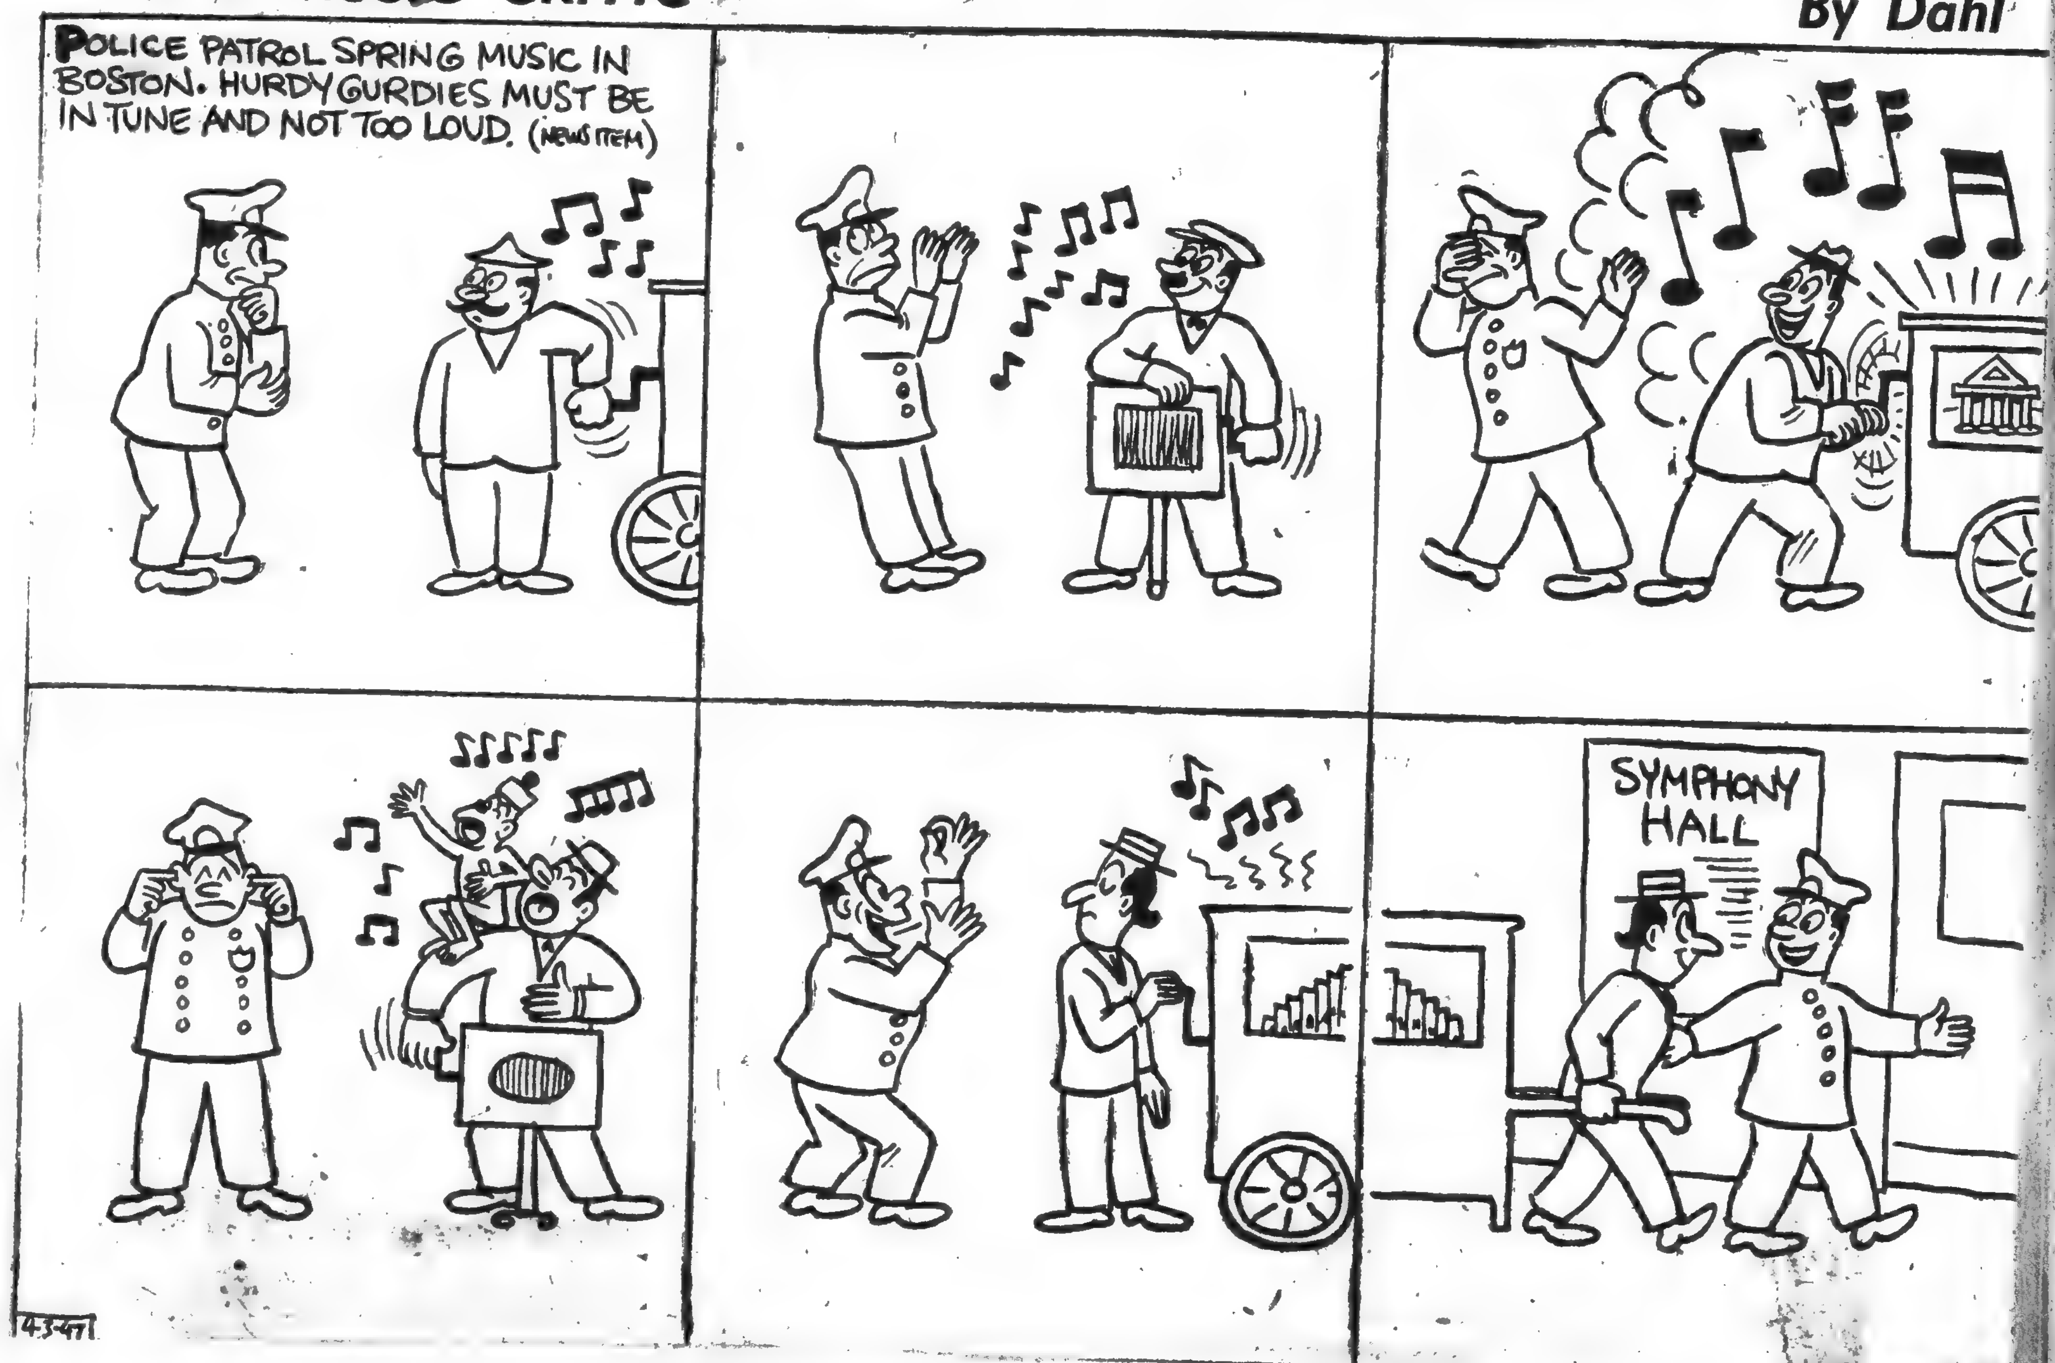
Unfortunately, the Alto Rhapsody as it was done yesterday was not as impressive as it has been at other times. There was one performance at Tangelwood last year, with the same soloist assisting, that was far superior to what was heard yesterday. At that time, Miss Brice's voice seemed richer and clearer with a more precise intonation. It had a hollow, blue color that fitted Goethe's moody verses and added something to them. But despite the unfavorable comparison between yesterday and last year Miss Brice was still pleasant to listen to.

Next Tuesday Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the final concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1947

THE MUSIC CRITIC

By Dahl



POLICE PATROL SPRING MUSIC IN BOSTON. HURDY GURDIES MUST BE IN TUNE AND NOT TOO LOUD. (NEWS ITEM)
SYMPHONY HALL
4-3-47

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs Boston Orchestra in Forum Concert

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

THE one and only Boston Symphony made its single Philadelphia appearance of the season at the Academy of Music last night before a very large and enthusiastic audience.

The Philadelphia Forum is to be thanked for securing this wonderful group and its equally amazing leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston conductor gave an excellently balanced program, which featured two novelties as far as Philadelphia was concerned, and one symphony which is familiar to all.

The program opened with Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Scored for strings, woodwinds, and two pianos, Martinu's work proved a fascinating composition.

The first movement is filled with rhythmic movement, while the second is an extended melody of considerable beauty in the lower strings which is always expressive. The concluding section is lively and full of polyphonic activity with much elaborate ornamentation by the pianos. These latter instruments were brilliantly played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera.

Mr. Foss, who is 25, was further and most impressively emphasized by his "Song of Songs," a Biblical Cantata for Soprano and Orchestra. Born in Berlin, the young composer was brought up in the United States. He has taken his text from the King James version of "The Song of Solomon" and has divided it into four distinct parts. The cantata is scored for full orchestra with a very extended and demanding solo for soprano voice.

Last night, Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, was entrusted with this difficult job. The vocal line makes great demands on the singer's range and also insists that she sing both very loud and very soft. Miss Davis met these requirements superbly, singing with impeccable musicianship and with much feeling for the text and phrase.

Her voice is a handsome instrument, not flawlessly equalized in all its registers, yet capable of many lovely and subtle effects. At times her vocal line was quite instrumental.

To go back to Mr. Foss' piece, despite the fact that some of the sections seemed to lack compactness and to meander and repeat themselves, the music is on a pretty grand and imposing level. It is written with great skill in its orchestration and with unimpeachable sincerity and depth of feeling. The effect it made was decidely impressive.

The second half of the program was all Koussevitzky. Here the Russian conductor unleashed the vehemence and intensity of his extraordinary temperament in a memorable performance of the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony.

He conducted with unflagging enthusiasm and threw himself heart and soul into his work. Such magnanimity and expenditure of self cannot help but generate a very definite reaction from an audience. Playing the final movement at a very high voltage, the distinguished conductor was the recipient of an ovation which was punctuated by loud "Bravos!"

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 1 - 1947

Boston "Pops" Concerts Start On ABC April 29

Boston "Pops" Concerts will be heard over ABC network for the duration of the summer season, and perhaps longer, effective April 29. This will replace the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts, of which the popular concerts are the usual summer season programming. Broadcasts will be heard Tuesdays 8:30-9:30 p.m., EST, with Arthur Fiedler, conducting. Fiedler has presided over the concerts since 1930.

(Continued from Page 1)

Forthcoming series will come from Symphony Hall, Boston, and will be produced by William L. Marshall, with Gene Hamilton as announcer.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 2 - 1947

Humor

Run, Don't Walk!

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, repeated last night in his interview over WBEC, the famous witticism of the late Philip Hale, Boston's renowned music critic. At this particular time all the major musical organizations are playing Brahms in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the great German composer's death. The works of Johannes Brahms for many years have been standard repertoire for symphony orchestras, string quartets and concert singers. But it has not always been so. During Brahms' lifetime, and for some time thereafter, many music-lovers had an active distaste for Brahms' music. In fact, it was so pronounced in Boston that Mr. Judd recalled Hale's celebrated sentence in a piece of musical criticism of this period. The reviewer observed that so many people left Symphony Hall in Boston during the playing of a Brahms work that the trustees should change the fire exit signs to read: "In case of Brahms, this way out."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1947

RACHMANINOFF FUND MAKES SOVIET GIFT

Andrei A. Gromyko, Soviet delegate to the United Nations, received yesterday a library of the recorded works of the late Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian-born pianist and composer, whose seventy-fourth birthday anniversary also was celebrated.

The records were presented by Olin Downes, music critic of THE NEW YORK TIMES, as executive chairman of the Rachmaninoff Fund. The ceremony took place in Mr. Gromyko's office at the headquarters of the Soviet delegation to the United Nations, 100 West Eighty-eighth Street.

Mr. Downes termed the composer, who died on March 28, 1943, "a man of genius whose art, honored by both Russia and America, is today a symbol of the spirit that unites musicians of the entire world." Mr. Gromyko said the recordings would be received with pleasure and interest by the Rachmaninoff Museum in Moscow.

The Rachmaninoff Fund, organized in 1943, aims to perpetuate the name and musical ideals of the late composer, conductor and pianist. Officers of the fund include Vladimir Horowitz, president, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, chairman of the artists' advisory committee.

The records were contributed by the RCA-Victor and Columbia Recording Companies.

RARE TRIBUTE GIVEN BRAHMS

Symphony Plays His Work on Anniversary

It was particularly appropriate that this week's Symphony concert was given on Thursday instead of Good Friday since it was 50 years ago, yesterday, that Johannes Brahms died.

The program selected by Serge Koussevitzky for this occasion: The "Academic Festival" Overture, Rhapsody for contralto solo, (Carol Brice) and Orchestra, Variations on a theme by Haydn and the Fourth Symphony, was the most brilliant tribute that could have been paid to the memory of a great composer. In this case, to claim that a man's most eternal monument is his work, is neither an unjustified exaggeration nor a verbal expedient. It is a simple and true statement of fact.

Anyone present at yesterday's concert who had doubted the truth of this in regard to Brahms must have experienced a quick change of mind during the concert. It was impossible to remain unaffected by Koussevitzky's dramatic reading of the Fourth especially. Purists may have taken exception to certain tempi, phrasing and other things, but the truth is that Dr. Koussevitzky does what he does so superbly and with such a distinguished flourish that there is no point in quibbling about it. It sometimes takes quite an effort to remember it, but there is never just one approach to music, even though some seem more valid than others. Yesterday, emotional content rather than line was emphasized. By the time Dr. Koussevitzky got through with the music he was limp—and so was the audience, but not so much that they couldn't stand up and cheer. It seems that the big news of a Koussevitzky concert is still Koussevitzky.

Unfortunately, the Alto Rhapsody as it was done yesterday was not as impressive as it has been at other times. There was one performance at Tangelwood last year, with the same soloist assisting, that was far superior to what was heard yesterday. At that time, Miss Brice's voice seemed richer and clearer with a more precise intonation. It had a hollow, blue color that fitted Goethe's moody verses and added something to them. But despite the unfavorable comparison between yesterday and last year Miss Brice was still pleasant to listen to.

Next Tuesday Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the final concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As far as the Symphony concerts proper are concerned, the extensive commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms comes to an end this evening when Rudolf Firkusny repeats the performance of the first piano concerto that he offered yesterday afternoon. The remaining numbers of the current program are Bach's third suite for orchestra and Struss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Although Mr. Firkusny got a big hand at the end, the performance of the concerto was not quite everything that it might have been. For some reason, the orchestra did not get completely in tune with the piano and sensitive ears were bothered by this detail. The work itself is a curious one that comes to full realization only in an extraordinary interpretation. I can think offhand of only one that met that requirement, namely, Artur Schnabel's. He made you believe that the concerto was everything that Brahms tried to make it. Though still a young man, in the first movement he strove to out-Beethoven Beethoven, using the key and endeavoring to capture the spirit of the first movement of the latter's Ninth Symphony. In the Adagio he would achieve the serenity of Beethoven's later and greater slow movements. In the right hands, he can seem to do both of these things. Yesterday this listener, at least, received the impression of strivings unrealized. Nevertheless, Mr. Firkusny did a very capable job, musically and technically, and after the labored exuberance, if you can call it that, of the last movement he was, as said above, warmly applauded.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave us the fine suite of Bach, that of the celebrated air for the violin, no later than last season. It seemed then that the overture sounded a bit heavy. Yesterday it was just right. The tone poem of Strauss, which we had not heard for four years, though there was a warming up last Tuesday evening, is one of the most brilliant, the most sensational offerings of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. Musically, "Zarathustra" is uneven. There are radiant pages. There are also those which are banal, however, amusing they may be to listen to; and you have the feeling that this attempt to put Nietzsche's philosophy into music was a tour de force of which even Strauss was not fully capable. But as a tonal show "Zarathustra" is hardly surpassed by anything in the orchestral literature. Every choir is put through its paces. And what paces.

This Clipping From Fredricksburg, Va.
Star
APR 2 - 1947

Of Interest To Red Seal Collectors:

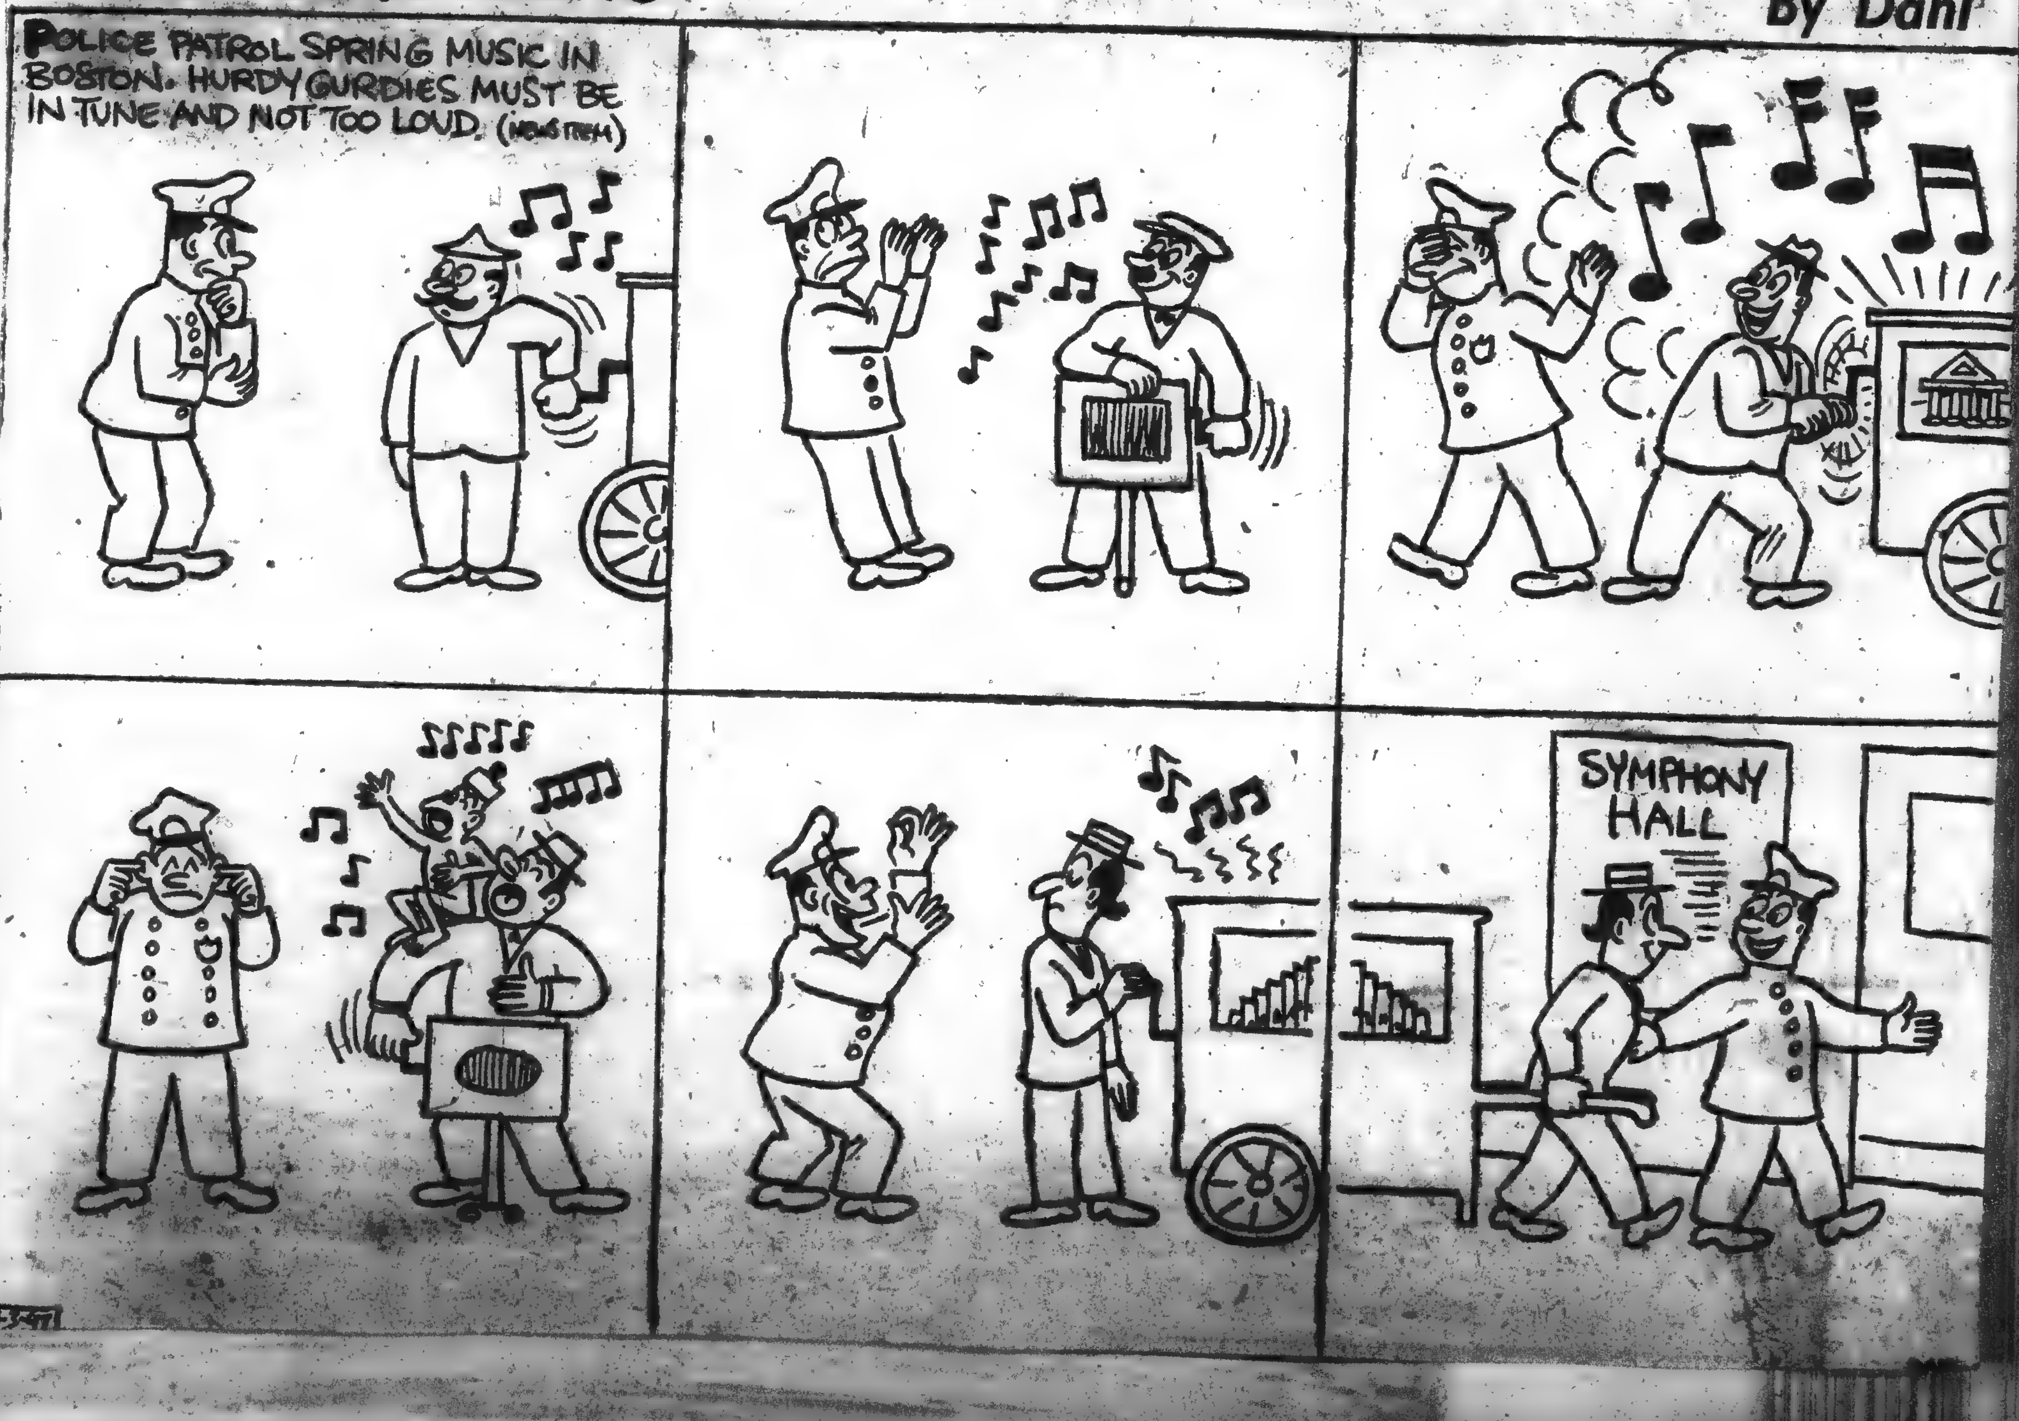
PROKOFIEFF: Symphony No. 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Con.

Brokofieff wrote this symphony in a single month, during the summer of 1944, and conducted its premiere in January of the following year. Soviet newspaper correspondent Robert Magidoff, writing from Moscow shortly after the symphony was first played in that city, quoted Prokofieff as describing the work as "symphony about the spirit of man." In essence the "Fifth Symphony" is Prokofieff's ode to the end of the war, and its music reflects the joy occasioned by victory. While the music is no less modern than the composer's "Fourth Symphony," dedicated to the Boston Symphony, there is a full store of rich tonal color and superb melody almost romantic in character. Serge Koussevitky and the Boston Symphony have provided a superlative supplement to their equally fine RCA Victor recording of the same composer's "Classical Symphony."

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1947

THE MUSIC CRITIC

By Dahl



POLICE PATROL SPRING MUSIC IN BOSTON. HURDY GURDIES MUST BE IN TUNE AND NOT TOO LOUD. (NEWS ITEM)
SYMPHONY HALL
4-3-47

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN
APR 2 - 1947

Great Artists Loathe Criticism

Laconia Interested in Moses Smith's Unauthorized Biography of Koussevitzky

Sometime late in February the editor of the Evening Citizen reading in the New York Herald Tribune Virgil Thomson's comment entitled "Koussevitzky Case" liked it so much he clipped it and laid it one side on his desk. A. J. Liebling, Dartmouth alumnus, in the March 22nd issue of The New Yorker, continuing his delightful essays on "The Wayward Press", cited the Thomson story as an example of excellent reporting. "Two recent stories about musicians had sufficient news interest to get on the front pages, but each had to wait for Mr. Thomson, in his Sunday column, to write it really well," Mr. Liebling explained. This seemed to confirm our judgment in preserving the piece for future reference. Then, on the day Mayor Parmentier was inaugurated, we learned to our great surprise that Moses Smith, author of the biography that is the basis of the "Koussevitzky Case" is the brother of Louis Smith of the L. W. Guild company, which owns the Guild Northland Mills here, with Mayor Parmentier as superintendent. Therefore there will be added local interest in Mr. Thomson's article, and for that reason it is reprinted herewith:

KOUSSEVITZKY CASE

By Virgil Thomson

(—in N. Y. Herald Tribune)

Serge (or Sergei) Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, is an aristocrat among American conductors and in Boston music circles something of an autocrat. Born seventy-two years ago in Russia and reared there in poverty (his family, though Orthodox Jews, never lived in a ghetto), he has attained wealth, world-wide fame and the highest distinction in his profession. As a virtuoso on the double-bass viol and as a conductor his ranking, by any standards, has been for many years among that of the very greatest in our time. As a composer he has contributed to the reputable literature of his instrument. As a publisher and a patron of contemporary music he has probably made a more lasting contribution to the art than any other single person living, excepting five or six composers. His place in its history is already assured and glorious.

* * *

The Official Story

Just to make assurance doubly sure, the Boston immortality machine has started issuing this winter what looks like a series of books bearing the papal imprimature of the good Doctor (LL. D., honoris causa, Harvard, 1929, and elsewhere). M. A. DeWolfe Howe, official biographer to the Bostonian great, has furnished "The Tale of Tanglewood, Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals" (Vanguard Press, New York, 1946, $2), prefaced by Mr. Koussevitzky himself. And Hugo Leichtentritt, a musicologist of repute and a former Lecturer of Harvard University, has fathered "Sergei Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music" (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass., 1946, $3).

Both volumes are slender, and their tone is unctuous. The first sketches ever so lightly the history of the celebrated summer festivals that have now grown into a training school for composers, conductors and orchestral musicians. The second enumerates the American compositions played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (sometimes under other leaders) since 1924. The list is large and impressive. If Mr. Leichtentritt's critical paragraphs are weakened by the fact that he has neither heard many of the works nor had access to their scores, the tabulation of Mr. Koussevitzy's public encouragements to American composers alone is of value as proving once and for all (if Walter Damrosch, Frederick Stock, Pierre Monteux and Leopold Stokowski had not proved it before) that a sustained program policy supporting contemporary composition does not keep subscribers away from symphony concerts.

* * *

The Unofficial Biography

And now to supplement these two books, which are clearly official and more than a little superficial, arrives a full-length biography of the maestro which is neither. It is entitled simply "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne, and Heath, New York, 1947, $4). Announced for sale on Feb. 15, its distribution has been held up for the time being by an injunction that prohibits its publication, sale and distribution till Justice Sheintag of the New York Supreme Court shall have determined whether the book's circulation will do its subject "irreparable harm." If the present writer, who has read an advance copy received before the injunction was issued, is in any way typical of the American reading public, it certainly, in his opinion, will not. The only possible harm he can envisage to so impregnable a reputation as that of Serge Koussevitzky is that already done by his own efforts to suppress the book.

Moses Smith, a trained newspaper man, for many years music critic of "The Boston Evening Transcript," as well as a friend of Mr. Koussevitzky, has produced a far more thorough study, a better work of scholarship than either Mr. Howe or Mr. Leichtentritt, scholars both by trade. There seems little in the book of factual statement that is subject to question. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky, in view of his great devotion to the memory of his second wife, is made unhappy by mention of his first marriage, hitherto not publicized in America, is scarcely germane. Neither is his possible sensitivity to reports of his quarrels with musicians and with blood relatives. These are, as a matter of fact, common knowledge; and they legitimately form part of the whole story of his musical life, just as his first marriage does of any complete biography.

Judgments and opinions, expressed over any writer's signature, are, of course, personal. The conductor's legal complaint objected to Mr. Smith's statement that Koussevitzky had succeeded as a conductor in spite of imperfect training as a young man in musical theory and score-reading. This also, if I may make so bold, has long been common knowledge among musicians. Nor is the estimable Doctor unique among the conducting great for being in a certain sense self-taught. Leopold Stokowski, Sir Thomas Beecham and Charles Muench, great interpreters all of them, did not come to conducting through early mastery of the conservatory routines. They bought, muscled or impressed their way in and then settled down to learn their job. They succeeded gloriously, as Koussevitzky has done. All honor to them. They have all, Koussevitzky included, contributed more of value to the technique of their art than most of the first-prize-in-harmony boys ever have.

* * *

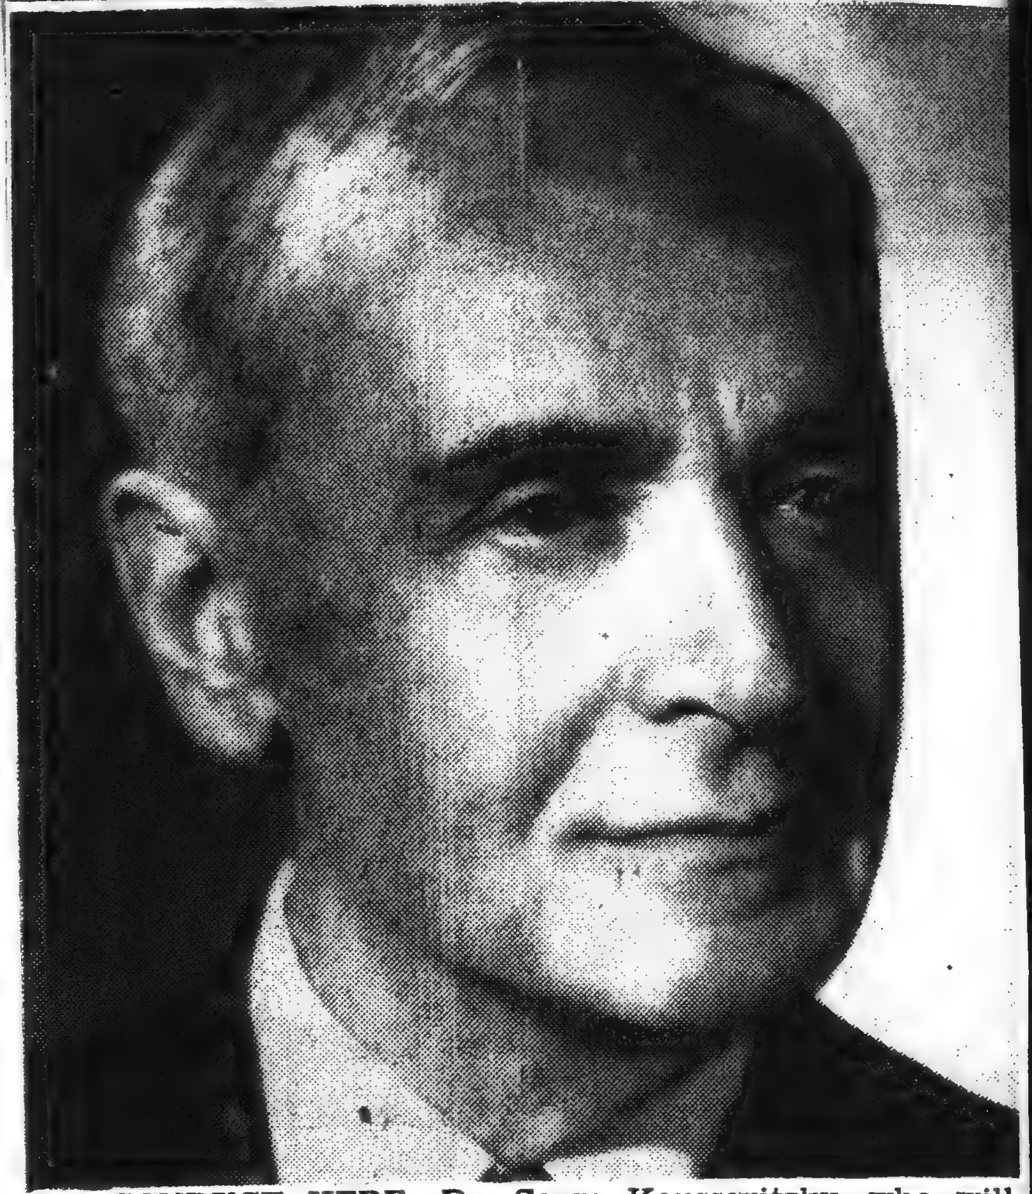
The "Last Infirmity of Noble Mind"

But great pedagogues, and the good Doctor is one, do hate hearing that their own education has not been conventional, though it rarely was. And all great artists loathe criticism. They do; they really do. What they want, what they need, what they live on, as Gertrude Stein so rightly said, is praise. They can never get enough of it. And sometimes, when they have come to be really powerful in the world they take the attitude that anything else is libel and should be suppressed. Dr. Koussevitzky's complaint, as I remember, did not use the word libel. It spoke of possible "irreparable injury." Well, criticism is often injurious; there is no question about that. Many a recitalist, receiving unfavorable reviews, finds it more difficult to secure further engagements than if his reports had been less critical. Minor careers have been ruined over night that way. Major careers are rarely harmed by criticism, because major artists can take it. They don't like to; but they have to, so they do. All the same, it is the big boys, the great big boys that nothing could harm, that squawk the loudest. I know because I have been in the business for several years now.

Mr. Smith's book makes Koussevitzky out to be a very great man indeed, but it also makes him human. Gone is the legend of his papal infallibility. Renewed is one's faith in his deep sincerity, his consecration, his relentless will to make the world permanently better than he found it. Nobody, I am sure, can read the book through without admiring him more. And the faith of the pious need not be shaken by reading that he has not always been toward his fellowman just and slow to anger. Civilization would be just a racket if we had to learn the lives of its great men from their official biographers and their paid agents. And if infallibility must be proved by suppressing all the arguments against it, any pope who tries this, even if he succeeds, has by that very action relinquished the point.

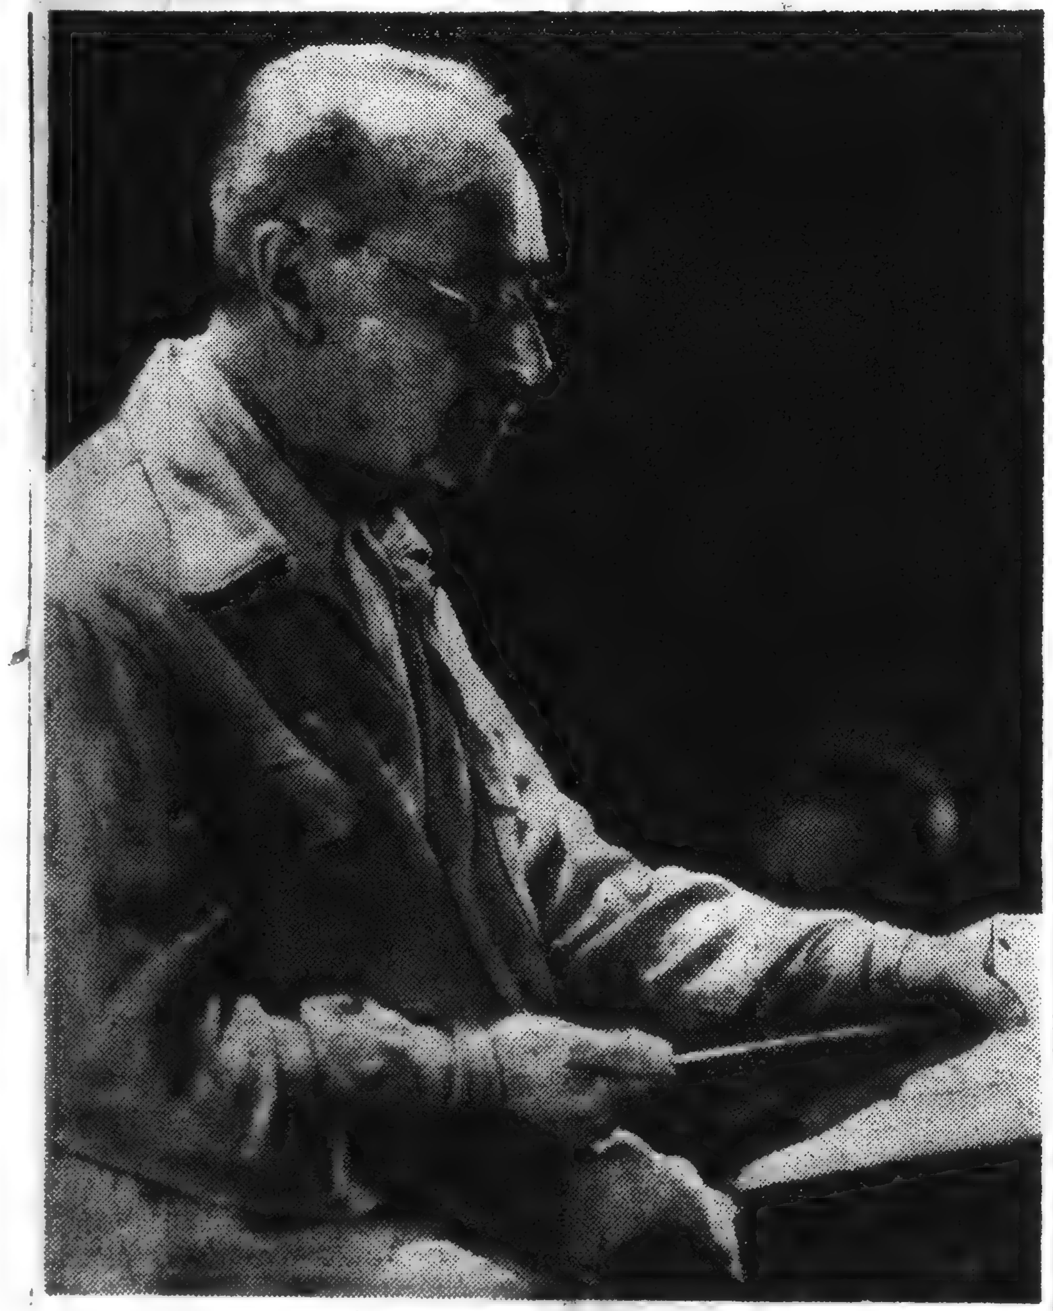
Mr. Koussevitzky is not the only first-class conductor in the world, though he is one of the best. Nor is he the only first-class conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed. ~~Nor~~ does he any longer play the double-bass in public, though when he did he was, by common consent, world champion. His unique position in a world full of excellent conductors, many of them devoted to contemporary music, is that he has played more of it, launched more of it, published more of it and paid for more of it than anybody else living. That is the clear message of Mr. Smith's biography. Everything else, a petulant gesture here and there, a musical or family quarrel, a pretentious remark, a vainglorious interview, the present court action, all these things serve the picture; they bring him more vividly to life. How can any one mind knowing them? Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity apotheosis that has already begun, would see any value in posing before an already worshiping universe without the customary habiliment of one human weakness. His lawsuit, of course, adds to the tableau that he has essayed to compose so carefully just that.

NEWARK,
STAR-LEDGER
APR 4 - 1947



TO CONDUCT HERE—Dr. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through an all-Brahms program at the Mosque Theater next Thursday under the Griffith Music Foundation auspices.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News
APR 6 - 1947



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony, caught in a characteristic pose during rehearsal. The famous leader and his orchestra will appear Thursday at 8:30 P. M. at the Mosque in an all-Brahms concert sponsored by Griffith Music Foundation.

[147]

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Off the Record

Mitroupoulos; Koussevitzky Records Illustrate Prokofieff's Development

By HARVEY TAYLOR

TWO phases in the development of Serge Prokofieff are admirably illustrated in two recordings released last week. One is Dimitri Mitropoulos (for Columbia) playing the piano solo line and conducting from the keyboard the Russian composer's third piano concerto in C-major with the Robin Hood Dell orchestra of Philadelphia.

The other is Serge Koussevitsky (for Victor) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra performing Prokofieff's excellent fifth symphony, opus 100.

The C-major piano concerto is a fine example of Prokofieff's earlier style. Briliant, but glib and at times satirical, its chief virtue lies in its wonderful rhythmic vigor and its flashy piano pyrotechnics.

Mitropoulos is just as bombastic and exciting as a pianist as he is on the conductor's podium. It's a fine performance well recorded.

More Maturity

In the fifth symphony, Prokofieff shows a much broader interest in emotional content. The first movement is somber and reflective and the slow movement contains lyric passages of great beauty. Only in the last movement does he revert to the crisp humor that marked many of his earlier compositions.

Koussevitzky, who introduced the work to Americans in November, 1945, conducts it beautifully and the recording is very good.

Just too late for the Easter market, Victor has come up with an unheralded but very good recording by the RCA Victor Chorals under Robert Shaw of Bach's Easter contata "Christ Lay in the Bonds of Death." The chorus does a fine job although its soloists remain anonymous.

Another Columbia release is Artur Rodzinski conducting the New York Philharmonic in Sibelius' rumbling fourth symphony in A-minor. It's not one of our preferred symphonies, but Rodzinski and his men do well by it.

For Moviegoers

Apparently aimed at people who saw the movie "Humoresque" and still want to hear some of the melodies that John Garfield pretended to play therein is Columbia's album called "Humoresque" featuring violinist Isaac Stern and pianist Oscar Levant.

Included in it are Waxman's 'Carmen Phantasy," Dvorak's "Humoresque," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumblebee," Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" and a ghastly and unforgivable arrangement by conductor Waxman of themes from "Tristan and Isolde." In the latter, Stern plays the soprano line and Levant plays an ornate re-writing of tenor and orchestra parts designed to sound like a piano concerto. All in all one of the most distasteful jobs of musical butchery that the movies have achieved so far.

Sir Thomas Beecham (for Victor) does a job of musical rehashing that's no so bad. He took themes from old and seldom sung Handel operas and assembled them into a ballet suite in 19 parts which he calls "The Great Elopement."

Sir Thomas is an able orchestrator. The themes, although rescored for full modern orchestra, keep the original Handel flavor and the suite makes pleasant listening.

Apr 26

TI

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 24th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8 in F major Op. 93 ..... Beethoven Symphony No. 9 in D minor Op. 125, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy" ..... Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

As was the case last year Mr. Koussevitzky elected to end the season with the triumphant notes of Beethoven's 9th Symphony ringing in our ears. If the effect yesterday was a little less electrifying than in 1946, that was only to be expected and had nothing to do with the quality of the performance which was again one of impassioned eloquence.

Beethoven was a genius who was not afraid to state a simple truth without equivocation or philosophical misgivings as to whether that truth were all it was cracked up to be. The bortherhood of man was for Beethoven a good and a true idea and he sang its praises with all his might, which posterity has come to agree has never been equalled on a symphonic scale.

Mr. Koussevitzky imbued the forces at his command with the dramatic passion and the grand line of this work. The nuances were there too and the subtleties of tonal sonority. The orchestra played beautifully for him, and the chorus from Cambridge, having been well schooled by Mr. Woodworth, sang with extra fervor. The vocal quartet also sang well. It might be observed, too, that all four singers have participated in the Berkshire Music Center and therefore proved, if proof were needed, the high standards of that institution.

Last year Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with a Haydn Symphony, and yesterday he chose Beethoven's 8th for the same office. It has often been pointed out that the even-numbered Symphonies of Beethoven are the cheerful products of his genius, an exception being the First which is also bright. The 8th is the most cheerful of all of them. It has no slow movement, yet no one could complain that its gaiety is monotonous. Again the orchestra played superbly in this work, with a marvellous lightness which is well nigh inimitable.

This 66th season has been a Brahms - Beethoven - Strauss year. There were nine (not 10 as the program has it) works of Brahms, and you could say there were eleven if you counted the Requiem and the 3rd Symphony on a Tuesday. Beethoven added up to seven, and Strauss had five (not four) to his credit. I have summarized the season in Sunday's paper and was misled by the Brahms figure, though I managed to catch the Strauss. If these familiar works formed the back-bone of the season there was also plenty of modern music, though no world-shaking or controversial novelty.

The concert will be repeated tonight. On Tuesday night at 8:30 the 62nd season of the Pops will open under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 6 - 1947

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has recorded the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony. The interpretation is more eloquent than Artur Rodzinski's with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra issued by Columbia a few weeks ago and the recording is somewhat fuller and more glowing as mere sound than the latter's, although both sets have almost noiseless surfaces.

Columbia has published Dimitri Mitropoulos's traversal under his own direction of Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto in C major, Op. 26 with the assistance of the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra. This is one of the Russian composer's most vital, exhilarating products, and Mr. Mitropoulos's account of the difficult piano part is technically expert and his conception of the score as a whole is illuminating and exciting. Excellent recording.

Also released by Columbia is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter Overture" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy on two twelve-inch records. The performance is an effective one and the recording as such is clear, full-sounding and smooth surfaced.

Other Victor Sets

Bach's Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," one of his greatest and most affecting works in this form, is set forth on four ten-inch disks by the Victor Chorale and Orchestra under Robert Shaw's direction in deeply perceptive, tonally impressive fashion, and the recording is a particularly fine one from the mechanical point of view.

Twelve of the nineteen numbers which compose the score of the ballet "The Great Elopement" devised by Sir Thomas Beecham from works by Handel are performed under the latter's direction by the London Philharmonic Orchestra. This is music of characteristically Handelian noble serenity and exuberance. Both the interpretation and its transference to the disks are first-rate accomplishments.

Six oratorio arias, "Why Do the Nations," from Handel's "Messiah," "Now Heaven in Fullest Glory Shone," from Haydn's "Creation," "Give Me Back My Lord" from Bach's "St. Matthew Fashion," "O God, Have Mercy Upon Me," from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and "Lord God of Abraham" and "It Is Enough" from the latter's "Elijah" are delivered by Norman Cordon with varying effectiveness.

The bass's voice is heard most advantageously in the slow moving Mendelssohn arias which demand little in the way of vocal flexibility. In these, where the singer can concentrate on the expressive aspects of the music, his voice retains much of the warmth of richness which is possessed in his best days at the Metropolitan Opera House. But when, as in Handel's "Why Do the Nations" or in Bach's "Give Me Back My Lord," vocal agility is required, Mr. Cordon's singing is labored and ineffectual. Competent accompaniments have been supplied by the R. C. A. Victor Orchestra, directed by Sylvan Levin. Good recording.

Twelve Hungarian folksongs are voiced by Alexander Sved accompanied by a gypsy orchestra conducted by Charles Benci. The sensuous quality of Mr. Sved's barytone voice lends itself well to the disclosure of these songs; but his sentimental approach to them is disaffecting.

Beethoven's "Pathetique" Sonata, Op. 13, in C minor, is discoursed impressively on the whole by Artur Rubinstein; weakening to this conception is his slowing down of tempo in the E flat minor episode of the first movement, a procedure which divests the music of its inherent intensity, since a touch of sentimentality creeps in with the slackening of the pace. The pianist's full-bodied, sensitively variegated tone has been felicitously recorded.

On a single ten inch record, Mr. Rubinstein plays Liszt's "Valse oubliee" charmingly and Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet" with poetic insight. Excellent recording.

Victor Single Twelve-Inch Records

Stravinsky's "Fireworks" and the "Sicilienne" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande" are well played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra conducted by Desire Defaauw. Sinigaglia's racy "Danza Piemomtese" in A. Op. 31, No. 1, is well accounted for by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conducting.

Concert Hall Society

The two newest publications in Concert Hall Society's Limited Editions are Samuel Barber's "Capricorn" Concerto and the "Gordian Knot" Suite of Purcell, both set forth by the Saidenberg Little Symphony, Daniel Saidenberg director. In the "capricorn" Concerto, Mr. Barber finally breaks with his earlier, neo-romantic style, and with Stravinsky as his guide produces an expertly contrived, beguiling composition, which despite its sources bears the stamp of an individual musical mind. Both works are admirably interpreted and the recording, as in Concert Hall's previous release, is extraordinarily fine.

Musicraft has put forth Beethoven's granitic "Grosse Fuge." Op. 133, solidly performed by the Kroll String Quartet and satisfactorily recorded on two twelve-inch disks.

JOURNAL

APR 6 - 1947

Double Bass to Conductor

New author and new publishing house combine to offer dispassionate biography of musician

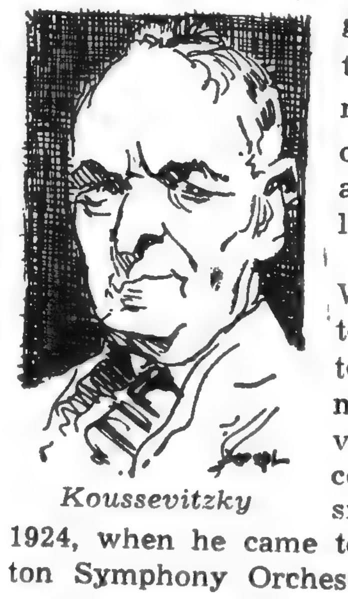
A Review by Fanny Brandeis

KOUSSEVITZKY: By Moses Smith. 400 pp. Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc. $4.

TO WRITE a biography of a living person is certainly far more difficult than to bring to life an historic figure. To be objective, veracious, just and discriminating is a prerequisite in providing an adequate presentation of the protagonist. When the subject of the biography is a well-known person, still living, in achieving these prerequisites the pitfalls are many; mine fields, even booby traps lie across the terrain. Obviously, there is a way to avoid them. It is to glide sweetly and superficiously over dangerous ground, avoiding dangerous repercussions by avoiding reality. The result is no biography, but an idealized camera study.

Mr. Moses Smith, in his book, "Koussevitzky," has not attempted to escape the dangers. He has boldly and dispassionately presented the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he knows him, sees him and believes him to be—a brilliant, an intuitive, a tremendously hard-working and devoted musician, dedicated with an almost religious intensity to his art, but human enough to have faults, even failings, which have prevented his being a completely great conductor.

The story of Koussevitzky's rise from a double-bass player in the orchestra of the Bol'shoi Theater in Moscow to his present pre-eminence is a fascinating one. After a brilliant marriage Koussevitzky became the only double-bass virtuoso of our time and he traveled over Europe as a soloist. Soon he decided to become a conductor, and with an immense fortune at his command, he organized an orchestra. The descriptions of the travels of the orchestra on the Volga, giving concerts of great music in towns that had never heard an orchestra before, are quite fabulous.



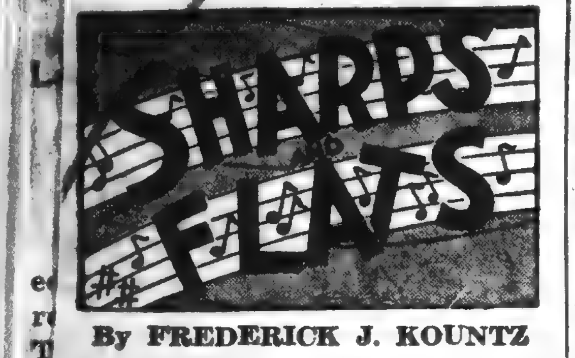
Koussevitzky

The first World War put an end to this, but not to Koussevitzky's music publishing ventures, nor his conducting outside of Russia. By 1924, when he came to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was famous throughout Europe, though only a name in this country. The developing and accomplishments of his astonishing career in the United States are known, and Mr. Smith has given all credit to Koussevitzky for what he has brought about. At the same time he has told without rancor, but also without restraint, many details of the conductor in relation to music and musicians which have caused great excitement.

The book is extraordinarily interesting as a story, also as a revelation of what a great conductor actually is and does, seen, not from the back, as the audience does, but face to face, as by his orchestra. A new publishing house, devoted to books on music, and a new author have combined to present an absorbing book.

[148]

APR 6 - 1947



By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

A FRIEND of mine who has never paid enough attention to serious music to know whether he likes it or not was dragged by his determined wife to the concret which the Philadelphia orchestra played in the Peristyle during the music season now ending. He was not bored into slumber; he didn't find the music unimpressive. But what was of most interest to him was the relationship between conductor and orchestra. And, when I next saw him, he expressed the opinion that a good orchestra should be able to function satisfactorily without a conductor.

I rather suspect that this statement was a shot in the dark. But it was hitting pretty close to fact. It is true that, among the visiting orchestras which we heard here during the winter, the Philadelphia is one which might conceivably operate on a conductorless basis.

It is advisable, I think, to make my point clear at once. When I speak of a conductorless orchestra I have no reference at all to one which has developed from scratch without authority over it. Such development never results in an orchestra that is worth hearing. I am speaking only of an expert orchestra, thoroughly trained and rehearsed over a good many years, which might at concerts dispense with its conductor.

Let's consider shortly the other orchestras which we heard during the year, excepting, of course, the Boston group which is in enough of a class by itself to merit separate treatment. Take the Pittsburgh situation. Reiner doesn't need the orchestra but the orchestra would be considerably less important without him. Reiner is enormously greater as a conductor than his players are as an orchestra. The uncertainties of the Mitropoulos manner of conducting have communicated themselves to a degree to his orchestra. So that in one part or another of almost every one of thir concerts there are times when things are not entirely in hand. And George Szell has not been in Cleveland long enough to impress his wishes indelibly on that orchestra. Neither apparently has the orchestra become wholly acquainted with him.

* * *

AS I have suggested, the Boston orchestra is in a class entirely apart from these and perhaps from every other orchestra in the country. And the reason is obvious enough. It is the only orchestra which has had one conductor, one complete authority over it for a long enough period to allow conductor and orchestra to be unfailingly sure of each other and of the technical needs of the music they play.

Almost 20 years ago I was in attendance at one of the regular concerts in Symphony hall in Boston when the hall was thrown into total darkness because of a power failure in that part of the city where the auditorium is located. The conductor for that concert was not Koussevitsky but Maurice Ravel and the program contained only his compositions. When the lights went out the orchestra was well into the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2. That work demands a large orchestra. Yet it is classical in the sense that its transparency absolutely negates any inexactness in its proper playing. But the orchestra without lights, without conductor or music that it could see, continued flawlessly to the end of the section of music which it had begun before the darkness set in.

Ravel had arrived in Boston only a day or so before this particular concert. He had conducted no more than two rehearsals with the orchestra. Whether he was satisfied with the way the orchestra interpreted his music when darkness hobbled his conducting is beside the point. The fact remains that this music was played correctly—so far as notes and phrases were concerned—and explicitly without a conductor.

Now to get back again to the statement of my friend. I think he was not so much stating an opinion as he was questioning the exact function of a conductor.

* * *

OVER the period of a decade or two a great many of us have built up within ourselves a view of conducting which is pretty wide of the mark. We speak of hearing Toscanini and fail even to mention the orchestra which he has conducted. What we forget is that the magic in music which we have heard is not simply some spiritual power that Toscanini has thrown over his orchestra for the period of the concert, but the culmination of intense rehearsals in which conductor and orchestra have come to complete agreement on how they will play the music.

The conductor whose primary aim is only to represent the composer's musical intentions faithfully—and only that variety of conductor is worth his salt—has done his real conducting long before he brings his orchestra to the concert platform. He has rehearsed and rehearsed until both he and his orchestra are sure not only that they know the music but also that they understand it; until each section of the orchestra is thoroughly conversant not only with the parts it has to play but with the parts which every other section will play. And at a concert such a conductor is no more than a watchdog to preserve the unity of attack and accomplishment to which he and the orchestra have long since attained.

* * *

AND that basically is the real function of a conductor, to bring himself and his orchestra to that level of technical and musical unanimity in which the need of communication between them at public cncerts is approximately nil. Such an accomplishment demands long association of expert musicians, a thorough meeting of minds based on mutual understanding, and a maximum respect on all sides.

There isn't much doubt that most of the orchestras now active do not even approach that high level of sureness in which they could even think of approaching a public concert without a guidepost before them. The orchestras for the most part are not sufficiently expert. The bulk of them are not fully rehearsed in what they must play. And some of the conductors are highbinders whose sole approach to music is so personalized that they have little concern at bottom with orchestra or music or anything except themselves.

We shall not hear any conductorless orchestras, of course. The concert going public wouldn't want them. And neither would most of the conductors. But the only complete orchestral performances we shall hear will be from orchestras which know all of thir music long before they play it to us. The only one of that kind in the country is the Boston orchestra. If the Philadelphia orchestra retains its present level of proficiency and is sometime conducted by a man who will rule it instead of having it rule him, it will be another. If Szell and Reiner stay in their present posts for a long enough time, they too may produce something of the kind. There are no others in sight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 10 1947

Boston Symphony Ends Season's Concerts Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last Wednesday evening concert of its local season in Carnegie Hall last evening. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, offered an all-Brahms program, consisting of the Academic Festival Overture, the Alto Rhapsody, with Carol Brice as soloist, the Haydn-Brahms Variations and the Fourth Symphony. Robert Shaw prepared the male chorus for the Rhapsody.

The music pleased the large throng, which applauded the performances with considerable gusto.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 7 - 1947

Here Tuesday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Tuesday evening will mark the final event of the Bushnell Symphony Series with the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its own conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

His program, one of the most interesting yet offered in the series: Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" played in memory of the late Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns, cofounder of Bushnell Memorial; Rachmaninoff Third Symphony; Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and "La Mer"," by Debussy.

From 8:30 to 9:30 the orchestra will be heard over the American Broadcasting Company coast-to-coast network

---

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

BY THE time I began to suspect that Victor's March records had gone astray the April records had arrived. They include one of Bach's greatest choral works, the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden," which the Orféo Catalá of Barcelona sang in a recording that has long been out of print, and which now is sung—in German, as it should be—by Robert Shaw's chorus with a small orchestra (Set 1096; $3.75). The performance is good, and seems to have been well-recorded, but comes off the records with disturbing Symphony No. 5, performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Set 1095; $5.85). The performance is excellent, even with Koussevitzky's characteristically slower tempos in the slow portions which cause me to prefer Rodzinski's performance. The sound of the Boston Symphony is reproduced with warmth and luster that are lacking in the recorded sound of the New York Philharmonic, which however has clarity and distinctness that are lacking in the recorded sound of the Boston Symphony. And the Boston Symphony performance comes off the records with the disturbing noises of very poor surfaces.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1947

Koussevitzky Brings Seaso on to Close

By JOHN B. GROSS

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was presented in the last concert of the Bushnell Symphonic Series Tuesday night. The program:

Vocalise	Rachmaninoff
In Memoriam, Mary Bushnell Hillyer Seaverns
Symphony in A Minor, No. 3	Rachmaninoff
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	Brahms
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques	Debussy

No more fitting tribute to the late Mary Bushnell Hillyer Seaverns, co-founder of the Bushnell Memorial, could be made than the presentation of Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise" by Dr. Koussevitzky last evening.

His control of that superb instrument, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lifted those moments into an experience of rare and somber beauty. The violins played with a seraphic transparency against a tapestry of sound, their conductor obviously moved as he made this farewell to a friend and benefactor.

From the first note of the program the evening thus became one of dedication, a splendid close to the formal symphony season.

* * *

THERE IS no denying the emotional impact produced when in the presence of great art. The musicologist may cavel over precise beat and phrasing, but when one is favored with Brahms' giant masterpiece, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, as interpreted last evening there is little one can say. From the crisp, incisive statement of the theme, to the last soaring wealth of sound, it was something one lived rather than so many notes on paper. We doubt if Brahms ever heard his own composition, other than inwardly, in more magical guise.

Debussy's "La Mer" has long been a familiar of the Boston Symphony's reportoire, but with each hearing fresh wonders are revealed.

The undulant rhythms, the flashing moods, the high white harmonics of strings against harp glissandi continually maze the listener with their changing emphases. It is one of those rare compositions to which the listener can bring nothing and still be swept away by the genius of its inventiveness.

* * *

ON REHEARING, we continue to find Rachmaninoff's third symphony interesting only in part. Compared to the concerti it seems labored and self conscious, as if the Slav temperament were held in leash by an harmonic Five Year Plan. We like the Adagio non Troppo with its violin solo of the first theme. Dr. Koussevitzky read this movement with especial subtlety.

There are many conductors who inspire admiration and respect, but Dr. Koussevitzky impells an exceedingly rare response—something close to reverence. What a clean and satisfying thing it is to listen to a master whose daily habit is excellence, to find the marriage of composer and performance the complete harmony it is meant to be.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 10 1947

BRAHMS PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Symphony in Tribute to Composer—Brice and Chorus Are Heard

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is payin its respects to Brahms in its fina New York concerts of the seaso this week. The occasion, of course is that this year marks the fiftieth anniversary of Brahms' death. Not that such an excuse is required to put on a Brahms program. But anniversaries in round numbers are an amiable tradition, and they sweeten the life of a conductor who has many programs to make each season.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians did not stray far afield from the expected works at Carnegie Hall last night. There were the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Variations on a Theme of Haydn and the Fourth Symphony. These are standard Brahms offerings. Less often heard is the Rhapsody for Contralto Solo, Male Chorus and Orchestra, and this work had a performance of somber splendor.

The soloist was Carol Brice, the American contralto, whose voice is a noble instrument, comparable to that of Marian Anderson some years ago. Miss Brice is young, and her singing has not yet the emotional depth and insight it will have some years from now. But it is a voice of majestic size and fullness, rich in color and wide in range. Miss Brice has a tendency to slid into tones in the upper part of th voice, but it is a fault that can b corrected. In a work like th Brahms Rhapsody, the dark-hue grandeur of the voice made a dee impression.

A large male chorus from th Collegiate Chorale, of which Rob ert Shaw is the director, sang wit its accustomed command of re fined nuances, adding measurabl to the quality of the performanc And the Bostonians did their shar handsomely.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the eve ning with the overture which wa burnished until it gleamed. Th Variations were played with pr cision and with the transparent o chestral tone that is a hallmark the Boston Symphony. As for th Fourth Symphony, it has long bee one of Mr. Koussevitzky's f vorites. He conducted it with an i candescence that might have l one to forget that he and this o chestra had played it many, man times in their years together.

H. T.

4/9/47

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

The Pops

By CYRUS DURGIN

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra began the 62d season of Pops at Symphony Hall last evening. Once again there was a large audience, in search of light musical entertainment, to applaud conductor, orchestra and every number and encore on an evening-long program. Over the week-end past, Symphony Hall had undergone its usual Winter-to-Spring transformation: the lower walls of the auditorium had been washed over with a cool green; the rows of seats on the floor had been moved out and green tables and gold chairs moved in; there were ash trays on the tables, and waitresses to take orders for light refreshments. On the stage, the orchestra had dispensed with the graduated stages of the Winter season and were sitting on a level. The conductor's stand once again was banked with gladioli.

The musical principle of the Pops is to feature old favorite numbers drawn from the light classics, and to intersperse them with modern novelties and popular tunes. For beginning, accordingly, there was the first of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, that imposing and rhythmically swinging number that everyone can sing or at least hu Next, instead of an overture, ca a collection of piano pieces co posed by Rossini and orchestrat by the contemporary English co poser, Benjamin Britten, under th title of "Matinees Musicales." Thes form a complement to last season "Soirees Musicales," which als were Rossini piano pieces don up for orchestra by Mr. Britten One of the "Matinees Musicales" has a fetching subtitle: "Solfeggi Gorgheggi," which, in a free translation, means "Scale Passages and Twittering."

HE BOSTON DAILY GLOB

Probably there never has been a Pops concert without a waltz, and Heaven forbid that there ever should be one. Last night's obeisance to the "three-dance" was "Music of the Spheres," by Josef Strauss, two-years-younger brother of Johann Jr., the "Waltz King." Then followed Gillis' indigenous "Ranch House Party," and, for the most solid music of the evening, Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

After "Finlandia," by Sibelius, this Pops opening became progressively more informal. The roaring "Orizaba," which is part of Dmitri Tiomkin's score for the film "Duel In the Sun" (opening May 8 at Loew's State and Orpheum Theatres), was followed by a potpourri from last season's musical hit, "Annie Get Your Gun." This last was all very good fun except that Mr. Fiedler took "Doin' What Comes Naturally" at such a fast tempo that the tune was hardly natural. The encore immediately afterward, Leroy Anderson's "Old McDonald Had a Farm," suggested tht Spike Jones had taken up arranging for the Pops. By this time orchestra and audience were out of the light classics and deep in the groove, so there was practically no amazement at "Open the Door, Richard," which seemed to have been mixed up with the Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin" and Dave Rose's "Holiday for Strings," plus other condiments. Anderson's "Fiddle-Faddle" (which sounds it) and Morton Gould's "American Salute" finished the evening.

Since other cities have taken up the Pops idea, perhaps we can no longer call these concerts unique. But, by golly, we certainly have the best of them.

Kouss Ends
Seaso

Program
Memoria
Mary B.

[149]

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 10 1947

Koussevitzky Ends Concert Season Here

Program Includes Memorial Tribute to Mary B. H. Seaverns

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the final concert of the Bushnell Memorial Series Tuesday night. The program:

Vocalise	Rachmaninoff
Symphony No. 3	Rachmaninoff
Variations On a Theme By Haydn	Brahms
La Mer	Debussy

The playing of Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise" in memory of Mrs. Charles F. T. Seaverns at the Bushnell Memorial last evening, must have led many persons to reflect on how still and small the voice of music would have been in Hartford, had it not been for her and her mother, Dotha Bushnell Hillyer. First planned by Mrs. Hillyer and then carried to fruition by Mrs. Seaverns, the Bushnell Memorial has enabled this city to be one of the musically-privileged in the country. While the performance of the "Vocalise" by Serge Koussevitzky and The Boston Symphony Orchestra was indeed appropriate tribute, it is even more gratifying to realize that all the great music which may be played there in the future will be a continuing monument to the devotion of Mrs. Seaverns and her mother both to that sublimating art and to this community.

Uninspired Playing.

In view of the occasion, it was too bad that the concert itself could not have been one of the memorable events we have had so frequently from Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra. It was not. Actually, it was what might be called routine in a big way. Not that the conductor wasn't all set for a tremendous performance. He had programed two vivid works in the Rachmaninoff symphony and "La Mer," and even in "Vocalise" he seemed surcharged with excitement, tingling with tension and eager to squeeze every emotion from the evening's fare.

But though he attempted during the course of the night to call almost every separate player to account, and to bring a surge and incandescence from every page, he semed unable to communicate this fervor to the orchestra. His mood appears to have been plainer even to the audience than the players, for there was considerable comment on the animation of his conducting. But it was a case where the orchestra view the world moderato, and he, molto agitato. They fiddled while he burned. Even "La Mer," one of the greatest things the Boston Symphony ever does, ran little higher than the Connecticut in a spring freshet, except for the sudden outburst at the close, as if the idea of going home had given the men a sudden lift.

The Rachmaninoff was being played here for the first time. Persons who had heard the composer himself conduct it, said they felt Mr. Koussevitzky's version was generally a more dramatic one. They also declared, incidentally, that portions of the third and fourth movement were omitted last night. In any event, it was an ultra-romantic dish as the Boston conductor served it up and it is plainly a vastly rhapsodic composition for anybody. It is filled with Slavic pictures, some folkish as in Sibelius, some glittering fancies as in Rimsky-Korsakov, and many deeply personal in the Rachmaninoff temper which ranges the febrile, the introspective and the quixotic. The writing itself is immensly variegated within the customary Rachmaninoff solidity, compactness. Yet despite its invention, imagination and vividness, there is a certain neurotic quality about it that does not make one over anxious to hear it again immediately.

It was very pleasant to hear the cheerful Brahms Variations again. Where Arturo Toscanini favors the writing for the woodwinds and brass and thus fosters a Haydnish clarity in them, Mr. Koussevitzky loves best the strings and so makes a broad, sunny, rich little tapestry, Brahms-uppermost. Your choice, no two alike. T. H. P.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 10 1947

The Bostonians

Carol Brice and Collegiate Chorale in Brahms Works

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, music director; last concert of its evening series at Carnegie Hall yesterday, with Carol Brice, contralto, and a men's chorus from the Collegiate Chorale (Robert Shaw, director), in the following program of music by Johannes Brahms:

Academic Festival Overture
Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 53
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98

In commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Johannes Brahms, Serge Koussevitzky is devoting all three programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last New York visit of the season to that eminent composer's music. Yesterday evening's concert at Carnegie Hall presented three works which have been long and deservedly entrenched in the standard repertoire, and also the less frequently heard but hardly unfamiliar Rhapsody on Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter." This work, usually and more briefly designated as the Alto Rhapsody, will also be performed by Miss Brice, the men of the Collegiate Chorale and the orchestra tomorrow night in Brooklyn and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The last performance here of the Rhapsody by a major orchestra was given by the Philadelphians three year ago, with Marian Anderson as the soloist. The work wears well, both musically and emotionally; the instrumental and vocal color of the score reproduce and enhance the contrasted expressive hues of the three verses taken from Goethe's poem. The performance was well proportioned in its balance of solo vocal, choral and instrumental sonorities, and persuasive interpretatively. The text was sung in English.

Miss Brice sang with emotional conviction, with an impressive volume and basic quality of tone. This is a voice of unusual caliber and promise; its use on this occasion suggested a need for more consistent clarity and concentration of tone and clearer English enunciation to make its assets fully realized. The chorus sang well, and its director, Robert Shaw, shared the applause with Miss Brice and Dr. Koussevitzky.

The program was well selected as to contrast, with works representing different periods in Brahms's activity in the orchestral field. The Academic Festival Overture had a high-spirited interpretation; the Haydn Variations were performed with notable lucidity. Tonal opulence and interpretative eloquence, along with a few idiosyncracies in regard to tempi, characterized the performance of the Fourth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 10 1947

Brice Is Soloist In Brahms Score

Another tribute to Brahms, in this fiftieth year since his death, was paid in Carnegie Hall last night, this time by the Boston Symphony. Directed by Serge Koussevitzky, they rediscovered the "Academic Festival" Overture, "Haydn Variations," Fourth Symphony and Alto Rhapsody. Carol Brice was soloist in the latter, assisted by a male chorus from Robert Shaw's Collegiate Chorale.

Miss Brice was in sumptuous voice for the occasion. In many respects hers is a glorious instrument, colorfully produced throughout its wide range. These characteristics are particularly fit for the somber measures of this work. Sometimes she would break the line in wide intervals and her enunciation (the music was sung in English) was indistinct, but the feeling for the idiom was always present. The choral background was properly placed—subdued when necessary, brilliantly to the fore at moments of climax. Robert Shaw shared a bow with soloist and conductor at the work's conclusion.

The perfection of the orchestra dominated the "Academic Festival" Overture. This was a sharp, clear reading, with a few novel twists in the brass section. Koussevitzky can find inner lines where no other conductor can, and he likes to bring them out. In this case he conducted with a vigor that resulted in some magnificently rich sounds. The symphony and "Haydn Variations," both familiar to Boston Symphony hearers, received customary treatment. H. C. S.

MONTGOMERY, ALA
TRIBUNE
4/11/47

Carol Brice Snubbed In Boston Hotel

NEW YORK, N. Y. —(SNS)— Carol Brice, the brilliant young Negro contralto winner of the Naumberg Award, was subjected to an embarrassing experience at breakfast Saturday morning at the Copley Plaza Hotel in Boston, Mass., where she was allowed to sit unserved over a period of time and finally had to speak to the head waiter who then sat her in an uninhabited corner of the dining room.

The great young singer, who recently appeared in Atlanta, is in Boston appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of Johannes Brahms' death. Neil Scott, her personal representative, reported the incident to the press.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
News
APR 11 1947

Boston Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads Brahms Program at Mosque for Griffith Music Foundation

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took place last night at the Mosque Theater and gave the season an admirable sense of completion. Playing an all-Brahms program, the veteran orchestra was the target for salvos of applause from an audience that filled the hall to capacity. Present were most of this area's musicians.

Once again Griffith Music Foundation, sponsor of the event, is to be congratulated for its labors in the rewarding cause of musical enlightenment and pleasure. There must have been a special sense of fulfillment for the foundation in the fact that dozens had to be turned away for lack of room.

This reviewer went to the Mosque with no great sense of expectancy. After all, a program containing nothing more than two symphonies of Brahms seemed like cold comfort. One symphony and a serenade, overture or the "Haydn" Variations" would have been more appetizing.

The first half of the program was a case in point. The symphony here was the Third in F Major, a curiously shattered and discontinuous piece of musical composition. The string tone was marvelous in its warmth and feeling and the other instruments followed along properly. Yet the atmosphere was one of somnolence and fatigue, a state of affairs that reached its climax in the very last chord. Here the signals got mixed, the orchestral choirs came in at different times and Dr. Koussevitzky turned to the violins with what one wag described as Steely Glance No. 3.

Sensuous

But no matter what went on before the intermission, after it came the flooding, refulgent glory of the C Minor Symphony. As if to recompense, the grand old man on the podium and his wonderful group played the symphony better than we ever have heard it done. The tone and tempo were frenetic in their urgency. Rhythms were rapped out as if by a gigantic drum. The sensuously passionate measures of the slow movement glowed. Best of all was the finale's rapt painting of an Alpine scene, with horn and flute sounding against shimmering strings, and the affirmative stride of the greatest of Brahms's themes.

It was a triumph of creative interpretation for Dr. Koussevitzky. The 72-year-old Russian maestro, growing more sparing of gesture with each passing season, gave bountiful proof of his orchestra's right to being placed among the foremost in the world, if further proof were needed.

The program left this observer yearning for future performances here by the orchestra that might include some of the famous Koussevitzkian readings of Debussy, Ravel, Wagner and Bach.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
CALL

APR 11 1947

Carol Brice Embarrassed in Boston Hotel

BOSTON. — Carol Brice, brilliant young contralto who was here to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra, was subjected to an embarrassing experience at breakfast Saturday morning, April 5, in the Copley Plaza hotel. She was allowed to sit in the dining room for nearly an hour unserved.

When finally she spoke to the head waiter, he moved her to an uninhabited corner of the dining room.

The young singer, whose voice has been acclaimed by critics the country over, came here to appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra on a program commemorating the 50th anniversary of the death of Johannes Brahms.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 11 1947

The Bostonians

Carol Brice and Collegiate Chorale in Brahms Works

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, music director; last concert of its evening series at Carnegie Hall Wednesday, with Carol Brice, contralto, and a men's chorus from the Collegiate Chorale (Robert Shaw, director), in the following program of music by Johannes Brahms:

Academic Festival Overture
Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 53
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98

In commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Johannes Brahms, Serge Koussevitzky is devoting all three programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last New York visit of the season to that eminent composer's music. Wednesday night's concert at Carnegie Hall presented three works which have been long and deservedly entrenched in the standard repertoire, and also the less frequently heard but hardly unfamiliar Rhapsody on Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter." This work, usually and more briefly designated as the Alto Rhapsody, will also be performed by Miss Brice, the men of the Collegiate Chorale and the orchestra tonight in Brooklyn and tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The last performance here of the Rhapsody by a major orchestra was given by the Philadelphians three year ago, with Marian Anderson as the soloist. The work wears well, both musically and emotionally; the instrumental and vocal color of the score reproduce and enhance the contrasted expressive hues of the three verses taken from Goethe's poem. The performance was well proportioned in its balance of solo vocal, choral and instrumental sonorities, and persuasive interpretatively. The text was sung in English.

Miss Brice sang with emotional conviction, with an impressive volume and basic quality of tone. This is a voice of unusual caliber and promise; its use on this occasion suggested a need for more consistent clarity and concentration of tone and clearer English enunciation to make its assets fully realized. The chorus sang well, and its director, Robert Shaw, shared the applause with Miss Brice and Dr. Koussevitzky.

The program was well selected as to contrast, with works representing different periods in Brahms's activity in the orchestral field. The Academic Festival Overture had a high-spirited interpretation; the Haydn Variations were performed with notable lucidity. Tonal opulence and interpretative eloquence, along with a few idiosyncracies in regard to tempi, characterized the performance of the Fourth Symphony.

Bernstein and Shaw Invited To Conduct at Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky has invited Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw to be guest conductors of the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer. Mr. Bernstein and Mr. Shaw will be members of the faculty for the Berkshire Music Center, which wil be in session at the orchestra's summer home during July and early August.

The opening concert on July 13 by an orchestra of chamber music proportions will be devoted to the music of Bach and the second concert on July 20 that of Mozart.

In the first series of concerts (July 24, 26 and 27) for full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Copland's Third Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Barber's Overture "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse" and Martinu's Concerto Grosso.

Miss Ruth Posselt will be the soloist for the Hindemith Concerto and William Primrose for the Berlioz work.

The second weekend, July 31 and Aug. 2 and 3, will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle, followed on Aug. 5 by a performance of the Ninth Symphony in an extra concert.

In the final series, Aug. 7, 9 and 10, will be played a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem, with chorus and soloists.

Information and subscriptions may be obtained from the Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 12 1947

The P

LAST OF THE SERIES

The Boston Symphony Concert Left Much to Be Desired

To the Editor of The Courant:

Tuesday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which should have formed a fitting close to such a brilliant symphonic series, seems to have fallen flat for more reasons than one.

There can be no denying that the exquisite and poignantly-beautiful "Vocalise" of Rachmaninoff should have formed a fitting tribute to the late and beloved Mrs. Seaverns. But something seems to have gone wrong. In the second half of the piece, there were two wrong entries, perhaps unnoticed by most listeners. I wondered if one of these would have possibly upset the whole applecart: Fortunately, it didn't. No doubt Dr. Koussevitzky put all he had into the piece, but there was something lacking. It's a shame, too, because I could picture Mrs. Seaverns among us, reveling in the beauty of that little movement.

As to the Symphony No. 3, of Rachmaninoff, which continued the program, something was also lacking. I happen to own the original recording of this Symphony, by the Philadelphia orchestra, with the late composer conducting. In the Koussevitzky reading on Tuesday evening, there seemed to be lacking a certain amount of what we would ordinarily call "pep." Also, for some unknown reason, the Director cut the final movement. It was quite noticeable to one who knows the work as intimately as I do. To my way of thinking, the two parts of the "Vocalise" might have been played without repetition. I realize that radio entered into this thing, but even at that the program ought to have been so arranged as to avoid cutting of the finale of the Symphony.

I Disagree

I am in complete disagreement with The Courant's regular reviewer: This particular Symphony can bear repeated hearings. Its formal construction should not be passed up. It would be interesting to compare the Second and Third Symphonies of Mr. Rachmaninoff. Both are fine; both have their faults; but both also have their great strength. The Third Symphony is as different from the Second as day from night, or nearly so. I think there are more dramatic movements in the Third than in the Second Symphony. Also, Mr. Rachmaninoff has employed a device first used by Cesar Franck,—that is, the merging of a "Scherzo" with his "Slow" movement. There is much more orchestral coloring in the Third Symphony. If Dr. Koussevitzky wanted to cut the third movement,—if it had to be cut at all,—why didn't he use better judgment? Now, an admission: I think the third movement of this Symphony was the weakest part of the entire work.

As to the remainder of the program, what need we say? The Brahms Variations can only be played one way,—conventionally,—and Dr. Koussevitzky did that admirably. I didn't stay for the Debussy, as that can be heard on records whenever one wishes. But again I say, something was wrong with the orchestra. I wish we might have an explanation. Can it be that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is tiring of Hartford?

JOHN J. DUFFY.

Hartford.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 13 1947

RECORDS: WORKS BY LEADING LIVING COMPOSERS

Barber, Piston, Britten, Prokofieff and Sibelius Represented in New Releases

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SOME of the leading living composers of several countries are represented in the latest batch of new recordings. The quality of this music is an indication that the standard of output in recent years has not been something to be ashamed of. It shows that good music, and perhaps some great music, is still being composed.

Beginning with our own composers, there are works by Samuel Barber and Walter Piston. Mr. Barber's Capricorn Concerto, released by Concert Hall Society in its limited edition, is played by the Saidenburg Little Symphony, with Daniel Saidenburg conducting and Julius Baker, Harry Freistadt and Mitchell Miller as instrumental soloists. Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, with E. Power Biggs as organ soloist.

After listening to Mr. Barber's concerto several times on disks, I have revised my opinion of the work. When I heard it in the concert Hall I admired the tightness of its structure and the economy and shrewdness of its instrumentation but I did not care for its ideas. The material improves on acquaintance. If Mr. Barber is leaving the broad, romantic world of his earlier compositions, that is his privilege. Writing in a style that reflects more of his contemporaries, he remains a composer of individuality and taste. This recording does well by the work.

Mr. Piston's brief work, recorded on a single Victor twelve-inch disk, is also written knowingly and with economy of means. It has clarity, makes its points cogently and mixes orchestra and organ effectively. A neat, precise piece of work, recorded in similar vein.

Benjamin Britten, one of Britain's most accomplished young composers, may be sampled in Decca's FFRR album of Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, performed by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra with the composer conducting and with Peter Pears, tenor, and Dennis Brain, horn player, as soloists. Mr. Britten has taken poems by Cotton, Tennyson, Blake, Jonson, Keats and an anonymous fifteenth century writer and has woven them together, by means of the unity of his themes and instrumental bridges, into a well-knit and personal composition. The mood varies between somber and mellow, for the most part. The music knows where it is going and it has character. The recording is first rate.

Russia's finest composer, Prokofieff, is represented by the Symphony No. 5 and the Piano Concerto No. 3. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the symphony a vital, spacious performance (Victor, five twelve-inch records). The recent performance on disks by Artur Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was good, but the Bostonians seem to have a shade the better of it. As for the symphony itself, it remains one of the most impressive works of our time. The composer's early concerto, played with snap and gusto by the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra of Philadelphia, with Dimitri Mitropoulos doubling as conductor and piano soloist (Columbia, three twelve-inch records) has youthful vitality but it is shallow compared with the symphony.

Finally, there is Sibelius, still among the living, even if his Symphony No. 4 is more than thirty-five years old. It is played clearly and spaciously by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Rodzinski (Columbia, four twelve-inch records). Here is a work once described as bleak and northern. Heard after more recent works it seems warm and romantic.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK
WORLD
4/13/47

Carol Brice Snubbed In Boston Hotel

NEW YORK, N. Y. —(SNS)— Carol Brice, the brilliant young Negro contralto winner of the Naumberg Award, was subjected to an embarrassing experience at breakfast Saturday morning at the Copley Plaza Hotel in Boston, Mass. where she was allowed to sit unserved over a period of time and finally had to speak to the head waiter who then sat her in an uninhabited corner of the dining room.

The great young singer, who recently appeared in Atlanta, is in Boston appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of Johannes Brahms' death. Neil Scott, her personal representative, reported the incident to the press.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 13 1947

Boston Symphony

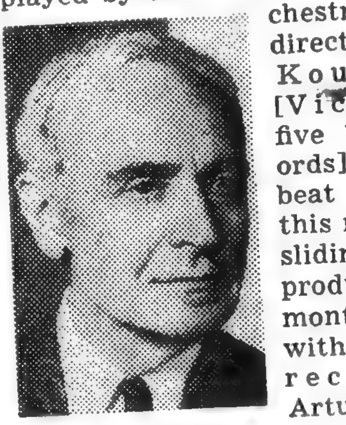
Firkusny to be Soloist; Brahms Music Listed

Rudolf Firkusny, pianist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony next Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. He will play the Brahms Concerto, No. 1, in D minor. The program will also include Bach's Suite in D major, No. 3, and "Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Strauss.

On Tuesday, April 22, Mr. Koussevitzky will present the Brahms Requiem with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. The season will close on April 25 and 26 with performances of Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth Symphonies.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 13 1947

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky [Victor M-1095; five 12 inch records]. Columbia beat Victor on this release by sliding under the production wire a month or so ago with a brilliant recording by Artur Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic, tho this symphony had been practically Mr. Koussevitzky's American property in terms of initial, not to say sumptuous, performance. So now we have two distinguished albums featuring one of the more effective contemporary scores. But the Boston orchestra is the Boston orchestra, and unique in our time. That confetti gay scherzo sound just about as delightful as when the visiting Bostonians played it a year ago in Orchestra hall.



Serge Koussevitzky

• • •

Chopin Waltzes, Volume I., played by Jacques Abram [Musicraft 76; three 12 inch records]. Fast, accurate, flashy, splashy and cheap playing of these waltzes: A flat, Opus 32, No. 1; A minor, Opus 34, No. 2. C sharp minor, Opus 64, No. 2; E flat, Opus 18; A flat, Opus 64, No. 3; D flat, Opus 64, No. 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 13 1947

BRAHMS THIRD LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Ends Season With Stirring Performance of Symphony at Carnegie

By OLIN DOWNES

There has often been discussion of the "right" tempo of the opening movement of Brahms' Third Symphony, which began the final New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the end of its Brahms observances of the season, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky stirred us very much by the pace at which he took the movement, one properly representative of the marking, "Allegro con brio," and especially suited to the projection of the lightning flash of the initial theme. Later in the movement the tempo became more elastic than in the opening part, fortunately free of retards or changes of pace. The movement was molded superbly by the conductor, who had only to command to see his utmost wish realized by the glorious orchestra.

But the first movement is not characteristic of the entire symphony. The two middle movements are almost chamber music. They are in parenthesis, as it were, between the spaciousness and splendor of the first movement and the finale. As such they were treated with the poetical insight that their contents ask of the perceptive interpreter. The last pages seldom fail to make the throat tighten, as the fierce energy of the lightning theme, heard first in minor, is transformed into a golden reflection in the major key and the shimmering figures of the strings. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with a special solicitude for its innermost quality, which is of romantic beauty rather than of classical architectonics.

The symphony was followed by Carol Brice's appearance in the Brahms Rhapsody for contralto solo, chorus and orchestra, which, performed by the same artists last Wednesday night, made such an excellent impression. There is no need to review again Miss Brice's capacities as singer and artist. She was called many times back to the stage, led there by Dr. Koussevitzky, who also brought on Robert Shaw, conductor of the Collegiate Chorale, for recognition of his work in preparing the singers.

Dr. Koussevitzky concluded the concert with the epical "First" of Brahms which he projected with immense effect. But perhaps "effect" is a misleading word. The performance lay so much deeper than passing "effect." Especially in the slow movement it pierced to the center of the music. The corollary to this lofty mood was the exultant finale and its proclamation of faith. The audience applauded and cheered as Dr. Koussevitzky, repeatedly returning to the stage, took leave for the summer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 13 1947

Boston Symphony Heard

Brahms Program at Carnegie Hall Ends 61st N. Y. Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its sixty-first New York season with another all-Brahms program yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Alto Rhapsody, which had appeared on last Wednesday night's program in the same hall, was repeated, with Carol Brice once again appearing as the contralto soloist and a men's chorus from Robert Shaw's Collegiate Chorale collaborating with the orchestra.

In other respects the program was different from Wednesday's. It included the first and third symphonies.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 14 1947

Brahms Alto Rhapsody

Variation on the theme of Brahms came with the inclusion of the Alto Rhapsody in the final program of the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. This work is far less frequently heard than the Third and First Symphonies which completed the program. Carol Brice was the soloist.

In quality and caliber Miss Brice has an unusually fine voice. It still suggests promise rather than fulfillment. It blended beautifully with the Men's Chorus of the Collegiate Chorals, and the tonal richness of the orchestra.

The Third Symphony fared better than the First. Both were played with all the glory of sound that the Bostonians can create under the searching leadership of Koussevitzky.

• • •

Repeating for the most part last Thursday's all-Russian program, the Philharmonic-Symphony closed its 105th season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It embarks on its most extensive tour today, filling a 28-concert schedule in 24 cities. Stokowski will conduct the first 11 concerts; the remainder will be directed by Eugene Ormandy, George Szell, and Dimitri Mitropoulos.

---

ment.

app 16 - Mon

Honegger for Tanglewood

Arthur Honegger has accepted the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Berkshire Music Center, to take charge of the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, together with Aaron Copland. The Swiss composer has not visited this country since 1929. The school will open July 1.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

APR 15 1947

INTERVIEW DIRECTOR EISENSTEIN BY PHONE

Boston Movie Critics Hold 30 Minute Talk With Russian in Moscow

BOSTON, April 14-Æ-In a 30-minute telephone call to Moscow, Boston movie critics today interviewed Russian film director Sergei Eisenstein and learned that he is a Hollywood fan.

His current favorites are "The Kid From Brooklyn" and Jimmie Stewart's "It's A Wonderful Life." He saw the pictures at the American Embassy.

"I like the fine human touches," said Eisenstein, who was invited to Hollywood in the early 30s to direct films, but departed without ever having made one.

Today's far-flung press party was arranged by Movie Theater Manager George Kraska. He will cpen the first New England showing of Eisenstein's latest film, "Ivan the Terrible," tomorrow.

Also on hand today was Russian-born Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had hoped to congratulate his old friend Sergei Prokofieff, who composed the score for the film.

Eisenstein reported that the composer had been ill and is away from Moscow just now.

Another surprise guest at the 6,000-mile telephone interview was the Russian director's old pupil, the American author Jay Leyda, who translated Eisenstein's volume "The Film Sense."

Eisenstein, who also has been ailing, said he hoped to finish the second part of "Ivan The Terrible" by September.

"Much of it will be in color," he promised. "I am very excited about that."

Eisenstein, who began his career shortly after the Russian revolution with "Potemkin" and "Ten Days That Shook The World"—both based on events that led up to it—still likes making historial films "of any period."

The basic idea of "Ivan the Terrible" is that the 16th century Czar "was the unifier of his country," he pointed out, "and I hope that will appeal to the United States, as well as Russia."

Asked if he planned another visit here, Eisenstein quipped: "Would you be friendly to me? I am not from Greece or Turkey!"

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

APR 15 1947

FAMOUS BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL COME TO CITY

The 100-piece Boston Symphony orchestra, generally regarded as the finest music organization of its kind in the world, has been contracted for a concert here Dec. 6 as one of the feature attractions on the Civic Music association program for next season, it was announced today. This will mark its first appearance in South Bend and culminates more than two years of negotiations in an effort to secure it.

The popularity of the Boston Symbphony is evidenced by the fact that annually more requests are received from Civic Music members for its appearance here than for any other concert attraction, according to Irvin S. Dolk, chairman of the talent committee.

This orchestra plays a complete season in Boston, plus a concert series every other week in New York city and a summer series in the Berkshires. It has time for only the briefest of tours with an extremely limited number of dates that are so eagerly sought the organization could play many times over the engagements it can accept.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

APR 17 1947

Boston Orchestra Will Play Henry Cowell's Symphony

Henry Cowell, one of the outstanding figures in contemporary music, revealed Wednesday evening in an interview that his Fourth Symphony, completed last Summer, has just been chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, Dr. Koussevitzky having made the decision "just last Friday."

The noted and prolific American composer (he has written nearly 800 compositions) was in Buffalo to speak on "How to Listen to Contemporary Music" in the Twentieth Century Club under the auspices of the Music Forum for Piano Teachers.

"In practically all contemporary music," Mr. Cowell said, "nine parts are made of unfamiliar musical material. Psychologically, we focus our attention on the unfamiliar tenth part and summarily reject the whole thing.

THIS IS NOT, OF COURSE, conducive to the broadening of our understanding of contemporary music.

"One should try to listen for what is familiar in a piece of modern music. This will, in a sense, orient the listener, so that what is unfamiliar falls into place in the context of the whole. It's something like getting the significance or meaning of the one unfamiliar word in a sentence because you understand all the others. In that way you add to the language, whether of music or of words."

Mr. Cowell played several of his piano pieces after his talk. These works exemplified some of his experiments in the extension of the sound possibilities of the piano.

AMONG THEM WAS "THE Tides of Mananaun," in which tone-clusters — "successions of simultaneous seconds"—are used in the bass to give a "richer, fuller sound to the tides."

Another was the "Aeolian Harp," played directly on the strings of the piano to give "an eerie tone quality suitable to the wind harp." Mr. Cowell also played his "Advertisement," in which he has used dissonant tone-clusters. He is noted, incidentally, for his "unequalled pyrotechnical" performance of this piece.

The composer recalled that he had played a recital of his pieces about 20 years ago in the home of Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey.

Apr 16

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Scholarship Winners

Among the 10 national winners of the John Hancock scholarships for study under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., this summer are Miss Lois Schaefer and Adolph S. Herseth, students at the New England Conservatory of Music, shown above with Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 19 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY LOSES IN BOOK SUIT APPEAL

The Appellate Division unanimously upheld yesterday a decision of Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag refusing to enjoin the publication and distribution of the book "Koussevitzky," a biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, written by Moses Smith.

In upholding Justice Shientag, the higher court said: "Our affirmation of the order should not be construed as a determination by this court that injunctive relief may not be had to restrain the publication of defamatory statements in a proper case. Suffice to say that the record before us does not furnish any proper basis for the granting of a temporary injunction."

Dr. Koussevitzky, in addition to naming the author, had included Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors, as defendants, charging that his right of privacy had been invaded.

In his decision Justice Shientag had said in part:

"The right-of-privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fiction or novelized in character. An examination of the book clearly shows that it is not fictional."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 15 1947

MAKE CALL TO MOSCOW

But Koussevitzky and Friends Had Booked 3 Weeks Ago

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 14—Despite the telephone strike, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a group of friends were able today to talk by long distance telephone with Sergei Eisenstein, Soviet film director, in Moscow.

The call had been planned for 10:30 A. M., but the connection with Moscow was not established until 4:30 P. M., with Mr. Koussevitzky and his friends, including newspaper reporters, speaking from the Hotel Kenmore here. New England is not affected internally by the telephone strike, but the circuits ran through New York, where calls are on an "emergency" basis. A telephone official here explained that the connection was made because the call had been booked three weeks ago.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

APR 14 1947

Bostonians Close With All-Brahms

Brahms' First Symphony was heard again in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, when Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony in its final New York concert of the season. And if I had to choose between the San Franciscans' and the Bostonians' versions of this majestic work, I would choose the latter, if only because I was more greatly moved by it.

For conductor and players were at the very peak of their music-making powers, and the Symphony was invested with a lyric beauty, an emotional breadth and a tonal felicity that quickened the heart while it enchanted the ear. And for truly heavenly music, there was Dr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's discourse of the coda of the last movement of the same composer's Third Symphony earlier in the afternoon.

The third item of an all-Brahms program was the lovely Rhapsody for Alto and Male Chorus, beautifully sung by Carol Brice, accompanied by the orchestra and Robert Shaw's choister's. All in all, it was an uncommonly rewarding concert, as warming and salubrious as the April sunshine outside.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1947

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 23rd regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Firkusny, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Orchestral Suite in D major No. 3 . . . . Bach
Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor Op. 15 . . . . Brahms Tone Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" . . . . Strauss

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was a singularly fine one, with a nicely balanced and contrasted program; and in fact it makes one regret that the season is so nearly over. Bach's Suite, with the celebrated Air, is music of the purest beauty. I suppose the Bach scholars might be inclined to criticize the David orchestration, but it is probably the only way to hear the music at a symphony concert and in a large hall. Anyway it sounded beautiful yesterday and that, after all, is what counts.

Brahms' First Piano Concerto is one of those works which you greatly respect without ever feeling deep affection. You admire the variety, power and originality of the first movement and the touching lament in the adagio. You come away with the sensation of having had solid intellectual fare, but this Concerto would never survive the "desert island" test. If you could only have one Brahms concerto to take with you, who would not take either the Violin or the Second Piano Concerto? You would reject this one respectfully, of course, but it would be something of the cold shoulder just the same.

Mr. Firkusny gave a brilliant rendition of the solo part. Someone, though, should have seen to it that the orchestra was in tune with the piano. Those with ultra-sensitive ears in the audience yesterday must have had rather a trying session. The interpretation otherwise was a fine one, a searching revelation of a difficult score. Mr. Firkusny is new to me, but I am aware that his admirable pianistic talent is not exactly today's news.

After last Tuesday's performance I commented at some length on Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," so there is no need to repeat those observations now. It is the best of the tone poems, the most eloquent, vulgar, luscious, ingenious and opulent. If you dislike it, rest assured that Strauss and all his works are not for you. "Zarathustra" has long been one of Koussevitzky's most stunning war-horses. Whenever he elects to take it out of the stable I shall be on hand to cheer. And if other conductors and orchestras choose to compete in this, my money, for what it is worth, is on the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky. Even though it ends so quietly and mysteriously, "Zarathustra" is one of those pieces which send audiences out into the open air in a daze. This was its effect yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's 8th and 9th Symphonies for the final concert of the season.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 16 1947

Inside Stuff—Orchestras-Music

Names of 10 student winners of the Tanglewood music scholarships offered by the Boston Symphony and its ABC network sponsor, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., were announced last night (15) on the orch's next to last concert of the season under John Hancock's banner. Six of the winners announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, symphony conductor, are young instrumentalists; two are composers and two singers. They'll get tuition and expenses for two months' study at the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts starting June 30. More than 1,000 students submitted entries in the competition.

Six instrumentalists chosen were: Maricarol Hanson, 23, pianist, Minneapolis; Lois Schaefer, 23, flutist, Olympia, Wash.; Kermit D. Moore, 19, 'cellist, Akron; Norman Carol, 18, violinist, Philadelphia; Seymour Lipkin, 20, Detroit (who has been a guest conductor of the Detroit Symphony and Philadelphia Opera Co.), and Adolph S. Herseth, 25, trumpeter, Bertha, Minn.

Other winners were Russell Smith, 19, Alexandria, Va., and Gordon Playman, 25, Minneapolis, both composers; Adele Addison, 21, Springfield, Mass., lyric soprano, and Stanley Kimes, 25, Nokomis, Ill., bass.

[152]

PM MATTER OF MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH Apr 20

THE nearly 700 published compositions of Johannes Brahms were performed in Baltimore this season, under the joint auspices of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and the Peabody Conservatory of Music. Reginald Stewart, who heads them both, deserves the title of world's champion Brahmsite. Such a program puts to shame Boston's season-long observance of the 50th anniversary of Brahms' death, which fell on April 3. The Symphony Orchestra has indeed done its part but other signs of awareness of this significant semi-centenary have been lacking. To be sure, the Conservatory Orchestra did play both the "Tragic" Overture and the Variations on a theme of Haydn, but it might have done that much any year. And I would say off-hand that the recitalists and other concert-givers have been less Brahms-conscious than usual. So if you did want to see—or hear—the job done up brown, Baltimore was the place for you.

As I say, the Symphony's contribution has been fairly extensive, and on Tuesday evening it will bring matters to a climax with a performance of the "German Requiem," the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, baritone, assisting. The Third Symphony showed up locally only at a Tuesday concert. Bruno Walter gave us the Second and Dr. Koussevitzky the First and Fourth, while Leonard Bernstein contributed the Second Serenade. The actual "memorial" program of April 3 and 5 included, in addition to the Fourth Symphony, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Haydn Variations and the Rhapsody with alto solo (Carol Brice) and male chorus. This last is one of Brahms' most moving compositions and I regret that a brief illness kept me from hearing it in its first Boston performance since 1930. Dr. Koussevitzky has also given us the Violin Concerto (Yehudi Menuhin) and last week the First Piano Concerto (Rudolf Firkusny), while at Tanglewood last August he staged a preview with a three-day Brahms Festival.

* * *

If the composer could miraculously be returned to earth he would find himself more highly regarded than he was even during his lifetime, though there were perfervid Brahmsites then, such as Hans von Buelow, who coined that handy one about the three B's (Bach, Beethoven and Brahms), thus putting the last-named in company where, for all his greatness, he didn't quite belong. He himself knew better. For Beethoven and Mozart he had a wholesome respect and his humbleness in their figurative presence was one of the few winning things about him. Personally he was a bit of a curmudgeon, hiding his native shyness beneath a bearish exterior.

* * *

Not only has Brahms' popularity increased enormously, the prevailing notion regarding him has changed materially. It is difficult to believe that Philip Hale could have found his music "granitic." And there were many who breathed assent when he said that Symphony Hall should have a sign, "Exit in case of Brahms."

Our admiration instinctively goes out to the adventurer, the pioneer, the trail-blazer; but such artists are sometimes unsure of their paths. They stumble and falter. Brahms was more prudent. He looked not forward but backward. Mere opportunists jump on the current bandwagon and sometimes find themselves carried down the wrong street. Brahms took a long-range view. He saw where lay the eternal verities, in such classics as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart, and he realized that the romanticism of Schumann would make an excellent leaven for this formal loaf.

Yet it would be grossly unfair to call Brahms just a "copycat," for all his disturbing reminiscences. If his music is a synthesis, and an extremely adroit one, it still contains enough that is original to give it true validity. And in these days, when "get famous quick" is no less popular than "get rich quick," we cannot but admire his quest for perfection, which he held to be more important even than beauty. Our standards of beauty change, and sometimes with great rapidity. A good job remains a good job, and Brahms, a master craftsman, one of the very best, if perhaps not one of the very greatest composers, always did a good job. For that he has reaped his reward—that and his aforesaid ability to fuse the classic and romantic elements in a product that many now find more palatable than either one of them straight.

Nevertheless, he did not compose for posterity, but simply did what he thought was right, firmly expecting that his music would not long survive. Moreover, in the turbulent times in which he lived, it took courage to be a reactionary.

* * *

The Bach Circle of Boston will give its annual festival at Jordan Hall this week. Tomorrow evening Karl Geiringer will lecture and Ralph Kirkpatrick will play the harpischord. On Tuesday evening the Bach Circle chorus and orchestra, Richard W. Ellsasser, conductor, will give a concert with soloists.

MUSIC Apr 19

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

A solidly German program including two of the classic B's furnishes the music for the last pair of concerts but one, this season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It begins with the Suite No. 3, in D major, of Bach, and continues with the Brahms D minor Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

From every point of view, Mr. Firkusny's performance of the Brahms Concerto was as fine as any I can remember. This is a curious work, hard and granitic in some pages, lush and sentimental in others. The orchestration is decidedly immature and no matter how fine the orchestra and how hard they work, Brahms' fumbling treatment really does not "sound."

The Concerto requires, then, a pianist of solid technical attainments and thorough-going musicianship, an artist of both intellect and feeling, who knows the appropriate style. If it is played bluntly the Concerto can seem duller than it is in certain of its pages. If it is played with just the right nuances, the proper tempi and a shrewd and calculating sense of tone and emphasis, then music and soloist both emerge triumphant.

That is precisely what happened yesterday, for Mr. Firkusny is an artist of parts. When power was demanded, as in the first movement and the beginning of the finale, Mr. Firkusny was powerful. But he never thumped, nor did his tone once get hard. He clothed the solo part with a lyrical, poetic quality.

This Concerto always has been one of Mr. Koussevitzky's excellently-accompanied numbers, too, so that the total result was most enjoyable. Obviously the audience thought so, for they applauded generously.

Bach and Strauss both soared in clouds of orchestral virtuosity. Throughout, the texture was fine of grain, and clear of sound. Take, for example, such a small but important detail as the pizzicato bass in the miscalled "Air on the G String" (which in the original version is not on the G string). You could hear every note of it.

So could you hear the figurations of the gentler instruments, like the clarinets, flute and bassoons, which ripple through much of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The much divided strings, in typical Strauss fashion, were firm and clear, never a soft mush of sonorities. The organ was not quite in tune, but it was more nearly so than on some occasions in the past. From start to finish, a rewarding concert.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 19 1947

BOTH of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concerts last week, taking note of the fiftieth anniversary of Brahms' death, were devoted to his music. Together, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, they included three of his four symphonies, the "Variations on a Haydn Theme," the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Rhapsody for Alto Solo, Male Chorus, and Orchestra. I didn't hear the first concert, on Wednesday evening, but I feel safe in assuming that it was like the Saturday matinée, which was brilliantly played and masterfully conducted. Even the Alto Rhapsody, which can be rather uneventful, had persuasive power under Mr. Koussevitzky's fervent ministrations. Carol Brice gave glowing tone to the solo part.

THE San Francisco Symphony and its conductor, Pierre Monteux, also bowed in the direction of Brahms, with a performance of his First Symphony, at a Carnegie Hall concert last week. In addition, their program introduced Olivier Messiaen's "The Ascension," a set of four movements called "symphonic meditations" by the composer, in which he expresses religious devotion in compact and singularly colorful orchestral terms. Other items of the evening were the Bach-Respighi C-minor Passacaglia and Fugue and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The San Francisco group is an expert, seasoned organization, and it was plain—in spite of some unnecessary noisiness in the early part of the concert, perhaps caused by unfamiliarity with the hall's acoustics—that it is one of our important orchestras. Mr. Monteux's conducting was, as always, distinguished for its clarity, simplicity, sensitivity, and knowledge. —ROBERT A. SIMON

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
APR 26 1947

Koussevitzky Loses, Biog Wins Again

NEW YORK, April 19.—The appellate division of Supreme Court yesterday unanimously unheld the decision of Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag in refusing to stop publication and distribution of a biography of the Boston Symphony Ork fronter, Serge Koussevitzky, by Moses Smith, former Hub music critic. Koussevitzky brought suit last month not only against the author, but also against the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and the distributors, the Arco Publishing Company. He charged that his right of privacy had been invaded.

The appellate division said that its decision "should not be construed as a determination by this court that injunctive relief may not be had to restrain publication of defamatory statements in a proper case," but added that "the record before us does not furnish proper basis for granting the temporary injunction."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 19 1947

Appellate Court Upholds Koussevitzky Publishers

The Appellate Division unanimously upheld yesterday the right of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, of 1 Madison Avenue, to publish and distribute the book "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, Boston music critic, dealing with the life of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky charged that the book invaded his rights of privacy. Justice Bernard L. Sheintag, of the Supreme Court, ruled on March 4 that this was not true of the book and refused to issue an order enjoining its publication. His opinion was appealed to the Appellate Division, which upheld it yesterday.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 20 1947

Harvard Symposium

New Choral Will Be Sung Friday Night, May 2

Robert Shaw will conduct the Collegiate Chorale in new works by Paul Hindemith, Aaron Copland and G. Francesco Malipiero on Friday night, May 2, in the Memorial Church of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. This will be the closing event of the second day of the university's Symposium on Music Criticism. The Hindemith work, "Apparebit Repentina Dies," is based on a medieval Latin text and is scored for mixed chorus and eleven brass instruments.

Mr. Copland's "In the Beginning" takes its text from the Book of Genesis in the Bible and is scored for a capella chorus with mezzo-soprano solo. Malipiero's "La Terra," with a text from Virgil's Georgics, is scored for mixed chorus and organ. Mary Crowley, organist, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the assisting artists.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 20 1947

On the Records

The fifth symphony by Prokofiev is brilliantly executed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, and brilliantly recorded by Victor (10 sides). The effect is somewhat superior to the Rodzinski recording released by Columbia recently. Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the London Philharmonic in excerpts from "The Great Elopement," a ballet constructed by Sir Thomas from excerpts from various works by Handel, rescored (six sides). It is uncommonly pleasant music. Robert Shaw directs the Victor Chorale and Orchestra in Bach's "Christ Lag in Todesbanden" (eight 10-inch sides). The ensemble is excellent, except that the words are seldom intelligible. Artur Rubinstein, pianist, plays the "Pathetique" sonata of Beethoven (four sides). The performance is less deft than that by Rudolph Serkin and the repeat in the first movement has been ignored, presumably to keep the price down; perhaps by playing the slow movement presto, the sonata could be done on one record. On the other hand, Rubinstein's version of the first movement is, so far as it goes, superior in emotional force to Serkin's. The "Moonlight" is elegantly played by Vladimir Horowitz (four sides). Ten-inch single: Home on the Range, Guion; The Last Round-up, Hill, with Robert Merrill, baritone, and Russ Case and orchestra.

The dark and beautiful fourth symphony by Sibelius is admirably played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony, conducted by Artur Rodzinski (Columbia, eight sides). The recording is excellent. Prokofiev's lively and often boisterous third piano concerto is essayed by Dmitri Mitropoulos, as conductor and pianist, and the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra (six sides) The result is entertaining. Isaac Stern, violinist, plays selections from the movie "Humoresque", with an orchestra conducted by Franz Waxman (eight sides). Mr. Stern is a fiddler of great skill; whether he ought to be playing "The Flight of the Bumblebee" in public, I don't know. The music ranges from that to a fantasy on themes from "Tristan". This is probably part of the campaign by the movies, which has done so much for history and literature, to do something for music. Helen Traubel, soprano, sings arias from Italian operas, for which her voice is not well suited (six sides). "Vissi d'arte," "Suicidio," "Ritorna vincitor" and "Sai Chi l'Onore" are among the selections. Original works and arrangements by Morton Gould are conducted by him (eight sides). Among the pieces: Go Down, Moses; American Salute, Cowboy Rhapsody.

G. Y. L.

[153]

Pm

MATTER OF MUSIC

Apr 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE nearly 700 published compositions of Johannes Brahms were performed in Baltimore this season, under the joint auspices of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and the Peabody Conservatory of Music. Reginald Stewart, who heads them both, deserves the title of world's champion Brahmsite. Such a program puts to shame Boston's season-long observance of the 50th anniversary of Brahms' death, which fell on April 3. The Symphony Orchestra has indeed done its part but other signs of awareness of this significant semi-centenary have been lacking. To be sure, the Conservatory Orchestra did play both the "Tragic" Overture and the Variations on a theme of Haydn, but it might have done that much any year. And I would say off-hand that the recitalists and other concert-givers have been less Brahms-conscious than usual. So if you did want to see—or hear—the job done up brown, Baltimore was the place for you.

As I say, the Symphony's contribution has been fairly extensive, and on Tuesday evening it will bring matters to a climax with a performance of the "German Requiem," the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, baritone, assisting. The Third Symphony showed up locally only at a Tuesday concert. Bruno Walter gave us the Second and Dr. Koussevitzky the First and Fourth, while Leonard Bernstein contributed the Second Serenade. The actual "memorial" program of April 3 and 5 included, in addition to the Fourth Symphony, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Haydn Variations and the Rhapsody with alto solo (Carol Brice) and male chorus. This last is one of Brahms' most moving compositions and I regret that a brief illness kept me from hearing it in its first Boston performance since 1930. Dr. Koussevitzky has also given us the Violin Concerto (Yehudi Menuhin) and last week the First Piano Concerto (Rudolf Firkusny), while at Tanglewood last August he staged a preview with a three-day Brahms Festival.

* * *

If the composer could miraculously be returned to earth he would find himself more highly regarded than he was even during his lifetime, though there were perfervid Brahmsites then, such as Hans von Buelow, who coined that handy one about the three B's (Bach, Beethoven and Brahms), thus putting the last-named in company where, for all his greatness, he didn't quite belong. He himself knew better. For Beethoven and Mozart he had a wholesome respect and his humbleness in their figurative presence was one of the few winning things about him. Personally he was a bit of a curmudgeon, hiding his native shyness beneath a bearish exterior.

* * *

Not only has Brahms' popularity increased enormously, the prevailing notion regarding him has changed materially. It is difficult to believe that Philip Hale could have found his music "granitic," And there were many who breathed assent when he said that Symphony Hall should have a sign, "Exit in case of Brahms."

Our admiration instinctively goes out to the adventurer, the pioneer, the trail-blazer; but such artists are sometimes unsure of their path. They stumble and falter. Brahms was more prudent. He looked not forward but backward. Mere opportunists jump on the current bandwagon and sometimes find themselves carried down the wrong street. Brahms took a long-range view. He saw where lay the eternal verities, in such classics as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart, and he realized that the romanticism of Schumann would make an excellent leaven for this formal loaf.

Yet it would be grossly unfair to call Brahms just a "copycat," for all his disturbing reminiscences. If his music is a synthesis, and an extremely adroit one, it still contains enough that is original to give it true validity. And in these days, when "get famous quick" is no less popular than "get rich quick," we cannot but admire his quest for perfection, which he held to be more important even than beauty. Our standards of beauty change, and sometimes with great rapidity. A good job remains a good job, and Brahms, a master craftsman, one of the very best, if perhaps not one of the very greatest composers, always did a good job. For that he has reaped his reward—that and his aforesaid ability to fuse the classic and romantic elements in a product that many now find more palatable than either one of them straight.

Nevertheless, he did not compose for posterity, but simply did what he thought was right, firmly expecting that his music would not long survive. Moreover, in the turbulent times in which he lived, it took courage to be a reactionary.

* * *

The Bach Circle of Boston will give its annual festival at Jordan Hall this week. Tomorrow evening Karl Geiringer will lecture and Ralph Kirkpatrick will play the harpischord. On Tuesday evening the Bach Circle chorus and orchestra, Richard W. Ellsasser, conductor, will give a concert with soloists.

Glo

MUSIC

Apr. 19

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

A solidly German program including two of the classic B's furnishes the music for the last pair of concerts but one, this season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It begins with the Suite No. 3, in D major, of Bach, and continues with the Brahms D minor Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

From every point of view, Mr. Firkusny's performance of the Brahms Concerto was as fine as any I can remember. This is a curious work, hard and granitic in some pages, lush and sentimental in others. The orchestration is decidedly immature and no matter how fine the orchestra and how hard they work, Brahms' fumbling treatment really does not "sound."

The Concerto requires, then, a pianist of solid technical attainments and thorough-going musicianship, an artist of both intellect and feeling, who knows the appropriate style. If it is played bluntly the Concerto can seem duller than it is in certain of its pages. If it is played with just the right nuances, the proper tempi and a shrewd and calculating sense of tone and emphasis, then music and soloist both emerge triumphant.

That is precisely what happened yesterday, for Mr. Firkusny is an artist of parts. When power was demanded, as in the first movement and the beginning of the finale, Mr. Firkusny was powerful. But he never thumped, nor did his tone once get hard. He clothed the solo part with a lyrical, poetic quality.

This Concerto always has been one of Mr. Koussevitzky's excellently-accompanied numbers, too, so that the total result was most enjoyable. Obviously the audience thought so, for they applauded generously.

Bach and Strauss both soared in clouds of orchestral virtuosity. Throughout, the texture was fine of grain, and clear of sound. Take, for example, such a small but important detail as the pizzicato bass in the miscalled "Air on the G String" (which in the original version is not on the G string). You could hear every note of it.

So could you hear the figurations of the gentler instruments, like the clarinets, flute and bassoons, which ripple through much of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The much divided strings, in typical Strauss fashion, were firm and clear, never a soft mush of sonorities. The organ was not quite in tune, but it was more nearly so than on some occasions in the past. From start to finish, a rewarding concert.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 19 1947

BOTH of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concerts last week, taking note of the fiftieth anniversary of Brahms' death, were devoted to his music. Together, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, they included three of his four symphonies, the "Variations on a Haydn Theme," the "Academic Festival" Overture, and the Rhapsody for Alto Solo, Male Chorus, and Orchestra. I didn't hear the first concert, on Wednesday evening, but I feel safe in assuming that it was like the Saturday matinée, which was brilliantly played and masterfully conducted. Even the Alto Rhapsody, which can be rather uneventful, had persuasive power under Mr. Koussevitzky's fervent ministrations. Carol Brice gave glowing tone to the solo part.

THE San Francisco Symphony and its conductor, Pierre Monteux, also bowed in the direction of Brahms, with a performance of his First Symphony, at a Carnegie Hall concert last week. In addition, their program introduced Olivier Messiaen's "The Ascension," a set of four movements called "symphonic meditations" by the composer, in which he expresses religious devotion in compact and singularly colorful orchestral terms. Other items of the evening were the Bach-Respighi C-minor Passacaglia and Fugue and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The San Francisco group is an expert, seasoned organization, and it was plain—in spite of some unnecessary noisiness in the early part of the concert, perhaps caused by unfamiliarity with the hall's acoustics—that it is one of our important orchestras. Mr. Monteux's conducting was, as always, distinguished for its clarity, simplicity, sensitivity, and knowledge. —ROBERT A. SIMON

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
APR 26 1947

Koussevitzky Loses, Biog Wins Again

NEW YORK, April 19.—The appellate division of Supreme Court yesterday unanimously unheld the decision of Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag in refusing to stop publication and distribution of a biography of the Boston Symphony Ork fronter, Serge Koussevitzky, by Moses Smith, former Hub music critic. Koussevitzky brought suit last month not only against the author, but also against the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and the distributors, the Arco Publishing Company. He charged that his right of privacy had been invaded.

The appellate division said that its decision "should not be construed as a determination by this court that injunctive relief may not be had to restrain publication of defamatory statements in a proper case," but added that "the record before us does not furnish proper basis for granting the temporary injunction."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 19 1947

Appellate Court Upholds Koussevitzky Publishers

The Appellate Division unanimously upheld yesterday the right of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, of 1 Madison Avenue, to publish and distribute the book "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, Boston music critic, dealing with the life of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky charged that the book invaded his rights of privacy. Justice Bernard L. Sheintag, of the Supreme Court, ruled on March 4 that this was not true of the book and refused to issue an order enjoining its publication. His opinion was appealed to the Appellate Division, which upheld it yesterday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 20 1947

Harvard Symposium

New Choral Will Be Sung Friday Night, May 2

Robert Shaw will conduct the Collegiate Chorale in new works by Paul Hindemith, Aaron Copland and G. Francesco Malipiero on Friday night, May 2, in the Memorial Church of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. This will be the closing event of the second day of the university's Symposium on Music Criticism. The Hindemith work, "Apparebit Repentina Dies," is based on a medieval Latin text and is scored for mixed chorus and eleven brass instruments.

Mr. Copland's "In the Beginning" takes its text from the Book of Genesis in the Bible and is scored for a capella chorus with mezzo-soprano solo. Malipiero's "La Terra," with a text from Virgil's Georgics, is scored for mixed chorus and organ. Mary Crowley, organist, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the assisting artists.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 20 1947

On the Records

The fifth symphony by Prokofiev is brilliantly executed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, and brilliantly re[illegible]0 sides). The effect is somewhat superior to the Rodzinski recording released by Columbia recently. Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the London Phil[illegible] in excerpts from "The Great Elopement," a ballet constructed by Sir Thomas from excerpts from various works by Handel, rescored (six sides). It is uncommonly pleasant music. Robert Shaw directs the Victor Chorale and Orchestra in Bach's "Christ Lag in Todesbanden" (eight 10-inch sides). The ensemble is excellent, except that the words are seldom intelligible. Artur Rubinstein, pianist, plays the "Pathetique" sonata of Beethoven (four sides). The performance is less deft than that by Rudolph Serkin and the repeat in the first movement has been ignored, presumably to keep the price down; perhaps by playing the slow movement presto, the sonata could be done on one record. On the other hand, Rubinstein's version of the first movement is, so far as it goes, superior in emotional force to Serkin's. The "Moonlight" is elegantly played by Vladimir Horowitz (four sides). Ten-inch single: Home on the Range, Guion; The Last Round-up, Hill, with Robert Merrill, baritone, and Russ Case and orchestra.

The dark and beautiful fourth symphony by Sibelius is admirably played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony, conducted by Artur Rodzinski (Columbia, eight sides). The recording is excellent. Prokofiev's lively and often boisterous third piano concerto is essayed by Dmitri Mitropoulos, as conductor and pianist, and the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra (six sides). The result is entertaining. Isaac Stern, violinist, plays selections from the movie "Humoresque" with an orchestra conducted by Franz Waxman (eight sides). Mr. Stern is a fiddler of great skill; whether he ought to be playing "The Flight of the Bumblebee" in public, I don't know. The music ranges from that to a fantasy on themes from "Tristan". This is probably part of the campaign by the movies, which has done so much for history and literature, to do something for music. Helen Traubel, soprano, sings arias from Italian operas, for which her voice is not well suited (six sides). "Vissi d'arte," "Suicidio," "Ritorna vincitor," and "Sai Chi l'Onore" are among the selections. Original works and arrangements by Morton Gould are conducted by him (eight sides). Among the pieces: Go Down, Moses; American Salute, Cowboy Rhapsody.

G. Y. L.

[153]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 20 1947

SPEAKING OF RECORDS

By JOHN BALL Jr.

Two unusual albums of Jewish [illegible] have made their appearance [illegible], both recorded in Argentina. Of entirely different content, they emphasize the great width of [illegible] as well as the important part played by smaller [illegible] companies in bringing out recordings which are distinctly off the beaten path.

YIDDISH THEATER MUSIC. Max Perlman, comedian. Stinson set S-611. Mr Perlman, we understand, is a great success on the Yiddish stage in South America. The six songs in the present set show him to be an artist of genuine ability. Although this reviewer has to admit being unable to understand a word Mr Perlman gets his stuff across very well just the same.

HEBREW CANTORIALS. Stinson set S-609. Cantor Pincas Borensztein with organ. In the notes supplied with this set, Cantor Borensztein is mentioned as a successor to the late Cantor Joseph Rosenblatt. We have long admired Cantor Rosenblatt and have some of his recordings in our own library. Cantor Borensztein is a tenor and if not the equal of Rosenblatt, at least his efforts are unusually good. This set also was recorded in South America.

A NIGHT AT CARNEGIE HALL. Lily Pons, Rise Stevens and Ezio Pinza. Columbia set MM-676. Three of Columbia's top-flight Met Opera stars give forth with selections which they sing in the Carnegie Hall film. Some of the sides are from older sets, others are new. For the most part the recording is good and the selections popular choices from the operatic repertoire.

PROKOFIEFF: SYMPHONY NO. 5. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Victor DM-1095. Here is the second good recording of this important new work to appear within the month; Columbia released its version with Rodzinski only a short while ago. Comparisons are here inevitable. After carefully checking both sets, we can report that Dr. Rodzinski gives the more straightforward reading and has the quieter surfaces. Dr. Koussevitzky, who made the present set, gives the score a highly interesting romantic type interpretation which is quite lush in spots. How you like your Prokofieff played will probably determine your choice here.

IN POPULAR VEIN. Best buy of the week: It's the Duke again, this time with "Sultry Suhset." This Musicraft disc features Johnny Hodges on alto sax, which is all that needs to be said . . . Frankie Carle has put two of his best back to back for Columbia, "Carle Boogie" and "Sunrise Serenade"

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

APR 21 1947

By STEVE CHARTER

During the broadcast of the Boston Symphony concert last Tuesday, the winners of six scholarships for music study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., were announced.

These winners were selected personally by Dr. Koussevitzky from 1500 applicants from all parts of the country. Each will be able to further his musical education under the tutelage of such famous musicians as Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Boris Goldovsky, and others.

The Berkshire Music Center is one of the outstanding schools of its kind in the United States. Provision is made for the study of music through participation in all types of performances. Individual instruction is given as it relates to group performance.

As Dr. Koussevitzky explains, ". . . what we want to give our students is constructive advice and a practical method which will stimulate their gifts, round out their abilities gained during their years of study and broaden their acquaintance with music."

There can be no doubt that the Berkshire Music Center has been instrumental in developing accomplished American artists, for example Lukas Foss and Leonard Bernstein.

But as Dr. Koussevitzky further explains, "Obviously we cannot hope to give fundamental courses and instruction on the same basis as they are introduced in conservatories, colleges and music schools." The contestants have had to furnish that for themselves.

It is sad that this preliminary training requisite to the winning of such wonderful scholarships is available to American children not on the basis of talent, but on the basis of their parents' ability to pay for it.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL BULLETIN

APR 21 1947

Classical

Release of SYMPHONY NO. 5 (OP. 100), by Serge Prokofieff played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a milestone in the realm of contemporary recorded music. It marks the first appearance on RCA Victor Records of the Soviet composer's "FIFTH" played by the conductor and orchestra who gave the work its first American performances.

Prokofieff wrote this symphony in a single month during the summer of 1944 and conducted its premiere in January of the following year.

In essence the FIFTH SYMPHONY is Prokofieff's ode to the end of the war, and its music reflects the joy occasioned by victory. While the music is no less modern than the composer's FOURTH SYMPHONY, dedicated to the Boston Symphony, there is a full store of rich tonal color and superb melody almost romantic in character. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony have provided a superlative supplement to their equally fine recording of the same composer's

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

APR 19 1947

Court Case Lost By Koussevitzky

New York, April 18 (AP)—The Appellate Division today unanimously upheld a lower court ruling which refused to enjoin publication and distribution of the book, "Koussevitzky," a biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky sued Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers; the Arco Publishing Company, distributors of the book, and its author, Moses Smith, Boston music critic, charging that the book invaded his rights of privacy.

In upholding Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag's ruling, the Appellate Division said: "The record before us does not furnish any proper basis for the granting of a temporary injunction.

"The right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure, unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character. An examination of the book complained of clearly shows that it is not fictional."

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 23, 1

MUSIC

Pension Fund Concert

The 103rd Pension Fund Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, participated, as did also Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, bass. The program was as follows:

A German Requiem, Op. 45....Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

As the culmination of the performances in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Brahms' death his German Requiem was the obvious choice for the pension fund concert last night. It was last performed, also as a pension fund concert, in 1939 and then drew a not very gratifying attendance. Last night there was almost a full house, but the austerity—and it must be admitted the occasional boring passages—in the Brahms Requiem still does not mean that the SRO sign is posted in Symphony Hall when it is given.

The fact that the Brahms Requiem was not designed for a Requiem Mass in any sense may tend to confuse people. It was actually written to a scriptural text in German, and therefore the resemblance of the words so often to the Beatitudes and the liturgy of the Church of England is another confusing factor. It was also composed in memory of the dead in the War of 1870, but the lovely fifth movement was a direct, personal acknowledgement of the loss of Brahms' beloved stepmother.

The performance by all the forces under Mr. Koussevitzky's command last night was singularly eloquent and moving. The opening chorus was sung with a beautiful soft tone. Later the female singers were often unduly shrill, but the memory of this first chorus is one to be treasured. Another remarkable feature of the performance was the superb singing by Frances Yeend in the 5th movement. Her voice soared forth by itself and against the chorus with extraordinary effect. We had most of us known that Miss Yeend was a fine soprano, but last night's singing was something far beyond that mild appraisal.

Mr. Pease, who distinguished himself in Britten's "Peter Grimes" in Tanglewood last summer, renewed that favorable impression by his excellent work in the baritone solos last night. Mr. Woodworth, who also trained the chorus for the '39 performance, deserves the greatest praise for the results that the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society achieved last night. He was present in the audience and must have felt the satisfaction of a job well done. Mr. Koussevitzky at the outset of the season had promised us Bach's B minor Mass for this spring, but the appropriateness of the Brahms anniversary and the vividness of the performance were excuse enough for the Requiem, if any were needed, in its place. After all, in Baltimore this season they gave all 700 of Brahm's compositions!

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 66th season is devoted to Beethoven, and, in its latter half, appropriately ceremonial. There are two Symphonies, the Eighth, in the key of F major, and the Ninth, in the relative minor key of D minor. Serge Koussevitzky conducts. The chorus consists of members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The four vocal soloists are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass-baritone.

If you are going to have an all-Beethoven and semi-ceremonial program, there is no better combination than the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. The Eighth is sufficiently small in size and scope to provide good contrast with the vast, imposing structure of the Ninth and its chorale finale. At the same time, the Eighth is nearer in style to the Ninth than the comparatively short First and Second of the Beethoven Symphonies, and therefore more appropriate than either of those two.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be in especially fine fettle yesterday, a fountain of energy and rhythm. It may be that he made the beginning of the Eighth and part of its finale too "big" dynamically, although the work is curiously uneven in its scoring. Certainly the delicate little allegretto went very delicately, and the tempo di menuetto was in its right frame. At any rate, here was a vital and cheery performance that was extremely satisfactory.

As the years go by, Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the cosmic Ninth Symphony grows more balanced in details, with a better sustained long classic "line." Yesterday he read the score better than I can ever remember hearing it from him before, and that is saying a good deal. One detail that must not be overlooked was the exquisite voicing of the cello and double bass recitative at the outset of the finale. Here were strength and power, and at the same time absolute precision and a tone that was light but not dry. What virtuosity it takes to play this demanding passage so beautifully!

Seldom has a chorus grappled more successfully with Beethoven's merciless vocal writing than yesterday, and seldom has choral tone sounded so rich and full in those agonizing high A's. The soloists were as excellent, James Pease carrying off first honors with his noble singing of the bass recitative. Miss Yeend is certainly the finest soprano for this Symphony that I have heard. The contralto of Miss Alberts did not stand out, but it formed an important strand in the texture as a whole. Mr. Laderoute labored hard but effectively with the tenor part, although his tones seemed throaty now and again. All in all, a fine ending for the season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 19 1947

Appellate Court Upholds Koussevitzky Publishers

The Appellate Division unanimously upheld yesterday the right of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, of 1 Madison Avenue, to publish and distribute the book "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, Boston music critic, dealing with the life of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Kouseevitzky charged that the book invaded his rights of privacy. Justice Bernard L. Sheintag, of the Supreme Court, ruled on March 4 that this was not true of the book and refused to issue an order enjoining its publication. His opinion was appealed to the Appellate Division which upheld it yesterday.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT

APR 27 1947

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

. . . will spend the latter part of April, all of May and early June on a spring tour of Palestine and Europe. On June 19 he will return to the United States by plane to conduct the New York Philharmonic Symphony in four summer concerts at Lewisohn stadium after which he will go to Tanglewood, Mass., where Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky has invited him to be a guest conductor at this summer's Berkshire festival.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: OPERA FOR T

4/27

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE new producing organization "Opera for College" has lined up casts of fifteen principals and is offering Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" at a joint fee of $1,475. The Mozart production alone sells for $850; the Donizetti for $825. Both productions are in English, and the idea is that the colleges who want them will furnish the orchestras and choral singers. Moritz Bombard, the director, and the professionals singing the leading roles will rehearse with the previously prepared college groups a few days fore each performance. Singers he group include Adolph An- Norvel Campbell, Betty Robert Falk, Jane Hob- Lys, Edward Nyborg nd.

The New York Times

Daniza Ilitsch

prison, where they later learned their guest had been executed. After twenty-three days in the Gestapo jail they were removed to a small cell in the Landesgericht, where, with six other women, they were to wait the arrival of circuit judges who were expected to try them some time after April 20.

Seven weeks passed. The time of trial drew nearer, but so did the Russians. So many Nazis had left by April 5 that on that day members of the underground were able to release the Ilitsch sisters along with most of the other prisoners.

While they were in jail Rada asked a guard for medicine for her sister's inflamed throat, explaining she was a singer. The guard snarled that she'd never sing again. But she is singing Desdemona, Aïda and other roles with the Metropolitan on tour.

WAGNER: Since the Bayreuth Festival has always been a family affair, the one member of the Wagner family who is clear of suspicion of Nazi sympathies, is bound to be an important factor in its revival. She is Friedelind Wagner, 29-year-old granddaughter of the composer, who left Germany in 1938, took sanctuary in England, and, with the help of Arturo Toscanini, came to this country in 1941.

Miss Wagner, who is waiting for her final American citizenship papers, lives in New York. The Mayor of Bayreuth, she said, had already invited her to go back to revive the festival, That was in August. She has still not answered him. She feels it is much too early to discuss a revival. Forty per cent of Bayreuth, she said, was destroyed during the war, there are no hotels left in the city and its population has been doubled since the war by people from bombed-out areas. Besides, she feels that though her grandfather preached the doctrine of redemption through love and pity, he is still associated in too many minds with the Nazis who wrongfully claimed him as a spiritual forebear. She does not want the festival to become a political football again. Her estimate was that it would take ten years before Bayreuth Festival could again be a truly international festival accessible to all and working for peace.

Wahnfried, her grandfather's house, was destroyed in the last week of the war, she said, but the Festspielhaus is intact. Recently it has been used by the United States Army. Jack Benny, the Rockettes and Billy Rose's "Diamond Horseshoe" have all played there. And there have been performances of "Madama Butterfly," "La Traviata" and d'Albert's "Tiefland." The Wagner in her squirms at the thought, she said, but she recognizes they have kept up the building. For she wants to see the festival restored. Even though she plans to make her permanent home in this country, she feels an obligation to save the festival. In fact, she left Germany because she felt saving it was her mission and she became convinced it could only be saved from the outside.

The property, she said, does not belong to her mother, Winifred Wagner, English wife of Siegfried, the composer's only son. It belongs to her two brothers, Wieland and Wolfgang, her sister, Verena, and herself. There is a stipulation in the will that it cannot be sold or divided while those heirs are alive. She has been sending packages to her co-inheritors, she said, but she has not written any of them since

---

apr. 26

BO

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the third consecutive season Dr. Koussevitzky is winding up the Symphony Concerts with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth. Two years ago it was heard alone, last year Haydn's Symphony No. 88 came before it. Yesterday afternoon, as will be the case this evening, it was preceded by Beethoven's very different Eighth Symphony. This or the other Beethoven overture has also served the same purpose. One thing is certain, the Ninth must be the last number. There is nothing that could follow it on the same program.

Now, as before, the chorus essential to the last movement is drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The excellent quartet of solo singers consists of four vocalists, now identified with the Berkshire Festival: Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The four, on the whole, provided what was the best quartet we have had in some time. Beethoven's voac lwriting is notoriously awkward and ungrateful, yet these singers did not make you unduly conscious of the fact. These passages, more suitable to instruments, were really sung, and what can be a painful experience became yesterday an agreeable one. Mr. Laderoute did well with his long solo and Mr. Pease with the measures with which he introduced the choral finale.

I have had occasion to quote before the rather sour observation made by Ernest Newman, who made the address at the Beethoven Centenary of 1927, that in England they had men and women sing such things as the "Missa Solemnis" and the finale of the Ninth. Be that as it may, there is something to be said for Dr. Koussevitzky's use of these collegiate choristers—at least in the last-named work. If their youthful voices do lack body, they enter marvelously into the spirit of the thing, and this enthusiasm, without which the last movement of the Ninth is dead letter, amply compensates for any lack of tonal substance. The young women even make that prolonged high A sound plausible.

Dr. Koussevitzky does many things superbly, but there is nothing that he does any better than the Ninth of Beethoven. Into it he puts his heart and soul, and players and singers cannot help responding. The one complaint you can make is that the first announcement of the choral melody by cellos and basses should not be so soft. In their extraordinary recitatives these instruments have already rejected the themes of the first three movements, and when the composer gives them a suggestion of the choral tune, they accept it gladly. And while they are not supposed to shout it, they certainly should not whisper it.

In retrospect, the merry little Eighth was overshadowed by its mighty successor. At the time of playing it had the requisite charm and humor.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 27, 1947

Guest Conductors, New Music; Symphony Season in Review

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 66th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended at Symphony Hall last night with the joyful if not triumphant call to brotherhood of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In looking back over this season it appears to have been one of about average quality, with now and then an event of special importance and excitement.

Over a period of several years Conductor Serge Koussevitzky gradually has been lightening the burden of his own work. That is natural, since he will be 73 in July. Thus far an undeclared policy of guest conductors interspersing Koussevitzy's own appearance has worked well. That is because Mr. Koussevitzky is a dominant figure and so long as he continues as music director (his title now in the program book) the orchestra will continue to reflect his character and his will. That is as it ought to be.

Perhaps the greatest interest of the season was found in the guest conductors rather than in any new music. The outstanding event was the return to this orchestra of Bruno Walter after an absence of 24 years. The symphonic Walter was a revelation to many concert-goers. Certainly he is a unique and unequalled master in the performance of the German classics, also in Bruckner and Mahler.

The "great" G minor Symphony of Mozart, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan," the Second Symphony of Brahms, the original version of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, and the Fourth Symphony of Mahler, with Desi Halban giving a lovely performance of the soprano solo, were done as I had never heard them done before. In other music, such as Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Mr. Walter fell short of what we are accustomed to hear at Symphony Hall. In his field, however, Mr. Walter is superlative, and it was a rare privilege to have him here.

Triumphant Mr. Muench

Second only to Mr. Walter was the triumphant appearance in an all-French program of Charles Muench. His technical command, his ear for a rich, yet pliant and clear tone and his good taste and sense of style made his concerts remarkable. He ought to be invited again. As for Mr. Bernstein, that talented if not thoroughly experienced young man continues to develop. He gave us an amazingly good "Le Sacre du Printemps." Yet I balk at conceding that he is now a fully rounded artist as technician and interpreter. His concert here with his own City Center Orchestra of New York, in November, proved that to my satisfaction.

Of the new music, to my mind, the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland was emphatically the best. This represents a new peak of technical achievement and expressive beauty for Mr. Copland, who indisputably is a leading composer of the time, in whom you find natural and progressive but unaffected modernity. Next I would rate the "Song of Songs" by Lukas Foss, in whose performances the soprano singing of Ellabelle Davis was so important. The New York reviewers blasted the daylights out of Mr. Foss' music, but I consider it vital and forward-looking in idiom if archaic in its technical device of repeating phrases of the verses taken from the Old Testament book.

Of Camargo Guarnieri's Symphony I cannot remember a note, nor can I (except the "Habby Birthday" phrase) remember any of Roy Harris' "Celebration." Milhaud's Second Symphony was strong and salient, not too easy to get at a first hearing but worthy of repetition. Roussel's "Ariane et Bacchus," heard here at long last from Mr. Muench, was completely pleasant.

Astringent Shostakovich

Of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony you can say it, too, is pleasant and slightly astringent but no great shakes. Richard Strauss' "Metamorphosen" was a total loss for my money. Opinion was divided over the Fifth Symphony of Vaughan Williams which, Heaven knows, is too long and on the soporific side. Yet to me it is music which has a large outlook and reassuring lyricism.

Erica Morini, the violinist, was an outstanding "new" soloist. It was a treat to have Dame Myra Hess back again. Soprano Frances Yeend and baritone James Pease covered themselves with credit in the pension fund performance of Brahms' "A German Requiem." Incidentally, to make a bit light of a solemn concern, the weeks-long observance of the 50th anniversary of Brahms' death seemed like too much Brahms. But perhaps that was because it was Spring, when the sap and the blood flow quicker than Brahms.

For the rest the season passed in familiar courses, both as to music and soloists. It passed also in the continuing recognition that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is still the greatest in the world. And now let thy servant depart for what music the Summer will bring, together with perhaps a little [illegible]

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

APR 27 1947

Music

By Felix Borowski.

Symphony Orchestra Much Improved By Defauw's Four-Year Conductorship

With the final notes of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony played at Orchestra Hall last evening, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra came to the end of its 56th season, and Desire Defauw concluded his engagement as conductor and musical director of the organization. It will be of interest, therefore, to consider what has been accomplished in the four years in which the Belgian conductor has had the orchestra under his control.

There can be no doubt that Mr. Defauw began his labors under great disadvantages. Although he had made a distinguished career in Belgium as conductor of the Brussels Royal Conservatory Orchestra, director of the Belgium radio and, in 1937, first conductor of the Orchestre National Belgique, he was not known in this country until Toscanini brought him in 1939 to America to conduct four concerts of the NBC Orchestra — an engagement repeated in 1941—and engagements in two successive years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Unknown Here

Rave notices in New York and Boston newspapers meant but little to Chicago concertgoers, and Defauw was an unknown quantity when, in 1943, he was appointed, after a guest appearance, as musical director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

His first task was to convince the public — and, more particularly, the orchestra — that a Belgian musician could cope with the repertory, largely German, that had flourished under the regime of Frederick Stock. We have no doubts as to the success with which Defauw surmounted this difficulty. Nor was his achievement confined to the German repertory alone—his range was extended to every school of musically creative art with, as was natural, no slighting of the Belgian branch.

Ravinia a Mistake

It was manifestly a mistake to have put the new conductor to the direction of a week of concerts during the summer of 1943 at Ravinia, where he had a comparatively small orchestra, and an acoustic problem of which he had been previously unaware. The results there scarcely were brilliant, although to the astonishment of most of his listeners, Defauw brought about at his final concert a magnificent reading of Beethoven's C minor symphony. It was left to the director to show his real abilities in the Orchestra Hall seasons which were to come.

The results in them often were exceedingly fine, and Defauw leaves the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on a much higher level than that on which he found it. Gradually greater clarity has been brought about in the part-playing; almost for the first time the organization learned what a real pianissimo could mean—it was not one of Stock's salient features—and audiences discovered what an improved orchestral balance could accomplish for high standards of performance.

Precision Lacking

There is, of course, another side to the ledger. One of the prime essentials of the finest orchestral and chamber music playing is precision. Too often this has been lacking in Orchestra Hall, and may be ascribed to insufficiency of discipline.

It is possible that this disciplinary flaccidity has been due to Mr. Defauw's endeavors to bring the orchestra over to his side. But any coddling of such an organization is as dangerous as it would be if, in a military post, the colonel of a regiment called the soldiers by their first names and invited them to tea. Subsequent battles inevitably would be lost.

No one, we believe, will begrudge Desire Defauw admiration for his courage in putting up a valiant fight.

Music lovers, we believe, will recall later with mingled homage and regret some of the masterly performances of much music by Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms which the conductor has offered them in the past and will wish him all prosperity and good luck in his future posts.

[155]

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

APR 27 1947

Records of the Week

Soviet Musical Enigma; Rodgers and Hart Tunes

By Felix Borowski.

ONE of the interesting, if baffling circumstances in Russian music is the apparent unwillingness of the Soviet governmental authorities to allow its composers leave their native country and to take advantage, by personal contact with other peoples, of their fame in alien lands. Shostakovich has been invited several times by orchestral organizations in America to conduct his works in Philadelphia and New York, but each invitation has been refused.

It was not always thus. Of the present-day Muscovite composers Prokofieff has had frequent appearances in the United States, both as composer and conductor. He was in Chicago in 1919, when he was given a contract for his opera, "The Love for the Three Oranges," and on five occasions appeared as piano soloist or as conductor of his own music with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Below is discussed Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony.

PROKOFIEFF. Symphony No. 5, Opus 100. Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Victor Red Seal, four 12-inch records.

This is one of Prokofieff's orchestral works, replete with powerful thematic material, and orchestrated with arresting skill. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra do all justice to a score of great difficulty. Record collectors desiring acquaintance with one of the most advanced and most fascinating examples of modern symphonic art, will be well advised to acquire this.

Fiw

BY ROSS PARMENTER

THIS will certainly be a banner summer for music festivals in America—and most of them will feature contemporary music. There are so many lined up that a man with a private plane could probably attend a festival every night of the summer and his flights would take him back and forth across the continent several times. At that, he'd have to miss quite a few. While Columbia University is holding its third annual festival of contemporary American music here next month, the University of Oregon is holding a three-day contemporary festival out in Eugene, Ore. And while the new Virginia Music Festival is running in Charlottesville, Va., the ninth annual festival will be going on out at Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah.

One of the major festivals opens on Tuesday. It is the seventeenth annual Eastman School Festival of American Music, which will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the school. Dr. Howard Hanson will be the director and eleven compositions will receive premières during the week-long event. Another festival beginning on Tuesday is the nineteenth annual one of the American Society of the Ancient Instruments in Philadelphia. The society will present three programs in memory of Ben Stad, its founder, who died last summer.

The new Charlottesville festival will be held June 13, 14 and 15 in the Scott Stadium at the University of Virginia. Dr. Hans Kindler will be the musical director and the concerts will be given by the National Symphony Orchestra. Edward R. Stettinius Jr. is the chairman of the festival's advisory board. The founders plan it as an annual event and have adopted the slogan "The Salzburg of the South."

One of the largest festivals, of course, will be the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. It will be held in July and August. An idea of some of the smaller festivals can be gained from the itinerary of the Roth Quartet. It will play at events being sponsored by the University of California both in Los Angeles and Berkeley by the California Music Society in La Jolla, by Denver University and by the University of Colorado at Boulder.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

APR 27 1947

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

KOUSSEVITZKY has lost his suit. So far as he is concerned his immediate efforts to halt the distribution of Moses Smith's book entitled "Koussevitzy" have come to naught. So far as the book is concerned it will undoubtedly be read by more people than the publishers ever anticipated, and with greater curiosity. Such is the irony of life.

While the eader may not condone the tone of the book, he will commend its informative nature. If it is unnecessarily abrupt in some of its frankness, it is highly enlightening in its account of Koussevitzky's career. The average reader will find a fascinating story about how one of the most illustrious conductors in the world made good in the United States. As an "American" success story the book is a revealing account of overcoming obstacles which would have defeated other men with less idealism and less willpower.

• • •

Laudatory Material

WHOEVER induced Koussevitzky to institute the suit did him a disservice. There is enough laudatory material in the text to offset the disparaging remarks which suggest more of truth than of fiction. Koussevitzky's sensitiveness to printed criticism may thus have proved a boomerang. One is inclined to accept more of Mr. Smith's statements now than before the suit was brought about. This action tends to emphasize some of the critical observations the book contains.

Did Koussevitzky overlook his his position in the musical world today? It is such that there was no necessity for him to defend himself. The book could do him no harm. And the straightforward account of what he has accomplished carries the weight in his favor.

• • •

Provocative Books

THAT the first book published by Allen, Towne and Heath should have traveled the rough road may work favorably for the firm's future. Dedicated to printing books about music only, it will be expected to produce provocative books if "Koussevitzky" is a sample. Actually it marks time issuing David Ewen's "Music Comes to America" and Franz Werfel's "Verdi," both of which are reprints.

A re-reading of "Music Comes to America" discloses that it has not been so completely revised and extended as to make it the new publication it is advertised to be. It is an interesting book, valuable in its running account of how we have reacted to music and music has reacted on us.

• • •

Werfel's Verdi

WERFEL'S "Verdi" was first published here some 20 years ago. Its reissue is worthwhile because it personalizes opera at a moment when opera is resurgent. Called a novel of the opera, "Verdi" is a fascinating story; its treatment of the emotional disturbances out of which came "Otello" and "Falstaff" makes gripping reading. Its style is literary, not critical; its picture of the times colorful, rather than photographic. Those music lovers who idolize the lesser Verdi can learn much from their composer in his soul-searching moments as he rose to his greatest height.

Fiw Apr 27

THE 'POPS'

The word "Pops" used to bring to mind only one city—Boston. But in recent years other towns have taken up the idea. Nearly all "Pops" concerts mix music and refreshments, light opera gems and some standard repertory.

In addition to Boston, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Toronto and New York are having "Pops" concerts this season. New York's second season, opening on Thursday and ending on June 14, will have all sorts of guest conductors, more soloists than you can shake a stick at and "nights" of all sorts, such as Gershwin nights, Viennese nights, musical comedy nights, Latin-American nights, and so on.

Her. Apr 27

The Original Pops

There were many years when the Pops were a unique Boston institution. Only at Symphony Hall could you imbibe Budweiser while listening to Handel's Largo. But it was too good a thing not to be copied, and this spring there will be at least four other series of "Pop" concerts in New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans and Toronto. All will mix light music with light refreshments. So probably in the future Boston will have to boast that it has the original Pops.

Meanwhile the 62d season gets under way tonight with Arthur Fiedler in command as usual. The only criticism of the present set-up seems to be that there just aren't enough seats. This, as any theater man will tell you, is the sweetest sort of criticism there is!

Symphony Series Concluded

Bach, Strauss, Tchaikovsky Make Up the Final Program

By Winthrop P. Tryon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, closed its Tuesday concerts in Symphony Hall last night, giving the sixth program of the series, which comprised the Bach Overture, otherwise designated as Suite No. 3 in D major; the Strauss Symphonic Poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

The three works were the best possible means for the orchestra to illustrate its powers in lines of its own peculiar preference and mastery. The Bach Suite stands scored in a general way for orchestra; but that does not mean orchestra either in the classic or in the modern meaning of the word. For the full choir of strings entirely dominates the situation, and certain passages for a light ensemble that includes a few wind instruments merely supply surprise diversions.

The scheme seems very primitive in the present era; though, historically regarded, it can have a quite striking effect. What probably went unrealized in the composer's period was that the music as written for strings, without the little episodes of contrast, established a mark not to be surpassed, or perhaps even approached, for time to come.

* * *

Another thing possibly quite as possible is that those main passages for the full string choir have never been so competently performed in the whole 200 years of their existence as they are today. But however that may be, they were set going last evening with a style, a vigor, and an ecstasy that will bear being plentifully talked about.

Nevertheless, all that, for the conductor and the executants of the Boston Symphony, was mere exercise in the antique. For them, the eighteenth-century piece, notwithstanding its exalted musical quality, was but an orchestral étude. They are ready to play it any time and are sure to accomplish the same brilliant result. Where they got down to business and did the job they are hired for was in the Strauuss symphonic poem. Here was a great modern orchestra interpreting a masterly modern score.

* * *

Why in the world the methods of Strauss have been ignored by aspiring twentieth-century composers in favor of impressionism, and in favor of complex and abstruse systems of rhythm, is hard to make out. Another thing to be laid, no doubt, to war; or if not, then to the beguilements of the Faun and Pétrouchka.

All sorts of remarks can be made on the insight and skill of Dr. Koussevitzky with "Zarathustra," and comment without end on the response of his players; nor could things have transpired as was the case had not the book from which he was reading and the printed notes which they were transforming into sound represented the art of composing at the top of inspiration.

"Zarathustra," indeed, survives; and we may well ask ourselves what contemporary of its composer has produced anything that contains more orchestral stuff, page for page, that calls out the talents of the man with the baton better, that more urgently compels performers to their highest efforts, or that transports listeners to higher realms.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms' Requiem

By CYRUS DURGIN

"A German Requiem" by Johannes Brahms was presented at Symphony Hall last night for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The chorus was the combined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, bass-baritone, were the soloists.

This special concert also brought to conclusion the local observance—which has extended over several weeks—of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms. The performance in the main was an eloquent recreation of what is really one of the great masterpieces in choral music. There were, to be sure, rough spots; as when the choral tone momentarily became hard or slipped from the pitch; when there seemed to be disagreement on tempo, but such moments were inconsiderable in comparison with the impressive total effect. The Harvard-Radcliffe choruses are good this year, even if that periodic shortcoming—weakness in the tenor and bass voices—again is evident. They had been carefully trained, and they responded well to Mr. Koussevitzky's demands.

Both Miss Yeend and Mr. Pease were remarkably successful with the exacting vocal solos, although from time to time—and unaccountably, for both are excellent singers technically—their tones were produced too far back in the throat. They not only sang their parts, they brought expression and feeling to them. As for Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting, his conception of the Brahms Requiem has become deepened and more refined over the years. He has never done it better than last night.

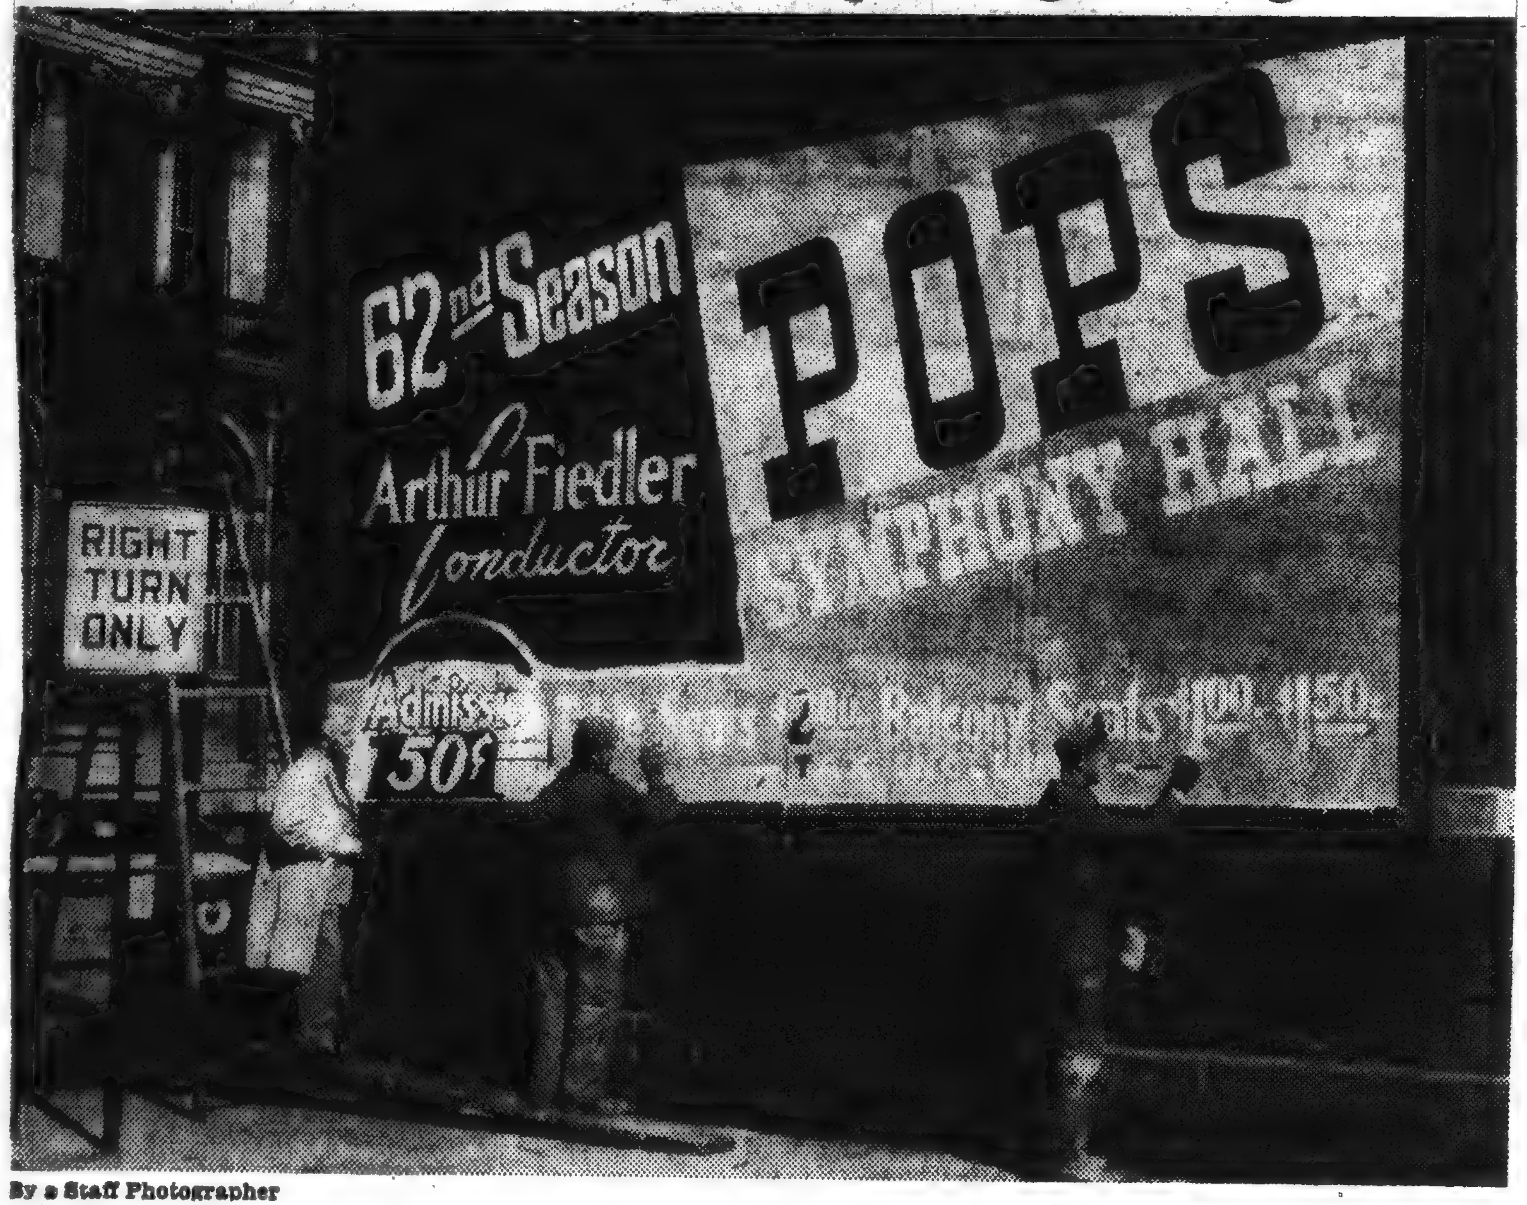
Why, O, why, does musical Boston permit vacant seats at a pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Even so, the large audience present gave all hands, including Mr. Woodworth, tumultuous applause when the concert was over.

YOUNG LOCAL COMPOSERS who will play their piano compositions at a concert sponsored by the Institute of Modern Art at the Women's City Club Monday are, left to right: Lucas Foss, 24, Boston Symphony pianist; Irving Fine, 30, of the Harvard music faculty, and Harold Shapero, 26, holder of the Prix de Rome and 1947 Guggenheim music fellowship.

Fiw Apr 27

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, APRIL 29, 1947

Heralding 'Pops' Opening Tonight



By a Staff Photographer

Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of Boston's "Pops" concerts, is shown at the left as William Fortier, of Melrose, and Frank J. McNamara, of Quincy, put finishing touches on a sign announcing the opening of the 62d season tonight at Symphony Hall. Although reserved-seat prices have increased this year, the entire second balcony remains unreserved at 50 cents a seat. These seats, like those for the entire hall, may be obtained two weeks in advance, as sale is limited to seating capacity. Originating in Boston, the "Pops" idea has since spread to other cities.

Arthur Fiedler and Pops Open 62nd Season

Trav Apr 30

By A. E. WATTS

Pops inaugurated its 62nd season last night at Symphony Hall to the traditional welcome of applause for everything from Tannhauser to Open the Door, Richard. Dame Boston, who has absorbed the cultural beauties—with dissonances—of Shostakovich and Brahms all winter, shook out her prim hair-do and revelled in music of all sorts. One of the reasons for Pops popularity is that whatever music is played is played with Symphonic precision. If an austere musician shudders at sweet sentimentality or tweaks inside at rhythmic plink-plunks, he still has the comforting crumb of precise musicianship. All the austere ones stayed away last night, for Arthur Fiedler and his players received a tumultuous welcome.

Pomp and Circumstance, which has opened many a Pops program, opened this one and before tapering into the frivolity of the evening, the orchestra played a suite of movements from Rossini. This arrangement by Britten offers rich contrasts of fortissimo and legato. Strauss waltzes then gave way to the puckish theme of Ranch House Party, with sonorous Tannhauser concluding the first part of the program.

Sibelius' Finlandia ushered in the second part in Symphonic manner and had the clashing, crashing boiler factoryish Orizaba as an immediate contrast. "Annie Get Your Gun" selections drew salvos of appreciation. Fiddle Faddle and American Salute, familiar Pops offerings, concluded the program.

Mr. Fiedler was generous with his extras and Gypsy Tango Jealousy and a rafter-shaking arrangement of Open the Door Richard had repeats. Old MacDonald Had a Farm, Country Garden and Marche Miniature were also standouts among the extras.

Exuberance was the general tone of the performance and so catching was the spirit of it that Mr. Fiedler had to restrain his first violins on occasion. Now if Mr. Fiedler can only have a few rehearsals with the white coated gentlemen who open the champagne and can get them to pop the corks on the down beats instead of in the middle of an adagio movement, performances will be 100 per cent. rhythmic.

Sponsoring much of last night's ticket sale was the New England Grenfell Association.

Pops is off to a wonderful start.

TONIGHT AT POPS

French Military March........Saint-Saens
Overture to "The Bronze Horse"...Auber
Scherzo from the "Reformation Symphony ....Mendelssohn
Ride of the Valkyries............Wagner
Divertissement ....Ibert
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra Saint-Saens
Soloist: Judith Davidoff, Radcliffe '50
Selection from "Oklahoma"......Rodgers
Jingles All the Way (Original Version) Cable
"Thunder and Lightning" Polka..Strauss

BRAHMS REQUIEM

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To aid its pension fund and complete its observance of the 50th anniversary of the death of Johannes Brahms, who died April 3, 1897, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered last night a performance of his "German Requiem." The chorus was the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society and the solo singers Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, bass. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

The next symphony season is several months away but some of us are already hoping that the music of Brahms will not be extensively featured. We have had plenty of it this year, if not as much as they had in Baltimore, where every published work of his was performed. Could flesh and blood stand hearing them all?

There are beautiful and affecting passages in the "German Requiem," the first chorus, the fourth division, "How Lovely is This Dwelling Place," and other pages that might be mentioned. But unlike the great requiem masses, such as Verdi's and Mozart's, this setting of passages from the Old Testament is on the whole dismal and depressing. There was a dour streak in Brahms, and it here finds full expression.

Nor was the performance one to make you feel more kindly toward the work. It is very nice to see these college boys and girls upon the stage, to watch their eager young faces, their enthusiastic response to Dr. Koussevitzky's wishes. But who is to claim that they constitute a real chorus in the fullest sense of the term? Moreover, neither Miss Yeend, nor Mr. Pease sang their respective portions with very much feeling for what it

---

'Musical America' Poll Results Are Listed

The performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini's direction on Feb. 9 and 16 was chosen as the outstanding musical radio event of the past season in the fourth annual poll of radio music conducted by "Musical America". The winners in other classifications chosen by 600 music editors and writers on music in American newspapers were:

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera broadcast, "Tristan und Isolde"; Symphony Orchestra, Boston Symphony (ABC); Symphony Conductor, regular, Arturo Toscanini; guest, Bruno Walter; Concert and Program Conductor, Donald Vorhees; Orchestra with featured soloists, Telephone Hour (NBC); Concert Orchestra, Longines Symphonette (WOR and local); Woman singer, regularly featured, Eleanor Steber; occasionally featured, Marian Anderson; Man Singer, regularly featured, James Melton; occasionally featured, Ezio Pinza; Instrumental Ensemble, NBC String Quartet; Vocal Ensemble, Collegiate Chorale; Pianist, Artur Rubinstein; Violinist, Jascha Heifetz; Organist, E. Power Biggs; Educational Program, Gateways to Music (CBS); Announcer and Commentator, Milton Cross (ABC).

A special award went to the National Broadcasting Company, which "consistently through the year served most faithfully the cause of serious music". Sixty-seven per cent of the voters expressed themselves as generally satisfied with the scripts used in the majority of serious music programs; the other thirty-three per cent made outspoken objections to various features.

BOSTON HERALD, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 19

Pops Opening Certain Sign Spring Has Come to Boston

By ALISON ARNOLD

IN SPITE of cold winds and near-zero temperatures, spring has come to Boston. For the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall began their 62nd season last night and with the blossoming magnolia trees and the swanboats, they are unfailing signs of spring.

The perennial pale salmon gladioli were banked around the front of the stage with lemon yellow added this year, but the familiar lattice at the back of the stage was absent. Gilt chairs were clustered closely about the small tables on the floor, and waitresses in trim gray uniforms dispensed light refreshments.

It seemed as if hot coffee should have taken the place of the tall pitchers of Pops punch last evening, but the traditional punch was much in evidence, along with mounds of ice-cream topped with cherries or strawberries. And the music was punctuated with the occa-popping of corks.

THE PROGRAM, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, included a wide variety of offerings, which ranged from Wagner's Tannhauser overture to the popular "Open the Door, Richard," which caused such an ovation that there was an encore. Another favorite was "Old MacDonald Had a Farm" and the audience seemed delighted to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra quacking, grunting, squealing and chirping.

The New England Grenfell Association benefited from this opening performance and pretty debutante flower vendors in gay printed frocks, headed by Miss Jane Kennard, sold fragrant gardenias and cakes of maple sugar. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the benefit committee, was on hand, wearing a springlike print of black and white with touches of green.

Attending together were Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Bradley and their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Sluder. With Mrs. Edward Harding was her youngest daughter, Josephine; Mrs. Robert C. Terry and Mrs. James R. Carter, 2d, arrived together, and in a foursome were Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Bowditch and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bowers.

AMONG OTHERS in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. John Perrin, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert King, Miss Gertrude Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Albert P. Gould, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Keller, Mr. Edward C. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and their son, Mr. Winsor Soule, 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Toppan, Mrs. Parker Hayden, Mrs. Gardiner Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout, Mr. Henry C. Everett and his daughter, Miss Claire Everett; Mrs. Lea S. Luquer, Dr. and Mrs. Lendon Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Henderson, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Harold Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bainbridge, Mrs. Morris LaCroix, Mr. and Mrs. Powell Robinson, Jr., and the latter's younger brother, Mr. Graves Hewitt; Mrs. John Alles and her daughter, Miss Jane Alles; Miss Barbara Shaw, Mrs. Fred B. Lund, and Mrs. Margaret Lane and her son, Mr. Thomas Lane, and her daughter, Miss Jean Harriet Lane.

HE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

The Pops

By CYRUS DURGIN

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra began the 62d season of Pops at Symphony Hall last evening. Once again there was a large audience, in search of light musical entertainment, to applaud conductor, orchestra and every number and encore on an evening-long program. Over the week-end past, Symphony Hall had undergone its usual Winter-to-Spring transformation: the lower walls of the auditorium had been washed over with a cool green; the rows of seats on the floor had been moved out and green tables and gold chairs moved in; there were ash trays on the tables, and waitresses to take orders for light refreshments. On the stage, the orchestra had dispensed with the graduated stages of the Winter season and were sitting on a level. The conductor's stand once again was banked with gladioli.

The musical principle of the Pops is to feature old favorite numbers drawn from the light classics, and to intersperse them with modern novelties and popular tunes. For beginning, accordingly, there was the first of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, that imposing and rhythmically swinging number that everyone can sing or at least hum. Next, instead of an overture, came a collection of piano pieces composed by Rossini and orchestrated by the contemporary English composer, Benjamin Britten, under the title of "Matinees Musicales." These form a complement to last season's "Soirees Musicales," which also were Rossini piano pieces done up for orchestra by Mr. Britten. One of the "Matinees Musicales" has a fetching subtitle: "Solfeggi e Gorgheggi," which, in a free translation, means "Scale Passages and Twittering."

Probably there never has been a Pops concert without a waltz, and Heaven forbid that there ever should be one. Last night's obeisance to the "three-dance" was "Music of the Spheres," by Josef Strauss, two-years-younger brother of Johann Jr., the "Waltz King." Then followed Gillis' indigenous "Ranch House Party," and, for the most solid music of the evening, Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

After "Finlandia," by Sibelius, this Pops opening became progressively more informal. The roaring "Orizaba," which is part of Dmitri Tiomkin's score for the film "Duel In the Sun" (opening May 8 at Loew's State and Orpheum Theatres), was followed by a potpourri from last season's musical hit, "Annie Get Your Gun." This last was all very good fun except that Mr. Fiedler took "Doin' What Comes Naturally" at such a fast tempo that the tune was hardly natural. The encore immediately afterward, Leroy Anderson's "Old McDonald Had a Farm," suggested tht Spike Jones had taken up arranging for the Pops. By this time orchestra and audience were out of the light classics and deep in the groove, so there was practically no amazement at "Open the Door, Richard," which seemed to have been mixed up with the Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin" and Dave Rose's "Holiday for Strings," plus other condiments. Anderson's "Fiddle-Faddle" (which sounds it) and Morton Gould's "American Salute" finished the evening.

Since other cities have taken up the Pops idea, perhaps we can no longer call these concerts unique. But, by golly, we certainly have the best of them.

Final Concerts of Symphony

Beethoven Program For Conclusion

By Winthrop P. Tyron

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the closing concert of the Friday series in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting for its crowning effort of the year the Symphony No. 9 (Choral) in D minor, op. 125, of Beethoven. Here it had the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; and of Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; and James Pease, baritone. The concert opened with a performance of the Symphony No. 8 in F major, op. 93, of Beethoven. The program is repeated tonight at the closing of the Saturday series.

* * *

Great as the enterprise is for everybody associated with an orchestra—governing body, management, players, and singers—subscribers, too, in an indirect way, to bring the Ninth Symphony to realization, it falls comfortably into the routine today of Boston Symphony affairs. To handle it will always be heavy artistic industry; and highly trained performers and well-practiced listeners will be, except under experimental and pioneer conditions, inevitably implied.

But if it could be done at all 100 years and more ago, when it was new, it ought to be done in these advanced times with confidence and relish, whatever the labor. We may leave out, then, conventional praise for the doings of instrumentalists and vocalists yesterday, even those of the solo quartet, which is drawn directly from the community anyway, being chosen out of the summer classes at Tanglewood.

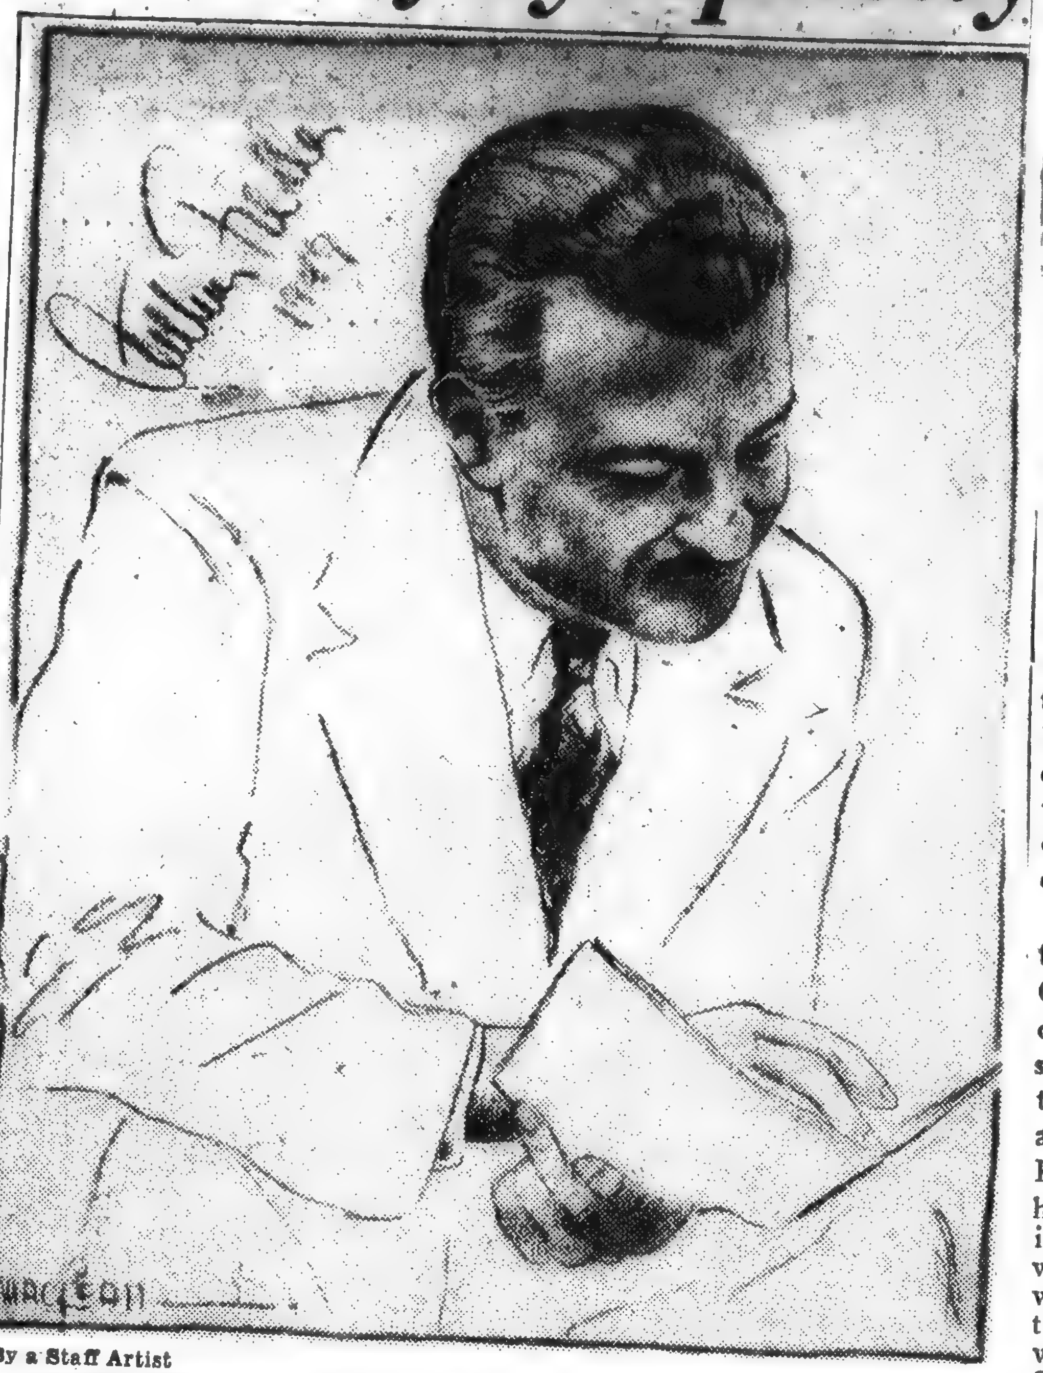
* * *

To consider, rather, the general interpretation of the work by Dr. Koussevitzy and to compare it, if we may uninvidiously, with that by a conductor like Arturo Toscanini—the Bostonian treats the Ninth Symphony like a thing of inexhaustible meaning, of which more can be made at every performance, while the New York man regards it as a matter which says its say for once, and there is the end. Dr. Koussevitzky, to speak broadly, takes the Platonic view, and Mr. Toscanini the Aristotelian. The one is a romantic who explores; the other, a grammarian, who rationalizes. Dr. Koussevitzky will ignore his orchestra to search out a detail of expression somewhere in the woodwind choir. Mr. Toscanini will see that every executant in the ensemble, even down to the kettledrummer, does precisely what the composer indicates for him to do, and will leave it to the listener to find out what the sound as a whole signifies.

This for a summary view of two men who have figured preeminently in the American orchestral scene for a generation; though no opinion of either should be pushed too far and be subjected to literal proof. Slightly illustrative of the Boston conductor's manner yesterday was his handling of the unison passage for double basses and 'cellos in the closing section of the Choral Symphony, where the main subject is introduced softly. Probably no other conductor would have the audacity to demand so subdued a singing of that tune on the big strings as Dr. Koussevitzky asked for; and very little chance that he would obtain the result if he tried.

Listeners will forget much about the occasion as the days pass, but they will be long letting that moment slip from recollection. When it is a difference between the possible and the impossible, Dr. Koussevitzky goes after the impossible every time.

Then, regarding the Symphony No. 8, John N. Burk points out in his "Life and Works of Beethoven" that modern conductors are unreasonably rapid here with the Finale; or at any rate they are by nineteenth-century habit and standard. Dr. Koussevitzky, indeed, runs off the main portion of the Finale as briskly as any of them; yet when a passage intervenes at a slackened tempo, he secures a contrast that cancels all effect of haste and hurry. Briefly, whenever he falls in with the altering fashions of conducting, he does so with good taste. Should doubt, therefore, arise about him with respect to discernment and classic propriety, he is likely to survive all inquisition.



By a Staff Artist

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which opens its sixty-second season Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY SEASON

In Retrospect, Much of Orchestra Year Was Interesting and Some of It Laudable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the performance last evening of Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth Symphonies—which meant that we heard all but Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 5—the 66th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed into history. Ahead of us now lie the orchestra's supplementary activities, the Pops, beginning next Tuesday evening, the Esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Festival.

What with five conductors functioning and two more, Camargo Guanieri and Darius Milhaud, conducting their own symphonies, this season did not lack variety. Whether that is good for the orchestra is another matter, but until Dr. Koussevitzky finally decides that he has had enough, that is what we are in for. The present system is not without its advantages, especially if we are to have guest conductors of the caliber of Bruno Walter, who was with us for four weeks, and Charles Muench, who was with us for one. Since leaders of their stature are rare, we should have them both next season and there seems to be a good chance that we will.

Even though he conducted a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in 1923 and of late years has appeared here frequently in the opera house, Mr. Walter's concerts were still in the nature of a revelation, both of his own extraordinary gifts and of what our orchestra can do under his diretcion. It was plain enough, even if you did not hear it from the players themselves, as it was quite possible to do, that he inspired in them both admiration and affection. In these days when conductors tend to turn the spotlight on themselves, Mr. Walter's utter absorbtion in his task, his attitude of devotion, of consecration, is refreshing. And you are more likely to be affected by it than by all the podium posings and posturings in the world. Especially memorable were his performances of Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration" (the last-named at a Tuesday concert), the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner and the Fourth of Mahler. The Mahler was the most remarkable of all, and after the Saturday evening performance the conductor is reported to have remarked that it was the most exalted moment of his life.

* * *

We are not likely to get novelties from Mr. Walter, who is now content to play the music that he has long cherished. Mr. Muench gave us three: an insignificant "Sonata a due" by Jaubert, a fine string Symphony by Honegger and a glowing Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Ariane et Bacchus." He also put new life into the Third Symphony of Saint-Saens. In the three weeks when he conducted Leonard Bernstein gave us only one new piece, Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, one of the most exciting novelties of recent years. Mr. Bernstein excelled in this music and, by report, in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." He gave us an admirable version of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, the revival of which, like that of Haydn's "Oxford," was long overdue. A novelty, as far as the Symphony Concerts are concerned, was Gluck's Overture to "Alceste," though the piece itself is nearly 200 years old.

* * *

As for Dr. Koussevitzky, in the matter of novelties, he equalled all of the others put together. Decidedly rewarding was Copland's Third Symphony, given its world premiere and repeated at a later pair of concerts. Pleasurable, but hardly stimulating, were Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony, Strauss' "Metamorphosen," Lucas Foss' Biblical Cantata, "The Song of Songs" (with Ellabelle Davis), Vaughan Williams' Fifth Symphony and Hanson's Serenade for flute, harp and strings. Hardly worth the trouble of preparing them were Harris' "Celebration" and the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff.

To the above list Richard Burgin added a pleasant enough Divertimento by Alexei Haieff. Guarnieri's Symphony was no great shakes but the Milhaul Second (another world premiere) was certainly the prize new work of the season. The large dose of Brahms was offset by the scant attention paid to that other popular favorite, Sibelius, represented only by his First Symphony (Mr. Burgin). Dr. Koussevitzky did us great service by restoring to the repertory the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, and this was as logically a Bruckner season as a Brahms one. What was really interesting was the emphasis placed, as in days gone by, on the Germans and Austrians: 16 composers represented by 42 works. Conversely, there were only 11 Russian pieces from 8 composers, while as many Frenchmen contributed 9 compositions. There were five Americans represented, only three of them native-born, and by one piece each. Between them, the remaining countries contributed nine works, from seven composers . . . Not Yehudi Menuhin, as stated here last Sunday, but Jascha Heifetz, played the Brahms Violin Concerto. One of those unaccountable slips. And Mr. Heifetz's performance was outstanding.

POP CONCERTS

TUESDAY

"Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
"Matinees Musicales"	Britten
"Music of the Spheres"	Josef Strauss
Ranch House Party	Gillis
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"	Sibelius
Orizaba from "Duel in the Sun"	Tiomkin
Selection from "Annie Get Your Gun."	Berlin-Anderson
Fiddle Faddle	Anderson
American Salute	Gould

WEDNESDAY

French Military March	Saint Saens
Overture to "The Bronze Horse"	Auber
Scherzo from the "Reformation" Symphony	Mendelssohn
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Divertissement	Ibert
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra	Saint-Saens
Soloist: Judith Davidoff, Radcliffe, '50
Selection from "Oklahoma"	Rodgers
Jingles All the Way	Cable
"Thunder and Lightning" Polka	Strauss

THURSDAY

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Grand Adagio from "Raymonda,"	Glazounoff
Ballet Music from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Die Fledermaus" ("The Bat")	Strauss
Pavane for a Dead Infanta	Ravel
"Espana" Rhapsody	Chabrier
Selection from "Carousel"	Rodgers
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes	Strauss
Wintergreen for President	Gershwin

FRIDAY

"Semper Fidelis" March	Sousa
Overture to "Rosamunde"	Schubert
Minuet for Strings	Bolzoni
Ballet Music from "Faust"	Gounod
Valse—Dance of Phryne—Bacchanale
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Perpetuum Mobile from Suite, Op. 39,	Moskowski
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Selection from "Song of Norway,"	Grieg-Bourdon
"Danube Waves," Waltzes	Ivanovici
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy"	Gliere

---

ston Symphony Expected To Visit London in September

By a Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor musical event of the first nitude in this war-torn Cap- visit and concerts by the Symphony Orchestra and world-famous conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky—is in process being arranged for the early present plans here are con- ed from Boston, the musi- will come to London at the of September.

London

The orchestra is tentatively duled for the vast Royal Al- Hall which has a capacity of It will come to a city whose but overworked, orches- have labored against great of short personnel and conductors, and stand- unavoidably have declined.

Although postwar London is teeming with musical events, and orchestras like Amsterdam's famous Concertgebouw have played to very enthusiastic audiences here, nothing comparable to a visit by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra has yet occurred. The visitors will be assured of having musical London at their feet.

Both the manager of Royal Albert Hall and Harold Holt, Ltd., who is handling the arrangements, told a representative of The Christian Science Monitor today that plans were "in the melting pot." The question is whether dates late in September are satisfactory to Boston, and they expect to have definite word "within a few days."

Conservatory Wins 2 Tanglewood Awards

Two New England Conservatory of Music students are winners of two of the 10 John Hancock Scholarships for study at Tanglewood this summer. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made the announcement during the intermission of the Tuesday broadcast over station WCOP. The two Conservatory student winners are Lois Schaefer of Olympia, Washington, and Adolph S. Herseth, of Bertha, Minnesota. Miss Schaefer, 23, is a flutist; while Mr. Herseth, 25, is a student of the trumpet. One scholarship winner is a Massachusetts girl, Adele Addison of Springfield.

Winners of the 10 complete scholarships for study at the Berkshire Music Center this summer were selected as the result of an open competition conducted by the Boston Symphony and its radio sponsor, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Pops Season Opens

Mentor 4-30-47

Sixty-Second Year Begun, Arthur Fiedler Conducting

By Winthrop P. Tryon

The Boston Pops, as the springtime concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are called on today's showbill, opened their sixty-second season in Symphony Hall last night with Arthur Fiedler conducting and with Alfred Krips as concertmaster. The occasion resembled all the beginnings of the sort, a study of the records would no doubt prove, at any rate in essentials; which tends to assure us that the town has not changed much in mood and temper all the time that the name, Boston Symphony, has figured on the amusement list.

If there has come about a change in the Pops as evenings of music, it may with fairness be attributed to the improved quality and standard of the conducting, as achieved in recent seasons by Mr. Fiedler. In early and middle days, the Pop Concert platform was directed somehow; but just how did not so much matter. The performances were relaxations; and quite regularly they relaxed progressively with the moving on of spring toward summer.

At present, however, the Pops are led with strictness and artistic conscience. There is plenty of fun and fooling, but there is no slackness or let-down of tone, style, or execution. To note an example from this particular opening, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture was never run off more cleanly, flexibly, and expressively, let us make bold to affirm, under Bostonian auspices than here. Whoever was present from afar can go home and say that he heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play.

Another item, more in the Pops' light line, which was carefully and interestingly presented was Britten's Suite of movements from Rossini entitled, "Matinées Musicales."

In regular course, Mr. Fiedler and the players got the house going with the second half of the program. Indeed, some of those adaptations for grand orchestra of musical comedy material are dazzlingly skillful. The conductor called one of the arrangers, Mr. Bodge, to the notice of the audience at the close of one of the drollest of the exercises. He also at a gay moment in proceedings called a little public attention to the Pops concertmaster, Mr. Krips, obliging him to stand, bow, and as much as say: "Yes, the Pops are having a new day; and if you don't think so, wait and see."

Tonight at the Pops

French Military March	Saint-Saëns
Overture to "The Bronze Horse"	Auber
Scherzo from the "Reformation" Symphony	Mendelssohn
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Divertissement	Ibert
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra	Saint-Saëns
Soloist: Judith Davidoff
Selection from "Oklahoma!"	Rodgers
Jingles All the Way	Cable
"Thunder and Lightning"	Strauss

Conductor: Arthur Fiedler

BALTIMORE, MD
AFRO AMERICAN
5/3/47

WINS HANCOCK AWARD—Adele Addison, 21, Springfield, Mass., soprano, was one of ten winners of the John Hancock Award enabling her to study at Tanglewood from June 30 to August 10 under the Boston Symphony conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky at the Berkshire Music Center. A soloist at the Old First Church in Court Square, Springfield, she previously won the Springfield Junior League scholarship and the State audition for the Lavalle Scholarships sponsored by the Natioal Federation of Music Clubs.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 2 - 1947

Palestine Symphony Orchestra U. S. Tour Urged by Bernstein

By Homer Bigart

By Telephone From London

Copyright, 1947, New York Tribune Inc.

JERUSALEM, May 1.—Leonard Bernstein, twenty-eight-year-old American composer and conductor, urged today an American tour for the Palestine Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, predicting that its appearance in the United States would be an event of political as well as artistic importance.

In his Jerusalem debut tonight, Mr. Bernstein conducted the orchestra in his difficult "Jeremiah" symphony, receiving an ovation from the 1,600 persons jammed in the Edison Cinema.

Mr. Bernstein paid a glowing tribute to the orchestra, which he said could easily be "the greatest in the world. It would be a terrific honor to conduct it in the United States," Mr. Bernstein said, "and when it comes, I hope I will be the guy to do it."

But first the orchestra needs two months' rehearsals under one conductor, said Mr. Bernstein, declaring that no orchestra could achieve greatness with a parade of guest conductors. He asserted that the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra had sunk to tenth place in two years under visiting maestros.

Without two months' preparation, he said, the orchestra might make a bad impression in America when compared wih the "slick, streamlined performances of the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras."

Mr. Bernstein said the physical conditions under which the orchestra labors are "scandalous." The only remedy, he said, is a big hall so the orchestra would not have to repeat the same program again and again.

"He recalled that last month the orchestra was compelled to play Caesar Franck's Symphony in D seven times in three weeks. He had heard the last of these performances and thought it remarkable that the orchestra was able to play the symphony with inspiration and fire.

"But it is a very sad situation and exhausting both to the orchestra and conductor," he said. "Besides how can you rehearse intelligently in rooms hardly large enough to squeeze the orchestra inside. Saturday night we rehearsed in a gymnasium so small that I had only a vague idea what the double basses were doing. When the orchestra played anything above pianissimo, I had to hold my ears."

Mr. Bernstein found Palestine audiences most responsive, adding that he felt "almost ashamed and guilty at the tornado of applause" he had received last week at Tel Aviv. "I found myself weeping on the forty-third bow," he said. "During the music, I could feel the audience rising with every crescendo, relaxing with every cadence and registering every musical event."

The Palestine orchestra operates on a budget of only £72,000 ($288,000) and the players receive only £30 to £35 monthly.

RECORD RETAILING
NEW YORK, N.Y
MAY, 1947

PROKOFIEV

"Fifth Symphony." Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Four 12" records. Victor DM-1095. $4.85

In this electrically charged and tonally highly accomplished version the Prokofiev work sounds much more convincing and attractive than in the previously released and, by comparison, rather sluggish performance of Rodzinski on the Columbia label.

Koussevitzky's performance has the further advantage of a first-rate recording job which allows many orchestral nuances to come through with utmost clarity.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 22d regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall. Carol Brice, contralto, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80 .... Brahms
Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 53 .... Brahms
Variations on a theme of Haydn, Op. 56A .... Brahms
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 .... Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

AS THE BOSTON Symphony's official recognition of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms, yesterday's concert was appropriate to the day. An all-Brahms concert is no novelty to Boston audiences, nor have his symphonies been allowed to fall into neglect. All four of them are, in fact, one of the mainstays of orchestra repertory, and they are now as familiar and beloved as they were once mistrusted and feared by many and even by some who should have known better.

Tchaikovsky, you may recall, thought that Joachim Raff was a giant compared to Brahms and that Anton Rubinstein was also an infinitely better composer! He held, too, that Brahms' Violin Concerto, which we now consider the greatest of all, was no finer than a well-constructed pedestal on which was placed, not a statue, but another pedestal. Even so can 50 years make the profound look foolish.

All of the music on yesterday's program was thrice familiar to Boston Symphony audiences, with the exception of the rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky revived this work at the Berkshire Festival last summer, as did he also the Double Concerto, Brahms' last orchestral composition. I wish that Mr. Koussevitzky had seen his way to letting us in Boston hear this latter work, even at the expense of leaving out the 4th Symphony. The 4th is my favorite Brahms symphony, but all the same I should rather listen at this point to the remarkable Double Concerto instead.

THE ALTO RHAPSODY is not one of Brahms' deepest or most important works, but it has a great deal of charm and a sensuous lyrical beauty that makes it well worth hearing now and again. The contrast of the solo contralto with the orchestra and the suddued male chorus as background is singularly effective and pleasant. The chorus for this occasion had been trained by Arthur Fiedler, but was otherwise nameless.

Miss Brice was singing beautifully yesterday, and the clarinet-like quality of her voice was perfect with the orchestra. As for the words of Goethe's poem, however, she might almost as well have sung in Arabic or Sioux. I finally made out with the aid of the program book that she was singing a variant of the English translation there provided and at length I distinctly heard the word, "enlighten," by dint of its being repeated so much. Lovely as Miss Brice's voice was, I suspect that an ideal performance would allow us to hear the text a little more clearly.

Mr. Koussevitzky was in capital form for the concert. He got all there was and then some out of the Academic Festival Overture, gave an intimate and expressive interpretation of the Haydn Variations and ended by imparting full value to the grandeur of the 4th Symphony.

The program will be repeated Saturday night. Next week the orchestra is out of town. For the concerts of April 18 and 19 Mr Koussevitzky will lead Bach's Suite No. 3, Brahms' Piano Concerto No 1 (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist) and Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

New Music and Classics; Symphony's Season in Review

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony has just completed its 66th season, and the time has come again to look at the record. The most interesting feature of this is always the comparison between what Mr. Koussevitzky in the fall planned to do and what in fact he did. Here's what happened. Of the six new symphonies he announced four were performed: Shostakovitch's No. 9, Copland's No. 3, Milhaud's No. 2 and Guarnieri's No. 1. Neither Piston's 3rd nor Messiaen's was played, but Mr. Koussevitzky at the time he told us of his plans expressed some doubt as to whether the parts would be ready. Four other brand new works were announced, and three were heard: Foss' "Song of Songs," Harris' Variations on a theme by Howard Hanson and Strauss' "Metamorphosen." Paulenc's Concerto in G minor for organ with strings and kettledrums was announced but not played. My guess would be the condition of the Symphony hall organ as the reason why in this instance.

On the whole this is a consistent record and might well be recalled when anyone complains that Mr. Koussevitzky changes his mind often about his programs. The record of new works to be repeated is amusing for the substitutions in those which were announced. Thus we heard Bartok's Music for strings and percussion instead of his Concerto for orchestra, Martinu's Concerto Grosso instead of his Symphony No. 1, Prokofieff's "Chout" instead of his Symphony No. 5; and instead of Stravinsky's "Ode" we had his "Sacre," Symphony in three movements and Symphony of Psalms.

As for "firsts" here is what happened. There were four "firsts anywhere": the Copland and Milhaud symphonies and the Foss and Harris works. The two symphonies were both interesting new music. Copland's was repeated during the season and will be done at Tanglewood, but the Milhaud should not be neglected in spite of the fact that it is not easy to assimilate. The Foss Cantata had a certain superficial musical attraction, but was not a deeply thought out artistic achievement. Harris' tribute to Howard Hanson may be conveniently forgotten, even its full orchestral intonement of "Happy Birthday Dear Teacher."

Pieces performed for the first time in other connections can be tabulated and briefly commented upon as follows: Guarnieri's Symphony (first U. S.—not very distinguished); Hanson's Serenade (first B.S.O.—critical comment as for Harris above); Honegger's Symphony for strings (first U. S.—absolutely first class); Jaubert's Sonata a due (first U. S.—rather like but not nearly so good as Martinu's Concerto Grosso); Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 (first B.S.O.—distinctly minor Rachmaninoff); Roussel's "Ariane et Bacchus" 2nd Suite (first B.S.O.—brilliant orchestral piece and one Koussevitzky should by all means undertake on his own hook); Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 (first Boston—Shostakovitch at his least pompous and most beguiling); Strauss' "Metamorphosen" (first U. S.—technically expert but emotionally cloying and stale); Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 5 (fairly impressive, poetic and introspective work, though not the English composer at his best).

Of the revivals of contemporary music the most rewarding were the Falla pieces in commemoration of his death in November of last year, the Hindemith Violin Concerto, Martinu's Concerto Grosso, Prokofieff's "Chout" and the Stravinsky pieces. All in all I don't think there was much reason to complain about the quantity or quality of modern music this season.

Actually there was rather less modern music than in 1945-46. In fact, the composer who far and away out-distanced any others in the number of his works performed was Brahms with 10, 12 if you count the 3rd Symphony at a Tuesday concert and the Pension Fund Requiem. Beethoven came next with 7, Strauss with 5, Haydn and Wagner with 4 each, Stravinsky and Falla with 3 each and Bruckner, Debussy, Mozart and Tchaikovsky with 2. I don't think in commenting upon these figures that we need have had quite so many repetitions of Brahms and Beethoven Symphonies from the previous season or quite so much Strauss. I am all for the rise over last season in the Haydn figures, if slightly distressed at the falling-off in Mozart. We should really hear some of the latter's piano concertos, which are scandalously neglected.

The figures on guest-conductors and soloists make interesting reading as compared with the New York Philharmonic. Last season we had five of the former. Koussevitzky conducted for 13 pairs, Walter for 4, Bernstein and Burgin for 3 each and Muench for 1. In addition Milhaud and Guarnieri each conducted his own symphony. The Philharmonic last season had 9 conductors, but next season the number will be only 5. As for soloists, this past season we had 10, of whom three were singers in symphonic works and one the viola soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Next season the Philharmonic has announced 19 soloists, of whom 10 are pianists, 7 violinists and 2 cellists. Draw your own conclusions.

So much for the Boston Symphony's 66th season. We can anticipate that the 67th will be much the same. The broadcasting problem has been solved with, I imagine, satisfactory financial results; and, with the shift to Tuesday nights the menace which a radio commitment always is to good program-building has been removed from the regular series. We can also be sur that the orchestra and Mr. Kous sevitzky will continue in that super form which we are sometimes pron to take too much for granted.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLO

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Fifty years ago yesterday morning Johannes Brahms was dying in Vienna of cancer of the liver. For 24 hours he had lain in a coma, his face to the wall. Then shortly before 8:30 on the morning of April 3, 1897, as his friend the pianist Anton Door described it, Brahms turned over in bed "with a sudden jerk, his splendid blue eyes became glazed with a film, and two great tears rolled softly and slowly down his cheeks." At 8:30 Brahms died, without pain, a little more than a month before his 64th birthday. The last of the great German symphonists was gone.

Through the circumstance that today is Good Friday, and therefore the afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this week was played at Symphony Hall yesterday, conductor Serge Koussevitzky was able to commemorate Brahms' passing on the very day a half-century afterward. For the purpose he chose an entire Brahms program (which will be repeated tomorrow evening at 8:30) consisting of the "Academic Festival" Overture; the Alto-Rhapsody on Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter," with Negro contralto Carol Brice as soloist, and a male chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler; the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Fourth Symphony.

Although there are those for whom so much Brahms is too much, even on a ceremonial occasion, this was a good selection of his orchestral music, almost from his earliest to his latest styles. Incidentally, from now to the end of the season, we shall have quite a bit more of Brahms.

Considering the applause and stamping that followed the performance of the "Academic Festival" Overture, it must have been my ears and mood that were at fault, for the orchestra sounded to me unaccountably thick and heavy, and it continued to do so through the afternoon. I seemed to miss that usual, extraordinary blend of light and heat which makes the Boston Symphony sound like no other orchestra.

Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky, welcomed back most cordially after a month's absence from the stand, never strove more earnestly for power and eloquence. And [illegible] true that no matter how beautifully his orchestra plays for the best guest conductors, it responds most fully to Mr. Koussevitzky. Miss Brice may not have been in her best voice yesterday, for she had difficulty with the pitch and some of Brahms' unreasonably wide vocal intervals. But she is an artist of perception and taste, and at her best Miss Brice can be infinitely satisfying. The chorus accomplished well its brief role in the Alto Rhapsody.

BALTIMORE, MD
AFRO AMERICAN
5/3/47

WINS HANCOCK AWARD—Adele Addison, 21, Springfield, Mass., soprano, was one of ten winners of the John Hancock Award enabling her to study at Tanglewood from June 30 to August 10 under the Boston Symphony conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center. A soloist at the Old First Church in Court Square, Springfield, she previously won the Springfield Junior League scholarship and the State audition for the Lavalle Scholarships sponsored by the National Federation of Music Clubs.

RECORD RETAILING
NEW YORK, N.Y
MAY, 1947

PROKOFIEV

"Fifth Symphony." Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Four 12" records. Victor DM-1095. $4.85

In this electrically charged and tonally highly accomplished version the Prokofiev work sounds much more convincing and attractive than in the previously released and, by comparison, rather sluggish performance of Rodzinski on the Columbia label.

Koussevitzky's performance has the further advantage of a first-rate recording job which allows many orchestral nuances to come through with utmost clarity.

New Music and Classics; Symphony's Season in Review

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony has just completed its 66th season, and the time has come again to look at the record. The most interesting feature of this is always the comparison between what Mr. Koussevitzky in the fall planned to do and what in fact he did. Here's what happened. Of the six new symphonies he announced four were performed: Shostakovitch's No. 9, Copland's No. 3, Milhaud's No. 2 and Guarnieri's No. 1. Neither Piston's 3rd nor Messiaen's was played, but Mr. Koussevitzky at the time he told us of his plans expressed some doubt as to whether the parts would be ready. Four other brand new works were announced, and three were heard: Foss' "Song of Songs," Harris' Variations on a theme by Howard Hanson and Strauss' "Metamorphosen." Paulenc's Concerto in G minor for organ with strings and kettledrums was announced but not played. My guess would be the condition of the Symphony hall organ as the reason why in this instance.

On the whole this is a consistent record and might well be recalled when anyone complains that Mr. Koussevitzky changes his mind often about his programs. The record of new works to be repeated is amusing for the substitutions in those which were announced. Thus we heard Bartok's Music for strings and percussion instead of his Concerto for orchestra, Martinu's Concerto Grosso instead of his Symphony No. 1, Prokofieff's "Chout" instead of his Symphony No. 5; and instead of Stravinsky's "Ode" we had his "Sacre," Symphony in three movements and Symphony of Psalms.

As for "firsts" here is what happened. There were four "firsts anywhere": the Copland and Milhaud symphonies and the Foss and Harris works. The two symphonies were both interesting new music. Copland's was repeated during the season and will be done at Tanglewood, but the Milhaud should not be neglected in spite of the fact that it is not easy to assimilate. The Foss Cantata had a certain superficial musical attraction, but was not a deeply thought out artistic achievement. Harris' tribute to Howard Hanson may be conveniently forgotten, even its full orchestral intonement of "Happy Birthday Dear Teacher."

Pieces performed for the first time in other connections can be tabulated and briefly commented upon as follows: Guarnieri's Symphony (first U. S.—not very distinguished); Hanson's Serenade (first B.S.O.—critical comment as for Harris above); Honegger's Symphony for strings (first U. S.—absolutely first class); Jaubert's Sonata a due (first U. S.—rather like but not nearly so good as Martinu's Concerto Grosso); Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 (first B.S.O.—distinctly minor Rachmaninoff); Roussel's "Ariane et Bacchus" 2nd Suite (first B.S.O.—brilliant orchestral piece and one Koussevitzky should by all means undertake on his own hook); Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 (first Boston—Shostakovitch at his least pompous and most beguiling); Strauss' "Metamorphosen" (first U. S.—technically expert but emotionally cloying and stale); Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 5 (fairly impressive, poetic and introspective work, though not the English composer at his best).

Of the revivals of contemporary music the most rewarding were the Falla pieces in commemoration of his death in November of last year, the Hindemith Violin Concerto, Martinu's Concerto Grosso, Prokofieff's "Chout" and the Stravinsky pieces. All in all I don't think there was much reason to complain about the quantity or quality of modern music this season.

Actually there was rather less modern music than in 1945-46. I fact, the composer who far an away out-distanced any others i the number of his works performe was Brahms with 10 (12 if you coun the 3rd Symphony at a Tuesda concert and the Pension Fund Re quiem). Beethoven came next wit 7, Strauss with 5, Haydn and Wagner with 4 each, Stravinsky an Falla with 3 each and Bruckne Debussy, Mozart and Tchaikovsk with 2. I don't think, in commenting upon these figures, that we nee have had quite so many repetition of Brahms and Beethoven Symphonies from the previous season o quite so much Strauss. I am all fo the rise over last season in the Haydn figures, if slightly distresse at the falling-off in Mozart. We should really hear some of the latter's piano concertos, which ar scandalously neglected.

The figures on guest-conductors and soloists make interesting reading as compared with the New York Philharmonic. Last season we had five of the former. Koussevitzky conducted for 13 pairs, Walter for 4, Bernstein and Burgin for 3 each and Muench for 1. In addition Milhaud and Guarnieri each conducted his own symphony. The Philharmonic last season had 9 conductors, but next season the number will be only 5. As for soloists, this past season we had 10, of whom three were singers in symphonic works and one the viola soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Next season the Philharmonic has announced 19 soloists, of whom 10 are pianists, 7 violinists and 2 cellists. Draw your own conclusions.

So much for the Boston Symphony's 66th season. We can anticipate that the 67th will be much the same. The broadcasting problem has been solved with, I imagine, satisfactory financial results; and, with the shift to Tuesday nights, the menace which a radio commitment always is to good program-building has been removed from the regular series. We can also be sure that the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky will continue in that super form which we are sometimes pron to take too much for granted.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 22d regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall. Carol Brice, contralto, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80	Brahms
Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 53	Brahms
Variations on a theme of Haydn, Op. 56A	Brahms
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98	Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

AS THE BOSTON Symphony's official recognition of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms, yesterday's concert was appropriate to the day. An all-Brahms concert is no novelty to Boston audiences, nor have his symphonies been allowed to fall into neglect. All four of them are, in fact, one of the mainstays of orchestra repertory, and they are now as familiar and beloved as they were once mistrusted and feared by many and even by some who should have known better.

Tchaikovsky, you may recall, thought that Joachim Raff was a giant compared to Brahms and that Anton Rubinstein was also an infinitely better composer! He held, too, that Brahms' Violin Concerto, which we now consider the greatest of all, was no finer than a well-constructed pedestal on which was placed, not a statue, but another pedestal. Even so can 50 years make the profound look foolish.

All of the music on yesterday's program was thrice familiar to Boston Symphony audiences, with the exception of the rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky revived this work at the Berkshire Festival last summer, as did he also the Double Concerto, Brahms' last orchestral composition. I wish that Mr. Koussevitzky had seen his way to letting us in Boston hear this latter work, even at the expense of leaving out the 4th Symphony. The 4th is my favorite Brahms symphony, but all the same I should rather listen at this point to the remarkable Double Concerto instead.

THE ALTO RHAPSODY is not one of Brahms' deepest or most important works, but it has a great deal of charm and a sensuous lyrical beauty that makes it well worth hearing now and again. The contrast of the solo contralto with the orchestra and the suddued male chorus as background is singularly effective and pleasant. The chorus for this occasion had been trained by Arthur Fiedler, but was otherwise nameless.

Miss Brice was singing beautifully yesterday, and the clarinet-like quality of her voice was perfect with the orchestra. As for the words of Goethe's poem, however, she might almost as well have sung in Arabic or Sioux. I finally made out with the aid of the program book that she was singing a variant of the English translation there provided and at length I distinctly heard the word, "enlighten," by dint of its being repeated so much. Lovely as Miss Brice's voice was, I suspect that an ideal performance would allow us to hear the text a little more clearly.

Mr. Koussevitzky was in capital form for the concert. He got all there was and then some out of the Academic Festival Overture, gave an intimate and expressive interpretation of the Haydn Variations and ended by imparting full value to the grandeur of the 4th Symphony.

The program will be repeated Saturday night. Next week the orchestra is out of town. For the concerts of April 18 and 19 Mr Koussevitzky will lead Bach's Suite No. 3, Brahms' Piano Concerto No 1 (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist) and Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 2 - 1947

Palestine Symphony Orchestra U. S. Tour Urged by Bernstein

By Homer Bigart

By Telephone From London

Copyright, 1947, New York Tribune Inc.

JERUSALEM, May 1.—Leonard Bernstein, twenty-eight-year-old American composer and conductor, urged today an American tour for the Palestine Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, predicting that its appearance in the United States would be an event of political as well as artistic importance.

In his Jerusalem debut tonight, Mr. Bernstein conducted the orchestra in his difficult "Jeremiah" symphony, receiving an ovation from the 1,600 persons jammed in the Edison Cinema.

Mr. Bernstein paid a glowing tribute to the orchestra, which he said could easily be "the greatest in the world. It would be a terrific honor to conduct it in the United States," Mr. Bernstein said, "and when it comes, I hope I will be the guy to do it."

But first the orchestra needs two months' rehearsals under one conductor, said Mr. Bernstein, declaring that no orchestra could achieve greatness with a parade of guest conductors. He asserted that the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra had sunk to tenth place in two years under visiting maestros.

Without two months' preparation, he said, the orchestra might make a bad impression in America when compared wih the "slick, streamlined performances of the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras."

Mr. Bernstein said the physical conditions under which the orchestra labors are "scandalous." The only remedy, he said, is a big hall so the orchestra would not have to repeat the same program again and again.

"He recalled that last month the orchestra was compelled to play Caesar Franck's Symphony in D seven times in three weeks. He had heard the last of these performances and thought it remarkable that the orchestra was able to play the symphony with inspiration and fire.

"But it is a very sad situation and exhausting both to the orchestra and conductor," he said. "Besides how can you rehearse intelligently in rooms hardly large enough to squeeze the orchestra inside. Saturday night we rehearsed in a gymnasium so small that I had only a vague idea what the double basses were doing. When the orchestra played anything above pianissimo, I had to hold my ears."

Mr. Bernstein found Palestine audiences most responsive, adding that he felt "almost ashamed and guilty at the tornado of applause" he had received last week at Tel Aviv. "I found myself weeping on the forty-third bow," he said. "During the music, I could feel the audience rising with every crescendo, relaxing with every cadence and registering every musical event."

The Palestine orchestra operates on a budget of only £72,000 ($288,000) and the players receive only £30 to £35 monthly.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Fifty years ago yesterday morning Johannes Brahms was dying in Vienna of cancer of the liver. For 24 hours he had lain in a coma, his face to the wall. Then shortly before 8:30 on the morning of April 3, 1897, as his friend the pianist Anton Door described it, Brahms turned over in bed "with a sudden jerk, his splendid blue eyes became glazed with a film, and two great tears rolled softly and slowly down his cheeks." At 8:30 Brahms died, without pain, a little more than a month before his 64th birthday. The last of the great German symphonists was gone.

Through the circumstance that today is Good Friday, and therefore the afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this week was played at Symphony Hall yesterday, conductor Serge Koussevitzky was able to commemorate Brahms' passing on the very day a half-century afterward. For the purpose he chose an entire Brahms program (which will be repeated tomorrow evening at 8:30) consisting of the "Academic Festival" Overture; the Alto Rhapsody on Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter," with Negro contralto Carol Brice as soloist, and a male chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler; the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Fourth Symphony.

Although there are those for whom so much Brahms is too much, even on a ceremonial occasion, this was a good selection of his orchestral music, almost from his earliest to his latest styles. Incidentally, from now to the end of the season, we shall have quite a bit more of Brahms.

Considering the applause and stamping that followed the performance of the "Academic Festival" Overture, it must have been my ears and mood that were at fault, for the orchestra sounded to me unaccountably thick and heavy, and it continued to do so through the afternoon. I seemed to miss that usual, extraordinary blend of light and heat which makes the Boston Symphony sound like no other orchestra.

Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky, welcomed back most cordially after a month's absence from the stand, never strove more earnestly for power and eloquence. And [illegible] true that no matter how beautifully his orchestra plays for the best guest conductors, it responds most fully to Mr. Koussevitzky. Miss Brice may not have been in her best voice yesterday, for she had difficulty with the pitch and some of Brahms' unreasonably wide vocal intervals. But she is an artist of perception and taste, and at her best Miss Brice can be infinitely satisfying. The chorus accomplished well its brief role in the Alto Rhapsody.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLO

THE ROVING REPORTER

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

62d Pops Season Opens with Fiedler & Company Fresh and Vigorous in Light Classical Program

The bustle in the back room ten minutes before Pops time was such that you'd never think Arthur Fiedler had ever been on a stage conducting a few score musicians before. The green room, which is a sort of a slush gray and not green at all, was crowded with musicians, ushers, gladioli, pianos, music, posters, photographs, well-wishers and a few people who'd gone in the wrong door.

It's always like that, they say, when the Pops take off for the 60-day stretch in Symphony Hall; almost as gala out back as it is out front. One of the reasons for it is the tradition, long established by the musicians of the orchestra, of sending Mr. Fiedler a sheaf of fake telegrams congratulating him on the opening of the season. A good many of them of course, aren't fakes, for Mr. Fiedler's success is the considerable concern of many well-wishers indeed, but enough of them are to make it hilarious for the musicians.

In the Mood

So the conductor's desk was piled high with them. "I live in South Denver (read one) and we have mountain time. When I hear 'Sunday at 4:30' it is 2:30 here. My sister lives in Wyoming and has Pacific time. She hears 'Sunday at 4:30' at 1:30 when I call her up at 2:30. Now with Daylight Saving Time do I call her up at 3:30 to hear you at 5:30? And if the Pops go on at 8:30 please tell me what time my sister should phone me so I won't miss the movie at 7:30." Another one went "I seen the picture 'Duel in the Sun.' Please wire was RCA victor?" Private jokes, mostly, but riotous for those giving and receiving—and putting them all in the mood.

By the time the first bell rang, however, the jokes were over, and the musicians took their places on the stage. Mr. Fiedler looked over his time-table—for when the Pops are on the air things have to go through without a hitch—and walked to the stage door, through which came the sound of the musicians tuning up and the over-all clatter of the voices in the hall below. When the clock's second hand hit 8:29, he went through the door, strode to the conductor's stand, looked up at the radio booth in the wall alongside the organ, and the 62d season of the Pops began.

Corresponding as they do to the onset of Daylight Saving time, putting screens on windows, looking at vacation advertising and spring fever, the Pops are always pleasantly nostalgic affairs. And they were pleasanter than usual last night, I'd say. They were pretty good last year, but there was more tension in the air then; a little more talk of trouble with Russia, or worry about atom bombs and one thing and another. Last night there seemed more of an air of relaxation, of reassurance.

The music last night was typical of Mr. Fiedler's genius for figuring out a program of light classical music which proves to be highly agreeable to the audience. Sometimes one or two are unfamiliar, such as the engaging Benjamin Britten suite based on the music of Rossini, but even the unfamiliar ones have that certain Pops flavor and quickly catch on.

The concert began with "Pomp and Circumstance," always a favorite with Pops-goers. Other pieces were "Music of the Spheres" by Josef Strauss, "Ranch House Party" by Gillis, the Overture to "Tannhaueser" by Wagner, "Finlandia," by Sibelius, a piece from the picture "Duel in the Sun," a medley from "Annie Get Your Gun," Anderson's latest novelty "Fiddle-Faddle" and Gould's "American Salute." There were plenty of encores, too.

Never Sounded Better

The orchestra, in the Pops groove from a full season of Sunday afternoons at 4:30 where the repertoire is somewhat similar to the Pops programs, never sounded better. It was fresh, vigorous and splendid-sounding, responding to the conductor's leadership with elan and enthusiasm. Although the floor audience drifted in little by little, as its time-honored custom, ten minutes after concert time there was hardly a vacant seat in the house, while the balcony audience hung over the railing in attention.

In short, although we've been having the Pops around here for 62 or so years now and you'd think the novelty would have worn off a little, it hasn't at all. On the contrary, they get better—and harder to get into—every season.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

MAY 2 - 1947

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, operatic, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center constituting membership in the society.

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAY - 1947

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard: $3). Since Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to American music has been of the greatest value and dignity, it is not too difficult to forgive Dr. Leichtentritt's eulogistic manner of recounting the conductor's achievements as artist and educator. Most of the volume is a survey of the development of American orchestral music through description (usually flattering) of the more than a hundred American scores performed by Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 3 - 1947

CRITICS CONTINUE THEIR APPRAISAL

Discussion Period and Concert Also Held on Second Day of Harvard Symposium

BY RUTH TRIPP

In Cambridge, yesterday afternoon, the second day of the Harvard Symposium on Music Criticism proceeded through various paths of discerning appraisal of the various functions of this profession.

Alfred Frankenstein, music critic of the San Francisco Chronicle, was chairman of the morning meeting. He addressed his colleagues as "those who drive the thin wedge of music into the news columns."

Edgar Wind, who is William Allen Nielson, research professor in art at Smith College, gave a brilliant exposition of "The Critical Nature of a Work of Art." His theory is that are is stimulated by criticism and that, by its intrusion into our daily lives, art and through it, the creative artist, possess extraordinary power for good or evil. His views on censorship of the arts was enlightening. He maintains that the critic should be only concerned as to whether or not the creative artist achieved what he set out to do and not with his original decision to do it.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist and lecturer, read a paper on "The Performer as Critic." It included references to her term as music critic of The New York Post. She expressed the hope that the decentralization of music now going on in the concert world in the United States might lead to a similar situation in the field of music criticism so that it would not be solely the accolade of the New York critic which would influence managers.

Virgil Thomson music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, read a paper on "The Art of Judging Music." His talk, as was expected, was replete with short, well-aimed sentences. However, when he attempted to give a verbal outline of musical texture, as it can be analyzed from a knowledge of contrapuntal devices, his talk missed its point.' Possibly he is accustomed to a newsroom for his flow of ideas. The atmosphere of Sanders Theatre scarcely suggests a deadline.

An afternoon session was devoted to a discussion period.

The evening concert presented three choral compositions which were commissioned for the Symposium. The works were performed in the Memorial Church and were heard for the first time.

"Apparebit Repentina Dies," a work for mixed chorus and brass instruments written by Paul Hindemith, was sung by The Collegiate Chorale of New York, Robert Shaw, conductor. The brass players were members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The text was a Latin poem Anonymous, before A. D. 700. The setting was true Hindemith writing which amassed volumes of vocal tone by means of horizontal writing and paid little attention to the text. The portions for brass alone were skillfully contrived and the manner of accompanying used by the instrumentalists was in proper proportion and truly beautiful.

The Malipiero work, second on the list, was titled "La Terra." Its text was taken from Book I of the Georgics of Virgil. The Chorale was accompanied by Mary Crowley, organist. It was pleasant music, mildly dissonant for the most part and violently so for the balance of the way. Here again it was not easy to get the words, even though the text was printed in the program. The thickness of the score interfered with the words. This was not due to a defect in the diction of the chorus, which did a remarkably fine piece of work with a difficult assignment.

The most interesting and appealing work presented was Aaron Copland's "In the Beginning . . ." for mixed chorus a capella with mezzo-soprano solo. The solo part was sung by Nell Tangeman. The text for this work was from Genesis I:1-II:7. The narrative was done by the solo voice and the summary of each day's accomplishment was outlined by the chorus. Most interesting devices were employed and complete clarity was maintained throughout the difficult composition. Copland appears to have the facility to write well either for voices or for instruments. His work seemed inspired and its presentation was given in an inspired manner.

• The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

MUCH WORK . . . OR NO PLAY

By NANCY D. DEAN, Providence '46

FEW people realize the work connected with running an orchestra, such as the Boston Symphony. The orchestra, founded in 1881, has about ten different offices at the hall and approximately thirty-five people on the staff plus the 110 men in the orchestra.

During the winter, four series of concerts are given in Boston at Symphony Hall (twenty-four Friday afternoons, twenty-four Saturday evenings, six Sundays, six Tuesdays) and six concerts in Cambridge at Sanders Theatre. In addition, the orchestra gives five concerts in New York, five in Providence, and others in New Haven, Brooklyn, Pittsburgh, Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, New London, Washington, Hartford, White Plains, Northampton, Newark, and Philadelphia. If one were in the vicinity of Symphony Hall on a Friday morning, he would be amazed to see the lines that form on the steps waiting for Rush Seats. The doors open at one-thirty, and the waiting crowd barges in, everyone trying to get the best seat. With a seat possessed and watched over by a neighbor as "occupied," the owner may go upstairs to the lunchroom where lunch is served each Friday. On days when there is a soloist, you sometimes will find people waiting on the steps as early as ten-thirty in the morning.

The Season Ticket Office handles all the subscriptions for the Boston concerts. The subscription list totals some six thousand and is taken care of through a card system. During the past year there has been a great demand for tickets, especially among the servicemen. There is regularly a long waiting list.

Another busy department is the Berkshire Festival Office which handles the series tickets for the twelve concerts given at Tanglewood each summer. Also connected with this office is the Berkshire Music Center, which takes care of the Music School held for six weeks in the summer, also at Tanglewood. Members of the orchestra are on the faculty, and last year there were about 400 students at the school. Thousands of music lovers from all over the country go to the Berkshires each summer to hear the orchestra play in the open air Music Shed.

Among the activities requiring considerable office work are the Pops concerts given at Symphony Hall six nights a week, from April twenty-ninth to June twenty-eighth. The name Pops is alleged to have originated jointly from popular, designating the character of the programs, and the sound resulting from the abrupt withdrawal of a champagne cork (although currently the liquid refreshment is more likely to be beer or Coca-Cola). These concerts, under the capable baton of Arthur Fiedler, are always "sell-outs." This year there have been twice as many applications for college and school nights at Pops as we can possibly take care of. There are 1,180 table seats on the floor, with five at a table, in addition to the regular seats in the first and second balconies. (The annual Katharine Gibbs night at Pops has become a major activity of the Boston alumnae.)

The Esplanade Concerts given on the Charles River Esplanade in the Hatch Memorial Shell are enjoyed by the general public for three weeks during the summer. There is no admission charge for these concerts; therefore, the orchestra appeals to its friends for support. And this entails its share of secretarial work.

The Symphony is not a profit-making organization but appeals annually to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for funds. Anyone may become a Friend by making a contribution to the orchestra. Such contributors hold an annual Friends Meeting in February at which Dr. Koussevitzky presides.

The New York and Providence subscriptions are handled at our office in Symphony Hall. The two series are completely subscribed before the season opens, and right now there is a waiting list of about 1,300.

Another very busy office is our addressograph department. Until a few years ago, all promotional mailings were hand addressed which, of course, took weeks of work. Now stencils are typed for each person and run through a machine. Big mailings no longer have any terror for the staff.

I have tried to give a little glimpse into each department. My own job is quite varied. When I went to work in September, I was assigned to the Season Ticket Office which at that time was very busy getting ready for the fall concerts. After the Boston concerts got well under way, I was transferred to the New York and Providence subscriptions, and at present I am in the Berkshire Festival Office working upon the renewals for the concerts this summer.

I find my job most interesting. For one who loves music as I do, there couldn't be a nicer place to work. The orchestra rehearses from ten to one, four mornings a week, and it is not difficult to imagine where I spend any free time I can find during these rehearsal periods.

THE ROVING REPORTER

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

62d Pops Season Opens with Fiedler & Company Fresh and Vigorous in Light Classical Program

The bustle in the back room ten minutes before Pops time was such that you'd never think Arthur Fiedler had ever been on a stage conducting a few score musicians before. The green room, which is a sort of a slush gray and not green at all, was crowded with musicians, ushers, gladioli, pianos, music, posters, photographs, well-wishers and a few people who'd gone in the wrong door.

It's always like that, they say, when the Pops take off for the 60-day stretch in Symphony Hall; almost as gala out back as it is out front. One of the reasons for it is the tradition, long established by the musicians of the orchestra, of sending Mr. Fiedler a sheaf of fake telegrams congratulating him on the opening of the season. A good many of them of course, aren't fakes, for Mr. Fiedler's success is the considerable concern of many well-wishers indeed, but enough of them are to make it hilarious for the musicians.

In the Mood

So the conductor's desk was piled high with them. "I live in South Denver (read one) and we have mountain time. When I hear 'Sunday at 4:30' it is 2:30 here. My sister lives in Wyoming and has Pacific time. She hears 'Sunday at 4:30' at 1:30 when I call her up at 2:30. Now with Daylight Saving Time do I call her up at 3:30 to hear you at 5:30? And if the Pops go on at 8:30 please tell me what time my sister should phone me so I won't miss the movie at 7:30." Another one went "I seen the picture 'Duel in the Sun.' Please wire was RCA victor?" Private jokes, mostly, but riotous for those giving and receiving—and putting them all in the mood.

By the time the first bell rang, however, the jokes were over, and the musicians took their places on the stage. Mr. Fiedler looked over his time-table—for when the Pops are on the air things have to go through without a hitch—and walked to the stage door, through which came the sound of the musicians tuning up and the over-all clatter of the voices in the hall below. When the clock's second hand hit 8:29, he went through the door, strode to the conductor's stand, looked up at the radio booth in the wall alongside the organ, and the 62d season of the Pops began.

Corresponding as they do to the onset of Daylight Saving time, putting screens on windows, looking at vacation advertising and spring fever, the Pops are always pleasantly nostalgic affairs. And they were pleasanter than usual last night, I'd say. They were pretty good last year, but there was more tension in the air then; a little more talk of trouble with Russia, or worry about atom bombs and one thing and another. Last night there seemed more of an air of relaxation, of reassurance.

The music last night was typical of Mr. Fiedler's genius for figuring out a program of light classical music which proves to be highly agreeable to the audience. Sometimes one or two are unfamiliar, such as the engaging Benjamin Britten suite based on the music of Rossini, but even the unfamiliar ones have that certain Pops flaver and quickly catch on.

The concert began with "Pomp and Circumstance," always a favorite with Pops-goers. Other pieces were "Music of the Spheres" by Josef Strauss, "Ranch House Party" by Gillis, the Overture to "Tannhaueser" by Wagner, "Finlandia," by Sibelius, a piece from the picture "Duel in the Sun," a medley from "Annie Get Your Gun," Anderson's latest novelty "Fiddle-Faddle" and Gould's "American Salute." There were plenty of encores, too.

Never Sounded Better

The orchestra, in the Pops groove from a full season of Sunday afternoons at 4:30 where the repertoire is somewhat similar to the Pops programs, never sounded better. It was fresh, vigorous and splendid-sounding, responding to the conductor's leadership with elan and enthusiasm. Although the floor audience drifted in little by little, as its time-honored custom, ten minutes after concert time there was hardly a vacant seat in the house, while the balcony audience hung over the railing in attention.

In short, although we've been having the Pops around here for 62 or so years now and you'd think the novelty would have worn off a little, it hasn't at all. On the contrary, they get better—and harder to get into—every season.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
MAY 2- 1947

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, operatic, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center constituting membership in the society.

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY - 1947

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard: $3). Since Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to American music has been of the greatest value and dignity, it is not too difficult to forgive Dr. Leichtentritt's eulogistic manner of recounting the conductor's achievements as artist and educator. Most of the volume is a survey of the development of American orchestral music through description (usually flattering) of the more than a hundred American scores performed by Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 3 - 1947

CRITICS CONTINUE THEIR APPRAISAL

Discussion Period and Concert Also Held on Second Day of Harvard Symposium

BY RUTH TRIPP

In Cambridge, yesterday afternoon, the second day of the Harvard Symposium on Music Criticism proceeded through various paths of discerning appraisal of the various functions of this profession.

Alfred Frankenstein, music critic of the San Francisco Chronicle, was chairman of the morning meeting. He addressed his colleagues as "those who drive the thin wedge of music into the news columns."

Edgar Wind, who is William Allen Nielson, research professor in art at Smith College, gave a brilliant exposition of "The Critical Nature of a Work of Art." His theory is that are is stimulated by criticism and that, by its intrusion into our daily lives, art and through it, the creative artist, possess extraordinary power for good or evil. His views on censorship of the arts was enlightening. He maintains that the critic should be only concerned as to whether or not the creative artist achieved what he set out to do and not with his original decision to do it.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist and lecturer, read a paper on "The Performer as Critic." It included references to her term as music critic of The New York Post. She expressed the hope that the decentralization of music now going on in the concert world in the United States might lead to a similar situation in the field of music criticism so that it would not be solely the accolade of the New York critic which would influence managers.

Virgil Thomson music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, read a paper on "The Art of Judging Music." His talk, as was expected was replete with short, well-aimed sentences. However, when he attempted to give a verbal outline of musical texture, as it can be analyzed from a knowledge of contrapuntal devices, his talk missed its point. Possibly he is accustomed to a newsroom for his flow of ideas. The atmosphere of Sanders Theatre scarcely suggests a deadline.

An afternoon session was devoted to a discussion period.

The evening concert presented three choral compositions which were commissioned for the Symposium. The works were performed in the Memorial Church and were heard for the first time.

"Apparebit Repentina Dies," a work for mixed chorus and brass instruments written by Paul Hindemith, was sung by The Collegiate Chorale of New York, Robert Shaw, conductor. The brass players were members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The text was a Latin poem Anonymous, before A. D. 700. The setting was true Hindemith writing which amassed volumes of vocal tone by means of horizontal writing and paid little attention to the text. The portions for brass alone were skillfully contrived and the manner of accompanying used by the instrumentalists was in proper proportion and truly beautiful.

The Malipiero work, second on the list, was titled "La Terra." Its text was taken from Book I of the Georgics of Virgil. The Chorale was accompanied by Mary Crowley, organist. It was pleasant music, mildly dissonant for the most part and violently so for the balance of the way. Here again it was not easy to get the words, even though the text was printed in the program. The thickness of the score interfered with the words. This was not due to a defect in the diction of the chorus, which did a remarkably fine piece of work with a difficult assignment.

The most interesting and appealing work presented was Aaron Copland's "In the Beginning . . ." for mixed chorus a capella with mezzo-soprano solo. The solo part was sung by Nell Tangeman. The text for this work was from Genesis I:1-II:7. The narrative was done by the solo voice and the summary of each day's accomplishment was outlined by the chorus. Most interesting devices were employed and complete clarity was maintained throughout the difficult composition. Copland appears to have the facility to write well either for voices or for instruments. His work seemed inspired and its presentation was given in an inspired manner.

• The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

MUCH WORK . . . OR NO PLAY

By NANCY D. DEAN, Providence '46

FEW people realize the work connected with running an orchestra, such as the Boston Symphony. The orchestra, founded in 1881, has about ten different offices at the hall and approximately thirty-five people on the staff plus the 110 men in the orchestra.

During the winter, four series of concerts are given in Boston at Symphony Hall (twenty-four Friday afternoons, twenty-four Saturday evenings, six Sundays, six Tuesdays) and six concerts in Cambridge at Sanders Theatre. In addition, the orchestra gives five concerts in New York, five in Providence, and others in New Haven, Brooklyn, Pittsburgh, Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, New London, Washington, Hartford, White Plains, Northampton, Newark, and Philadelphia. If one were in the vicinity of Symphony Hall on a Friday morning, he would be amazed to see the lines that form on the steps waiting for Rush Seats. The doors open at one-thirty, and the waiting crowd barges in, everyone trying to get the best seat. With a seat possessed and watched over by a neighbor as "occupied," the owner may go upstairs to the lunchroom where lunch is served each Friday. On days when there is a soloist, you sometimes will find people waiting on the steps as early as ten-thirty in the morning.

The Season Ticket Office handles all the subscriptions for the Boston concerts. The subscription list totals some six thousand and is taken care of through a card system. During the past year there has been a great demand for tickets, especially among the servicemen. There is regularly a long waiting list.

Another busy department is the Berkshire Festival Office which handles the series tickets for the twelve concerts given at Tanglewood each summer. Also connected with this office is the Berkshire Music Center, which takes care of the Music School held for six weeks in the summer, also at Tanglewood. Members of the orchestra are on the faculty, and last year there were about 400 students at the school. Thousands of music lovers from all over the country go to the Berkshires each summer to hear the orchestra play in the open air Music Shed.

Among the activities requiring considerable office work are the Pops concerts given at Symphony Hall six nights a week, from April twenty-ninth to June twenty-eighth. The name Pops is alleged to have originated jointly from popular, designating the character of the programs, and the sound resulting from the abrupt withdrawal of a champagne cork (although currently the liquid refreshment is more likely to be beer or Coca-Cola). These concerts, under the capable baton of Arthur Fiedler, are always "sell-outs." This year there have been twice as many applications for college and school nights at Pops as we can possibly take care of. There are 1,180 table seats on the floor, with five at a table, in addition to the regular seats in the first and second balconies. (The annual Katharine Gibbs night at Pops has become a major activity of the Boston alumnae.)

The Esplanade Concerts given on the Charles River Esplanade in the Hatch Memorial Shell are enjoyed by the general public for three weeks during the summer. There is no admission charge for these concerts; therefore, the orchestra appeals to its friends for support. And this entails its share of secretarial work.

The Symphony is not a profit-making organization but appeals annually to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for funds. Anyone may become a Friend by making a contribution to the orchestra. Such contributors hold an annual Friends Meeting in February at which Dr. Koussevitzky presides.

The New York and Providence subscriptions are handled at our office in Symphony Hall. The two series are completely subscribed before the season opens, and right now there is a waiting list of about 1,300.

Another very busy office is our addressograph department. Until a few years ago, all promotional mailings were hand addressed which, of course, took weeks of work. Now stencils are typed for each person and run through a machine. Big mailings no longer have any terror for the staff.

I have tried to give a little glimpse into each department. My own job is quite varied. When I went to work in September, I was assigned to the Season Ticket Office which at that time was very busy getting ready for the fall concerts. After the Boston concerts got well under way, I was transferred to the New York and Providence subscriptions, and at present I am in the Berkshire Festival Office working upon the renewals for the concerts this summer.

I find my job most interesting. For one who loves music as I do, there couldn't be a nicer place to work. The orchestra rehearses from ten to one, four mornings a week, and it is not difficult to imagine where I spend any free time I can find during these rehearsal periods.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 4 - 1947

Composer's Champion

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music. By Hugo Leichtentritt. 199 pp. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. $3.

By MORRIS C. HASTINGS

HUGO LEICHTENTRITT'S valuable new book on Serge Koussevitzky is not so much a biography of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor as it is a well-deserved tribute to the great musician as a devoted champion of the American composer. The greater part of the study is given over to an account and a critical estimate of each of the American works—and this includes music both by native-born and naturalized artists—played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from October, 1924, when Koussevitzky became conductor of the organization, to April, 1944.

The record is enormously impressive and unparalleled by any other director or orchestra in the concert hall. In these twenty seasons the Boston Symphony has presented the first performance of no fewer than sixty-six American compositions; and in this time it has performed a grand total of 162 different works by creative artists of this country.

This does not represent "the average of the American production" but "the cream of the crop, fastidiously selected by Koussevitzky," Dr. Leichtentritt tells us; and the omissions, he suggests, are as significant as the favored musicians. For example, "The loud, aggressive sensationalism of composers like Edgar Varese, George Antheil, Henry Cowell, Leo Ornstein did not appeal to him. Similarly, the extreme stubborn individualism of those strange old Yankee musicians Carl Ruggles and Charles E. Ives did not attract him, and he had little interest in the universally known celebrities of radio music—they did not need his patronage."

Of the composers who have been represented on the B.S.O. programs, Aaron Copland heads the list with eleven works played; and after him come Walter Piston with nine different compositions, Nicolai Berezowsky with eight, Roy Harris with six, and William Schuman and Samuel Barber with five apiece.

"SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY" actually is a brief, well-informed and entertaining history of American music from the conservative days of Chadwick and Foote and Loeffler, through the startling period when Gruenberg wrote "Daniel Jazz" and John Alden Carpenter his "Adventures in a Perambulator," to the present time in which composers seem on the verge of a genuine and compelling Americanism.

Dr. Leichtentritt fits the American composers into a number of neat categories. There are those like Taylor and Converse and Griffes who were influenced largely by the French impressionists; others—Bloch and Jacobi—are described as "remarkable exponents of Jewish music"; still others, such as Berezowsky and Koutzen and Dukelsky, disclose their Russian origin. There is the "American neo-classical school," inspired by Hindemith and Stravinsky, whose leaders are Piston and Sessions; and, finally, there are the composers—Copland, Harris and Schuman—who add "to the neo-classic substance various other ingredients, notably a stronger accent on Americanism."

The author's estimates of the composers and music under consideration are always interesting and often controversial. Hanson's Fourth symphony he considers "one of the noblest works ever written in America." He thinks it may be Roy Harris' mission "to champion the dignity of music in America." While admitting Leonard Bernstein's phenomenal gifts, he reminds that young man that "to disperse one's talents too ambitiously can only lead in the long run to mediocrity in all fields or even collapse."

In his introduction, the author hurriedly sketches Koussevitzky's extraordinary career abroad and in the United States. And he devotes two chapters to "Artist Koussevitzky" and "Koussevitzky as Educator." In the former, he gives an enthusiastic and illuminating critique of the conductor's interpretations and methods of realizing them. In the second of the two chapters, Dr. Leichtentritt examines Koussevitzky's noble work in establishing the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and his enkindling fight for a Federal subsidy of the arts.

The volume concludes with a memorable statement by Koussevitzky himself, which expresses his personality and genius. "The only ground for our authority," he writes, "is the love for us and for our work; and if this were absent, all else would be futility and emptiness. * * * But for such love to be able to arise it is necessary first of all that we ourselves do not smoulder like dying embers, but are aflame with sacred love for that which we serve, and those whom we serve—that is to say, for living art and living men."

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAY 5 1947

Famous Composers Attend Harvard Music Symposium

BY HILMAR GRONDAHL
Music Editor, The Oregonian

CAMBRIDGE, May 4 (Special)—Harvard's first symposium on music criticism opened Wednesday with Sanders theater crammed with critics, composers conductors and educators from all over the country. Serge Koussevitzky was in the audience, as were several famous composers, to hear manuscript performances of works commissioned especially for this symposium.

E. M. Forster, famous English author of "Passage to India" and other novels, flew the Atlantic to deliver a paper on "The Raison d'Etre of Criticism in the Arts."

New Works Performed

That is the kind of affair this is. Undertaken in the spirit of adventure, as Archibald T. Davison, dean of the department of music said, these sessions have aroused an interest beyond anything imagined. It is hard to put into a few hundred words the content of a day which included talks by Dr. Davison, and Dr. Paul H. Buck, provost of Harvard; lectures by Forster and Roger Sessions, and the performance by the Walden string quartet of three new compositions by Walter Piston, Arnold Schoenberg and Bohuslav Martinu.

The three new chamber works were Piston's string quartet 1947; Schoenberg's trio Opus 45 in one movement, and Martinu's quartet No. 6.

To me the most rewarding section was the first movement of Martinu's composition, which was as fluent, spontaneous and bubbling with life and spirit as though written by a contemporary Dvorak. Here were mood, movement and melody associated in the most expressive and grateful relationships—beautiful, alive, sane. The second movement was a deceptive andante with a quick accompanying figure which didn't say much. The final movement, though better than the second, seemed forced and quite devoid of conviction.

Trio Shows Talent

Schoenberg's trio was another of his masterly expansions of the known resources of violin viola and cello. His effects are something like Norman Corwin might dream up for a planetary course through the stratosphere with some riccocheting of small astral bodies and a few real bang-up collisions. It's ethereal, but is it music?

Piston's quartet was down to earth in a very enjoyable and modern sense.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
MAY 1 0 1947

Conductor's Restraints Removed By Court

The appellate division of the supreme court has just removed the last of a series of restraints obtained by Serge Koussevitzky against Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers of Moses Smith's unauthorized biography of the Boston conductor. According to the publishers, this was the final step in a series of legal moves by Koussevitzky to prevent the distribution of the book.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMSTERDAM STAR NEWS
MAY 1 0 1947

Awards For Winchell, Koussevitzky, Granz

The Peoples Committee will present awards to Norman Granz, Serge Koussevitzky and Walter Winchell at their June 16 "Negro Freedom Rally, Hazel Scott, chairman of the committee announced Wednesday, at a press conference held in her dressing room at the Roxy Theatre.

The awards will be presented to the men for their efforts to bring about better racial relations through their respective fields. Granz is director of the Jazz At The Philharmonic Concerts, Koussevitzky is director of the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra and Winchell is the famous journalist and radio commentator.

PIC
NEW YORK CITY
MAY -3 1947

THREE YEARS TO GO

At 24, Lukas Foss is a composer, pianist and conductor, and brilliant in all three fields. Foss first came to the attention of serious musicians eight years ago when musical publications called him a new talent of importance. Since then he has been official pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has guest-conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic, taught at the Berkshire Music Center, and has had his music played by three major symphony orchestras. Among his many compositions, his Song of Songs, for soprano and orchestra, has been acclaimed by Stokowski and Koussevitsky as his greatest work.

When Foss was 17, the New York critics hailed him for his work The Tempest. That notice was the first in a long list of awards, scholarships, and commissions, including both a Pulitzer Scholarship and a Guggenheim Fellowship. In 1944 Fritz Reiner predicted, "Lukas Foss will be one of America's great conductors within six years."

In 1942 Foss made musical history when the New York Philharmonic spent $5,000 to put on his hour-long cantata, The Prairie, sung by the Westminster Choir and four soloists. In the past only the acknowledged musical "greats" have rated such productions.

Foss studied piano with Julius Hereford in Berlin, spent three years at the Paris Conservatory, and later studied under Koussevitsky at Berkshire and Hindemith at Yale. He speaks English, French, and German fluently, and just as excitedly as he plays the piano. At the piano he yells himself hoarse and often pounds out of key. Carl Sandburg has described him as the "demon welterweight composer."

Despite his many accomplishments and honors, Lukas is not resting on laurels. He's as full of musical ideas as he is of energy, a combination that can't, as Virgil Thompson put it, "fail to raise the standard of musical achievement in his whole generation."

RUTH ORKIN

Triple-Threat Man on a Keyboard
Foss is composer, pianist, conductor personality, and wholesome good looks, told him to go into pictures. Audie passed up other movie propositions to cast his lot with the Cagneys. "I'd like to be as good an actor as they tell me I was a soldier," says Audie, whose soon-to-be-released first picture ought to indicate how well he is succeeding.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 4 - 1947

Composer's Champion

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music. By Hugo Leichtentritt. 199 pp. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. $3.

By MORRIS C. HASTINGS

HUGO LEICHTENTRITT'S valuable new book on Serge Koussevitzky is not so much a biography of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor as it is a well-deserved tribute to the great musician as a devoted champion of the American composer. The greater part of the study is given over to an account and a critical estimate of each of the American works—and this includes music both by native-born and naturalized artists—played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from October, 1924, when Koussevitzky became conductor of the organization, to April, 1944.

The record is enormously impressive and unparalleled by any other director or orchestra in the concert hall. In these twenty seasons the Boston Symphony has presented the first performance of no fewer than sixty-six American compositions; and in this time it has performed a grand total of 162 different works by creative artists of this country.

This does not represent "the average of the American production" but "the cream of the crop, fastidiously selected by Koussevitzky," Dr. Leichtentritt tells us; and the omissions, he suggests, are as significant as the favored musicians. For example, "The loud, aggressive sensationalism of composers like Edgar Varese, George Antheil, Henry Cowell, Leo Ornstein did not appeal to him. Similarly, the extreme stubborn individualism of those strange old Yankee musicians Carl Ruggles and Charles E. Ives did not attract him, and he had little interest in the universally known celebrities of radio music—they did not need his patronage."

Of the composers who have been represented on the B.S.O. programs, Aaron Copland heads the list with eleven works played, and after him come Walter Piston with nine different compositions, Nicolai Berezowsky with eight, Roy Harris with six, and William Schuman and Samuel Barber with five apiece.

"SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY" actually is a brief, well-informed and entertaining history of American music from the conservative days of Chadwick and Foote and Loeffler, through the startling period when Gruenberg wrote "Daniel Jazz" and John Alden Carpenter his "Adventures in a Perambulator," to the present time in which composers seem on the verge of a genuine and compelling Americanism.

Dr. Leichtentritt fits the American composers into a number of neat categories. There are those like Taylor and Converse and Griffes who were influenced largely by the French impressionists; others—Bloch and Jacobi—are described as "remarkable exponents of Jewish music"; still others, such as Berezowsky and Koutzen and Dukelsky, disclose their Russian origin.

"American neo-classical school," inspired by Hindemith and Stravinsky, whose leaders are Piston and Sessions; and, finally, there are the composers—Copland, Harris and Schuman—who add "to the neo-classic substance various other ingredients, notably a stronger accent on Americanism."

The author's estimates of the composers and music under consideration are always interesting and often controversial. Hanson's Fourth symphony he considers "one of the noblest works ever written in America." He thinks it may be Roy Harris' mission "to champion the dignity of music in America." While admitting Leonard Bernstein's phenomenal gifts, he reminds that young man that "to disperse one's talents too ambitiously can only lead in the long run to mediocrity in all fields or even collapse."

In his introduction, the author hurriedly sketches Koussevitzky's extraordinary career abroad and in the United States. And he devotes two chapters to "Artist Koussevitzky" and "Koussevitzky as Educator." In the former, he gives an enthusiastic and illuminating critique of the conductor's interpretations and methods of realizing them. In the second of the two chapters, Dr. Leichtentritt examines Koussevitzky's noble work in establishing the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and his enkindling fight for a Federal subsidy of the arts.

The volume concludes with a memorable statement by Koussevitzky himself, which expresses his personality and genius. "The only ground for our authority," he writes, "is the love for us and for our work; and if this were absent, all else would be futility and emptiness. * * * But for such love to be able to arise it is necessary first of all that we ourselves do not smoulder like dying embers, but are aflame with sacred love for that which we serve, and those whom we serve—that is to say, for living art and living men."

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAY 5 1947

Famous Composers Attend Harvard Music Symposium

BY HILMAR GRONDAHL
Music Editor, The Oregonian

CAMBRIDGE, May 4 (Special)—Harvard's first symposium on music criticism opened Wednesday with Sanders theater crammed with critics, composers conductors and educators from all over the country. Serge Koussevitzky was in the audience, as were several famous composers, to hear manuscript performances of works commissioned especially for this symposium.

E. M. Forster, famous English author of "Passage to India" and other novels, flew the Atlantic to deliver a paper on "The Raison d'Etre of Criticism in the Arts."

New Works Performed

That is the kind of affair this is. Undertaken in the spirit of adventure, as Archibald T. Davison, dean of the department of music said, these sessions have aroused an interest beyond anything imagined. It is hard to put into a few hundred words the content of a day which included talks by Dr. Davison, and Dr. Paul H. Buck, provost of Harvard; lectures by Forster and Roger Sessions, and the performance by the Walden string quartet of three new compositions by Walter Piston, Arnold Schoenberg and Bohuslav Martinu.

The three new chamber works were Piston's string quartet 1947; Schoenberg's trio Opus 45 in one movement, and Martinu's quartet No. 6.

To me the most rewarding section was the first movement of Martinu's composition, which was as fluent, spontaneous and bubbling with life and spirit as though written by a contemporary Dvorak. Here were mood, movement and melody associated in the most expressive and grateful relationships—beautiful, alive, sane. The second movement was a deceptive andante with a quick accompanying figure which didn't say much. The final movement, though better than the second, seemed forced and quite devoid of conviction.

Trio Shows Talent

Schoenberg's trio was another of his masterly expansions of the known resources of violin, viola and cello. His effects are something like Norman Corwin might dream up for a planetary course through the stratosphere with some ricocheting of small astral bodies and a few real bang-up collisions. It's ethereal, but is it music?

Piston's quartet was down to earth in a very enjoyable and modern sense.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
MAY 10 1947

Conductor's Restraints Removed By Court

The appellate division of the supreme court has just removed the last of a series of restraints obtained by Serge Koussevitzky against Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers of Moses Smith's unauthorized biography of the Boston conductor. According to the publishers, this was the final step in a series of legal moves by Koussevitzky to prevent the distribution of the book.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMSTERDAM STAR NEWS
MAY 10 1947

Awards For Winchell, Koussevitzky, Granz

The Peoples Committee will present awards to Norman Granz, Serge Koussevitzky and Walter Winchell at their June 16 "Negro Freedom Rally, Hazel Scott, chairman of the committee announced Wednesday, at a press conference held in her dressing room at the Roxy Theatre.

The awards will be presented to the men for their efforts to bring about better racial relations through their respective fields. Granz is director of the Jazz At The Philharmonic Concerts, Koussevitzky is director of the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra and Winchell is the famous journalist and radio commentator.

PIC
NEW YORK CITY
MAY 3 1947

THREE YEARS TO GO

At 24, Lukas Foss is a composer, pianist and conductor, and brilliant in all three fields. Foss first came to the attention of serious musicians eight years ago when musical publications called him a new talent of importance. Since then he has been official pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has guest-conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic, taught at the Berkshire Music Center, and has had his music played by three major symphony orchestras. Among his many compositions, his Song of Songs, for soprano and orchestra, has been acclaimed by Stokowski and Koussevitzky as his greatest work.

When Foss was 17, the New York critics hailed him for his work The Tempest. That notice was the first in a long list of awards, scholarships, and commissions, including both a Pulitzer Scholarship and a Guggenheim Fellowship. In 1944 Fritz Reiner predicted, "Lukas Foss will be one of America's great conductors within six years."

In 1942 Foss made musical history when the New York Philharmonic spent $5,000 to put on his hour-long cantata, The Prairie, sung by the Westminster Choir and four soloists. In the past only the acknowledged musical "greats" have rated such productions.

Foss studied piano with Julius Hereford in Berlin, spent three years at the Paris Conservatory, and later studied under Koussevitzky at Berkshire and Hindemith at Yale. He speaks English, French, and German fluently, and just as excitedly as he plays the piano. At the piano he yells himself hoarse and often pounds out of key. Carl Sandburg has described him as the "demon welterweight composer."

Despite his many accomplishments and honors, Lukas is not resting on laurels. He's as full of musical ideas as he is of energy, a combination that can't, as Virgil Thompson put it, "fail to raise the standard of musical achievement in his whole generation."

RUTH ORKIN

Triple-Threat Man on a Keyboard
Foss is composer, pianist, conductor personality, and wholesome good looks, told him to go into pictures. Audie passed up other movie propositions to cast his lot with the Cagneys. "I'd like to be as good an actor as they tell me I was a soldier," says Audie, whose soon-to-be-released first picture ought to indicate how well he is succeeding.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 9 - 1947

Book Notes

Koussevitzky Biography Freed

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court has removed the last of a series of restraints obtained by Serge Koussevitzky against Allen, Towne and Heath, publishers of "Koussevitzky," an unauthorized biography of the Boston music critic, Moses Smith. The book firm, after nearly three months of legal battles which began on Feb. 11, will now begin country-wide distribution of the biography to which the conductor of the Boston Symphony objected as "an invasion of privacy."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
MAY 1 1 1947

Biographers may breathe easily again, now that Serge Koussevitzky, the hypersensitive conductor of the Boston symphony, has lost in his last legal move to prevent distribution of "Koussevitzky," the unauthorized biography by Moses Smith. The appellate division of the New York supreme court has just denied the conductor's plea for a further appeal and has vacated the temporary stay against distribution of the book. Koussevitzky had claimed that the book invaded his right of privacy, and contained false and defamatory statements. The publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, a new firm, insisted that to suppress a biography because the subject disliked it would be a serious blow to a free press. Other publishers came to their support, and the victory is an important one for American let-

---

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL ✓
MAY 1 0 1947

Serge A. Koussevitzky

"KOUSSEVITZKY," by Moses Smith; Allen, Towne & Heath; 400 pp. (indexed); $4.

THE much-disputed biography of the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at long last going to be seen by the public. The conductor just lost his final appeal to prevent its distribution and sale. Hence the public will now be able to read a biography of Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky that comes nearer to being a true picture than any before written.

Previous biographies of Serge K. were highly laudatory, perhaps because they were commissioned by the principal character. This biography by Moses Smith, former music critic for the Boston American and Transcript, swings in the other direction, and perhaps a bit too far. Mr. Smith writes as though he had a chip on his shoulder—as if he is determined to do all in his power to debunk all the previous pro-Koussevitzky propaganda; and although he doesn't fail to mention the good attributes of the conductor, he hides them by his almost excessive emphasis on the failings—musical and otherwise—of Koussevitzky.

Mr. Smith apparently has not forgotten his training as a newspaper music critic, and approaches the entire subject from a definitely critical standpoint; he seems to hold to what appears to be the cardinal principle of critics, that education is demonstrated only when faults can be discovered and brought to light. If one reads the book with these things in mind, and makes allowances for them, a very true picture of Koussevitzky can be derived.

The biography is over-documented in some instances. In other spots it lacks documentary evidence. The latter is especially true in the early part of the book when the author is dealing with the beginnings of Mr. Koussevitzky. Here he often resorts to phrases including "probably," "uncertain as to the exact date," "one can make out a plausible account," "according to one story . . . according to another story," "it is hard to determine," etc.

Anyone writing a biography should be much more certain of his dates and facts than Mr. Smith appears to have been as indicated by the opening chapters of this book. This criticism is perhaps even more severe when you consider that the biography is written about a man who is still living, and covers only the past seventy-odd years.

This is the first book that Allen, Towne & Heath has published (although court actions of Mr. Koussevitzky have delayed the release date of the book long enough to permit the release of other books by the same publishers). The entire output of the firm is "dedicated to the music lover" with the promise that "the one guiding principle in our editorial policy will be to provide sound, authoritative, non-technical books in all branches of music—books which will not only be informative, but entertaining as well." This is a most praiseworthy credo, and the biography of Koussevitzky by Moses Smith, although tedious to the point of boredom in spots, is a good start in the right direction.

RICHARD H. WANGERIN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAY 1 1 1947

OF BOOKS AND MEN

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court has just removed the last of a series of restraints obtained by Serge Koussevitzky against Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers of the book "Koussevitzky," an unauthorized biography by the well-known Boston critic, Moses Smith. This was the final step in a series of legal moves by Koussevitzky to prevent the distribution of the book.

The lengths to which Koussevitzky went in attempting to suppress the book are indicated by the action of his attorneys in sending letters to the press threatening legal action against any publication of a review or comment about the book, notwithstanding that in the temporary restraint granted by the court the press and booksellers were specifically exempted from such restraint. Such intimidation was rejected in most cases. Not only were reviews of the book published, but in many cases special articles and editorials appeared supporting the position taken by the publishers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 1 1 1947

TOWARD A LYRIC THEATRE

New Forms Being Developed Away From The Major Opera Houses

By MARC BLITZSTEIN

THERE has been a lot of talk for a long time about the lyric theatre; and now the signs are that it is about to come into flower in this country. There would seem to be general agreement that the Met, dedicated largely to museum-works, is a lost cause (the directors of the Met understandably do not concur); and that if anything remotely the equivalent of the Opéra-Comique of Paris is to happen in America, it is most likely to come from other sources.

The two main aspects of such an agreement, would seem to be (1) the production of musical-theatrical pieces dealing seriously with relatively serious subject, and (2) pieces in which the various elements — music, dialogue, action, dances, recitative, songs—co-exist in unified form, or "integration" (that beloved word of the production-conferences), bearing continuous and basic relation to one another throughout.

"Opera" as a term has become non-negotiable; the large theatre-public shuns it as a bitter "educational" pill; and producers see no reason to pay musicians a higher scale of wages for what is a black eye at the box office. "Music drama" inevitably recalls Wagner, and the singing-without-songs and movement-without action which his great nineteenth-century works imply. So "lyric theatre" it is.

Broadway Offers Hope

Will Broadway be the mainspring? It begins to look possible. "Show Boat," "Johnny Johnson," "The Cradle Will Rock," "Oklahoma," "Carousel," "On the Town" and this season's "Finian's Rainbow," "Brigadoon" and "Street Scene" form a rather impressive list of works attempting an authentic amalgam of elements. It is true that only a few of them show any disposition to grapple with a serious theme; and even fewer appear able to handle large musical forms. In this respect, "Carmen Jones" provided a very satisfying pattern for the American adaptation of operatic classics, and proved to be completely "Broadway" in success-terms.

Another source is the private foundations, such as the Ballet Society ("Renard," "Blackface"), the Berkshire Music Center (Britten's "Peter Grimes") and the Columbia University Festival (Menotti's "The Medium" and Thomson's "The Mother of Us All").

A third group driving toward lyric theatre comprises the modern dancers and ballet companies (Agnes de Mille, Martha Graham, José Limon, Valerie Bettis, Tamiris, the Ballet Theatre); their works more and more use words and even songs as an adjunct to their choregraphic plan.

Films and Radio

Films and the radio should not be forgotten in this source-catalogue. Music, formerly used in these media as bridges between scenes, dialogue-underpinning, or straight numbers, now begins to function structurally and in close-up.

These are the sources of the lyric theatre that is about to break upon us. It occurred to the directors of the American-Soviet Music Society that a program presenting something of all these fields might genuinely advance and accelerate its emergence. The theatre-concert to be given by the society tomorrow at the City Center will therefore be a sort of variety demonstration.

It will include works of music written for the modern dance, lyric opera, ballet, straight film, animated and puppet film, and for the Broadway-destined lyric theatre itself. All of the works were written between 1934 and 1946; all will be performed theatrically as well as musically. There will be two world premières and one American première, especially commissioned for the concert. Some of the compositions will be presented in their entirety; others will feature particular scenes and sections, selected on the basis of their yield to the burgeoning form.

In such a galaxy, it is hard to pick and choose; but I should like to cite the scene from Prokofieff's new opera-buffa "Betrothal in a Convent," based on Sheridan's "Duenna," Jerome Robbins' new ballet-creation to the same composer's "Summer Day," and the sheaf of danced, sung and acted numbers from Gail Kubik's "Mirror for the Sky," a lyric-theatre work on the life of Audubon.

These are all "firsts," and it says a great deal for the courage and enthusiasm of the artists involved, that they have been eager to expend their energies on this single performance. It is no less pertinent to point out that in a day when the mutual understanding and friendship of the two greatest nations of the world is of supreme importance, a concert of this nature has the chance of making a real extra-musical dent.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
MAY 12 1947

Famous Fables

By E. E. Edgar

ULTIMATUM: Brilliant conductor Serge Koussevitsky has very definite ideas about music, and never compromises with his convictions.

At one time, when he was a conductor in Russia, he formed a music publishing house with several associates. His associates, knowing him to be stubbornly bent on having his own way, hesitated before joining him in the venture, but Koussevitzky assured them that their opinions would be respected, and that he would abide by the rule of the majority.

Shortly after the company was formed, a young musician named Stravinsky submitted a manuscript. Koussevitzky was enthusiastic, but the others didn't think much of it and turned it down. Koussevitzky hit the ceiling.

"You don't know what you're doing!" he stormed. "How can I work with such ignoramuses!"

"Remember, Serge," he was told, "you promised to let the majority rule."

"I promised and I will," said Koussevitzy, "but I'll tell you right now, if you don't accept this composition, I'll resign, form a new company and publish it myself!"

After some debate, the "majority" reversed its decision and the composition was accepted.

* * *

INTRODUCTION: William Collier, famed American comedian, was in great demand as an after-dinner speaker. One night, at a banquet, he was asked to introduce the other speakers.

"Ladies and gentlemen," announced Collier, "I am not going to stand up here tonight and bore you with a lot of old jokes. But I'll introduce the speakers who will!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 12 1947

TRUMAN TO CLOSE FETE AT PRINCETON

President Will Deliver Major Address After Receiving Honorary Degree

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRINCETON, N. J., May 11—Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton, announced today the plans for the final sessions of the university's year-long bicentennial celebration from June 14 to 17, at which time President Truman will receive an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws and deliver a major address.

Prominent guests will include representatives of the United States Bicentennial Commission, appointed by the Chief Executive, members of both houses of Congress, 400 educators from American and foreign universities, and delegates named by the State Government of New Jersey.

The sessions will open Saturday morning, June 14, with the dedication of the new Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium. Saturday afternoon the annual alumni parade will proceed to University Field where Princeton's varsity baseball team will engage Yale. After dinner, a musical and dramatic sketch of famous episodes in the university's history will be presented on the front campus, featuring a band concert and songs by the Princeton Glee Club.

Sunday's program will include an alumni memorial service in the university chapel, a garden party in honor of the university's guests at Dr. Dodds' residence, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new gymnasium, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

The laying of the cornerstone for the Harvey S. Firestone Memorial Library will highlight Monday's events. An official reception for all representatives of other institutions will be held in Alexander Hall, followed by a garden party at the Graduate College. A dinner for 2,000 in the Dillon Gymnasium is planned for Monday night, where guests will hear several distinguished speakers and be entertained by the music of the United States Marine Band.

Tuesday will end the university's bicentennial celebration, which has been marked by fifteen academic conferences and numerous other events during the last nine months. The academic procession, scheduled for Tuesday morning, will form on the front campus for the final convocation. Dr. Dodds will open the ceremonies. President Truman will head the list of forty receiving honorary degrees, and will close the program with an address to the assembled undergraduates, faculty members and visiting delegates.

STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE

MAY 14 1947

Town Hall Forum, Boston Symphony To Be Same Night

Two of radio's most popular programs, America's Town Meeting and the weekly performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard the same evening, beginning Sept. 2, it was announced today by the American Broadcasting Co.

Broadcast time of America's Town Meeting, the one hour forum of which George V. Denny, jr., is moderator, will be shifted next Fall from Thursday to Tuesday night, the symphony orchestra's regular evening.

The Town Hall broadcasts will be heard at their customary time, 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., and the Boston Symphony program will be moved back an hour, to reach ABC listeners from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m.

A two-time winner of the George Foster Peabody award and distinguished by 32 other national awards, America's Town Meeting is now presented under cooperative sponsorship and is carried by 226 stations. It has been a radio feature for 12 years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will inaugurate its 21st year on the air next Fall. The Boston Pops, Summer version of the famous symphony concerts will complete their current cycle June 24.

Dr. Koussevitzky, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has won many awards for his advocacy of contemporary composers, both of this country and abroad. Under his direction both world premieres and American premieres of compositions have been presented. His establishment of the Berkshire Music Centre, for which 10 scholarships were awarded this season by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, has been hailed as of great value in encouraging not only young composers but young artists in carrying out their musical careers.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

MAY 24 1947

Boston Symphony Is Outstanding Orchestra in Poll

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of music on the air announced today by "Musical America," national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations, the Boston symphony, heard last season over KWNO at 7:30 p. m. Tuesdays, won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors, while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year, Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan opera, Saturday symphony and other ABC features. With the Metropolitan opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature, broadcast during the winter over KWNO Saturdays at 1 p. m., the presentation of "Tristan and Isolde." Second place went to "Boris," revived this year in response to requests of listeners, while "Romeo et Julliette" was third.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan opera intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best script material on the air."

The "Musical America" poll was conducted under the direction of Miss Quaintance Eaton, associate editor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 18 1947

ONE THING AND ANOTHER

'Town Meeting' to Move to Tuesday—Morton Downey to Head New Show

By SIDNEY LOHMAN

THE American Broadcasting Company (WJZ) will undertake an experiment in radio programming next fall when the network will realign its Tuesday night schedule to compete for an audience against what up to now has proved an unbeatable array of top-ranking comedy shows on NBC.

Beginning Sept. 2, America's Town Meeting, heard on Thursdays from 8:30 to 9:30 P. M., will change to Tuesday nights at the same time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, ~~now scheduled~~ at that time, will be advanced one hour and will be broadcast from 9:30 to 10:30 P. M., thereby giving ABC listeners two consecutive hours of serious discussion and serious music.

NEW: CBS has signed two more new shows to grace its fall schedules. In the 6:30 to 7:30 P. M. time on Sundays—soon to be vacated by Kate Smith—will go a musical program under the direction of Percy Faith, to begin on Aug. 17. And, starting Friday, Oct. 3, Morton Downey, tenor, will return to the air as featured singer of a variety show scheduled to be heard from 10:30 to 11 P. M.

Both programs will be sponsored by the Coca-Cola Company and are said to represent an outlay of about $1,000,000.

Miss Smith is moving her daytime commentary program over to the Mutual network in the fall, but the future status of her Sunday evening musical show is still undetermined.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 25 1947

'Musical America' Poll Results Are Listed

The performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini's direction on Feb. 9 and 16 was chosen as the outstanding musical radio event of the past season in the fourth annual poll of radio music conducted by "Musical America". The winners in other classifications chosen by 600 music editors and writers on music in American newspapers were:

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera broadcast, "Tristan und Isolde"; Symphony Orchestra, Boston Symphony (ABC); Symphony Conductor, regular, Arturo Toscanini; guest, Bruno Walter; Concert and Program Conductor, Donald Vorhees; Orchestra with featured soloists, Telephone Hour (NBC); Concert Orchestra, Longines Symphonette (WOR and local); Woman singer, regularly featured, Eleanor Steber; occasionally featured, Marian Anderson; Man Singer, regularly featured, James Melton; occasionally featured, Ezio Pinza; Instrumental Ensemble, NBC String Quartet; Vocal Ensemble, Collegiate Chorale; Pianist, Artur Rubinstein; Violinist, Jascha Heifetz; Organist, E. Power Biggs; Educational Program, Gateways to Music (CBS); Announcer and Commentator, Milton Cross (ABC).

A special award went to the National Broadcasting Company, which "consistently through the year served most faithfully the cause of serious music". Sixty-seven per cent of the voters expressed themselves as generally satisfied with the scripts used in the majority of serious music programs; the other thirty-three per cent made outspoken objections to various features.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

MAY 16 1947

Firemen Credited With Assist In Writing of New Swingy Ditty

BOSTON, May 16.—(UP) New York's Tin Pan Alley had its chance today to pick up a swingy little ditty which a trio of noted composers whipped out with the aid of the Boston fire department.

It's name, as you may have guessed, is "Aflame."

Seems the boys in the back room at dignified Symphony hall were shooting the breeze about a new tune which Leroy Anderson, noted arranger and composer of "Jazz Pizzicato" had written.

The boys included Anderson, Ted Mossman who composed hit tune "Til the End of Time," and Maestro Arthur Fielder, who conducts the famed Boston Symphony orchestra in its pop concerts of semi-classical pieces.

Tune Needs Words

"That should have words," said Fielder of Anderson's piece which he had called "Serenata."

"If that music had words it would be a gold-plated hit on the popular market. It has a Latin zoom that would fit Sinatra's voice or Bing's."

Anderson modestly sipped his beer and glanced at the ceiling.

"It's a natural," agreed Mossman, "it needs a sharp lyric. Maybe a syrupy lyric. Anyway, it needs a lyric. I'd like to write one—if I could find a jumping off place."

At that moment the boys of hook-and-ladder 15 came screeching past the hall and Fielder, a "spark" of the first water, tore after the fire engines.

"Should have seen it," he said when he finally came puffing back, his striped trousers smudged and smelling of smoke. "What a fire. The whole place was aflame—literally aflame right to the roof."

"That," said Mossman solemnly, "is it. That's the jumping off place—aflame—everything's aflame—no, my heart is all aflame."

Lyrics Are Born

"Gimme a pencil pal," he said to Fielder, "I've got it cold."

While Anderson tended his beer and Fielder talked of the fire Mossman wrote on a scrap of paper:

"Aflame—my heart is all aflame.
You're to blame
And when I'm not with you
Each tender thought of you
Just thrills me through and through
Wonder if you feel the flame too . . ."

The inspirational boys of Hook and Ladder haven't been told yet how they lit the "spark" for "Aflame."

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

MAY 17 1947

Toscanini Wins Again In Musical America Poll

Once again, a radio production by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony was honored as the outstanding musical event of the radio year by music editors of the daily newspapers of the United States and Canada in the Fourth Annual Poll of Music on the Air conducted by Musical America, international music news magazine. This was the performance of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet on February 9 and 16. Full results of the poll are announced in the magazine's May issue.

Balloting among 600 men and women of the press in the principal cities from coast to coast also brought forth winners in 20 other classifications as follows:

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera Broadcast: Tristan and Isolde. Symphony Orchestra: Boston Symphony (ABC). Symphony ~~Conductor (Reg~~ular): Arturo Toscanini. Symphony Conductor (Guest): Bruno Walter. Concert & Program Conductor: Donald Voorhees. Orchestra with Featured Soloists: Telephone Hour (NBC). Concert Orchestra: Longines Symphonette (WOR & local). Musical Variety Program: Album of Familiar Music (NBC). Woman Singer (Regularly Featured): Eleanor Steber. Woman Singer: Occasionally Featured): Marian Anderson. Man Singer (Regularly Featured): ~~James Melton~~. Man Singer (Occasionally Featured): Ezio Pinza. Instrumental Ensemble: NBC String Quartet (NBC). Vocal Ensemble: Collegiate Chorale. Instrumentalist: Pianist, Artur Rubinstein; Violinist, Jascha Heifetz; Organist, E. Power Biggs. Program of Educational Character: Gateway to Music (CBS). Announcer, Commentator: Milton Cross (NBC).

A special award went to the National Broadcasting Company, which "consistently through the year served most faithfully the cause of serious music."

This year's questions to the music editors dealt entirely with the scripts surrounding musical programs and was called Words with Music. Expressing themselves as satisfied in general with the scripts used on the majority of serious musical programs were 67 per cent of the voters.

A large percentage voted the Metropolitan Opera's intermission features as the best script material on the air.

The 33 per cent of dissenters were extremely articulate, however, in their scorn for the "boring and frightening" qualities of the scripts, the inappropriateness of science talks in intermission (the vote was overwhelmingly against the New York Philharmonic Symphony's ventures in this field), the prevailing "unctiousness" of announcers and the intrusion of commercials.

Many had suggestions to make: notably a wish for more musical knowledge on the part of the announcer, and more information about the music and the composer, but others advocated a lighter treatment and more anecdotes. Several suggested "less comment and more music" and another went so far as to advocate a period of silence between musical numbers. Curtailing studio applause was another suggestion to gain time and dignity.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

MAY 17 1947

ABC To Fight NBC Tues. Comedies With Town Meet, Symph

NEW YORK, May 10.—American Broadcasting Company (ABC) this week turned to a policy of back-to-back mood programing as a weapon to combat powerful competing shows. In switching the co-op-sponsored America's Town Meeting from Thursday to Tuesday night beginning September 2, and airing it from 8:30 to 9:30 p.m. before the Boston Symphony's (Hancock Insurance) hour broadcast, the web intends to counter comedy shows put on by the National Broadcasting Company (NBC). The two-hour span of political discussion and longhair music, ABC hopes, will attract listeners from NBC's array of Date With Judy, Amos 'n' Andy, Fibber McGee and Bob Hope. Switch moves the Boston Symphony back an hour later than this season.

Going into the 9-9:30 seg of the Thursday time now held down by Town Meeting will be Tales of Willie Piper. The lamp division of General Electric will sponsor the comedy opus beginning September 4.

ght NBC ies With Symph

10.—American y (ABC) this icy of back-to-g as a weapon
mpeting shows.
co-op-sponsored Meeting from night beginning ing it from 8:30
he Boston Sym-nsurance) hour tends to counter
by the National ny (NBC). The litical discussion
ABC hopes, will n NBC's array of os 'n' Andy, Fib-
b Hope. Switch mphony back an season.
9-9:30 seg of the w held down by he Tales of Willie ivision of General
r the comedy opus

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAY 16 1947

Firemen Fire Imagination Of Lyric Writer; 'Aflame' Born

By HAL CLANCY

Boston, May 16 — (UP) — New York's Tin Pan Alley had its chance today to pick up a swingy little ditty which a trio of noted composers whipped out with the aid of the Boston Fire Department.

Its name, as you may have guessed, is "Aflame."

Seems the boys in the back room at dignified Symphony Hall were shooting the breeze about a new tune which Leroy Anderson, noted arranger and composer of "Jazz Pizzicato" had written.

The boys included Anderson, Ted Mossman who composed hit tune "Til the End of Time," and Maestro Arthur Fiedler, who conducts the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in its pop concerts of semi-classical pieces.

"That should have words," said Fiedler of Anderson's piece which he had called "Serenata."

"If that music had words it would be a gold-plated hit on the popular market. It has a Latin zoom that would fit Sinatra's voice or Bing's."

Anderson modestly sipped his beer and glanced at the ceiling.

"It's a natural," agreed Mossman, "it needs a sharp lyric. Maybe a syrup lyric. Anyway, it needs a lyric. I'd like to write one—if I could find a jumping off place."

At that moment the boys of hook-and-ladder 15 came screeching past the hall and Fiedler, a "spark" of the first water, tore after the fire engines.

"Should have seen it," he said when he finally came puffing back, his striped trousers smudged and smelling of smoke. "What a fire. The whole place was aflame—literally aflame right to the roof."

"That," said Mossman solemnly "is it. That's the jumping off place — aflame — everything's aflame — no, my heart is all aflame."

"Gimme a pencil pal," he said to Fiedler, "I've got it cold.'

While Anderson tended his beer and Fiedler talked of the fire Mossman wrote on a scrap of paper:

"Aflame—my heart is all aflame
You're to blame
And when I'm not with you
Each tender thought of you
Just thrills me through and through
Wonder if you feel the flame too. . . ."

The inspirational boys of hook-and-ladder haven't been told yet how they lit the "spark" for "Aflame."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 24 1947

Honor Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season launches its 22d consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of WJZ and the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of Music on the Air announced today by Musical America, national music magazine.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAY 19 1947

Feature of the Week

RADIO EDITORS of Cleveland newspapers have been beating the drums in recent months for more symphonic music on local stations. Most vociferous has been the Plain Dealer's Robert A. Stephan, who asked readers to write the program directors of Cleveland stations asking for more symphonic music.

C. M. Hunter, program director of WHK Cleveland, was bombarded with several hundred letters as a result of Mr. Stephan's lobbying. Mulling over the fact that Cleveland stations were already presenting most of the nation's outstanding symphonic groups—including the New York Philharmonic, the NBC Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Hunter and K. K. Hacka[illegible], WHK vice president and general manager, undertook to [illegible] whe[illegible]er these allegedly sym-[illegible] starved listeners were already hearing all the available [illegible].

[illegible]ing a telephone list from [illegible] names of those who wrote [illegible] they employed Market Re[illegible] of Cleveland to call each one while Cleveland Orchestra was on the air on Saturday, April 12, and during the NBC Symphony broadcast Sunday, April 13. Each person answering was asked three questions: Was your radio on when the phone rang? What station are you listening to? What program are you listening to?

The replies, according to a sworn statement by the research firm, were:

SATURDAY
138—Total talked to:
38—Symphony Listeners	27.55%
62—Not Listening to Any Program	44.90%
38—Listening to Other Programs	27.55%
	100.00%
100—Total Persons Not Listening to Symphony	72.50%
SUNDAY
161—Total talked to:
42—Symphony Listeners	26.1%
89—Not Listening to Any Program	55.3%
30—Listening to Other Programs	18.6%
	100.0%
119—Total Not Listening to Symphony	73.9%

WHK, incidentally, which initiated the survey, is owned by the Plain Dealer.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

MAY 18 1947

SMU Student to Sing In Berkshire Festival

Martha Ann Holmes, SMU music student from Wichita Falls, has been invited to sing in several operatic sequences this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. Miss Holmes recently won the Civic Federation's Young Artists competition, and has been awarded also the Pi Beta Phi annual award for the outstanding junior student in the SMU School of Music.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

MAY 23 1947

Boston Symphony Put in Top Place By National Music on the Air Poll

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of Music On The Air announced by Musical America, national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations, the Boston Symphony won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year, Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan Opera, Saturday Symphony and other ABC features.

With the Metropolitan Opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature the presentation of Tristan und Isolde. Second place went to Boris, revived this year in response to requests of listeners while Romeo et Juliette was third.

In the instrumental ensembles classification, ABC's Fine Arts Quartet, which this year has given the American premiere to two quartets by Shostakovich, took third place.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan Opera's intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best script material on the air."

The Musical America poll was conducted under the direction of Quaintance Eaton, associate editor.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

MAY 18 1947

Poll Decides Radio Idols

Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony won top place in a poll by music editors of daily newspapers in the United States and Canada, conducted by Musical America, international music news magazine, to decide the outstanding musical events of the radio year. Toscanini and the orchestra were chosen for their performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" in February.

The Boston Orchestra, however, was voted the most popular symphony orchestra on the air, though Toscanini was considered the favorite regular conductor. Bruno Walter was chosen the best guest conductor, and Donald Vorhees the best concert and program conductor.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAY 19 1947

Koussevitzky in Print

Serge Koussevitzky's one-night stand to prevent publication of the biography of himself by Moses Smith got a bad review from New York's second highest court last week.

Invoking the civil rights law of New York State, the Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony had tried to suppress the book prior to publication. His attorneys even went so far as to threaten New York newspapers with legal action if they reviewed Smith's "Koussevitzky" (NEWSWEEK, Feb. 24). Last week the Appellate Division, upheld Justice Bernard L. Shientag's decision which, in effect, exempted biographies of noted and newsworthy living persons from the civil rights law, and denied his application to take the case to the Court of Appeals.

At once Allen, Towne & Heath, Smith's publishers, put advertisements in New York newspapers informing potential readers that the book, held up since February, was available to all. The first publication by a new firm, "Koussevitzky" is expected to sell enough additional copies at least to cover litigation costs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 23 1947

MUSIC GROUP ORGANIZED

Friends of the Berkshire Center Form National Committee

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., May 22—A national committee has been formed for the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lewis Perry, headmaster emeritus of Phillips Exeter Academy, will be chairman. The honorary members are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra; Mrs. Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs; Mrs. Andrew Hepburn of Concord, who with her aunt, the late Miss Mary A. Tappan, gave their family's summer home to the orchestra; Henry B. Cabot and Jerome D. Greene, current and former president of the orchestra.

SUNDAY, MAY 25,

English Tour By Bostonians Is Postponed

Transportation Problems Halt Projected Trip; Other Symphony Plans

Plans for a short concert tour of England by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction next September have been shelved, it was learned recently, owing to difficulties of trans-Atlantic transportation. The projected tour, the first to be made abroad by this orchestra, would have been intensive, calling for more than a dozen concerts in a little over two weeks. As it is, Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians will have a six weeks' breathing spell between the recording session, closing Aug. 16, which will follow the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, and the beginning of rehearsals for the regular season in Symphony Hall.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

MAY 12 1947

Princeton program set

PRINCETON (AP)—President Truman, members of both houses of Congress and more than 400 representatives of colleges and universities in this country and abroad will be among those attending the four-day program June 14-17 which will be the climax to the Princeton University bicentennial celebration, Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of the university, announced yesterday.

Plans call for a program running from the dedication of the Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium at 11 A. M. Saturday to a speech by President Truman at the commencement Tuesday morning, Dr. Dodds said.

Features of the program day by day are:

Saturday—Alumni parade, Yale-Princeton baseball game, band and Glee Club concert.

Sunday—Alumni service of remembrance, meeting of the National Alumni Association, and Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

Monday—Service of rededication to the ideals of Princeton University in the university chapel, laying of the cornerstone of the Harvey S. Firestone Library, and a dinner for 2,000 in the gymnasium.

Tuesday — Commencement, with the usual academic procession awarding of bachelor and 40 honorary degrees and President Truman's speech.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
MAY 16 1947

Firemen Fire Imagination Of Lyric Writer; 'Aflame' Born

By HAL CLANCY

Boston, May 16 — (UP) — New York's Tin Pan Alley had its chance today to pick up a swingy little ditty which a trio of noted composers whipped out with the aid of the Boston Fire Department.

Its name, as you may have guessed, is "Aflame."

Seems the boys in the back room at dignified Symphony Hall were shooting the breeze about a new tune which Leroy Anderson, noted arranger and composer of "Jazz Pizzicato" had written.

The boys included Anderson, Ted Mossman who composed hit tune "Til the End of Time," and Maestro Arthur Fiedler, who conducts the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra in its pops concerts of semi-classical pieces.

"That should have words," said Fiedler of Anderson's piece which he had called "Serenata."

"If that music had words it would be a gold-plated hit on the popular market. It has a Latin zoom that would fit Sinatra's voice or Bing's."

Anderson modestly sipped his beer and glanced at the ceiling.

"It's a natural," agreed Mossman, "it needs a sharp lyric. Maybe a syrup lyric. Anyway, it needs a lyric. I'd like to write one—if I could find a jumping off place."

At that moment the boys of hook-and-ladder 15 came screeching past the hall and Fiedler, a "spark" of the first water, tore after the fire engines.

"Should have seen it," he said when he finally came puffing back, his striped trousers smudged and smelling of smoke. "What a fire. The whole place was aflame—literally aflame right to the roof."

"That," said Mossman solemnly "is it. That's the jumping off place — aflame — everything's aflame — no, my heart is all aflame."

"Gimme a pencil pal," he said to Fiedler, "I've got it cold.'

While Anderson tended his beer and Fiedler talked of the fire Mossman wrote on a scrap of paper:

"Aflame—my heart is all aflame
You're to blame
And when I'm not with you
Each tender thought of you
Just thrills me through and through Wonder if you feel the flame too. . ."

The inspirational boys of hook-and-ladder haven't been told yet how they lit the "spark" for "Aflame."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAY 24 1947

Honor Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season lauaches its 22d consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of WJZ and the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of Music on the Air announced today by Musical America, national music magazine.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAY 19 1947

Feature of the Week

RADIO EDITORS of Cleveland newspapers have been beating the drums in recent months for more symphonic music on local stations. Most vociferous has been the Plain Dealer's Robert A. Stephan, who asked readers to write the program directors of Cleveland stations asking for more symphonic music.

C. M. Hunter, program director of WHK Cleveland, was bombarded with several hundred letters as a result of Mr. Stephan's lobbying. Mulling over the fact that Cleveland stations were already presenting most of the nation's outstanding symphonic groups—including the New York Philharmonic, the NBC Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra and the Boston Symphony—Mr. Hunter and K. K. Hackathorn, WHK vice president and general manager, undertook to learn whether these allegedly symphony-starved listeners were already hearing all the available symphonies.

Compiling a telephone list from the names of those who wrote WHK, they employed Market Research of Cleveland to call each one while Cleveland Orchestra was on the air on Saturday, April 12, and during the NBC Symphony broadcast Sunday, April 13. Each person answering was asked three questions: Was your radio on when the phone rang? What station are you listening to? What program are you listening to?

The replies, according to a sworn statement by the research firm, were:

SATURDAY
138—Total talked to:
38—Symphony Listeners	27.55%
62—Not Listening to Any Program	44.90%
38—Listening to Other Programs	27.55%
	100.00%
100—Total Persons Not Listening to Symphony	72.50%
SUNDAY
161—Total talked to:
42—Symphony Listeners	26.1%
89—Not Listening to Any Program	55.3%
30—Listening to Other Programs	18.6%
	100.0%
119—Total Not Listening to Symphony	73.9%

WHK, incidentally, which initiated the survey, is owned by the Plain Dealer.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
MAY 18 1947

SMU Student to Sing In Berkshire Festival

Martha Ann Holmes, SMU music student from Wichita Falls, has been invited to sing in several operatic sequences this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. Miss Holmes recently won the Civic Federation's Young Artists competition, and has been awarded also the Pi Beta Phi annual award for the outstanding junior student in the SMU School of Music.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
MAY 23 1947

Boston Symphony Put in Top Place By National Music on the Air Poll

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of Music On The Air announced by Musical America, national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations, the Boston Symphony won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year, Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan Opera, Saturday Symphony and other ABC features.

With the Metropolitan Opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature the presentation of Tristan und Isolde. Second place went to Boris, revived this year in response to requests of listeners while Romeo et Juliette was third.

In the instrumental ensembles classification, ABC's Fine Arts Quartet, which this year has given the American premiere to two quartets by Shostakovich, took third place.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan Opera's intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best script material on the air."

The Musical America poll was conducted under the direction of Quaintance Eaton, associate editor.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
MAY 18 1947

Poll Decides Radio Idols

Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony won top place in a poll by music editors of daily newspapers in the United States and Canada, conducted by Musical America, international music news magazine, to decide the outstanding musical events of the radio year. Toscanini and the orchestra were chosen for their performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" in February.

The Boston Orchestra, however, was voted the most popular symphony orchestra on the air, though Toscanini was considered the favorite regular conductor. Bruno Walter was chosen the best guest conductor, and Donald Vorhees the best concert [illegible]

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAY 19 1947

Koussevitzky in Print

Serge Koussevitzky's one-night stand to prevent publication of the biography of himself by Moses Smith got a bad review from New York's second highest court last week.

Invoking the civil rights law of New York State, the Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony had tried to suppress the book prior to publication. His attorneys even went so far as to threaten New York newspapers with legal action if they reviewed Smith's "Koussevitzky" (NEWSWEEK, Feb. 24). Last week the Appellate Division, upheld Justice Bernard L. Shientag's decision which, in effect, exempted biographies of noted and newsworthy living persons from the civil rights law, and denied his application to take the case to the Court of Appeals.

At once Allen, Towne & Heath, Smith's publishers, put advertisements in New York newspapers informing potential readers that the book, held up since February, was available to all. The first publication by a new firm, "Koussevitzky" is expected to sell enough additional copies at least to cover litigation costs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 23 1947

MUSIC GROUP ORGANIZED

Friends of the Berkshire Center Form National Committee

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., May 22—A national committee has been formed for the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lewis Perry, headmaster emeritus of Phillips Exeter Academy, will be chairman. The honorary members are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra; Mrs. Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs; Mrs. Andrew Hepburn of Concord, who with her aunt, the late Miss Mary A. Tappan, gave their family's summer home to the orchestra; Henry B. Cabot and Jerome D. Greene, current and former president of the orchestra.

SUNDAY, MAY 25,

English Tour By Bostonians Is Postponed

Transportation Problems Halt Projected Trip; Other Symphony Plans

Plans for a short concert tour of England by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky's direction next September have been shelved, it was learned recently, owing to difficulties of trans-Atlantic transportation. The projected tour, the first to be made abroad by this orchestra, would have been intensive, calling for more than a dozen concerts in a little over two weeks. As it is, Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians will have a six weeks' breathing spell between the recording session closing Aug. 16, which will follow the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, and the beginning of rehearsals for the regular season in Symphony Hall.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
MAY 12 1947

Princeton program set

PRINCETON (AP)—President Truman, members of both houses of Congress and more than 400 representatives of colleges and universities in this country and abroad will be among those attending the four-day program June 14-17 which will be the climax to the Princeton University bicentennial celebration, Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of the university, announced yesterday.

Plans call for a program running from the dedication of the Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium at 11 A. M. Saturday to a speech by President Truman at the commencement Tuesday morning, Dr. Dodds said.

Features of the program day by day are:

Saturday—Alumni parade, Yale-Princeton baseball game, band and Glee Club concert.

Sunday—Alumni service of remembrance, meeting of the National Alumni Association, and Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

Monday—Service of rededication to the ideals of Princeton University in the university chapel, laying of the cornerstone of the Harvey S. Firestone Library, and a dinner for 2,000 in the gymnasium.

Tuesday — Commencement, with the usual academic procession, awarding of bachelor and 40 honorary degrees and President Truman's speech.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 25 1947

English Tour By Bostonians Is Postponed

Transportation Problems Halt Projected Trip; Other Symphony Plans

Plans for a short concert tour of England by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Serge Koussevitz~~-ky's direction next September have been shelved, it was learned recently, owing to difficulties of trans-Atlantic transportation. The projected tour, the first to be made abroad by this orchestra, would have been intensive, calling for more than a dozen concerts in a little over two weeks. As it is, Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians will have a six weeks' breathing spell between the recording session, closing Aug. 16, which will follow the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, and the beginning of rehearsals for the regular season in Symphony Hall.

The Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, under Reginald Stewart, will give twelve Sunday night concerts at the Lyric Theater, as compared with eight in the last season, during 1947-'48. This will open Oct. 26 and close March 14, under the auspices of Baltimore's Department of Municipal Music. The orchestra's series of twelve Wednesday night concerts will open Oct. 29 and close March 10.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Krueger, will make four tours next season, in Canada, in the South, the Mid-West and in the East. It will also play in several other Michigan cities. Otis Ingleman, formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Salt Lake Symphony, will be the Detroit orchestra's new concertmaster.

The Dallas Symphony Orchestra, under Antal Dorati, has announced fifty-two concerts for next season, including fifteen concerts in the regular subscription series, five children's concerts, an oratorio festival of three programs and three special concerts in Dallas, and a number of out-of-town engagements.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAY 25 1947

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

PEOPLE appear to agree generally on the best in musical performances. Whether they hear their music at first hand or vicariously over the radio, what they like falls into a familiar pattern. The New York music critics troop around night after night to concerts and operas covering the thousand and one events of a music season, while their colleagues elsewhere often listen to music on the radio.

Out-of-towners probably know far more about radio music than the music reviewers in large cities. The 600 men and women of the press in the principal cities from coast to coast have nominated their leaders in 20 different classifications for the fourth annual poll conducted by the magazine "Musical America." Their choice of what is best, however, offers little that is new.

Top-Rankers Listed

THE top-rankers are as follows: The performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony on Feb. 9 and 16 has been voted the outstanding musical event of the radio year. Other first places have been selected as follows:

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera broadcast, "Tristan and Isolde"; symphony orchestra, ~~Boston Symphony~~; symphony conductor, regular, Arturo Toscanini; guest, Bruno Walter; concert and program conductor, Donald Voorhees.

Orchestra with featured soloists, Telephone Hour; concert orchestra, Longines Symphonette; musical variety program, Album of Familiar Music.

Woman singer, regularly featured, Eleanor Steber; occasionally featured, Marian Anderson; man singer, regularly featured, James Melton, occasionally featured, Ezio Pinza; instrumental ensemble, NBC String Quartet.

Vocal ensemble, Collegiate Chorale; pianist, Artur Rubinstein; violinist, Jascha Heifetz; organist, E. Power Biggs; program of educational character, Gateways to Music.

Object to Commercials

QUESTIONED on the scripts used in musical programs, the music editors have expressed general satisfaction. The dissenting 33 per cent scorn "boring and frightening qualities" of some of the scripts, the inappropriateness of science talks, the "unctious attitude of announcers, and the intrusion of commercials." They are divided between serious and light treatment. Several suggest "less comment and more music."

This is all very well. It is obvious that the poll pays no attention to young talent just making its way. It tabulates standard brands and neglects the unusual. Nothing is said about furthering the art or making significant contributions.

With the wide dissemination of music today and the questionable taste prevailing, the rubber-stamp approval of this poll tends to eclipse rather than to foster either interest or talent. The 600 members of the musical press might render more valuable service by at least registering their thoughts on what was of news value during the musical season. There is nothing astonishing in these results. Even the average listener could do as well.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
MAY 25 1947

Boston Symphony Takes Top Honors Over All Symphonies

~~The Boston Symphony Orchestra~~, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting C. -pany, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of music on the air announced today by "Musical America," national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations, the Boston Symphony won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors, while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year, Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan Opera, Saturday Symphony and ohter ABC features. With the Metropolitan Opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature the presentation of "Tristan und Isolde." Second place went to "Boris," revived this year in response to requests of listeners, while "Romeo et Julliette" was third.

In the instrumental ensembles classification, ABC's Fine Arts Quartet, which this year has given the American Premiere to two quartets by Shostakovick, took third place.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan Opera intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best script material on the air."

The "Musical America" poll was [illegible] the direction of [illegible] Eaton, associate

---

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

MAY 25 1947

Front Row, Center

By WESLEY FIRST

Results of balloting among 600 music critics of newspapers from coast to coast will be announced this week by Musical America, international music news magazine. This year, The Erie Dispatch accepted an invitation to cast its votes.

Once again, a radio production by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony was voted the outstanding event of the radio year by the music critics responding to the Musical America poll.

This was the performance of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet last February 9 and 16.

These other classifications and their winners will also be announced this week.

In most of the classifications, The Dispatch voted with the majority.

Outstanding Metropolitan Opera broadcast: Tristan und Isolde; symphony orchestra, Boston Symphony (ABC); sym~~phony~~ conductor, regular, Toscanini; symphony conductor, guest, Bruuo Walter.

Concert and program director, Donald Voorhees; orchestra with featured soloists, Telephone Hour (NBC); concert orchestra, Longines Symphonette (WAR); musical variety program, Album of Familiar Music (NBC); woman singer, regular, Eleanor Steber; woman singer, occasional, Marian Anderson.

Man singer, regular, James Melton; man singer, occasional, Ezio Pinza.

Instrumental ensemble, NBC String Quartet (NBC); vocal ensemble, Collegiate Chorale; pianist, Artur Rubenstein; violinist, Jascha Heifetz; organist, E. Power Biggs; educational, Gateways to Music (CBS), announcer, Milton Cross (ABC).

A special award went to the National Broadcasting Co., which "consistently through the year served most faithfully the cause of serious music."

Toscanini, Anderson, the Telephone Hour and Milton Cross have won top place in their respective classifications ever since the poll began three years ago.

Also of interest are the answers to the magazine's questions addressed to the critics regarding music programs on the radio.

Sixty-seven per cent expressed satisfaction with the scripts used on the majority of serious music programs.

A large percentage, including this newspaper, voted the Saturday afternoon Met programs as having the finest intermission features.

The 33 per cent dissenters were scornful of the scripts, and the vote was overwhelmingly against the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's intermission talks on science. We found ourselves wholeheartedly agreeing in this.

Also scored by the critics were the prevailing unctiousness of music program announcers and the intrusion of commercials.

Suggestions for betterment of music on the radio included having announcers with more music knowledge, and material with more information about composer and music.

Probably the best suggestion came from a yet unidentified critic who blandly urged a period of silence between musical numbers.

The Musical America poll has been rated as one of the most influential in radio.

* * * *

PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STA
JUN 17 194

Wisdom And Experience Of Age Is Worth More Than Energy Of Youth

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival looked like a greying youth at the fina concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell m that most children think of thei parents as old, while the parent imagine themselves veritable babe in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Mur ray Butler only aged during th past five or six years, although h is now 85 and in spite of the i firmities of what we call old ag his mind has been crystal cle throughout those decades when, a cording to tradition, one seems live on borrowed time. A few yea ago, when I dined with him, I w astonished at the vivid youthf ness of his attitude toward lif

William Randolph Hearst w in financial difficulties some ye ago. He saved his enterprises a manages them today with un lievable vigor at 84. He not o edits his newspapers, but dire the business of his properties, ting a pace that is hard fo young man to follow. And T canini, at 80, directs the NBC s phony.

Average Span

The magazine, "World Rep some time ago listed the ave span of life in various coun They gave the following data:

Ave
Sp

Countries
New Zealand ....
Sweden ....
Netherlands ....
United States ....
Great Britain ....
Germany ....
France ....
Italy ....
Russia ....
India ....

When we were young—thos my generation—we were ta that the average span was 35 y in this country. Maybe that low. But the U. S. Life Insura companies, having recognized the life span has increased more than 50 percent, have nounced that next year they discard as obsolete the table mortality used for 80 years. T actuaries have finally caught with their own statistics. Perh when the American life reaches 100, we shall not mortality tables.

Other Questions

Physical youth is, of course, the sole question. Medical scie can find ways of saving life improving those whom they sa Mental youth, the flexibility of mind, continued usefulness, the pacity to earn a living and enjoy life—these are even m significant. George Bernard Sh at 91 has a whale of a good ti In spite of being a vegetarian which must be horrible—he ma ages to keep chipper. It is in mind. When that old boy ta about being in his second chi hood, he has his tongue in cheek, although some would say not I, however—that he never caped his first childhood.

During the depression yea they were laying off men at 50 finished. The dopes who thoug up that gimmick lacked unde standing of the world in whi they live. They were old fashione When the war came, they we begging the old boys to co back, because the old boys kne how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the of colleg curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little complain about him.

pyright. 1947

Sheboygan, Wis.
Press
5/28/47

Boston Symphony Rates High In Poll Of Music On The Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of music on the air announced in New York recently by "Musical America," national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations the Boston symphony won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors, while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan opera, Saturday symphony and other ABC features. With the Metropolitan opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature the presentation of "Tristan und Isolde." Second place went to "Boris," revived this year in response to requests of listeners, while "Romeo et Julliette" was third.

Music lovers in the Sheboygan area will be interested in these awards inasmuch as both of these ABC features have been heard over Station WHBL during the past season.

In the instrumental ensembles classification, ABC's Fine Arts quartet, which this year has given the American Premiere to two quartets by Shostakovich, took third place.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs, although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan opera intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best script material on the air."

The "Musical American" poll was conducted under the direction of Miss Quaintance Eaton, associate editor.

[165]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 26 1947

Koussevitzky Has Friendly Biographer

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

LEGAL difficulties in the way of its publication having now been composed, one picks up the new Moses Smith biography of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky looking first, of course, for those things to which the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra objected.

It must be declared at the very outset that nothing scandalous or discreditable is disclosed in this book (Allen, Towne and Heath, $4). It is true that the author has pointed out the clay feet of the idol, but that is the duty of the conscientious biographer. Mr. Smith has done a courageous job and one that is not often ventured where the subject is still living.

Perhaps one reason Smith went so microscopically in the early life of Koussevitzky grows out of the musician's unjustifiable secretiveness. It should not be possible to write of any man who is still living that "Koussevitzky married Nadezhda Galot, a ballet dancer, not later than 1902 and probably several years earlier." Why couldn't Koussevitzky tell us the date of his first marriage, if it is a material fact? We get an excellent picture of the famous steamer trips up and down the Volga when Koussevitzky brought his own orchestra to the many hamlets which had never before heard symphonic music. This was the first adventure in what has been a long career of entertaining in the grand manner and propagating music in the grand manner.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY has declared there were reflections on his competency as a conductor. Mr. Smith dilates upon the rehearsal methods used by the great Russian — his reliance, for instance, upon a pianist in familiarizing himself with new scores. The story goes—and it is fairly well known—that with any new composition Koussevitzky, in the early days at least, had his pianist play it through while he conducted for the sake of perfecting his baton routine. If that method worked, there is no reason why it wasn't as good as any other.

And Moses Smith makes it clear that this method has worked. He is appreciative of the genius of Koussevitzky as a conductor, of Koussevitzky's instinct for orchestral coloring matter and of his wizardry in its use. He projects successfully the dynamism of the man.

* * *

FULLEST CREDIT is given Koussevitzky for his valiant efforts in behalf of new composers the world around and of American composers in particular. This is, of course, coupled with the fact that Koussevitzky is himself a publisher and has in a material way profited by the exploitation of some of the composers whose name he has brought to the fore.

The record is carried right up to the present with a full account of the development of Tanglewood. Nothing better illustrates the character and the capacity of Koussevitzky than this unique cultural development in the Berkshire hills.

We are given also the details of the generations-long battle between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the union which ended so recently in the final capitulation to Petrillo. Koussevitzky had very little patience with the ultra-conservatives of Boston who opposed unionization. When the trustees as a last rampart raised the objection that the orchestra could not be unionized without compromising the artistic integrity of the conductor, Koussevitzky declared that they were more concerned about his artistic integrity than he was.

When the time came, he found the union regime actually a little more difficult than he expected because he had been accustomed to unlimited rehearsals and that in his own good time.

* * *

THERE IS SOME tangential material in this book which contributes to the long and stormy record of the Boston Orchestra, notably in the case of Dr. Karl Muck. The complete story of that conductor's clash with the authorities during the First World War and his internment has never fully been told.

It it difficult to see why the subject ever objected to this biography. Moses Smith has been most judicial in his approach, and in the last analysis one lays down the book with a renewed interest in Koussevitzky and a decidedly increased estimate of his artistic stature. He is a bigger man than he was before one began to read; there is a renewed wish to hear his incomparable music-making again and again. It is therefore a wholly friendly book.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

MAY 25 1947

Toscanini Wins Music Poll Again

Once again, a broadcast by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony was honored as the outstanding radio musical event of the year by music editors of U. S. A. and Canada daily papers in the Fourth Annual Poll of Music on the Air conducted by Musical America, music news magazine. This was the performance of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet on Feb. 9 and 16.

Winners in some of the other classifications voted on by the 600 music writers are:

¶ Outstanding Metropolitan Opera Broadcast: Tristan und Isolde.

¶ Symphony Orchestra: Boston Symphony (ABC).

¶ Symphony Conductor (Regular): Arturo Toscanini.

¶ Symphony Conductor (Guest): Bruno Walter.

¶ Concert and Program Director: Donald Voorhees.

¶ Orchestra with Featured Soloists: Telephone Hour (NBC).

¶ Concert Orchestra: Longines Symphonette (WOR and local).

¶ Musical Variety Program: Album of Familiar Music (NBC).

¶ Woman Singer (Regularly Featured): Eleanor Steber.

¶ Woman Singer (Occasionally Featured): Marian Anderson.

¶ Man Singer (Regularly Featured): James Melton.

¶ Man Singer (Occasionally Featured): Ezio Pinza.

¶ Instrumental Ensemble: NBC String Quartet.

¶ Vocal Ensemble: Collegiate Chorale.

¶ Instrumentalists: Artur Rubinstein (piano); Jascha Heifetz (violin); E. Power Biggs (organ).

¶ Program of Educational Character: Gateways to Music (CBS).

¶ Announcer, Commentator: Milton Cross (ABC).

A special award went to the National Broadcasting Co., which "through the year served most faithfully the cause of serious music."

This year's questions to music editors dealt entirely with the scripts surrounding musical programs. Expressing themselves as satisfied in general with the scripts used on the majority of serious musical programs were 67 per cent of the voters. A large percentage considered the Met's intermission features the best on the air.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

APR 27 1947

Boston Orchestra Off For Summer Boston 'Pops' On

The Boston "Pops" Concerts will replace the Tuesday night Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts over WTJS-ABC beginning April 29, it was announced today by Charles C. Barry, director of programs for the network.

The broadcasts will be part of the summer season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will be heard over WTJS-ABC each Tuesday at 7:30-8:30 p. m., CST, through June 24. Arthur Fiedler will be the conductor.

"The American Broadcasting Company is happy to present this, the 67th season of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra series," said Barry. "To thousands of listeners, the return of this popular series will be in the nature of a reunion."

"Mr. Fiedler, who has presided over these summer concerts since 1930, has been so successful that the programs have been attempted in other cities, demonstrating that his scheme of blending lighter numbers with the familiar serious type of music has a widening audience."

"Originally patterned after the Saturday "Pops" at St. James Hall in London, the Boston "Pops" Concerts, through the medium of broadcasting, have made it possible for the informality at Symphony Hall to be carried directly into the homes of thousands of listeners."

The broadcasts will come from Boston's Symphony Hall, which will undergo its annual changeover into summer garb at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts on April 22. Seats will be removed and tables installed where patrons may enjoy light refreshments and light music at the same time.

William L. Marshall, producer, and Gene Hamilton, announcer, on the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra series will continue in these capacities for the Boston "Pops" Concerts.

The season's opener will present "Pomp and Circumstance" by Elgar, "Ranch House Party" by Gillis, Wagner's 'Tannhauser' overture, Britten's "Matinees Musicales Suite" after Rossini, and Strauss' "Music of the Spheres' waltzes.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

MAY 28 1947

BACH:: Brandenberg Concert No. 2, in F, and No. 5, in D, Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky (Victor album DM-1118, four twelve inch records). Nos. 3 and 4 of the Brandenberg concertos were issued by Victor last June, in an album to which this proves a companion. All four were recorded during the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood —and Nos. 2 and 5, like the pair reviewed in this column almost a year ago, are close to perfection. Mr. Koussevitzk directs an ideally balanced reading which makes issuance of the first and final Brandenberg concertos, in the same album format, imperative—if they are not already on the way.

• • •

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

MAY 28 1947

MUSIC on RECORDS

KOUSSEVITZKY
During Rehearsal

Bach as Virtuoso

AMONG the many examples of Bach's supremacy as a virtuoso composer are his Brandenburg Concertos, which, happily, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are putting on records with fastidious taste and tone. The newest album contains the Concerto No. 2 in F, and the Concerto No. 5, in D.

Of these, the one in F is the better known. In this album it is played with painstaking balance of parts, with verve, and with an awareness of its values which takes it far from the hop, skip and jump performances often heard. The middle movement is especially beautiful for its delicately etched lyricism, and the other movements are appropriately light and gay.

The Concerto in D is one of Bach's minor masterpieces, with a subtlety of melodic line similar to that encountered in certain passages of the English suites. A piano is used as clavier in this recording, though not without an explanation that the sonorities have nevertheless been kept in balance, and its dominant role is splendidly set forth by Lukas Foss. The cadenza for clavier, in the first movement, comes off with plangent urgency. The second movement is such a fluent attenuation of voices that one could not ask for more.

As a whole, the album continues the standards set by Serge Koussevitzky and his men in the previous recorded concertos. The other feature players are Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin. The recording captures their fine blend of tone with precision. (Victor 1118; 4 12-inch).

ROSLINDALE, MASS
PARKWAY TRANSCRIPT
5/29/47

Critics Choose Boston Symphony As Best on Air

Six hundred music editors and critics throughout the United States and Canada have selected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, as the outstanding orchestra now broadcasting. The selection was made as the result of the "Music on the Air" poll taken by "Musical America," national music magazine.

Four certificates of first place awards in the fourth annual poll were accepted by Robert E. Kintner, executive vice president of the American Broadcasting Company, during the May 24th "Saturday Concert" broadcast, heard here over station WCOP. Quaintance Eaton, associate editor of the magazine who personally conducted the poll of 600 radio and music critics, made the presentations.

Aside from the Boston Symphony, which placed first in its class and swept the board in the poll, three other ABC units received first place awards. The Metropolian Opera intermission features, in which Boston's Boris Goldovsky participates; the Metropolitan broadcast of "Tristan and Isolde"; and Milton Cross, named outstanding announcer and commentator on music on the air; all were first place selections of the critics.

Music Editors Choose Winners

★ Symphony Conductor
Regular

Arturo Toscanini

Bruno Walter

★ Symphony Conductor
Guest

★ Program Conductor

Donald Voorhees

Eleanor Steber

★ Woman Singer
Regular

★ Woman Singer
Occasional

Marian Anderson

(Continued from page 3)

and Isolde was chosen as the outstanding single broadcast, with Boris Godunoff, and Romeo and Juliet running close behind. Heard in the Tristan broadcast on Nov. 30 were Helen Traubel, Set Svanholm, Margaret Harshaw, Joel Berglund and Deszo Ernster, with Fritz Busch conducting.

Other statistics which may prove interesting concern the two-and-three-time winners. For the third time E. Power Biggs leads the organ classification, for his broadcasts over the Columbia Broadcasting System. Donald Voorhees, conductor of the Telephone Hour, won for the second time as Concert and Program Conductor, as did the Variety Program, Album of Familiar Music (Gustave Haenschen, Donald Dame, Jean Dickenson, Margaret Daum, Evelyn MacGregor and others over NBC). Jascha Heifetz was again the leading violinist.

The most startling change in the lineup is the displacement of the three-time winner, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, by the Boston Symphony, which, two years ago, tied for first place, was in second place last year and this year comes to the top. Its broadcasts over ABC under Serge Koussevitzky came to the fore this year, although Dr. Koussevitzky remains, Toscanini in the voters' affections. as before, in second place to Arturo

New names this year include Eleanor Steber as Woman Singer Regularly Heard (The Firestone Hour, NBC) who advanced to first place from last year's second, while Licia Albanese took second place and Risë Stevens appeared newly in this classification in third. James Melton moved from second to lead as Man Singer Regularly Heard (Harvest of Stars, NBC). Bruno Walter, who earlier won first place as Operatic Conductor, was second last year as Guest Symphony Conductor and came to first place in this poll. Artur Rubinstein, third last year, advanced to first as outstanding pianist.

Because of two new classifications, there are additional programs to be listed. In the Concert Orchestra division, the Longines Symphonette, Mishel Piastro, conductor (WOR and local) was a winner, as it had before placed in another cate-

★ Musical Variety

ALBUM OF FAMILIAR MUSIC, Jean Dickenson, Donald Dame, Margaret Daum, Evelyn MacGregor, Gustave Haenschen

★ Vocal Ensemble

Ruth Orkin

COLLEGIATE CHORALE, Robert Shaw conducting

★ Symphony Orchestra

Richard Tucker

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting

★ Of Educational Character

GATEWAYS TO MUSIC, Columbia's School of the Air musical section. Members of the CBS Concert Orchestra at a rehearsal with Mauri, a member of Wasantha Singh's Indian instrumental group

---

SCHENECTADY,
GAZETTE

JUN 3 - 1947

Of Music and Musicians

Did you ever have a desire to d something awfully nice for someone you'd never met? Or probably would never meet? And then suddenly realize that your pocketbook was thinner than usual and that you'd have to suppress that desire to play Santa.

If you have, you can now stop being inhibited in that respect by simply sending a "gift in any amount" as a "Friend of the Berkshire Music Center" to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc. Money raised ~~by the~~ Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center is used to give young musicians "a chance to work with well known masters, to play in orchestras, to practice the art of conducting and to perfect themselves in their own instruments." It gives them "a chance to learn how to compose, to sing in choruses and opera, to play in trios, quartets and full orchestras."

The center, which for the present is limited to 400 students, was established in 1940. It continued through 1942, was suspended for the duration of the war, and reopened in July of last year. Students last year came from South America, Canada and 36 of the United States. The school is dependent on three sources of income, tuition from students who are able to pay, revenue from the Berkshire Festival concerts and gifts of those who elect to become Friends.

And by becoming a "Friend" you will be entitled to attend performances of the two student orchestras, the choral and opera departments and the chamber music groups.

This summer the course in orchestral conducting will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will supervise the rehearsals of the orchestra with the assistance of Leonard Bernstein Richard Burgin, Stanley Chapple and Eleazar de Carvalho. William Primrose will be in charge o chamber music. Students in com position will be directed by Aaro Copland and Arthur Honegger, dis tinguished guest composer fron France. The opera department wi be in charge of Boris Goldovsk assisted by Frederic Cohen an Richard Rychtarik. School choruse will be directed by Hugh Ross an Robert Shaw. Mr. Ross will hav a madrigal group and Mr. S small and large choruses.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

MAY 30 1947

WE HAVE TWO more of the masterful Brandenburg concertos by the ancient and accepted Bach, as performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, released by Victor this month—in a four-pocket album which is the companion piece to that containing the third and fourth concertos as performed by the Bostonians and released in June, 1946. The present concertos, the second and fifth, were recorded at the same time as their predecessors, during the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. While Koussevitzky's conception of this music lacks some of Bach's essential simplicity, it makes for elegant listening as performed by the virtuoso orchestra under his command. True Bach scholars may prefer the Busch recordings, for authentic style; but the Koussevitzky versions are rich and delightful. The wood wind work is of the first order.

CRANBURY, N.J
PRESS
5/30/47

Boston Orchestra In Princeton Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a concert on Sunday evening, June 15, in the Dillon Gymnasium of Princeton University. This concert will constitute one of the events of the concluding festivities of Princeton's Bicentennial celebration.

Dr. Koussevitsky, on this occasion, will conduct the 105 members of his famous organization in a program which includes the Bach "Suite No. 3" for orchestra; the "Academic Festival Overture" by Brahms; Beethoven's 3rd "Eroica" Symphony, and Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom." In this last work the chorus will be supplied by the Princeton University Glee Club and the Princeton University chapel choir.

Tickets for this concert, at $3.00, may be had at the Princeton University Store. No seats will be reserved. The doors will be open at 7:45 and the concert will begin at 8:30 p. m.

Music Editors Choose Winners

★ Symphony Conductor Regular

Arturo Toscanini

Bruno Walter

★ Symphony Conductor Guest

★ Program Conductor

Donald Voorhees

Eleanor Steber

★ Woman Singer Regular

★ Woman Singer Occasional

Marian Anderson

(Continued from page 3)

and Isolde was chosen as the outstanding single broadcast, with Boris Godunoff, and Romeo and Juliet running close behind. Heard in the Tristan broadcast on Nov. 30 were Helen Traubel, Set Svanholm, Margaret Harshaw, Joel Berglund and Deszo Ernster, with Fritz Busch conducting.

Other statistics which may prove interesting concern the two-and-three-time winners. For the third time E. Power Biggs leads the organ classification, for his broadcasts over the Columbia Broadcasting System. Donald Voorhees, conductor of the Telephone Hour, won for the second time as Concert and Program Conductor, as did the Variety Program, Album of Familiar Music (Gustave Haenschen, Donald Dame, Jean Dickenson, Margaret Daum, Evelyn MacGregor and others over NBC). Jascha Heifetz was again the leading violinist.

The most startling change in the lineup is the displacement of the three-time winner, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, by the Boston Symphony, which, two years ago, tied for first place, was in second place last year and this year comes to the top. Its broadcasts over ABC under Serge Koussevitzky came to the fore this year, although Dr. Koussevitzky remains, as before, in second place to Arturo Toscanini in the voters' affections.

New names this year include Eleanor Steber as Woman Singer Regularly Heard (The Firestone Hour, NBC) who advanced to first place from last year's second, while Licia Albanese took second place and Risë Stevens appeared newly in this classification in third. James Melton moved from second to lead as Man Singer Regularly Heard (Harvest of Stars, NBC). Bruno Walter, who earlier won first place as Operatic Conductor, was second last year as Guest Symphony Conductor and came to first place in this poll. Artur Rubinstein, third last year, advanced to first as outstanding pianist.

Because of two new classifications, there are additional programs to be listed. In the Concert Orchestra division, the Longines Symphonette, Mishel Piastro, conductor (WOR and local) was a winner, as it had before placed in another cate-

★ Musical Variety

ALBUM OF FAMILIAR MUSIC, Jean Dickenson, Donald Dame, Margaret Daum, Evelyn MacGregor, Gustave Haenschen

★ Vocal Ensemble

Ruth Orkin

COLLEGIATE CHORALE, Robert Shaw conducting

★ Symphony Orchestra

Richard Tucker

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting

★ Of Educational Character

GATEW[illegible]C, Columbia's School of the Air musical section. Members of the [illegible] Concert Orchestra at a rehearsal with Mauri, a member of Wasantha Singh's Indian instrumental group

---

SCHENECTADY
GAZETTE

JUN 3 - 19

Of Music and Musicians

Did you ever have a desire to d something awfully nice for someone you'd never met? Or probably would never meet? And then suddenly realize that your pocketbook was thinner than usual and that you'd have to suppress that desire to play Santa.

If you have, you can now stop being inhibited in that respect by simply sending a "gift in any amount" as a "Friend of the Berkshire Music Center" to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc. "Money raised by the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center is used to give young musicians "a chance to work with well known masters, to play in orchestras, to practice the art of conducting and to perfect themselves in their own instruments." It gives them "a chance to learn how to compose, to sing in choruses and opera, to play in trios, quartets and full orchestras."

The center, which for the present is limited to 400 students, was established in 1940. It continued through 1942, was suspended for the duration of the war, and reopened in July of last year. Students last year came from South America, Canada and 36 of the United States. The school is dependent on three sources of income, tuition from students who are able to pay, revenue from the Berkshire Festival concerts and gifts of those who elect to become Friends.

And by becoming a "Friend" you will be entitled to attend performances of the two student orchestras, the choral and opera departments and the chamber music groups.

This summer the course in orchestral conducting will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will supervise the rehearsals of the orchestra with the assistance of Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Stanley Chapple and Eleazar de Carvalho. William Primrose will be in charge of chamber music. Students in composition will be directed by Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, distinguished guest composer from France. The opera department will be in charge of Boris Goldovsky assisted by Frederic Cohen and Richard Rychtarik. School choruses will be directed by Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw. Mr. Ross will have a madrigal group and Mr. S small and large choruses.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

MAY 30 1947

WE HAVE TWO more of the masterful Brandenburg concertos by the ancient and accepted Bach, as performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, released by Victor this month—in a four-pocket album which is the companion piece to that containing the third and fourth concertos as performed by the Bostonians and released in June, 1946. The present concertos, the second and fifth were recorded at the same time as their predecessors, during the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. While Koussevitzky's conception of this music lacks some of Bach's essential simplicity, it makes for elegant listening as performed by the virtuoso orchestra under his command. True Bach scholars may prefer the Busch recordings, for authentic style; but the Koussevitzky versions are rich and delightful. The wood wind work is of the first order.

CRANBURY, N.J
PRESS
5/30/47

Boston Orchestra In Princeton Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a concert on Sunday evening, June 15, in the Dillon Gymnasium of Princeton University. This concert will constitute one of the events of the concluding festivities of Princeton's Bicentennial celebration.

Dr. Koussevitsky, on this occasion, will conduct the 105 members of his famous organization in a program which includes the Bach "Suite No. 3" for orchestra; the "Academic Festival Overture" by Brahms; Beethoven's 3rd "Eroica" Symphony, and Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom." In this last work the chorus will be supplied by the Princeton University Glee Club and the Princeton University chapel choir.

Tickets for this concert, at $3.00, may be had at the Princeton University Store. No seats will be reserved. The doors will be open at 7:45 and the concert will begin at 8:30 p. m.

Koussevitzky, 'Bad Boy' of Music

Conductor's Efforts to Suppress a Biography of Him Have Focused Attention on His Rise to Eminence Through Audacity, Herculean Labor and Unquestioned Genius

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who brings ~~his superlative~~ Boston symphony orchestra to Milwaukee each December, is a great musician, a great conductor and a hard loser. Several weeks ago an "unauthorized' biography of the maestro was brought out by a new publishing firm--Allen, Towne & Heath. The book was written by Moses Smith, a veteran Boston critic and onetime friend of the conductor.

Koussevitzky was enraged by the book. He called it an invasion of his privacy, and he demanded that the courts suppress it. The courts have refused to ban it, and the re-ult has been that the Koussevitzky story has received vastly more attention than would otherwise have come to it.

Just why the conductor sought to expunge the essay is not overly apparent. His biographer is critical, to be sure, but highly laudatory. He wells upon the musician's genius. But he likewise reminds his readers that Koussevitzky is human, that he has displayed human shortcomings, even in his field of music. But Koussevitzky has overcome his musical shortcomings in magnificent fashion. He has achieved victory by mighty labors.

Invasion of Privacy?

The biography "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith, was involved in litigation even before its publication day. The conductor, upon reading an advance copy, asserted that the book contained information detrimental to his reputation, constituted an invasion of his privacy and would interfere with his projected autobiography. The publishers replied that to enjoin a serious biography by a reputable scholar because the subject took exception to some of the facts and interpretations was a blow to a critic's right and to freedom of speech. Their view was upheld by the New York state courts.

Koussevitzky took command of the Boston orchestra in 1924, after long and successful experience in Russia and France. His programs were unusual. He played Russian music and French music brilliantly. His excursions into ancient compositions and into the contemporary output were refreshingly original.

But, as every orchestra fan knows, the foundation of a symphonic repertory is the German classics—the Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Bach, Brahms and the rest. And in the German music, he was obviously less strong, less experienced. It was felt that he didn't know these scores. Close listeners were surprised to notice confused uncertainty in his Haydn and Wagner.

"There were times in those days when Koussevitzky was close to tears with frustration, induced by a confused awareness that he was not prepared for his task," Moses Smith asserts. "The most dramatic achievement in Koussevitzky's career lay in his eventual victory, in his application of his talents and powerful will to learn after 50 what a student of conducting often learns before 20."

Talent and will power—that is the Koussevitzky career. His father was a poor Jewish violinist and string bass player of Tver, 160 miles northwest of Moscow. Serge was a born musician. He took up the cello and soon played better than his father. Occasionally he would run away, for several days at a time, with troupes of wandering musicians. At 17 he left home for Moscow.

At a Moscow conservatory in which he sought entrance, he was turned down because the term was already under way. The furious youth burst into the office of the principal and shouted: "You can't turn me away. I will stay here!" The principal yielded.

As the boy had no money for tuition, he was given a choice of specializing in trombone or string bass. The paying students seldom chose these instruments, which were generally alloted the charity pupils. He elected the string bass as a big brother to the cello. He was to become the world's finest player on the huge, deep voiced instrument. Koussevitzky, who now is 72, no longer plays the double bass, but the phonograph records which he made years ago attest his phenomenal ability to draw a rich, mellow tone out of an instrument which only growls and grunts under less skillful hands.

Koussevitzky on the podium

Koussevitzky as a young man married a ballet dancer. Poverty and conflicts in their professional lives brought a divorce a few years later.

Handsome and talented, the young musician was invited to the homes of the wealthy. One such home was that of Konstantin Ushkov, a millionaire tea merchant. His daughter, Natalya, had seen Serge play and had fallen in love with him across the footlights. They were married in 1905, when he was 31.

Down the Volga on a Music Boat

The Ushkov family was extremely fond of Koussevitzky. His wife's millions were at his disposal. He was reputed to be the wealthiest living instrumentalist.

With such means, he determined to be a conductor. He moved to Berlin and studied conducting in a unique way, by attending the concerts of Nikisch, Mahler, Weingartner and other masters of the baton, and following their work with a copy of the conductor's score. In two years he felt ready for his conductor's debut. He hired the Berlin Philharmonic and directed an all-Russian program, with Rachmaninoff as piano soloist. The critics and audience agreed that he conducted with a fiery effectiveness.

The youthful conductor next set himself up as publisher, to bring forth scores of the rising young Russians, such as Scriabin and Stravinsky. He lived a true millionaire's life. Thirteen servants were required for his Moscow home.

In 1910 Koussevitzky hit upon his most spectacular project—the hiring of a big orchestra, the chartering of a large Volga river steamer, and the presentation of concerts in towns along this most beloved of Russian rivers. The steamer Pervyi could accommodate all the musicians and their families, plus Russian and foreign correspondents, actors and other guests.

Three such tours were made, in 1910, 1912 and 1914. On the third trip, Koussevitsky's orchestra numbered 100. The entire musical world applauded the tours. "What a merry life we led," a newspaperman recalls.

He Had to Learn by Doing

In the first World war Koussevitzky directed concerts as long as the draft permitted any semblance of an orchestra. Even with a "pickup" organization, he achieved remarkable results. The revolutions of 1917 did not deter him. He was acknowledged to be Russia's foremost conductor, and when the Kerensky regime came in, he was named leader of the state symphony orchestra, the successor to the imperial orchestra of the czar's days. When the Bolshevists took over, they retained Koussevitzky.

The conductor displayed amazing courage. He declared that he would continue to lead the state orchestra, although "there can be no question of an 'accord' between myself and the new government." He characterized Russia's new rulers as the 'harshest, most despotic and violent regime that has ever reigned over us."

Koussevitzky's popularity saved him from liquidation. He continued to be Russia's top director. But he was planning to leave, nevertheless. The government had seized his fortune—more than $1,000,000, he estimated—but foresighted relatives had planted wealth for him abroad. He and his wife received permission in 1920 to go abroad.

Paris was his home for the next four years. In funds again, he proceeded to give concerts on a scale which startled and thrilled the Parisian public. Handsome, impeccably tailored, lavish in his hospitality, he made his home a rendezvous for the musicians, the artists, the new composers.

Across the Atlantic, a new conductor was being sought for Boston's famous orchestra, which had undergone years of upheaval. Karl Muck had been tossed out during the war for his alleged leaning toward Germany. Eventually Pierre Monteux took command, but his tenure was to end in 1924. Scouts for the Bostonians brought back exciting tales of Koussevitzky's success in Paris, and he was hired.

His first few seasons in Boston were brutally difficult, because of his imperfect grasp of the entire orchestral literature. But he won out. Friends who had heard him in his Russian days were amazed at the improvement. Literally he learned by doing—the hardest way when you consider that the conductor daily has to face the most critical of audiences, his musicians.

In his early years Koussevitzky fired many of the players, apparently indiscriminately. He asserted that it was to strengthen discipline. But some of his musicians have said, privately, that he discharged some men only because they had discerned the maestro's weaknesses.

Of the results attained by his musicianship and his whiplash discipline, there can be no doubt. The orchestra which he has built into a model of precision and sonority is generally ranked as the world's best.

A Less Than Perfect Command of English

Koussevitzky's American success has not been impeded by his less than perfect command of the English language. A couple of the gems he has flung at his musicians have been culled by his biographer.

"Bassi, you sound like bassi auf which is de price 5c." ("You sound like 5c bass players.")

To a wind player: "You brief so long eet becomes half nut." ("You take so long to breathe you make your notes half notes.")

Koussevitzky's energy has been astonishing. In recent years he has established, almost single handed, an ambitious festival and school at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires. He has conducted, taught classes, raised money and handled executive and administrative jobs that would have taxed three ordinary men.

Koussevitzky's friendship for American composers is legendary. He has always made it a point to seek out fresh young talent—Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein are among his proteges—and he has introduced some 150 new works by more than 50 American composers.

If Koussevitzky has any apparent fault, it is perhaps an excess of the dynamic, demonic energy which has characterized his entire career. He must make his music intensely expressive, whether the composer wills it so or not. His changes in tempo and in the symmetry of his compositions have drawn the attention of captious critics for years.

But the tone and power which he draws forth have invariably won their unstinted praise. Long ago he learned the secret of pulling a rich, succulent tone out of the unwieldly bull fiddle. As a maestro, he has learned how to draw that same sort of music, magnified a hundred times, from that mighty instrument, the orchestra. Long years from now he will be remembered for the distinctive Koussevitzky tone, powerful, resounding, glowing and gleaming in many hues.

WALTER MONFRIED.

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

RIVALRY has flared up again between Columbia and Victor. Simultaneous issue of recordings of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony place them in keen competition. Except that Columbia uses four discs to Victor's three, there is not sufficient difference between the two albums to give one company an edge over the other.

Making a bid to perform a new Shostakovich work has developed into a popular pastime. These recording intensify the scramble. They also set up the New York Philharmonic - Symphony against the Boston Symphony, for the playing of the orchestra may be the decisive factor in choosing one album or the other. The fact that Efrem Kurtz conducts the former and Koussevitzky the latter does not bring quite so much contrast as the casual observer might think.

The situation now stands that we consider the Shostakovich Ninth - willy - Columbia, nilly-Victor. Coming as a surprise to those who have weathered the hour-long seventh and eighth symphonies, the Ninth has been too readily dismissed as a trivial work. On the contrary, its gaiety expresses release from war-time seriousness.

Proves Self Russian

SOME may consider such characteristics trifling, but the contemplative note is not missing. The somber thought asserts itself amidst the laughter: Shostakovich has not overlooked the dual nature of the Russian people.

Repeated hearings of the Ninth Symphony do not curtail its exuberance or wear thin its substance. To be sure, the Shostokovich formulas are quite apparent: Much of the music sounds reminiscent of measures existing in his other works. The trade mark is there indelibly stamped in the style of melody, of phrase, and of instrumentation. It all sounds well, fresh and witty and sincere.

The Columbia album has the advantage of brisk, brilliant and vibrant conducting by Kurtz and exceptionally fine playing by the Philharmonic-Symphony. A peculiar miscalculation in timing causes one unfortunate break between the first and second records. The Victor album reveals the penetration into a score characteristic of Koussevitzky, but gives the impression of a somewhat less dynamic treatment of the music. One tends to be more attracted to the Columbia album on first hearing.

Handel Suite Impressive

A NUMBER of Columbia albums call for more mention than is possible here. Wieniawski's Second Violin Concerto is persuasively set forth by Isaac Stern, violinist, and the Philharmonic - Symphony with Kurtz conducting. Stern brings more than sheer virtuosity to his performance, appreciating as he does the musical values as well. The Handel "Water Music" suite is impressively played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy. The 'cellist, Piatigorsky, indulges in playing some famous Russian melodies of Rubinstein, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky - Korsakov, Cui and Tchaikowsky.

Victor's new recording of the Bach Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 are felicitously played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its own soloists, conducted by Koussevitzky. The fame of this music is sufficient endorsement of its intrinsic merits. An album of Mendelssohn's piano music presents Horowitz more as a superlative technician than as an interpreter. As a result, his performance of the "Variations Serieuses" appears almost as a distortion of the romantic spirit of the music.

A BOUQUET FOR 'POP' CONCERTS

Lighter Repertoire Seen as Deserving a Place in Musical Life

By OLIN DOWNES

WELCOME to the "Pop" concerts in Carnegie Hall! The first spring season of these events is evidently pleasing to the public. Programs of orchestral and operatic music, of not too serious a sort, and refreshments of no heavier nature, make for excellent entertainment, and may also remind us of Debussy's admirable observation, that there is one music whether it is found in a waltz or a symphony.

Yes! If this type of concert serves to reassure audiences that music does not bite, that it is not necessary to fold your hands in prayer when you enter a concert hall, and that a good time may be enjoyed and even applauded without betraying ignorance or irreverence, it will have materially advanced the interests of the art. For it is perhaps as essential in our present stage of musical "culture," to emphasize the beauty of a popular Italian aria, or the genius of a march by John Philip Sousa, as to attempt to convince a newcomer that a piece of machine-made counterpoint must be studied to be "understood," or that those are in the outer darkness whose natural, sound musical instinct bids them reject the sterile, feeble pretentiousness of empty scores of the kind produced recently by Igor Stravinsky.

Other Things in Art

Certain it is that a lifetime may be spent in assimilating the grandeurs of an "Eroica" symphony, or the Fourth of Sibelius. But there are other things in the art, as there are other things, also important, in living. Academicians and snobs may be blind to lesser beauties. When they are, one strongly suspects the quality of their perceptiveness or their alleged devotion to the greater forms. There is wonderful music not included in the higher intellectual brackets by the self-appointed high priests of the cults whom it would profit if they themselves were enough in touch with realities to recognize its value and its universality in the sense that so impressed Debussy.

The "Pop" concerts present many soloists and ensemble groups who have not yet had big-league opportunities. Appearances at these occasions are not to be minimized or underestimated. They require the artist to prove himself, with the audiences declaring spontaneously their judgments irrespective of the critics. These audiences will listen to what they like and what they hear, or be inattentive and bored, as they have a perfect right to be if they are not interested. The performer succeeds or fails with this big, variously assorted public without any learned propaganda to aid him.

And similarly with the young conductors. They may not have as extensive opportunities to rehearse as they would desire for an ideal situation. They might choose more ambitious programs if they followed their wishes in the arrangement. But they must get up and direct the orchestra in an interpretation as near as may be to their conceptions of the music. They must accompany soloists in the performance, not only of a concerto, but a recitative and aria, which may be harder, and learn how to meet contingencies.

Opera Singer

Voss

John Hamill, who will sing the role of Frederic in "The Pirates of Penzance" at the New York City Center Wednesday.

Nor are the programs necessarily a handicap. Modern music, as well as "romantic" or "classic" compositions, is desirable as a part of their offerings. Music of sophisticated workmanship can properly be included in the lists if it is presented with imagination and skill in the gentle art of program making.

A practical value in this arrangement, which is important, is that of employment. For the body of Philharmonic-Symphony players whose performances are the basis of the entertainment, the "Pops" mean more weeks of engagements between the subscription seasons of the winter and the Stadium concerts of the summer, and a further step along the road a modern orchestra must take for its development and self maintenance. Where employment for members of a representative orchestra for something that approaches a ten or eleven months' season is assured, that orchestra is in a fair way to the solution of many problems. And this, in turn, extends the service which the orchestra renders its public.

It is not surprising to the present observer that the "Pop" concerts in Carnegie Hall have, in the first two weeks of their existence, gained the public's support. It is merely incomprehensible to him that a distinctive kind of orchestral entertainment which has long since proved its value in other cities—Boston's "Pop" concerts being the historical model—should have been so long in receiving consideration in this community.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
JUN 5 - 1947

Boston Symphony at Princeton

Special to the Herald Tribune

PRINCETON, N. J., June 4.—The first public event in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction Sunday night, June 15, as a part of the four day program which closes the university's bicentennial celebration. Eighty members of the Princeton Glee Club and the University Chapel Choir will sing with the orchestra in the finale of "Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson, who is a member of the Princeton music faculty. The program also includes Bach's third suite, in D major, Brahms's Academic Festival Overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
JUN 6 - 1947

CopelandandBloch Get Critics' Awards

Virgil Thomson Receives Citation for Opera

The Music Critics Circle has made awards for two American works which were introduced to New York in the 1946-'47 season, according to an announcement yesterday by Miles Kastendieck, its president. In the category of orchestral works, the Circle's award went to Aaron Copland for his third symphony, which was first played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last November. Honorable mention went to Douglas Moore's second symphony, which was first played here by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Alfred Wallenstein in the Columbia University festival May 17.

The Circle's award for chamber music went to Ernest Bloch for his second string quartet, which was first played here by the Griller Quartet Feb. 26. David Diamond's third string quartet, introduced at a concert of the League of Composers March 16, received honorable mention. No award was made in the category of dramatic music, which includes both choral and stage works. A special citation was voted to Virgil Thomson for his opera "The Mother of Us All," which was ineligible for the award, since its composer is a member of the Circle. Honorable mention was given to Kurt Weill for his "Street Scene."

An American chamber music works reheard here in the last season and deserving a place in the repertory of chamber-music groups, the Circle named Samuel Barber's "Capricorn" concerto, Aaron Copland's Sextet, Charles Ives's second string quartet, Douglas Moore's first string quartet and Walter Piston's second string quartet. No citations were made for orchestral and dramatic music reheard in the last season.

The Circle makes awards annually for what it considers exceptional works by American citizens which had their first New York public performances during the season under consideration, and cites meritorious American works reheard here during the season.

JUN - 1947

Distinctive Works Of Season Voted By Music Critics

NEW YORK, June 6.—(AP)—The Music Critics' Circle of New York has voted Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second Quartet as the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music works heard in New York for the first time the past season.

Copland, a New York City composer, had his symphony performed last November by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Bloch maintains a residence at Agate Beach, Oreg. His quartet was introduced last February by the Griller String Quartet.

In the category of dramatic music no award was voted. However, Virgil Thomson's opera, "The Mother of Us All," received a special citation. Thomson, because he is a member of the circle, was ineligible for the regular award.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
JUN 6 - 1947

Music Critics Pick Winners

New York, June 6. (AP)—The music critics circle of New York has voted Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second Quartet as the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music works heard in New York for the first time the past season.

Copland, a New York City composer, had his symphony performed last November by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Bloch maintains a residence at Agate Beach, Ore. His quartet was introduced last February by the Griller String Quartet.

In the category of dramatic music no award was voted. However, Virgil Thomson's opera, The Mother Of Us All, received a special citation. Thomson, because he is a member of the circle, was ineligible for the regular award.

NEW YORK TIMES
JUN 5 - 1947

Princeton to Hear Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRINCETON, N. J., June 4—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a concert in Princeton University's new Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium on the evening of June 15, as part of the final celebrations of the university's bicentennial year. An audience of 3,000, including delegates from 450 educational institutions throughout the world, is expected to attend the concert.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JUN 5 - 1947

Since June 1946, Victor has made available on records the second, third, fourth and fifth Brandenburg Concertos played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The second and fifth have just been released. The perfection of the Boston players makes possible a superlative performance of Bach's music. These records are something to cherish, something to listen to when all else seems futile. Album M-1118.

The recordings of the works of Tschaikowsky seem limitless, yet Columbia has done us a marked favor in making available the Russian master's delightful, "Serenade in C Major for String Orchestra." Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, the result is a graceful exposition of a truly charming work. M-677.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JUN 5 - 1947

Deems Taylor Deems Orchestra Conductors Don't Rate Copyrights

By United Press

Conductor Walter Damrosch "plays everything too slow" and Guy Lombardo's "saxophones are always flat."

For that reason, Composer Deems Taylor told a House Judiciary subcommittee, he would be able to tell blindfolded whether a piece of music was being played by Damrosch or Lombardo.

Mr. Taylor

But generally speaking, Mr. Taylor said, he and most others would have to see the conductor in order to identify him.

Mr. Taylor made these observations to explain why he opposes legislation to permit the copywrighting of recorded "interpretations" of music. The bill's supporters have argued that orchestral arrangements are distinctive enough to justify their copyrighting.

But Mr. Taylor, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, said copyrights should be entirely controlled by the music writer.

Under the proposed bill, he said, "Serge Koussevitzky might be able to sue me for infringing upon his copyrighted interpretation of my work. To me, that just doesn't make sense."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JUN 6 - 1947

Records

Two Branc

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Two of the six "Brandenburg" Concertos of Bach—the No. 2, in F major (flute, violin, oboe, trumpet and strings) and the No. 5 in D major (flute, violin, clavier and strings)—come out of the Victor mills, as done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Written at Coethen, where Bach composed most of his chamber music, the "Brandenburg" concertos occupied about two years of the composer's time. When they were completed he addressed them to his patron, the Margrave Christian Ludwig of Brandenburg (who still sounds to us—after all these years—like a character out of Wagner). With that went an elaborately worded dedication, in the typical humility of the times, as Abdy Williams says.

However, Bach was no figure of 20th century importance in the Margrave's eyes, apparently, for after that noble music patron's death, it was discovered that the concertos had not been listed among his catalogued possessions. Lucky for us that the composer kept his own copies of the works, which were later found, together with several other manuscripts, in a bunch of stuff and things.

The Boston Symphony's performance of these works is as close to the ideal of Bach's time, one would expect, as a modern, highly polished, well-oiled musical machine can bring them. Which may be about as much as there is to ask for. Smooth playing marks the renderings, the rhythms are good, and they are bouncy, too, wherever necessary. The Victor set, DM-1118, contains four 12-inch disks. * * *

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER
JUN 8 1947

Major Concertos in Five New Disc Albums

By ALEXANDER FRIED

IT'S TIME TO TAKE another look at the records—No fewer than five new albums contain major concertos. While it can't be said all the concertos will appeal to every music lover, each concerto in its way is important enough to appeal to somebody.

Bach's "Brandenburg" Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 (Victor) represent the vital classic master school. They get splendid performance from the Boston Symphony strings and various soloists, led by Koussevitzky.

Most noteworthy soloists are Roger Voisin, playing the difficult high Bach trumpet and Lukas Foss, the piano. Why modern piano, by the way? Why not the authentic old

---

SPOKESMAN REVIEW
17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, LATE WIFE'S NIECE MARRIED

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

A BOUQUET FOR 'POP' CONCERTS

Lighter Repertoire Seen as Deserving a Place in Musical Life

By OLIN DOWNES

WELCOME to the "Pop" concerts in Carnegie Hall! The first spring season of these events is evidently pleasing to the public. Programs of orchestral and operatic music, of not too serious a sort, and refreshments of no heavier nature, make for excellent entertainment, and may also remind us of Debussy's admirable observation, that there is one music whether it is found in a waltz or a symphony.

Yes! If this type of concert serves to reassure audiences that music does not bite, that it is not necessary to fold your hands in prayer when you enter a concert hall, and that a good time may be enjoyed and even applauded without betraying ignorance or irreverence, it will have materially advanced the interests of the art. For it is perhaps as essential in our present stage of musical "culture," to emphasize the beauty of a popular Italian aria, or the genius of a march by John Philip Sousa, as to attempt to convince a newcomer that a piece of machine-made counterpoint must be studied to be "understood," or that those are in the outer darkness whose natural, sound musical instinct bids them reject the sterile, feeble pretentiousness of empty scores of the kind produced recently by Igor Stravinsky.

Other Things in Art

Certain it is that a lifetime may be spent in assimilating the grandeurs of an "Eroica" symphony, or the Fourth of Sibelius. But there are other things in the art, as there are other things, also important, in living. Academicians and snobs may be blind to lesser beauties. When they are, one strongly suspects the quality of their perceptiveness or their alleged devotion to the greater forms. There is wonderful music not included in the higher intellectual brackets by the self-appointed high priests of the cults whom it would profit if they themselves were enough in touch with realities to recognize its value and its universality in the sense that so impressed Debussy.

The "Pop" concerts present many soloists and ensemble groups who have not yet had big-league opportunities. Appearances at these occasions are not to be minimized or underestimated. They require the artist to prove himself, with the audiences declaring spontaneously their judgments irrespective of the critics. These audiences will listen to what they like and what they hear, or be inattentive and bored, as they have a perfect right to be if they are not interested. The performer succeeds or fails with this big, variously assorted public without any learned propaganda to aid him.

And similarly with the young conductors. They may not have as extensive opportunities to rehearse as they would desire for an ideal situation. They might choose more ambitious programs if they followed their wishes in the arrangement. But they must get up and direct the orchestra in an interpretation as near as may be to their conceptions of the music. They must accompany soloists in the performance, not only of a concerto, but a recitative and aria, which may be harder, and learn how to meet contingencies.

Nor are the programs necessarily a handicap. Modern music, as well as "romantic" or "classic" compositions, is desirable as a part of their offerings. Music of sophisticated workmanship can properly be included in the lists if it is presented with imagination and skill in the gentle art of program making.

A practical value in this arrangement, which is important, is that of employment. For the body of Philharmonic-Symphony players whose performances are the basis of the entertainment, the "Pops" mean more weeks of engagements between the subscription seasons of the winter and the Stadium concerts of the summer, and a further step along the road a modern orchestra must take for its development and self maintenance. Where employment for members of a representative orchestra for something that approaches a ten or eleven months' season is assured, that orchestra is in a fair way to the solution of many problems. And this, in turn, extends the service which the orchestra renders its public.

It is not surprising to the present observer that the "Pop" concerts in Carnegie Hall have, in the first two weeks of their existence, gained the public's support. It is merely incomprehensible to him that a distinctive kind of orchestral entertainment which has long since proved its value in other cities—Boston's "Pop" concerts being the historical model—should have been so long in receiving consideration in this community.

Opera Singer

Voss

John Hamill, who will sing the role of Frederic in "The Pirates of Penzance" at the New York City Center Wednesday.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JUN 5 - 1947

Boston Symphony at Princeton

Special to the Herald Tribune

PRINCETON, N. J., June 4.—The first public event in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction Sunday night, June 15, as a part of the four day program which closes the university's bicentennial celebration. Eighty members of the Princeton Glee Club and the University Chapel Choir will sing with the orchestra in the finale of "Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson, who is a member of the Princeton music faculty. The program also includes Bach's third suite, in D major, Brahms's Academic Festival Overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JUN 6 - 1947

CopelandandBloch Get Critics' Awards

Virgil Thomson Receives Citation for Opera

The Music Critics Circle has made awards for two American works which were introduced to New York in the 1946-'47 season, according to an announcement yesterday by Miles Kastendieck, its president. In the category of orchestral works, the Circle's award went to Aaron Copland for his third symphony, which was first played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last November. Honorable mention went to Douglas Moore's second symphony, which was first played here by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Alfred Wallenstein in the Columbia University festival May 17.

The Circle's award for chamber music went to Ernest Bloch for his second string quartet, which was first played here by the Griller Quartet Feb. 26. David Diamond's third string quartet, introduced at a concert of the League of Composers March 16, received honorable mention. No award was made in the category of dramatic music, which includes both choral and stage works. A special citation was voted to Virgil Thomson for his opera "The Mother of Us All," which was ineligible for the award, since its composer is a member of the Circle. Honorable mention was given to Kurt Weill for his "Street Scene."

An American chamber music works reheard here in the last season and deserving a place in the repertory of chamber-music groups, the Circle named Samuel Barber's "Capricorn" concerto, Aaron Copland's Sextet, Charles Ives's second string quartet, Douglas Moore's first string quartet and Walter Piston's second string quartet. No citations were made for orchestral and dramatic music reheard in the last season.

The Circle makes awards annually for what it considers exceptional works by American citizens which had their first New York public performances during the season under consideration, and cites meritorious American works reheard here during the season.

NEWS

JUN [illegible] 1947

Distinctive Works Of Season Voted By Music Critics

NEW YORK, June 6.—(AP)—The Music Critics' Circle of New York has voted Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second Quartet as the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music works heard in New York for the first time the past season.

Copland, a New York City composer, had his symphony performed last November by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Bloch maintains a residence at Agate Beach, Oreg. His quartet was introduced last February by the Griller String Quartet.

In the category of dramatic music no award was voted. However, Virgil Thomson's opera, "The Mother of Us All," received a special citation. Thomson, because he is a member of the circle, was ineligible for the regular award.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JUN 6 - 1947

Music Critics Pick Winners

New York, June 6. (AP) — The music critics circle of New York has voted Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second Quartet as the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music works heard in New York for the first time the past season.

Copland, a New York City composer, had his symphony performed last November by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Bloch maintains a residence at Agate Beach, Ore. His quartet was introduced last February by the Griller String Quartet.

In the category of dramatic music no award was voted. However, Virgil Thomson's opera, The Mother Of Us All, received a special citation. Thomson, because he is a member of the circle, was ineligible for the regular award.

NEW YORK TIMES

JUN 5 - 1947

Princeton to Hear Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRINCETON, N. J., June 4—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a concert in Princeton University's new Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium on the evening of June 15, as part of the final celebrations of the universtiy's bicentennial year. An audience of 3,000, including delegates from 450 educational institutions throughout the world, is expected to attend the concert.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUN 5 1947

Since June 1946, Victor has made available on records the second, third, fourth and fifth Brandenburg Concertos played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The second and fifth have just been released. The perfection of the Boston players makes possible a superlative performance of Bach's music. These records are something to cherish, something to listen to when all else seems futile. Album M-1118.

The recordings of the works of Tschaikowsky seem limitless, yet Columbia has done us a marked favor in making available the Russian master's delightful, "Serenade in C Major for String Orchestra." Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, the result is a graceful exposition of a truly charming work. M-677.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JUN 5 1947

Deems Taylor Deems Orchestra Conductors Don't Rate Copyrights

By United Press

Conductor Walter Damrosch "plays everything too slow" and Guy Lombardo's "saxophones are always flat."

For that reason, Composer Deems Taylor told a House Judiciary subcommittee, he would be able to tell blindfolded whether a piece of music was being played by Damrosch or Lombardo.

Mr. Taylor

But generally speaking, Mr. Taylor said, he and most others would have to see the conductor in order to identify him.

Mr. Taylor made these observations to explain why he opposes legislation to permit the copywrighting of recorded "interpretations" of music. The bill's supporters have argued that orchestral arrangements are distinctive enough to justify their copyrighting.

But Mr. Taylor, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, said copyrights should be entirely controlled by the music writer.

Under the proposed bill, he said, "Serge Koussevitzky might be able to sue me for infringing upon his copyrighted interpretation of my work. To me, that just doesn't make sense."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUN 6 - 1947

Records

Two Branc

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Two of the six "Brandenburg" Concertos of Bach—the No. 2, in F major (flute, violin, oboe, trumpet and strings) and the No. 5 in D major (flute, violin, clavier and strings)—come out of the Victor mills, as done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Written at Coethen, where Bach composed most of his chamber music, the "Brandenburg" concertos occupied about two years of the composer's time. When they were completed he addressed them to his patron, the Margrave Christian Ludwig of Brandenburg (who still sounds to us—after all these years—like a character out of Wagner). With that went an elaborately worded dedication, in the typical humility of the times, as Abdy Williams says.

However, Bach was no figure of 20th century importance in the Margrave's eyes, apparently, for after that noble music patron's death, it was discovered that the concertos had not been listed among his catalogued possessions. Lucky for us that the composer kept his own copies of the works, which were later found, together with several other manuscripts, in a bunch of stuff and things.

The Boston Symphony's performance of these works is as close to the ideal of Bach's time, one would expect, as a modern, highly polished, well-oiled musical machine can bring them. Which may be about as much as there is to ask for. Smooth playing marks the renderings, the rhythms are good, and they are bouncy, too, wherever necessary. The Victor set, DM-1118, contains four 12-inch disks. • • •

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

JUN 8 1947

Major Concertos in Five New Disc Albums

By ALEXANDER FRIED

IT'S TIME TO TAKE another look at the records—No fewer than five new albums contain major concertos. While it can't be said all the concertos will appeal to every music lover, each concerto in its way is important enough to appeal to somebody.

Bach's "Brandenburg" Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 (Victor) represent the vital classic master school. They get splendid performance from the Boston Symphony strings and various soloists, led by Koussevitzky.

Most noteworthy soloists are Roger Voisin, playing the difficult high Bach trumpet and Lukas Foss, the piano. Why modern piano, by the way? Why not the authentic old

---

[illegible]N 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, LATE WIFE'S NIECE MARRIED

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boa[illegible] liner Queen Elizabeth for a [illegible]moon in Europe. He said [illegible] friends who went to the [illegible]ce him off had been told [illegible]dding.

NEW YORK TIMES

JUN 6 - 1947

HONORED BY CRITICS

Aaron Copland

Ernest Bloch

Lucienne Bloch

COPLAND AND BLOCH WIN MUSIC HONORS

Critics Circle Names Works by Them as Best Played Here for First Time

The Music Critics Circle of New York has voted Aaron Copland's Third symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second quartet the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music works heard for the first time in New York during the last season.

Mr. Copland's symphony had its New York première last November, when it was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Mr. Bloch's quartet was introduced to New York by the Griller String Quartet in a February concert at Town Hall.

Honorable mention in the orchestral category was voted to Douglas Moore's Symphony No. 2 which was played by the NBC Symphony under Alfred Wallenstein's direction as part of the Columbia University Festival of Contemporary American Music last month.

Honorable mention in the chamber music category went to David Diamond's Third string quartet, which had its first performance at a concert presented by the League of Composers at the Museum of Modern Art last March.

No award was voted in the category of dramatic music, which includes stage and choral works. A special citation, however, was voted to Virgil Thomson's opera, "The Mother of Us All," which was ineligible for the award since the composer is a member of the circle. "The Mother of Us All" was presented at Brander Matthews Theatre, at Columbia University, last month. It has a libretto written by Gertrude Stein.

Honorable mention in the dramatic music field went to Kurt Weill's setting of Elmer Rice's "Street Scene," which had a Broadway run.

The circle has as one of its aims the building of an American repertory, according to Miles Kastendieck, its president, and at its two meetings this week and last week to vote on the awards it took note of the increase in performances of chamber music. It has named the following works, heard again during the last season, as worthy of a place in the repertory of chamber music organizations: Samuel Barber's "Capricorn" concerto, Aaron Copland's Sextet, Charles Ives' Quartet No. 2, Douglas Moore's Quartet No. 1 and Walter Piston's Quartet No. 2.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JUN 6 - 1947

Copland, Bloch Win Awards

Aaron Copland and Ernest Bloch are the recipients of the annual testimonials of the Music Critics Circle of New York for this season, according to the announcement made today by Miles Kastendieck, president of the Circle. The awards are in the fields of orchestral and chamber music.

Mr. Copland's Third Symphony was voted the work of an American composer considered exceptional among the orchestral compositions heard this season. It was introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

Honorable mention went to Douglas Moore's Symphony No. 2, first heard at the Columbia University Festival last month.

Mr. Bloch's Quartet No. 2 received the award in chamber music. It was first introduced here by the Griller String Quartet in February. Honorable mention was given to David Diamond's Third String Quartet introduced at a League of Composers concert in March.

No award was made in the third category of dramatic music which includes choral and stage works.

A special citation was voted to Virgil Thomson for his opera "The Mother of Us All" which was ineligible for the award since the composer was a member of the Circle. Honorable mention was given to Kurt Weill for "Street Scene."

CRANBURY, N.J
PRESS
6/6/47

Concert At Princeton In New Gymnasium

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its eminent Russian-born conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert Sunday evening, June 15, in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium as part of the climactic four-day program concluding Princeton's year-long celebration of its Bicentennial Year.

Marking the first time that the Dillon Gymnasium has been used for a public event of any kind, the concert preceding the Bicentennial Dinner Monday evening in the gymnasium and the final Bicentennial convocation Tuesday morning on the front campus, will attract an audience of more than 3,000 persons, including delegates from 450 educational institutions and learned societies located in all parts of the world.

A feature of the symphonic program, starting at 8:30 p. m., will be the presentation of the finale from "The Testament of Freedom," written for full orchestra and choir for the Thomas Jefferson Bicentennial in 1943 by Dr. Randall Thompson, well known American composer and a member of Princeton's Department of Music.

Rendering "The Testament of Freedom" with the 105-piece orchestra will be an 80-voice chorus drawn from the Princeton Glee Club and University Chapel Choir. The concert chorus will sing under the joint leadership of J. Merrill Knapp and Carl Weinrich, directors, respectively, of the glee club and choir.

The program will also include J. S. Bach's "Suite Number 3 in D Major" for orchestra, the "Academic Festival Overture" by Brahms and Beethoven's Third "Eroica" Symphony in E-Flat, which will follow the intermission as the last number of the evening.

The Boston Symphony, the nation's third oldest symphony orchestra, this spring completed its 66th season and its 23rd under Koussevitzky. Next month it will give a series of twelve concerts as part of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. In 1936 Koussevitzky and his famous organization played a conspicuous role in Harvard's Tercentenary, appearing several times before scholars attending Harvard's Conferences on Arts and Sciences.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JUN 8 - 1947

BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS

The second album of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra recorded under Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Mass., contains Concertos No. 2 in F and No. 5 in D (Victor, four 12-inch records). Nos. 3 and 4 were issued a year ago.

The size of the orchestra approximates that of Bach's day. The playing of ensemble and soloists is brilliant. Soloists are Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Roger Voisin, playing a small trumpet of Bach's time; Fernard Gillet, oboe, and Lukas Foss, piano.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JUN 8 - 1947

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has published the performance by Yehudi Menuhin with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra under Antal Dorati's direction of Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto. This is one of the Hungarian master's most compelling products; its ideational material is arresting and, if not as clearly developed as that of the Third Piano Concerto recently recorded, is none the less welded into a rich-textured, fascinating pattern. Mr. Menuhin gives a superb account of the highly intricate, difficult solo part, not only conquering its technical problems in masterly fashion but revealing the music's message with unfailing discernment. Mr. Dorati and the orchestra supply a well proportioned, effective accompaniment, and the recording as such is excellent.

Other Victor Sets

Another contemporary work in an utterly different idiom, Virgil Thomson's Suite from "The Plow That Broke the Plain," one of the composer's finest and most touching scores, is well played by the Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra under the perceptive guidance of Leopold Stokowski. First-rate recording.

Bach's Second and Fifth Brandenburg Concertos are tellingly traversed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. All of the solo players, Roger Voisin, trumpeter, Georges Laurent, flutist, Fernand Gillet, oboist, Richard Burgin, violinist and Lukas Foss, pianist, make valuable contributions to the well integrated interpretation, and the recording, mechanically regarded, is among the best.

Piano works by Mendelssohn including the "Variations Serieuses," the Songs Without Words, Op. 67, No. 5 and Op. 62, No. 1, and Liszt's arrangement of the "Wedding March" are performed by Vladimir Horowitz with varying results. Only the two Songs Without Words emerge with the essential touch of poetry. The "Variations Serieuses" are surgically dissected, only the rattling skeleton of the composition is left by the time Mr. Horowitz has finished his cold-blooded dissection of the composer's most enduring creation for the piano. And Liszt's fustian transcription of the "Wedding March" sounds under the pianist's dead-sure fingers like the rat-tat-tat of a machine gun. One may admire the unerring precision of Mr. Horowitz's fingers while regretting his utter disregard for whatever musical values this time-tried war horse still might reveal in the hands of a more sensitive musician. Satisfactory recording on the whole.

Columbia Sets

Schubert's great C major Symphony No. 9 is discoursed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Bruno Walter's direction in profoundly perceptive fashion; here is an interpretation in which flawless pacing, subtleties of nuance and dynamics add up to a conception of the score which for all its attention to detail never loses sight of its structural breadths. The recording is superior in transparency and fullness of sound to the earlier version under Mr. Walter's leadership with the London Symphony Orchestra issued by Victor.

Tchaikovsky's Serenade in C major for strings is convincingly traversed by the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy and satisfactorily recorded.

Constant Lambert's arrangement of the ballet suite from Adam's "Giselle" is well played by the Orchestra of Covent Garden under Mr. Lambert's direction. Fine recording.

Menotti's ballet suite "Sebastian," a highly eclectic, ineffectual score which, unlike Adam's romantic music, cannot be listened to with interest when divorced from the choreography, is capably performed by the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra directed by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Good recording.

Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto is played by Cyril Smith with the asistance of the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra led by George Weldon. Mr. Smith has neither the technical equipment of the virtuoso nor the sheer strength demanded for a convincing interpretation of this work. The piano cannot be heard above the orchestra in the climactic pages. The only completely satisfactory recording of this concerto remains the composer's.

Excerpts from Kurt Weill's "Street Scene" are recorded on six twelve-inch disks by Anne Jeffreys, Polyna Stoska, Brian Sullivan and other members of the original production staged by Dwight Deere Wiman and the Playwrights' Company, with Maurice Abravanel as conductor. The work of all the performers concerned in this album is worthy of admiration, the best singing, of course, is that vouchsafed by Miss Stoska and Mr. Sullivan. This writer can find little deserving of praise in Mr. Weill's music, however, which is a blend of Gershwin and Puccini with scarcely a trace of the composer's individuality in evidence. Fine recording.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUN 8 - 1947

Record Player

Brandenburg Bach Answers The Critics

By Paul Hume

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 and 5. Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Victor 1118. $4.85.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for several seasons played pre-Tanglewood Festivals of Bach and Mozart. During their recording sessions in the shed they waxed all six of the Brandenburgs, and we are now given the second and fifth, having had three and four some time ago.

Following my review of the two earlier releases, many asked me if I did not think that the full string section of the modern orchestra was too large for these works, and didn't I have any of the purist in me. Sure I have. And these records were made by a greatly reduced string section, so that they are entirely in keeping with the physical requirements suggested in Bach's writing.

I do not find Koussevitsky's style in these in any way a violation of Bach's spirit as I understand that spirit. There is a fine feeling for the shape of phrases, and a musicianly sense of tempos. The various contrapuntal lines speak with utmost clarity, and I ask no more of anyone in the Brandenburgs.

Furthermore the sound of the instruments in the Boston Symphony is of such sensuous beauty as to enhance anything they play. This is as true of Bach as of Debussy. In these records they are joined by Lukas Foss, pianist, while their regular first trumpet, Roger Voisin, does miracles with the high part assigned him in the second concerto.

I think Rudolf Serkin a far greater pianist than Foss, and the long cadenza of the D major concerto is less exciting and intense in this new set than in the older Busch recordings. Nevertheless on the whole I prefer the new Victor recordings. The engineering is practically perfect and the surfaces, for a change, excellent.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 8 - 1947

Books on Music and Musicians for Readers and Students of Many Ages

Worcester Mass
6/8/47

Horatio Alger Of Music

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith; Allen, Towne and Heath, $4.

Although this book has been out since mid-Winter, we have just received a review copy, because Koussevitzky, in his attempt to suppress it, did manage to prevent its being sent to reviewers, after the first shipment to newspapers had gone out. He did not win his case for suppression, but frankly we don't blame him for being infuriated with the book.

Of Lourie's Life of Koussevitzky, Moses Smith says: "Far from adding to Koussevitzky's stature, it detracted by virtue of its glaring errors of fact and emphasis, its numerous and serious omissions, and its prevailing tone of hero-worship."

No one will ever accuse Mr. Smith of hero-worship. While grudgingly allowing that Koussevitzky does get fine effects from his orchestra, and "is certainly one of the very few artists among conductors on the American scene," he seems to have the attitude of giving the devil his due. Music critic on the Boston American and then the Transcript, he often irritated Koussevitzky with his criticisms, particularly on the conductor's tempi. He seems still to have a chip on his shoulder, to be always looking for flaws.

If there is one theme which can be said to run through the book, it is that Koussevitzky succeeded in spite of his lack of thorough study of music in his youth. He ends the book with this paragraph: "Now, past 70, he goes on learning. He continues to pay the debt he acquired when, 40 years ago, he began to study conducting from the top down. The manner, fidelity and continuity of this payment through the years suggest few parallels in musical history."

Questions Facts

Although Mr. Smith refers to the resentment which Dr. Koussevitzky has felt and often expressed towards adverse criticism, we imagine he now resents the emphasis the author puts on his "inadequate musicianship and technique" less than Smith's attitude towards the facts of the conductor's early life. As though he had been dead for years and there were no one who knew him alive today, Mr. Smith presents the arguments for and against such simple matters of fact as when he became a Christian or when the title of free musician was given him.

But the man is living. Supposedly all one needs to do to verify such facts is to ask him. The inference therefor is either that the musician refuses to divulge the facts of his youth, or that his answers can not be taken as true. Any one, it seems, would be insulted by being discussed in this manner. Dr. Koussevitzky resents this book, we understand, on two grounds: First that he is planning to have an authorized biography written, and second that many of Mr. Smith's statements are such as to hurt him in his career.

We feel that in both points he is right. Yet on the other side, such is the jealousy with which we regard our freedom of the press that we should be loath to see a book banned because it contains matters which might hurt a person's career. But it seems to us the belittling, at times sneering way in which Mr. Smith writes of the famous conductor who is still living is in execrable taste.

Wife's Money Helped

On our part, we are overemphasizing one angle of the book in this review, but the lawsuit naturally upsets one's balance in regarding what Mr. Smith has written. He has a lot of interesting material on the life of the poor Russian boy who rose to a top place in his profession. He gives much credit to his second wife and the fortune she brought him as a help in his career. He tells how it was by chance that the Russian youth took up the double bass, an instrument seldom used for solo work, on which he performed miracles.

in New York, when the Nazi police tried to find and arrest him in Vienna.

There is a lot about music-publishing that most of us do not know. Even this technical part Mr. Heinsheimer makes interesting. He tells how the actual taking down of music, the mechanical processes, have changed hardly at all since the days of Bach, although such tremendous strides have been made in the printing of words since the Gutenberg Bible was printed back in the 15th century. Nor did we realize how important the music publisher can be in helping new musicians to get their wares before the public. The music score looks good; played on the piano, he sounds promising. But will it be a hit? Who knows? It's a lottery, and there is excitement a-plenty in the launching of new works.

With his coming to America, Mr. Heinsheimer gives us a bunch of new impressions. On the whole he likes us: he likes us so well he becomes one of us, and is now an American citizen. He sees orchestras springing up all over the country. He studies the new kind of music made for movies. He sees the old patterns of music in Europe dissolving, and he watches new patterns evolving in America—"the signs of a new musical destiny". He is thrilled with his visions, and one would be lethargic indeed not to share his enthusiasm. His ardor, his humor, his penetrating analysis of what makes the music world tick, combine to make Menagerie in F Sharp a stimulating book.

Of tremendous local interest here in Massachusetts is his account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the long fight for and against its being unionized, of the growth of the musical festival at Tanglewood, of the training of the orchestra, and Koussevitzky's interest in developing American music.

Much of his analysis of musical interpretations will go over the head of the average reader, but he has also much to say in this field that is of general interest, such as his summary of the gifts of our three greatest conductors, as follows: "Stokowski's characteristic gift, which he has carried to excess, has been a prodigious increase of orchestral sonority. Koussevitsky's distinctive talent, which he also has exercised too much, has lain in the exploration of the subtle tints of orchestral coloring and the super-refinement of orchestral tone. Toscanini's contribution, which was scarcely new but was spectacular in its brilliance and in the consistency of its application, has been precise, clean, perfectly balanced, beautifully styled orchestra playing."

M. B.

BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS
HERALD
JUN 9 - 1947

Famous Fables

ULTIMATUM: Brilliant conductor Serge Koussevitzky has very definite ideas about music, and never compromises with his convictions.

At one time, when he was conductor in Russia, he formed a music publishing house with several associates. His associates, knowing him to be stubbornly bent on having his own way, hesitated before joining him in the venture, but Koussevitzky assured them that their opinions would be respected, and that he would abide by the rule of the majority.

Shortly after the company was formed, a young musician named Stravinsky submitted a manuscript. Koussevitzky was enthusiastic, but the others didn't think much of it and turned it down. Koussevitzky hit the ceiling.

"You don't konw what you're doing!" he stormed. "How can I work with such ignoramuses!"

"Remember, Serge," he was told, "you promised to let the majority rule."

"I promised and I will," said Koussevitzky, "but I'll tell you right now, if you don't accept this composition, I'll resign, form a new company and publish it myself!"

After some debate, the "majority" reversed its decision and the composition was accepted.

[illegible]
BULLETIN
JUN 17 1947

36 Get Honorary Degrees At Princeton Convocation

Princeton, N. J., June 17.—(AP)—Thirty-six honorary degrees were presented today at Princeton University's bi-centennial convocation. The recipients, led by President Truman, included 10 educators, seven scientists, four in the field of politics and statesmanship, three in business and engineering, three as military leaders, four in religion two in literature, two in jurisprudence and one in music.

The purple hood of the laws degree was slipped over the head and shoulders of the President after the degree had been conferred upon U. S. Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson, Governor Alfred E. Driscoll of New Jersey, and Field Marshal Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Governor General of Canada.

General Dwight D. Eisenhower and Admiral Chester W. Nimitz also received the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

Recipients of degrees included:

Doctor of Laws

Warren R. Austin, U. S. representative to the United Nations.

Bernard M. Baruch, former U. S representative to the United Nations atomic energy commission.

Vannevar Bush, president of the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

Edmund E. Day, president of Cornell University.

Frank D. Fackenthal, acting president of Columbia University.

Learned Hand, presiding judge of the U. S. Circuit Court Second Circuit, New York.

Charles F. Kettering, consultant and member of the board of General Motors Corporation.

Alfred P. Sloan Jr., chairman of the board of General Motors Corporation.

Robert G. Sproul, president of the University of California.

Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, secretary of the Sacred Oriental Congregation of Rome.

Doctor of Letters

Paul H. Buck, provost and professor of history at Harvard University.

T. S. Eliot, poet, critic and playwright.

Douglas Southall Freeman, historian and editor of the News Leader, Richmond, Va.

Edgar S. Furniss, provost and professor of political and social science at Yale.

Andre Grabar, professor in Byzantine art of the College De France.

Mildred McAfee Horton, president of Wellesley College.

Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Robert M. MacIver, professor of political philosophy and sociology at Columbia University.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
JUN 15 1947

THE Music Critics Circle of New York, which has as one of its aims the building of an American repertoire, has voted Aaron Copland's Third symphony and Ernest Bloch's Second quartet as the outstanding American orchestral and chamber music heard for the first time in New York during last season. Mr. Copland's symphony had its New York premiere last November when it was played by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction. Mr. Bloch's quartet was introduced by the Griller String Quartet in concert in Town Hall last February.

[illegible]
MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS-SCIMITAR
JUN 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUN 12 1947

Boston Symphony Taking Part In Celebration at Princeton

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert Sunday evening in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium as a part of the university's four-day program in celebration of its bicentennial.

The first public event of any kind in the gymnasium, the concert will precede the bicentennial dinner Monday evening and the final convocation Tuesday morning on the front campus, and will have an audience of more than 3000 including delegates from 450 educational institutions and learned societies throughout the world.

The symphonic program will include the finale from "The Testament of Freedom," written for the Thomas Jefferson Bicentennial in 1943 by Dr. Randall Thompson, composer and member of Princeton's music department, who was for several years a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Bach's suite No. 3 in D major, Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," and Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica" that will be played at Tanglewood this season. An 80-voice chorus from the Princeton glee club and University chapel choir will sing with the orchestra in "The Testament."

In 1936 Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were included in the program of Harvard's Tercentenary.

MARION, IND.
LEADER TRIBUNE
JUN 17 1947

Koussevitzky Reveals Marriage to Secretary

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JUN 15 1947

Speaking Of Records

By JOHN BALL Jr

Summer may mean a time of lighter programs in the concert halls and out in the open air, but the same does not appear to apply to record releases. This month the new releases seem to keep coming without relaxing a bit in favor of warm weather listening. Right off the bat, so to speak, we have BACH: Brandenburg Concerti No. 2 and 5. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Victor 1118.

Of the six Brandenburg Concerti these two are perhaps the best known, the second for the remarkable trumpet part and the fifth for the clavier (or piano). In this recording the Boston Symphony plays with remarkable precision and makes up through technical skill for a certain lack of excitement in the overall readings. Mechanically, the recording is unusually good. Finian's Rainbow. Ella Logan and members of the original cast. Columbia MM 686. Like many sister sets, the enjoyment of this album depends in a considerable measure on whether or not the listener has seen the stage production. Assuming that he has, then this album should be a most welcome souvenir. If not then all that we can say is that the tunes are in the main catchy, the voices typical Broadway and the mechanical part has been well accomplished.

KHATCHATURIAN: Masquerade Suite Santa Monica Symphony Orchestra. Jacques Rachmilovich conductor. Asch set 800.

After listening to the controlled rhythmic fury of the "Gayne Suite" by this same composer, we were prepared for anything. This music proved to be highly pleasant listening, without making any pretense of being heaven-storming or even a challenge, rhythmically, to Gayne. The score has been well played for the most part and the record surfaces are surprisingly good, the best, in fact, that we can recall having been put out by this company.

In popular vein: Evelyn and her Magic Violin, Columbia C-114. At the expense of having to be less than gracious to a lady, we are compelled to state that Miss Evelyn's music making is something far less than good. Unless you are a particular fan of this lady we suggest that you pass this particular set by.

Baby Dodds Drum Solos. Disc set 700. This unique set features four sides of pure percussion performed by the celebrated Baby Dodds. Baby is in fine form and has been well recorded except for somewhat noisy surfaces. For this type of thing we lean towards Sidney Catlett, but there is no doubt that these records will appeal to a wide audience, most particularly those who may be studying traps themselves.

TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER
JUN 15 1947

All Princeton Excited Over Events of Next Three Days

PRINCETON—Three days which Princetonians now living may never see duplicated begin today in this community. Residents plan to make the most of the festivities, which have been arranged in connection with the University's celebration of its 200th anniversary.

The unprecedented influx of visitors, taxing hotel and restaurant accommodations to absolute capacity, began late last week, when the first contingents of 5,000 alumni arrived for class reunions. Their activities reached a climax yesterday afternoon, with the annual parade and Yale-Princeton baseball game, but many of them will remain in town for the bicentennial program.

Numerous events which townspeople may attend will take place today, tomorrow and Tuesday. A concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tonight in Dillon Gymnasium, the $2,000,000 structure which was dedicated before a large throng yesterday morning.

The $6,000,000 Firestone Library will draw renewed attention tomorrow morning, when the large structure which has so radically altered Nassau Street's appearance will be dedicated. The first ceremony involving delegates from 400 educational institutions throughout the world will be closed to the public in Alexander Hall tomorrow afternoon. Many Princetonians who are hosts to the delegates will, however, be present at a dinner for 2,000 in Dillon Gymnasium tomorrow night.

It will, of course, be the visit of President Harry S. Truman Tuesday morning that will evoke the greatest popular interest. His route of march in the academic procession, scheduled to begin on the campus in Holder Hall courtyard, will reach Nassau Street near the First Presbyterian Church.

Other widely-known figures upon whom Princetonians will gaze, many for the first time in this community, are Senators Hawkes, Smith and Barclay, Governor Alfred E. Driscoll, Herbert Hoover, Viscount Alexander, governor-general of Canada; Cardinal Tisserant of the Vatican; Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal, Admiral Ernest J. King, Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, and General Dwight D. Eisenhower.

PTA Installation

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUN 18 1947

BSO Violinist Dies in Boston

Nicholas Kassman, a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night in Boston. Former concert master and conductor of an orchestra in Helsinki, Finland, he was brought to this country to play with the Boston group by Serge Koussevitzky, a friend of long-standing, when Koussevitzky took over as conductor.

Survivors include three children, Elly, concert pianist who has appeared in a recital in Pittsfield, and Vera and Eugene, who have been students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
JUN 20 1947

Between Book Ends

Study in Genius

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith. (Allen, Towne & Heath, New York.)

Serge Koussevitzky was once accosted in the Green Room by a feminine enthusiast who had obviously been transported into another and a higher realm by the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert she had just heard.

"Dr. Koussevitzky, I know who you are," she exclaimed. "You are GOD."

"I know my responsibilities," answered the doctor proudly.

Moses Smith, whose controversial biography of Koussevitzky has just been published, also knows his responsibilities. His tribute to the Boston conductor does not imply that deification is in order, but it is a handsome and just tribute just the same.

First of all, Smith admits without cavil that Koussevitzky is one of the three great conductors in practice in America. He also cites chapter and verse to show that Koussevitzky's service to American music has exceeded that of any other—American or foreign. Finally, he makes it quite clear that Koussevitzky's life IS music, with everything else on the fringe. His consecration to his profession was priest-like, his zeal was—and still is—that of a monomaniac. So he has accomplished wonders with the Boston Orchestra and with the musical life of every community in which he has worked.

There are many sides to Koussevitzky, however. He is a genius, but he is vain, tyrannical and sometimes humorless. He also neglected to learn his profession from the ground up. His slowness with a score made him enlist the services of a pianist when he was studying a new work, to get the sound of the music in his ear. As a conductor he was preoccupied with color, and sometimes to the neglect of line, balance and rhythm.

These strictures are all set down without malice and in good, clear, intelligible prose. There is not the slightest indication that the author was trying for a success by scandal. His obvious purpose was to present a complete record of one of the most arresting figures in twentieth century music. And in this, I would say, he has succeeded admirably.

THOMAS B. SHERMAN.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JUN 17 1947

Conductor Weds

[Associated Press Wirephoto]

Serge Koussevitzky and bride sailing from New York yesterday.

New York Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUN 18 1947

HONOR DEGREES GO TO 36 AT PRINCETON

Mildred McA. Horton, Ex-Head of Waves and Now President of Wellesley, Only Woman

LEADERS OF NATION CITED

Truman and Governor-General of Canada Lead on Roster Covering Many Fields

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRINCETON, N. J., June 17—Thirty-five men and one woman received honorary degrees from Princeton University at the final academic convocation of the university's bicentennial celebration today.

Walter E. Hope of the class of '01, university orator and chairman of the executive committee of the board of trustees, presented the candidates.

The list of recipients and the citations read by Mr. Hope follow, with citations omitted in the cases of the last four candidates, Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson, Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll of New Jersey, Viscount Alexander of Tunis, the Governor General of Canada, and President Truman:

DOCTOR OF ENGINEERING

ADMIRAL BEN MOREELL, retired, chief of the Navy Bureau of Yards and Docks during the war and now president of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation—A brilliant engineer both ashore and afloat, whose scholarly and energetic application of the engineering approach has produced significant technological advances of a high order. Organizer and first in command of the Seabees, whose fabulous exploits and achievements played so substantial a part in the victory of the Pacific.

DOCTOR OF SCIENCE

WALTER S. ADAMS, astronomer and director emeritus of the Mount Wilson Observatory—A lifelong student of the spectra of the sun and stars, his original and precisely detailed studies of the light given off by thousands of stars in hundreds of different wave lengths have revealed their distance from the earth and their composition. For more than twenty years the distinguished director of the world's foremost observatory.

WALTER H. BUCHER, professor of geology at Columbia University—An inspiring teacher and outstanding authority on the structure of the earth's crust; his analyses and deductions in theoretical geology have stimulated and enlightened geologists throughout the world.

EDWARD DELOS CHURCHILL, professor of surgery at Harvard University and president of the American Surgical Association—A brilliant surgeon, sympathetic teacher and outstanding investigator. His work in the surgery of the chest and in the functions of the parathyroid gland, and his fundamental clarification of the problems of wound-healing in the war, established his place as one of the great figures of present-day surgery.

WALTER WALKER PALMER, professor of medicine, College of Physicans and Surgeons, Columbia University—An outstanding man of medicine, whose early researches in the field of biochemistry contributed to the present-day application of the techniques of the fundamental sciences to the solution of the problems of clinical medicine. His capacity for leadership and for helpful human relationships has been especially effective in developing and inspiring his younger associates, and has helped to make his medical clinic one of the great teaching and research organizations of the country.

WENDELL MEREDITH STANLEY, member of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research and co-winner of the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1946—Nobel Laureate in chemistry, his studies in the virus diseases of plant and animal life have revealed new crystalline units, giant chemical molecules which extend the range of scientific observation to the very threshhold of living organisms.

ALFRED HENRY STURTEVANT, professor of genetics at the California Institute of Technology—Eminent theorist, biologist and field naturalist, by his researches on genes and chromosomes he has laid the foundation upon which much of modern science of genetics is built.

JOHN VAN NEWMANN, professor of mathematics at the Princeton Institute of Advanced Study—Mathematician and physicist, whose wide-ranging genius is equally at home with the abstract principles of quantum mechanics and the practical effects of shock waves from high explosives, in the devotion of his versatile talents to the grave problems of war he rendered outstanding service.

SELMAN ABRAM WAKSMAN, professor of soil microbiology at Rutgers University—A pioneer in the investigation of antibiotic substances, the discoverer of streptomycin, his brilliant studies of the endless conflict between micro-organisms has enabled medical science to enlist armies of microbes in the service of mankind.

DOCTOR OF LETTERS

PAUL HERMAN BUCK, provost, dean of the faculty and professor of history at Harvard University—Provost of Harvard, an historian whose penetrating insight into the political and social forces which influence a free society has made him a recognized leader in the development of a pattern of education adapted to the needs of a great democracy.

THOMAS STEARNS ELIOT, poet and playwright—Critic and poet of distinction, whose work has affected the course of literature and exerted a strong influence upon all contemporary writing. As a critic he has made possible by his perceptions a new and more coordinated view of the whole of literature. As a poet he has widened the scope of the art to include the every-day life of the average man. Keenly aware of the trends of the time, he has become the literary conscience of an era.

DOUGLAS SOUTHALL FREEMAN, editor and historian—Distinguished editor and scholar, trusted advisor of our great educational foundations, biographer of Lee and his lieutenants, master of the spoken and written word with a discriminating sense of values, a man of warm human sympathies and wide-ranging interests, he has enhanced our knowledge and enriched its enoyment.

EDGAR STEPHENSON FURNISS, provost, dean of the graduate school and professor of political and social science at Yale University—Provost of Yale and dean of its graduate school. A teacher and scholar whose interest has ever centered upon the advancement of man's estate; whose deep understanding of the ways of teachers and scholars enables him to discharge with rare insight the responsibilities of our sister institution for standards of scholarship and research.

ANDRE GRABAR, Professor in Byzantine Art of the College de France—Professor of the College de France, eminent historian of the art of the Eastern Roman Empire, worthy successor to the great tradition of Russian Byzantine scholarship. His penetrating and subtle studies of the development of imperial iconography and of the origins of Christian architecture have opened a new understanding of the knowledge of the religious and artistic bases of our civilization.

MILDRED McAFEE HORTON, president of Wellesley College—First woman to be commissioned to the United States Navy and first to become a captain. Her brilliant success in that unique capacity has been attributed, in part, to what has been termed her "unerring sense of how to rule the Waves and when to waive the rules." Of more substantial importance, however, are her outstanding ability as an educator and administrator, her keen and active mind, her warm human qualities and a God-given sense of humor.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Distinguished representative of the great musical tradition of Russia, wise and imaginative educator, generous friend and mentor of young conductors, performers and composers; uncompromising champion of contemporary music, inspired conductor of the Boston Sym-

---

CUMBERLAND, MD.
TIMES
JUN 19 1947

INSIDE RADIO
by
PAUL LUTHER

I know you've heard and possibly used the expression, "Everything happens in threes," but it wasn't until a month ago that this saying was brought home in such a way that I'm sure I'll never again question its logic.

During the warmup prior to the broadcast of a 15 minute quiz feature which I was to emcee, I asked two ladies from the audience to come on stage and be interviewed in order to put my air contestants at ease and to help fill in until air time. For their cooperation both were given a corsage and coincidence number one came to light when one of the ladies revealed her name to be the same as that of sponsor, but no relation.

Minutes later during the show contestant Number Three successfully answered her question and following the customary applause I awarded her a gift certificate covering a two-day weekend stay with all expenses at a leading hotel. She accepted but immediately following the signoff she approached me in a rather hesitant manner and said, "Mr. Luther, do you suppose I could exchange this certificate for another prize?" Somewhat puzzled, I said I thought it might be arranged but would she mind explaining why. "Not at all" was the reply. "I've been living at this hotel for over a year".

The final item on the agenda was the awarding of a special prize and for this each studio guest had retained one half of his admission ticket, the other deposited in a box which had been brought to the stage. The proper procedure for such a selection, I decided, would be to have one of the ladies do the actual drawing, so I picked up the box of stubs and started down the aisle. Half way towards the back, I leaned towards the center of the auditorium and asked a lady if she would do the honors.

Well, you might just as well have hit me in the head with a ball bat. She drew the ticket and let out a squeal you could hear four blocks away. That's right—it was her own ticket, Number 285.

And so, if anyone ever tells you that there's no such thing as "Coincidence" or "Things happening in threes", send them to me, because I'm on your side.

"Could you please tell me something about Gene Hamilton whose voice I enjoy on the Boston Symphony broadcasts?" asks K.C.P. of Augusta, Me.

Gene is a native of Toledo, Ohio and during his high school years thought seriously becoming a boxer. He won a few fights but one night forgot to duck and, the next day, he decided to try vaudeville. Teamed with Comedian Bruce Dollison, they toured the Orpheum Circuit for a year during which time Gene mastered the guitar and became a crooner gathering unto himself a measure of fame over a Columbus, Ohio, radio station.

Next, he took a turn at announcing and during his long career before the mike in Chicago, Cleveland, and New York, Gene has handled all types of commercials, plus special events and just plain staff announcing. Today, he ranks second only to Milton Cross in the field of opera and symphonic broadcasts and this comes as no great surprise as both were trained singers before deciding to become announcers.

During the war, Gene served as writer and narrator for Army films and broadcasts and even now finds time to do occasional work for the services.

Still an athlete, he works out nearly every day with his young son in the gymnasium of the Hamilton home at Baldwin, L. I., and even though he has no intention of trying to become another Haymes or Como, he still says that singing is his hobby.

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUN 16 1947

73-Year-Old Conductor Weds Secretary, 46

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL GAZETTE
JUN 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
JUN 20 1947

The Reviewing Stand

Southern Orchestra Records Concerto

By Evans Rodgers

The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra conducted by George Weldon blossoms forth in a new Columbia Masterworks recording of Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 3 with Cyril Smith at the piano.

The orchestra sounds very rich and powerful on these records and if the City of Birmingham Orchestra can do this well, it would seem logical that our own New Orleans Orchestra could make an equally impressive appearance on records.

No doubt Columbia carefully chose this third piano concerto of Rachmaninoff since it makes a perfect companion piece to the famous second concerto (Columbia Masterworks Set No. 605), and because of Rachmaninoff's great popularity with American audiences.

As in most of Rachmaninoff's other music, the melodic line is simple, easily comprehended, and constantly repeated. It is enriched by straightforward orchestration which makes the music immediately enjoyable.

The records—there are five 12-inch ones in this set—are quite free of surface noise and the recording is mechanically excellent.

BRANDENBURG

Owners of the old RCA Victor recording of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra should be especially interested in Victor's new recording of the same music done by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the concerto in which the concertino consists of trumpet, flute, oboe and violin. The music for these four instruments is written in a very high register and the brilliant score for the trumpet calls for a specially constructed instrument, much smaller than the regular size.

When Stokowski made his recording, however, he used a regular trumpet, and the difference in the Koussevitzky recording, which uses a special trumpet, is really startling.

The whole performance by Koussevitzky is superb and the album should be in the collection of all Bach devotees.

EQUALLY FINE

It is RCA Victor Set No. 1118, and consists of four 12-inch records. It also contains an equally fine recording of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in which the concertino consists of violin, flute and piano.

Mr. Koussevitzky has also recorded two of the other Brandenburg Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, and they are contained in RCA Victor Album No. 1050 consisting of four 12-inch records.

No doubt Victor plans to have Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra issue a fourth album containing the concertos Nos. 1 and 6, so that these important Bach compositions played by the same conductor and orchestra, will all be available.

PRINCETON, N.J
HERALD
6/20/47

KOUSSEVITSKY CONCERT CLOSES MUSICAL SEASON

By Dr. Roy D. Welch

The final concert of Princeton's Bicentennial year was given on Sunday evening in the new Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. At this concert the University's guests were the several hundred delegates assembled in Princeton for the closing ceremonies of the Bicentennial celebration, a distinguished company representing governments and institutions of learning throughout the world. Princeton hosts and hostesses to these visitors and a numerous public joined the guests in an audience of 28,000, which filled the hall almost to capacity. The orchestra, at this time of year not regularly playing, was assembled for the Princeton concert by Dr. Koussevitzky, who interrupted his own brief holiday to appear here. The University and the public recognizes gratefully the special effort on the part of players, conductor, and management, that made this out-of-season concert possible.

The program of this concert was as follows: Brahms, Academic Festival Overture; Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major; Finale from "The Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson (text by Thomas Jefferson); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica." In the performance of the "Testament," the male chorus consisted of the members of the Princeton University Glee Club, J. Merrill Knapp, conductor, and the Princeton University Chapel Choir, Carl Weinrich, director.

This concert was the climax of a series of musical events that, throughout the year, have been closely related to the Bicentennial. On October 19, 1946, there was sung at the opening Convocation in the University Chapel a Commemorative Anthem for male chorus and organ written by E. T. Cone, Class of 1939, Woodrow Wilson Fellow and Instructor in the Department of Music. On the same day the University Band played for the Processional to the Chapel a little known but brilliant Military March by Beethoven. On the following day, the Pro Arte Quartet played in McCarter Theatre, including on its program the Third String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg. Later in the year, four concerts were given in Procter Hall by Princetno alumni who have made careers as concert artists. John Kirkpatrick. Class of 1926, pianist, George Newton, Class of 1929, baritone, James Sykes, Class of 1930, pianist, and Joseph Hawthorne, Class of 1930, violist, appeared on Sunday afternoons before highly appreciative audiences. Programs of special interest were given on the occasion of the annual Symposium on Music at Princeton, November 23rd, and at the Bicentennial Conference on Scholarship and Research in the Arts on April 24th of this year. On this latter occasion a program of French Chansons and Italian Madrigals, sung by local singers under the direction of Professor Randall Thompson, was given in Procter Hall before an audience which included scholars and other guests of the conference. Many of the conference guests heard a pro-

Cleveland orchestras, the Budapest String Quartet, Robert Casadesus, Enesco, and others to McCarter Theatre. The University Glee Club, under J. Merrill Knapp, gave two concerts with visiting organizations, including the appearance in McCarter Theatre on April 25th with the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and Nan Merriman. The University Chapel Choir appeared at all but one of the major convocations, gave, with the chorus of the New Jersey College for Women, the annual Milbank Memorial Concert on May 4th, sang at the Memorial Service on Sunday and the Service of Dedication on Monday, and joined with the Glee Club in singing the "Testament of Freedom" with the Boston Symphony on Sunday evening. The Orchestra gave two concerts in Alexander Hall on Sunday evenings under the directiong of Russell Ames Cook. The Glee Club and some members of the Choir produced, with the help of Walter Johnson, the program of Episodes in Princeton's History last Saturday evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
JUN 18 1947

PORTLAND, [illegible]
EXPRESS
JUN 20 1947

How Old Is Old?

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

HERBERT HOOVER is 73 years old. Bernard Baruch will be 77 Tuesday. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 78.

When does a man really become old?

I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other.

They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according ta tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time.

A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago.

He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84.

He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow.

And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. symphony.

* * *

THE magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Av. Span	Countries	Av. Span
N. Zealand	67	Germany	61
Sweden	66	France	57
Netherlands	66	Italy	55
U. S.	65	Russia	45
Grt. Britain	62	India	27

When we were young—those of my generation — we were taught that the average span was 35 years [illegible] country. Maybe that was low.

But the U. [illegible] life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 60 per cent, have [illegible] that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100 we shall not need mortality tables.

* * *

PHYSICAL youth is, of course, not the sole question.

Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save.

Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant.

George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time.

In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper.

It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished.

The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned.

When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way.

That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him

---

Fiedler will play, at this 1947 concert, "The Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz" which was conducted at the stival in 1872 by its composer, ohann Strauss the younger.

Donald O. J. Messenger, writing about the Jubilee anniversary plans in the Christian Science Monitor of Wednesday, said Mr. Fiedler "is thinking, too, of including snatches of tunes that were popular in earlier postwar periods, such as 'When Johnny Comes Marching Home' — said to have been written by Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, organizer and director" of the 1872 Jubilee.

What possible good can this do? Can it prevent Stalin and Molotov from hating us? Can it make Americans mistrust Russian communists less than they do (with good reason)? Can a concert in Boston, emphasizing an international theme though it will, help in any way to curb the gnawing fears which lead mankind from one bloody war to another?

The answer cannot be Yes and it cannot be No. The answer, in part, is that it's worth trying. Where words fail — and words do fail, miserably, to explain America to the Russians, and Russia to the Americans — music may in time succeed. Who knows?

Mr. Gilmore of "Johnny Comes Marching Home" fame, "was enthusiastic over the idea of the sense of unity that he felt would be developed in great numbers of people singing and playing together," Mr. Messenger writes in his Monitor story. "He would have liked to get, first the whole Nation, then the whole world to unite in this way."

The best Mr. Gilmore could achieve, of course, was to assemble 50,000 to sing in Boston. But, Mr. Messenger notes, "today * * * with shortwave radio to unite groups all over the world, he could come much closer to his aim.

"Community singing by radio, in fact, is one detail of the plans for an annual, world-wide Peace Day celebration which has been prepared by the Committee for Peace Day in the United Nations, and which are expected to be laid before the United Nations in the Fall."

That's a wonderful idea! We can't speak Chinese. We can't speak Russian. We may have smatterings of French or German, but we "don't speak the language" of any other people — even the English — so expertly as never to be misunderstood. Words can be dangerous. They can spread misunderstanding and confusion. But music is a language all can understand.

Music is harmony. And peace — the true peace that has been so long absent from this world of discord—what is that but harmony, worldwide?

Harmony is what the peace-maker strives for when he speaks of seeking "broader areas of agreement" among nations; not "unity," (which may be impossible of attainment) but the harmonizing of different nations, different national traditions, customs, tastes into a symphony of many blending colors and tones. Who shall say that humanity cannot sing its way into harmony and peace? Everything else has been tried and found wanting. Music may indeed have the power, at last, to do what all the swords, all the statesmen's words, have failed to do.

Certainly there's the seed of a good idea here. Certainly it's worth trying.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
JUN 20 1947

The Reviewing Stand

Southern Orchestra Records Concerto

By Evans Rodgers

The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra conducted by George Weldon blossoms forth in a new Columbia Masterworks recording of Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 3 with Cyril Smith at the piano.

The orchestra sounds very rich and powerful on these records and if the City of Birmingham Orchestra can do this well, it would seem logical that our own New Orleans Orchestra could make an equally impressive appearance on records.

No doubt Columbia carefully chose this third piano concerto of Rachmaninoff since it makes a perfect companion piece to the famous second concerto (Columbia Masterworks Set No. 605), and because of Rachmaninoff's great popularity with American audiences.

As in most of Rachmaninoff's other music, the melodic line is simple, easily comprehended, and constantly repeated. It is enriched by straightforward orchestration which makes the music immediately enjoyable.

The records—there are five 12-inch ones in this set—are quite free of surface noise and the recording is mechanically excellent.

BRANDENBURG

Owners of the old RCA Victor recording of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra should be especially interested in Victor's new recording of the same music done by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the concerto in which the concertino consists of trumpet, flute, oboe and violin. The music for these four instruments is written in a very high register and the brilliant score for the trumpet calls for a specially constructed instrument, much smaller than the regular size.

When Stokowski made his recording, however, he used a regular trumpet, and the difference in the Koussevitzky recording, which uses a special trumpet, is really startling.

The whole performance by Koussevitzky is superb and the album should be in the collection of all Bach devotees.

EQUALLY FINE

It is RCA Victor Set No. 1118, and consists of four 12-inch records. It also contains an equally fine recording of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in which the concertino consists of violin, flute and piano.

Mr. Koussevitzky has also recorded two of the other Brandenburg Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, and they are contained in RCA Victor Album No. 1050 consisting of four 12-inch records.

No doubt Victor plans to have Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra issue a fourth album containing the concertos Nos. 1 and 6, so that these important Bach compositions played by the same conductor and orchestra, will all be available.

PRINCETON, N.J
HERALD
6/20/47

KOUSSEVITSKY CONCERT CLOSES MUSICAL SEASON

By Dr. Roy D. Welch

The final concert of Princeton's Bicentennial year was given on Sunday evening in the new Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. At this concert the University's guests were the several hundred delegates assembled in Princeton for the closing ceremonies of the Bicentennial celebration, a distinguished company representing governments and institutions of learning throughout the world. Princeton hosts and hostesses to these visitors and a numerous public joined the guests in an audience, of 28,000, which filled the hall almost to capacity. The orchestra, at this time of year not regularly playing, was assembled for the Princeton concert by Dr. Koussevitzky, who interrupted his own brief holiday to appear here. The University and the public recognizes gratefully the special effort on the part of players, conductor, and management, that made this out-of-season concert possible.

The program of this concert was as follows: Brahms, Academic Festival Overture; Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major; Finale from "The Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson (text by Thomas Jefferson); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica." In the performance of the "Testament," the male chorus consisted of the members of the Princeton University Glee Club, J. Merrill Knapp, conductor, and the Princeton University Chapel Choir, Carl Weinrich, director.

This concert was the climax of a series of musical events that, throughout the year, have been closely related to the Bicentennial. On October 19, 1946, there was sung at the opening Convocation in the University Chapel a Commemorative Anthem for male chorus and organ written by E. T. Cone, Class of 1939, Woodrow Wilson Fellow and Instructor in the Department of Music. On the same day the University Band played for the Processional to the Chapel a little known but brilliant Military March by Beethoven. On the following day, the Pro Arte Quartet played in McCarter Theatre, including on its program the Third String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg. Later in the year, four concerts were given in Procter Hall by Princetno alumni who have made careers as concert artists. John Kirkpatrick. Class of 1926, pianist, George Newton, Class of 1929, baritone, James Sykes, Class of 1930, pianist, and Joseph Hawthorne, Class of 1930, violist, appeared on Sunday afternoons before highly appreciative audiences. Programs of special interest were given on the occasion of the annual Symposium on Music at Princeton, November 23rd, and at the Bicentennial Conference on Scholarship and Research in the Arts on April 24th of this year. On this latter occasion a program of French Chansons and Italian Madrigals, sung by local singers under the direction of Professor Randall Thompson, was given in Procter Hall before an audience which included scholars and other guests of the conference. Many of the conference guests heard a progrom of original compositions by graduate students in the Department on April 23rd, and witnessed the awarding for the first time of the Princeton Prize for Musical Composition, which was given to Henry Green Morgan, Class of 1940.

Less immediately connected with the Bicentennial but attracting many of the University's conference guests, have been other concerts given throughout the year by visiting artists and organizations, by local musicians, and by undergraduates. The Princeton University Concerts course brought the Philharmonic and Cleveland orchestras, the Budapest String Quartet, Robert Casadesus, Enesco, and others to McCarter Theatre. The University Glee Club, under J. Merrill Knapp, gave two concerts with visiting organizations, including the appearance in McCarter Theatre on April 25th with the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and Nan Merriman. The University Chapel Choir appeared at all but one of the major convocations, gave, with the chorus of the New Jersey College for Women, the annual Milbank Memorial Concert on May 4th, sang at the Memorial Service on Sunday and the Service of Dedication on Monday, and joined with the Glee Club in singing the "Testament of Freedom" with the Boston Symphony on Sunday evening. The Orchestra gave two concerts in Alexander Hall on Sunday evenings under the directiong of Russell Ames Cook. The Glee Club and some members of the Choir produced, with the help of Walter Johnson, the program of Episodes in Princeton's History last Saturday evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
JUN 18 1947

Old?

LSKY

H[illegible]rible [illegible]er. will old Ko[illegible] sec- n [illegible]gue and [illegible]ome best [illegible]irst at [illegible] mu[illegible]ars, gr[illegible] 50 com[illegible] W[illegible] up come[illegible]ich I [illegible]sh- I di[illegible] as they were begging the old b[illegible] come back, because the old knew how—which is more their great grandchildren prove.

Experience and wisdom with age and if the oldste[illegible] addition, are mentally vig[illegible] they are worth infinitely [illegible] than the bright boys fresh [illegible] college who know how to a statistical curve but lac[illegible] experience and wisdom to [illegible] what made it curve that wa[illegible]

That is the difference, f[illegible] stance, between Jesse Jon[illegible] 73, and the little drips who plain about him must have been young some time o[illegible] other.

They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according ta tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time.

A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago.

He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84.

He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow.

And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. symphony.

* * *

WERY
w World on Parade ng Tonight
MINEVITCH'S
ONICA SCALS
JONNY PUELO
nightly—8 and 11:30

PORTLAND,
EXPRESS
JUN 20 1947

Music, Where Words Fail

Next month, in its Esplanade Shell concert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Arthur Fiedler will revive a 75-year-old idea —an idea which was demonstrated by the World Peace Jubilee and International Music Festival held in Boston shortly after the close of the Franco-Prussian War — namely, the idea of the power of music to express the universal longing for peace, its power to speak a language understood by all peoples, all nations.

A display of flags, and dancing exhibitions by various national groups, are expected to be among the special events planned for the Jubilee anniversary program in Boston. And Mr. Fiedler will play, at this 1947 concert, "The Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz" which was conducted at the Festival in 1872 by its composer, Johann Strauss the younger.

Donald O. J. Messenger, writing about the Jubilee anniversary plans in the Christian Science Monitor of Wednesday, said Mr. Fiedler "is thinking, too, of including snatches of tunes that were popular in earlier postwar periods, such as 'When Johnny Comes Marching Home' — said to have been written by Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, organizer and director" of the 1872 Jubilee.

What possible good can this do? Can it prevent Stalin and Molotov from hating us? Can it make Americans mistrust Russian communists less than they do (with good reason)? Can a concert in Boston, emphasizing an international theme though it will, help in any way to curb the gnawing fears which lead mankind from one bloody war to another?

The answer cannot be Yes and it cannot be No. The answer, in part, is that it's worth trying. Where words fail — and words do fail, miserably, to explain America to the Russians, and Russia to the Americans — music may in time succeed. Who knows?

Mr. Gilmore of "Johnny Comes Marching Home" fame, "was enthusiastic over the idea of the sense of unity that he felt would be developed in great numbers of people singing and playing together," Mr. Messenger writes in his Monitor story. "He would have liked to get, first the whole Nation, then the whole world to unite in this way."

The best Mr. Gilmore could achieve, of course, was to assemble 50,000 to sing in Boston. But, Mr. Messenger notes, "today * * * with shortwave radio to unite groups all over the world, he could come much closer to his aim.

"Community singing by radio, in fact, is one detail of the plans for an annual, world-wide Peace Day celebration which has been prepared by the Committee for Peace Day in the United Nations, and which are expected to be laid before the United Nations in the Fall."

That's a wonderful idea! We can't speak Chinese. We can't speak Russian. We may have smatterings of French or German, but we "don't speak the language" of any other people — even the English — so expertly as never to be misunderstood. Words can be dangerous. They can spread misunderstanding and confusion. But music is a language all can understand.

Music is harmony. And peace — the true peace that has been so long absent from this world of discord— what is that but harmony, worldwide?

Harmony is what the peace-maker strives for when he speaks of seeking "broader areas of agreement" among nations; not "unity," (which may be impossible of attainment) but the harmonizing of different nations, different national traditions, customs, tastes into a symphony of many blending colors and tones. Who shall say that humanity cannot sing its way into harmony and peace? Everything else has been tried and found wanting. Music may indeed have the power, at last, to do what all the swords, all the statesmen's words, have failed to do.

Certainly there's the seed of a good idea here. Certainly it's worth trying.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
JUN 20 1947

The Reviewing Stand

Southern Orchestra Records Concerto

By Evans Rodgers

The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra conducted by George Weldon blossoms forth in a new Columbia Masterworks recording of Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 3 with Cyril Smith at the piano.

The orchestra sounds very rich and powerful on these records and if the City of Birmingham Orchestra can do this well, it would seem logical that our own New Orleans Orchestra could make an equally impressive appearance on records.

No doubt Columbia carefully chose this third piano concerto of Rachmaninoff since it makes a perfect companion piece to the famous second concerto (Columbia Masterworks Set No. 605), and because of Rachmaninoff's great popularity with American audiences.

As in most of Rachmaninoff's other music, the melodic line is simple, easily comprehended, and constantly repeated. It is enriched by straightforward orchestration which makes the music immediately enjoyable.

The records—there are five 12-inch ones in this set—are quite free of surface noise and the recording is mechanically excellent.

BRANDENBURG

Owners of the old RCA Victor recording of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra should be especially interested in Victor's new recording of the same music done by ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the concerto in which the concertino consists of trumpet, flute, oboe and violin. The music for these four instruments is written in a very high register and the brilliant score for the trumpet calls for a specially constructed instrument, much smaller than the regular size.

When Stokowski made his recording, however, he used a regular trumpet, and the difference in the Koussevitzky recording, which uses a special trumpet, is really startling.

The whole performance by Koussevitzky is superb and the album should be in the collection of all Bach devotees.

EQUALLY FINE

It is RCA Victor Set No. 1118, and consists of four 12-inch records. It also contains an equally fine recording of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in which the concertino consists of violin, flute and piano.

Mr. Koussevitzky has also recorded two of the other Brandenburg Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, and they are contained in RCA Victor Album No. 1050 consisting of four 12-inch records.

No doubt Victor plans to have Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra issue a fourth album containing the concertos Nos. 1 and 6, so that these important Bach compositions played by the same conductor and orchestra, will all be available.

PRINCETON, N.J
HERALD
6/20/47

KOUSSEVITSKY CONCERT CLOSES MUSICAL SEASON

By Dr. Roy D. Welch

The final concert of Princeton's Bicentennial year was given on Sunday evening in the new Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. At this concert the University's guests were the several hundred delegates assembled in Princeton for the closing ceremonies of the Bicentennial celebration, a distinguished company representing governments and institutions of learning throughout the world. Princeton hosts and hostesses to these visitors and a numerous public joined the guests in an audience of 28,000, which filled the hall almost to capacity. The orchestra, at this time of year not regularly playing, was assembled for the Princeton concert by Dr. Koussevitzky, who interrupted his own brief holiday to appear here. The University and the public recognizes gratefully the special effort on the part of players, conductor, and management, that made this out-of-season concert possible.

The program of this concert was as follows: Brahms, Academic Festival Overture; Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major; Finale from "The Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson (text by Thomas Jefferson); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica." In the performance of the "Testament," the male chorus consisted of the members of the Princeton University Glee Club, J. Merrill Knapp, conductor, and the Princeton University Chapel Choir, Carl Weinrich, director.

This concert was the climax of a series of musical events that, throughout the year, have been closely related to the Bicentennial. On October 19, 1946, there was sung at the opening Convocation in the University Chapel a Commemorative Anthem for male chorus and organ written by E. T. Cone, Class of 1939, Woodrow Wilson Fellow and Instructor in the Department of Music. On the same day the University Band played for the Processional to the Chapel a little known but brilliant Military March by Beethoven. On the following day, the Pro Arte Quartet played in McCarter Theatre, including on its program the Third String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg. Later in the year, four concerts were given in Procter Hall by Princetno alumni who have made careers as concert artists. John Kirkpatrick. Class of 1926, pianist, George Newton, Class of 1929, baritone, James Sykes, Class of 1930, pianist, and Joseph Hawthorne, Class of 1930, violist, appeared on Sunday afternoons before highly appreciative audiences. Programs of special interest were given on the occasion of the annual Symposium on Music at Princeton, November 23rd, and at the Bicentennial Conference on Scholarship and Research in the Arts on April 24th of this year. On this latter occasion a program of French Chansons and Italian Madrigals, sung by local singers under the direction of Professor Randall Thompson, was given in Procter Hall before an audience which included scholars and other guests of the conference. Many of the conference guests heard a progrom of original compositions by graduate students in the Department on April 23rd, and witnessed the awarding for the first time of the Princeton Prize for Musical Composition, which was given to Henry Green Morgan, Class of 1940.

Less immediately connected with the Bicentennial but attracting many of the University's conference guests, have been other concerts given throughout the year by visiting artists and organizations, by local musicians, and by undergraduates. The Princeton University Concerts course brought the Philharmonic and Cleveland orchestras, the Budapest String Quartet, Robert Casadesus, Enesco, and others to McCarter Theatre. The University Glee Club, under J. Merrill Knapp, gave two concerts with visiting organizations, including the appearance in McCarter Theatre on April 25th with the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and Nan Merriman. The University Chapel Choir appeared at all but one of the major convocations, gave, with the chorus of the New Jersey College for Women, the annual Milbank Memorial Concert on May 4th, sang at the Memorial Service on Sunday and the Service of Dedication on Monday, and joined with the Glee Club in singing the "Testament of Freedom" with the Boston Symphony on Sunday evening. The Orchestra gave two concerts in Alexander Hall on Sunday evenings under the directiong of Russell Ames Cook. The Glee Club and some members of the Choir produced, with the help of Walter Johnson, the program of Episodes in Princeton's History last Saturday evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
[illegible] 1947

Old?

LSKY

H rible er.
wi old
Ko sec-gue ome an er—be first at mu ars, gr 50
co
W up er-com ich
I sh-
I d as ey

were begging the old b come back, because the old knew how—which is more their great grandchildren prove.

Experience and wisdom with age and if the oldste addition, are mentally vig they are worth infinitely than the bright boys fresh college who know how to a statistical curve but lac experience and wisdom to what made it curve that w

That is the difference, f stance, between Jesse Jon 73, and the little drips who plain about have been young some time other.

They tell me that most children think of their parents a old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time.

A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago.

He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84.

He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow.

And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. symphony.

* * *

[illegible]
JUN 29 1947

Music, Where Words Fail

Next month, in its Esplanade Shell concert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Conductor Arthur~~ Fiedler will revive a 75-year-old idea—an idea which was demonstrated by the World Peace Jubilee and International Music Festival held in Boston shortly after the close of the Franco-Prussian War — namely, the idea of the power of music to express the universal longing for peace, its power to speak a language understood by all peoples, all nations.

A display of flags, and dancing exhibitions by various national groups, are expected to be among the special events planned for the Jubilee anniversary program in Boston. And Mr. Fiedler will play, at this 1947 concert, "The Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz" which was conducted at the festival in 1872 by its composer, Johann Strauss the younger.

Donald O. J. Messenger, writing about the Jubilee anniversary plans in the Christian Science Monitor of Wednesday, said Mr. Fiedler "is thinking, too, of including snatches of tunes that were popular in earlier postwar periods, such as 'When Johnny Comes Marching Home' — said to have been written by Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, organizer and director" of the 1872 Jubilee.

What possible good can this do? Can it prevent Stalin and Molotov from hating us? Can it make Americans mistrust Russian communists less than they do (with good reason)? Can a concert in Boston, emphasizing an international theme though it will, help in any way to curb the gnawing fears which lead mankind from one bloody war to another?

The answer cannot be Yes and it cannot be No. The answer, in part, is that it's worth trying. Where words fail — and words do fail, miserably, to explain America to the Russians, and Russia to the Americans — music may in time succeed. Who knows?

Mr. Gilmore of "Johnny Comes Marching Home" fame, "was enthusiastic over the idea of the sense of unity that he felt would be developed in great numbers of people singing and playing together," Mr. Messenger writes in his Monitor story. "He would have liked to get, first the whole Nation, then the whole world to unite in this way."

The best Mr. Gilmore could achieve, of course, was to assemble 50,000 to sing in Boston. But, Mr. Messenger notes, "today * * * with shortwave radio to unite groups all over the world, he could come much closer to his aim.

"Community singing by radio, in fact, is one detail of the plans for an annual, world-wide Peace Day celebration which has been prepared by the Committee for Peace Day in the United Nations, and which are expected to be laid before the United Nations in the Fall."

That's a wonderful idea! We can't speak Chinese. We can't speak Russian. We may have smatterings of French or German, but we "don't speak the language" of any other people — even the English — so expertly as never to be misunderstood. Words can be dangerous. They can spread misunderstanding and confusion. But music is a language all can understand.

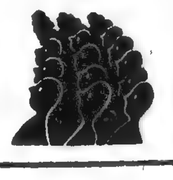
Music is harmony. And peace — the true peace that has been so long absent from this world of discord—what is that but harmony, worldwide?

Harmony is what the peace-maker strives for when he speaks of seeking "broader areas of agreement" among nations; not "unity," (which may be impossible of attainment) but the harmonizing of different nations, different national traditions, customs, tastes into a symphony of many blending colors and tones. Who shall say that humanity cannot sing its way into harmony and peace? Everything else has been tried and found wanting. Music may indeed have the power, at last, to do what all the swords, all the statesmen's words, have failed to do.

Certainly there's the seed of a good idea here. Certainly it's worth trying.

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
3 1947

Music



Lucretia in Chicago

THE name of Benjamin Britten, the 33-year-old, fair-haired boy of English music, gained wide currency in this country last summer when the American première of his opera "Peter Grimes" was given at the Berkshire Festival. Although "Peter Grimes" was reasonably well received, its success by no means lived up to the advance claims that had been made for it. The music plainly showed Britten's remarkable flair for dramatic expression, yet in many important technical regards it was too much the work of a gifted amateur.

On June 1 in Chicago an enterprising group known as the Opera Theatre presented the first American staging of a more recent Britten opera, "The Rape of Lucretia," which has already been given 130 times in England in nine months. "The Rape of Lucretia" is not only a more arresting and more vitally beautiful work than "Peter Grimes"; it is a composition of almost unbelievably greater professional skill and sureness.

Ronald Duncan's libretto is derived without essential plot change from the familiar story as it is found in Livy and Shakespeare. The four scenes show successively the wager made by Tarquinius, Etruscan prince of Rome, to two fellow soldiers that he can conquer Lucretia, the only virtuous wife left in Rome; the intrusion of Tarquinius into Lucretia's home while her husband is away; the rape itself, presented with no attempt at reticence of detail; and Lucretia's suicide after she has confessed her impurity to her husband.

Two solo singers, a soprano and a tenor, take over the function of the classic chorus, interpreting and commenting upon the story from the sidelines. A curious, pervasive Christian mysticism colors their part of the text. Although the action took place in about 500 B. C., the audience is asked to "view these human passions and these years/With eyes which once have wept with Christ's own tears." Although there is no reason to doubt Duncan's, or Britten's, sincerity in thinking this an important framework, many listeners seemed to be unconvinced that the classical story gained either power or meaning from the introduction of the element of Christian moralism.

In the main, however, the libretto is both natural and poetic, which is the rarest and most virtuous of combinations in an opera book. The music stems from great operatic traditions, with strong echoes of both Purcell and Verdi, yet its ideas are fresh, striking and very much Britten's own.

Under the direction of Paul Breisach, an excellent musician to whom the Metropolitan did not give adequate opportunities when he conducted there, the Chicago performance was impeccably prepared, with first-desk Chicago Symphony men to give tonal radiance to the instrumental parts, and with a competent cast whose best members were Regina Resnik as the Female Chorus, Frank Rogier (lately of Menotti's "The Telephone") as Tarquinius, and Marguerite Piazza as a soubrette named Lucia. There is some talk of performances by the same cast in other cities next fall.

ANOTHER of the year's distinctive new operas, Kurt Weill's "Street Scene," is now available on phonograph records (Columbia MM-683, six 12-inch records, $7). Since the excerpts were chosen by the composer himself, the album gives a sense of the dramatic integrity and continuity of the score which is missing from the usual potpourri collections of musical-comedy hit songs. Maurice Abravanel conducts the orchestra with as much ardor as though the recording session had been the opening night in New York. Except for Norman Cordon, who is under contract to Victor, the original cast sings the music. Polyna Stoska's voice is enchanting, though two or three spots sound tired; Anne Jeffreys sounds better than she does on the stage; and Brian Sullivan sounds just as well, though I cannot help wondering how he will negotiate the taxing tenor role of Beethoven's "Fidelio" in the Central City, Colorado, festival this summer. Instead of appearing in the "Street Scene" album, Norman Cordon sings a variety of standard oratorio bass solos in the stuffed-shirt manner which is held to be appropriate to them (Victor M-1094, three 12-inch records, $3.85).

CECIL SMITH

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

JUN 22 1947

Other Recordings

Of the other recordings recently released, the Bach Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 and 5 are the most spectacular. They are reviewed below:

Album: Bach's Brandenburg Concertos, No. 2 in F and No. 5 in D, played by musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting (four 12-inch Victor records, $5.10).

This new recording of the second and fifth are by the same musicians who recorded the third and fourth for Victor last year. Koussevitzky and his Boston musicians probably will record the first and sixth in the near future, to complete the set. When they do that, the three albums—six concertos—together will be a treasure of recorded music.

Both recording quality and performance on these two—the second and fifth—are superb. The second features Rogers Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Richard Burgin, violin. All these gentlemen give sterling performances, but Mr. Voisin's interpretation of the incredibly high—and difficult—trumpet part is an unforgettable experience. Judging by the sound, he used a small D-flat trumpet. Tone is beautiful and his technique is flawless.

Only possible flaw—and this is a matter of personal opinion—is the use of piano when the score calls for harpsichord. The piano is excellent, but the other instrument might give the performance more authenticity, as well as strike a better tone balance with the strings and woodwinds.

Album: Mozart's Quartet No. 2 in E-flat Major for Piano and Strings, played by George Szell, piano, with members of the Budapest String Quartet (three 12-inch Columbia records, $4.05).

George Szell, whose reputation rest chiefly on his excellence as a conductor, proves an artistic match for the four fine musicians of the Budapest quartet. There is good balance on this Mozart piano quartet (actually a quintet) and it is fairly well recorded.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUN 22 1947

OTHER REVIEWS

Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C. New York Philharmonic-Symphony conducted by Bruno Walter. (Columbia, six twelve-inch disks.) This masterpiece needs no comment. It is enough to say that here is the finest recording of the music available. Mr. Walter directs with richness of perception and vitality, truly con amore. The orchestra plays well. Highly recommended.

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2 and 5. Boston Symphony conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. (Victor, four twelve-inch records.) Playing of the highest caliber is devoted to these scores. The orchestra has a fine blend of mellowness and vibrancy, and the pacing of the music is sound. First-rate solo work is done by Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin, and Lukas Foss, piano. Recording, good.

Piano Music of Mendelssohn. Vladimir Horowitz, piano. (Victor, three twelve-inch records.) In observance of the centenary of Mendelssohn, this album brings Mr. Horowitz' unsurpassed virtuosity. He plays the Variations Sérieuses, the composer's finest piano music, somewhat clinically, but two of the Songs Without Words are restrained and poetic, and the Wedding March and Variations After Liszt make a virtuoso's holiday. Recording, all right.

Patter Songs from Gilbert and Sullivan, Vol. 2. Nelson Eddy, baritone, with chorus and orchestra conducted by Robert Armbruster. (Columbia, three ten-inch disks.) Mr. Eddy sings excerpts from The Pirates of Penzance, Patience, Trial by Jury, Ruddigore, The Gondoliers and Princess Ida. The words and music retain their wit and freshness, and the performance is pleasant. Savoyards, however, might prefer a drier, lighter [illegible]

HOLDENVILLE, OKLA.
NEWS

JUN 27 1947

BOSTON SYMPHO
TO STAGE HUGE

BOSTON, June 27 (U.P.)—If all goes well, Boston symphony orchestra conductor Arthur Fiedler hopes to make the loudest musical noise next Wednesday that the nation has heard in 55 years.

"I'm looking for 20,000 singers," he said. "I want to get them all together on the esplanade and duplicate the concert 'that rocked the world' staged by bandleader Patrick Saarfield Gilmore in 1872."

Fiedler, a little man with a huge imagination, said he had appealed to singing societies, glee clubs and church choirs to join him and his symphony musicians in a rip-snorting rendition of the "anvil chorus"—with English words.

"I want everyone who likes to sing to send me a postcard and say they'll sing with me," Fiedler said. "I hope they come from New York and Kansas and Canada as they did for Gilmore."

Fiedler admitted he wouldn't have 2,000 instrumentalists as did the mustached maestro of the eighteenth century. He added glumly that he woudn't have artillery and musketry to help him out as did Gilmore.

"But we'll have electric amplification and that should give us a lot of volume", he said triumphantly. "We aren't asking the fire department to join us like Gilmore did, because we have a giant electric organ that can make out-of-this-world noises."

For Gilmore's ear-buster, a special colleseum was constructed near Boston's park square. It held the huge band, 20,000 vocalists and an audience of 40,000. The ruckus was to celebrate the end of the Franco-Prussian war.

Fiedler's show will be outdoors. If it doesn't rock the world, as Gilmore claimed his extravaganza would, it certainly should rock Boston.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUN 29 1947

EIGHTH NOTES: Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have abandoned plans for a short concert tour of England next September owing to difficulties of transAtlantic transportation.

AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN

JUN 27 1947

'Loudest' Music Sought

BOSTON, June 27.—(UP)—If all goes well, Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Arthur Fiedler hopes to make the loudest musical noise next Wednesday that the nation has heard in 55 years.

"I'm looking for 20,000 singers," he said. "I want to get them all together on the esplanade and duplicate the concert 'that rocked the world' staged by Bandleader Patrick Saarfield Gilmore in 1872."

Fiedler, a little man with a huge imagination, said he had appealed to singing societies, glee clubs and church choirs to join him and his symphony musicians in a rip-snorting rendition of the "Anvil Chorus"—with English words.

"I want everyone who likes to sing to send me a postcard and say they'll sing with me," Fiedler said. "I hope they come from New York and Kansas and Canada as they did for Gilmore."

Fiedler admitted he wouldn't have 2,000 instrumentalists as did the mustached maestro of the 19th Century. He added glumly that he wouldn't have artillery and musketry to help him out as did Gilmore.

"But we'll have electric amplification and that should give us a lot of volume," he said triumphantly. "We aren't asking the fire department to join us like Gilmore did, because we have a giant electric organ that can make out-of-this-world noises."

For Gilmore's ear-buster, a special colliseum was constructed near Boston's Park Square. It held the huge band, 20,000 vocalists and an audience of 40,000. The ruckus was to celebrate the end of the Franco-Prussian War.

Fiedler's show will be outdoors. If it doesn't rock the world, as Gilmore claimed his extravaganza would, it certainly should rock Boston.

BEAUMONT, TEXAS
JOURNAL

JUN 27 1947

Loudest Musical Noise Heard In 55 Years Set For Boston

BOSTON, June 27 (UP)—If all goes well, Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Arthur Fiedler hopes to make the loudest musical noise next Wednesday that the nation has heard in 55 years.

"I'm looking for 20,000 singers," he said. "I want to get them all together on the esplanade and duplicate the concert 'that rocked the world' staged by Bandleader Patrick Saarfield Gilmore in 1872."

Fiedler, a little man with a huge imagination, said he had appealed to singing societies, glee clubs and church choirs to join him and his symphony musicians in a rip-snorting rendition of the "Anvil Chorus"—with English words.

"I want everyone who likes to sing to send me a postcard and say they'll sing with me," Fiedler said. "I hope they come from New York and Kansas and Canada as they did for Gilmore."

Fiedler admitted he wouldn't have 2000 instrumentalists as did the mustached maestro of the eighteenth century. He added glumly that he wouldn't have artillery and musketry to help him out as did Gilmore.

"But we'll have electric amplification and that should give us a lot of volume," he said triumphantly. "We aren't asking the fire department to join us like Gilmore did, because we have a giant electric organ that can make out-of-this-world noises."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Musical Criticism in the Soviet Union

In Which Some American Writers Are Taken To Task for Seemingly Intentional Misstatements Anent the Current Status of Shostakovich.

by Igor Boelza

I noted with pleasure that when the article in which I attempted a concise informative summary of Soviet musical life, and in particular of the publication of music in this country, was published in The Musician, it was prefaced by some friendly remarks by the editor. Objective information always contributes to mutual understanding, and cultural relations between the nations; yet when Soviet musicians read foreign magazines they are struck by the fact that some aspects of our musical life are woefully misrepresented. The reasons appear to vary from mere misinformation to what at times seems malicious distortion.

An example of this can be seen in an article in "The Musical Times" of London written by Leonid Sabaneyev, in which he earned for himself a somewhat inglorious name by slanderous remarks concerning Soviet composers and the great classics of Russian music. Sabaneyev was probably the only musician in the world who on the occasion of the Tschaikowsky centenary, published an abominable slander on the composer's memory as well as upon the Russian people.

I am reminded of the friend of Edgar Allen Poe who referred to a calumny on his memory published after his death; to the effect that up to then, he had never thought, so he said, "that dogs were allowed in cemeteries in America." We fail to understand why David Ewen, giving the characteristics of Soviet composers in his book, "Composers of Today," refers solely to Sabaneyev, or why the other American commentators so often quote his obviously prejudiced writings.

To set to rest some of these false innuendos I should like to speak to American readers somewhat about music criticism in this country. We have a background of sound traditions in this field, carried over from the classic period of Russian musical development, like Schuman, Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz, Saint-Saens and other composers of the West who devoted much attention to criticism. Tchaikovsky, Serov, Caesar Cui and Rimsky-Korsakov left brilliant examples of it in Russia. To these must be added the classic work of Vladimir Stasov, the friend and ideologist of "The Big Five." Glinka's "Notes' and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Annals of My Musical Life" are not merely memoirs but they contain critical material of importance that bears on the history of music.

Many outstanding Soviet composers continue this tradition. Myaskovsky has written "Autobiographical Notes and a Critical Study: Beethoven and Tschaikowsky." Sergei Prokofieff is a brilliant writer on his subject, and one of his articles was recently published in the "Musical Quarterly." The same may be said of Vissari on Shebalin, whose critical articles are known to readers of "Modern Music;" and of Dmitri Shostakovich, Yuri Shaporin and many others.

In 1941, a musician was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences for the first time in the 220 years of its existence. This was Boris Asafiev, who signs his critical and journalistic work under the pseudonym, Igor Glebov. His books and articles represent the best in musical scholarship and thought. Space does not permit the enumeration of all the Soviet musicians who at the same time are critics; but some of their names are fairly well known in the United States.

"Soviet Music," a magazine which devotes a good deal of space to criticism, has appeared regularly for many years. It contains articles giving detailed analyses, with illustrations in musical notation, of new compositions, reviews of concert life in the republics and towns of the Soviet Union, notes, commentaries and polemics. Music criticism and information have an important place in the newspaper "Soviet Art," as in other newspapers of the same type in Kiev, in the Ukraine, and in Minsk in the Beilorussian language. The central press and provincial papers also publish interesting news-items and articles on the new operatic, ballet and dramatic productions, new compositions, and current concerts.

The magazine "Theatre" publishes criticisms of music, principally of opera and ballet. The more important literary magazines, such as "Novy Mir" (New World), often print interesting music material, such as Rachmaninoff's correspendence with Marietta Shaginian. Musical articles also appear in the picture weeklies like "Ogoniek," which has an enormous circulation.

Opinions on music in our press are not always those of professionals, for one of the most interesting critical articles I ever read was the late Alexei Tolstoy's short review of Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, which appeared in "Izvestia."

Not infrequently in the foreign press one finds remarks about "official" criticism in the Soviet Union, which is presumed to take the place of freely-expressed opinions. The groundlessness of this suggestion can be readily shown. A short time ago a severe criticism concerning Leonid Leoniv's play "Lenushka" by Victor Gorodinsky and Yakov Varshavsky, appeared in a Moscow paper, "Komsomolskaya Pravda." Soon after this, "Pravda" published an article by the popular writer, Konstantine Simeonov, who pointed out the mistakes which, from his standpoint, these writers had made. After this the All-Russian Theatre Society provoked wide discussion of the play, and controversy regarding the two articles developed considerable warmth.

At the end of last season, the Second Symphony of Alexander Krein, one of the older generation of Soviet musicians, was performed in Moscow. My article in "Izvestia" gave it a favorable evaluation, in which soon after, the musical commentator of "Soviet Art" joined. Yet these favorable articles did not deter a commentator in "Soviet Music" from voicing an unfavorable opinion of the symphony.

These two instances of diametrically-opposite views on the same composition, emphasize the freedom with which our critics can and do express their views, and should show that we do not hold to the Roman rule "de gustibus non est disputandum." On the contrary, the verities emerge in debate. We consider that taste is a matter to be argued about. Certainly we do not defer to criticisms based on personal preferences and tastes, but we respect those which exhibit a more detached attitude. We argue about art with great warmth, not only through the medium of the press, but in organizations like the Composers' Union, where music, books on theory and history, and critical reviews, are taken under consideration.

One of the most-discussed compositions of late was Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, which aroused keen controversy in the Composers' Union and the press, both pro and con. Yet to our great surprise we read in the October issue of "Musical America," an article by Grace May Stutsman entitled "A Shostakovich Work played in Boston," in which she said that "Despite the fact that Soviet officials have discounted this symphony as out of line, so to speak with their political policies, it is notable that the Soviet radio has broadcast a performance and that the work has been performed in Leningrad and other Russian cities." While the first part of the sentence is a pure fabrication, the second part corresponds to the truth; and I might add that shortly after its first performance

---

On The Record—

Shoshtakovich Ninth Gets Double Play

Shoshtakovitch's Victory Symphony (No. 9) gets two nods from the major manufacturers this week. The Russian modernist went all the way back to Haydn as a starting place for this one, and paused long among the 19th Century romantics before he completed the five movements.

Efrem Kurtz and the New York Philharmonic in Columbia Set 688 bear down harder on the victoriousness. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1134 linger more ~~lovingly in~~ the neo-classic and late romantic atmospheres.

* * *

Two of the younger top-flight American violinists display their wares in two disparate concertos. Isaac Stern, with the backing of Kurtz and the New Yorkers, has himself a field day in Wieniawski's romantic No. 2 in Columbia's Set 656. Yehudi Menuhin cracks a tougher nut in Bela Batrok's concerto. With the able assistance of the Dallas Orchestra, he gets most of the meat from this one in RCA-Victor Set 1120. But you've got to help, too, especially when they go into 9-8 time.

* * *

Getting a little tired of romantic saccharine? Don't feel quite up to wandering in atonal mazes? What you're looking for is some Bach and Handel. Koussevitsky and his Bostonians give performances which long should stand as definitive of Bach's Brandenberg Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 in RCA-Victor Set 1118. Eugene Normandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra do an Ormandy arrangement of Handel's Water Music in Columbia Set X-279. Both sets are as refreshing as long drinks of icy water on a hot day.

* * *

The Farm Security Administration's documentary movie, "The Plow that Broke the Plains," broke a lot of records for honest and beautifully effective movie making back in the 30's. One of its greatest assets was its musical score by Virgil Thompson. Now Leopold Stokowski and the Hollywood Bowl Symphony give an effective reading of the earthy music in RCA-Victor Set 116.

Also new: Horowitz applies his metronomic fingers to three Mendelssohn pieces including the wedding march in RCA-Victor Set 1121 . . . The Boston Pops Orchestra in RCA-Victor Set 1119 lushes up that Chopin medley to which Les Sylphides is danced . . . Piatigorsky resins his most lyric bow for a go at a half dozen Russian melodies, among them "None But the Lonely Heart," in Columbia Set 684 . . . What sounds like an assortment of all the types of chairborne Air Force men get together for a performance of Marc Blitzstein's Airborne Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1117. They run up the engines all right, but somebody seems to have forgot to take the chock from under the wheels.—D.L.

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

BICENTENNIAL CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

MUSIC DIRECTOR

HERBERT LOWELL DILLON GYMNASIUM

Sunday, June 15, 1947 · 8:30 P.M.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JUL 3 - 1947

1872 ANVIL CHORUS JUST CLINKS NOW

Boston, July 3 (A. P.).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's hopes of approaching the noise made by the city's Anvil Chorus of 1872 fell short by 198 anvils last night. The idea was to obtain a chorus of 20,000 singers to compare with those of the World Peace Jubilee and International Music Festival of nearly three-quarters of a century ago. Only thirty-eight registered for the chorus.

The audience, estimated by the police at 34,000, and Arthur Fielder's musicians made a brave try as voices were raised in rendition of the Anvil Chorus from Verdi's "Il Trovatore," but their efforts were nothing as compared to the jubilee, which had 20,000 choristers and red-shirted Boston firemen beating 200 anvils. Last night there were two anvils.

Meeting, Feb. 26, Of Symphony Friends

The [illegible] Friends of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, will hold its annual meeting in Symphony Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 26, at 4 P. M. Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends, will address the meeting. There will be a special program of music arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, and afterwards Mr. Koussevitzky will receive the members at tea in the upper foyer It is still possible to become a friend of the Boston Symphony by mailing a contribution to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JUN 5 - 1947

Princeton to Hear Boston Symphony

Concert June 15 Is Feature for Closing Program of Bicentennial

PRINCETON — Serge Koussevitszky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert June 15 in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium as part of Princeton's final four-day bicentennial celebration series which will begin with the dedication of the gymnasium June 14 and close with an address by President Truman June 17.

Featured on the program will be Beethoven's Third "Eroica" Symphony in E-flat and the finale of "The Testament of Freedom" composed for the Thomas Jefferson centennial in 1943 by [illegible] Thompson, American composer, member of Princeton's [illegible] of music.

Assisting the 105-piece [illegible] in "The Testament of Freedom" [illegible] choral setting for orchestra [illegible] choir of four texts of Thomas Jefferson, will be an [illegible] from the Princeton Glee Club [illegible] the University Chapel Choir [illegible] leadership of their [illegible] Merrill Knapp and [illegible]

Marking the first time the gymnasium has been used [illegible] public [illegible] the program [illegible] also will [illegible] J. S. Bach's [illegible] Number [illegible] in D Major for [illegible] estra [illegible] Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture." [illegible] is expected [illegible] attract an audience of more [illegible] 3,000, including [illegible] representatives from 450 educational institutions and societies [illegible] over the world.

CHICAGO [illegible]
NEWS
JUL 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterd[illegible] secretary of the last [illegible] Olga Naumoop, [illegible]

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
[illegible] 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Marries

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP) Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

[175]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Musical Criticism in the Soviet Union

In Which Some American Writers Are Taken To Task for Seemingly Intentional Misstatements Anent the Current Status of Shostakovich.

by IGOR BOELZA

I noted with pleasure that when the article in which I attempted a concise informative summary of Soviet musical life, and in particular of the publication of music in this country, was published in THE MUSICIAN, it was prefaced by some friendly remarks by the editor. Objective information always contributes to mutual understanding, and cultural relations between the nations; yet when Soviet musicians read foreign magazines they are struck by the fact that some aspects of our musical life are woefully misrepresented. The reasons appear to vary from mere misinformation to what at times seems malicious distortion.

An example of this can be seen in an article in "The Musical Times" of London written by Leonid Sabaneyev, in which he earned for himself a somewhat inglorious name by slanderous remarks concerning Soviet composers and the great classics of Russian music. Sabaneyev was probably the only musician in the world who on the occasion of the Tschaikowsky centenary, published an abominable slander on the composer's memory as well as upon the Russian people.

I am reminded of the friend of Edgar Allen Poe who referred to a calumny on his memory published after his death; to the effect that up to then, he had never thought, so he said, "that dogs were allowed in cemeteries in America." We fail to understand why David Ewen, giving the characteristics of Soviet composers in his book, "Composers of Today," refers solely to Sabaneyev, or why the other American commentators so often quote his obviously prejudiced writings.

To set to rest some of these false innuendos I should like to speak to American readers somewhat about music criticism in this country. We have a background of sound traditions in this field, carried over from the classic period of Russian musical development, like Schuman, Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz, Saint-Saens and other composers of the West who devoted much attention to criticism. Tchaikovsky, Serov, Caesar Cui and Rimsky-Korsakov left brilliant examples of it in Russia. To these must be added the classic work of Vladimir Stasov, the friend and ideologist of "The Big Five." Glinka's "Notes' and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Annals of My Musical Life" are not merely memoirs but they contain critical material of importance that bears on the history of music.

Many outstanding Soviet composers continue this tradition. Myaskovsky has written "Autobiographical Notes and a Critical Study: Beethoven and Tschaikowsky." Sergei Prokofieff is a brilliant writer on his subject, and one of his articles was recently published in the "Musical Quarterly." The same may be said of Vissari on Shebalin, whose critical articles are known to readers of "Modern Music;" and of Dmitri Shostakovich, Yuri Shaporin and many others.

In 1944, a musician was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences for the first time in the 220 years of its existence. This was Boris Asafiev, who signs his critical and journalistic work under the pseudonym, Igor Glebov. His books and articles represent the best in musical scholarship and thought. Space does not permit the enumeration of all the Soviet musicians who at the same time are critics; but some of their names are fairly well known in the United States.

"Soviet Music," a magazine which devotes a good deal of space to criticism, has appeared regularly for many years. It contains articles giving detailed analyses, with illustrations in musical notation, of new compositions, reviews of concert life in the republics and towns of the Soviet Union, notes, commentaries and polemics. Music criticism and information have an important place in the newspaper "Soviet Art," as in other newspapers of the same type in Kiev, in the Ukraine, and in Minsk in the Beilorussian language. The central press and provincial papers also publish interesting news-items and articles on the new operatic, ballet and dramatic productions, new compositions, and current concerts.

The magazine "Theatre" publishes criticisms of music, principally of opera and ballet. The more important literary magazines, such as "Novy Mir" (New World), often print interesting music material, such as Rachmaninoff's correspendence with Marietta Shaginian. Musical articles also appear in the picture weeklies like "Ogoniek," which has an enormous circulation.

Opinions on music in our press are not always those of professionals, for one of the most interesting critical articles I ever read was the late Alexei Tolstoy's short review of Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, which appeared in "Izvestia."

Not infrequently in the foreign press one finds remarks about "official" criticism in the Soviet Union, which is presumed to take the place of freely-expressed opinions. The groundlessness of this suggestion can be readily shown. A short time ago a severe criticism concerning Leonid Leoniv's play "Lenushka" by Victor Gorodinsky and Yakov Varshavsky, appeared in a Moscow paper, "Komsomolskaya Pravda." Soon after this, "Pravda" published an article by the popular writer, Konstantine Simeonov, who pointed out the mistakes which, from his standpoint, these writers had made. After this the All-Russian Theatre Society provoked wide discussion of the play, and controversy regarding the two articles developed considerable warmth.

At the end of last season, the Second Symphony of Alexander Krein, one of the older generation of Soviet musicians, was performed in Moscow. My article in "Izvestia" gave it a favorable evaluation, in which soon after, the musical commentator of "Soviet Art" joined. Yet these favorable articles did not deter a commentator in "Soviet Music" from voicing an unfavorable opinion of the symphony.

These two instances of diametrically-opposite views on the same composition, emphasize the freedom with which our critics can and do express their views, and should show that we do not hold to the Roman rule "de gustibus non est disputandum." On the contrary, the verities emerge in debate. We consider that taste is a matter to be argued about. Certainly we do not defer to criticisms based on personal preferences and tastes, but we respect those which exhibit a more detached attitude. We argue about art with great warmth, not only through the medium of the press, but in organizations like the Composers' Union, where music, books on theory and history, and critical reviews, are taken under consideration.

One of the most-discussed compositions of late was Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, which aroused keen controversy in the Composers' Union and the press, both pro and con. Yet to our great surprise we read in the October issue of "Musical America," an article by Grace May Stutsman entitled "A Shostakovich Work played in Boston," in which she said that "Despite the fact that Soviet officials have discounted this symphony as out of line, so to speak with their political policies, it is notable that the Soviet radio has broadcast a performance and that the work has been performed in Leningrad and other Russian cities." While the first part of the sentence is a pure fabrication, the second part corresponds to the truth; and I might add that shortly after its first performance

---

On The Record—

Shoshtakovich Ninth Gets Double Play

Shoshtakovitch's Victory Symphony (No. 9) gets two nods from the major manufacturers this week. The Russian modernist went all the way back to Haydn as a starting place for this one, and paused long among the 19th Century romantics before he completed the five movements.

Efrem Kurtz and the New York Philharmonic in Columbia Set 688 bear down harder on the victoriousness. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1134 linger more ~~lovingly in~~ the neo-classic and late romantic atmospheres.

* * *

Two of the younger top-flight American violinists display their wares in two disparate concertos. Isaac Stern, with the backing of Kurtz and the New Yorkers, has himself a field day in Wieniawski's romantic No. 2 in Columbia's Set 656. Yehudi Menuhin cracks a tougher nut in Bela Batrok's concerto. With the able assistance of the Dallas Orchestra, he gets most of the meat from this one in RCA-Victor Set 1120. But you've got to help, too, especially when they go into 9-8 time.

* * *

Getting a little tired of romantic saccharine? Don't feel quite up to wandering in atonal mazes? What you're looking for is some Bach and Handel. Koussevitsky and his Bostonians give performances which long should stand as definitive of Bach's Brandenberg Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 in RCA-Victor Set 1118. Eugene Normandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra do an Ormandy arrangement of Handel's Water Music in Columbia Set X-279. Both sets are as refreshing as long drinks of icy water on a hot day.

* * *

The Farm Security Administration's documentary movie, "The Plow that Broke the Plains," broke a lot of records for honest and beautifully effective movie making back in the 30's. One of its greatest assets was its musical score by Virgil Thompson. Now Leopold Stokowski and the Hollywood Bowl Symphony give an effective reading of the earthy music in RCA-Victor Set 116.

Also new: Horowitz applies his metronomic fingers to three Mendelssohn pieces including the wedding march in RCA-Victor Set 1121 . . . The Boston Pops Orchestra in RCA-Victor Set 1119 lushes up that Chopin medley to which Les Sylphides is danced . . . Piatigorsky resins his most lyric bow for a go at a half dozen Russian melodies, among them "None But the Lonely Heart," in Columbia Set 684 . . . What sounds like an assortment of all the types of chairborne Air Force men get together for a performance of Marc Blitzstein's Airborne Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1117. They run up the engines all right, but somebody seems to have forgot to take the chock from under the wheels.—D.L.

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

BICENTENNIAL CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

MUSIC DIRECTOR

HERBERT LOWELL DILLON GYMNASIUM

Sunday, June 15, 1947 · 8:30 P.M.

[illegible] SUN

JUL 3 - 1947

1872 ANVIL CHORUS JUST CLINKS NOW

Boston, July 3 (A. P.).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's hopes of approaching the noise made by the city's Anvil Chorus of 1872 fell short by 198 anvils last night. The idea was to obtain a chorus of 20,000 singers to compare with those of the World Peace Jubilee and International Music Festival of nearly three-quarters of a century ago. Only thirty-eight registered for the chorus.

The audience, estimated by the police at 34,000, and Arthur Fielder's musicians made a brave try as voices were raised in rendition of the Anvil Chorus from Verdi's "Il Trovatore," but their efforts were nothing as compared to the jubilee, which had 20,000 choristers and red-shirted Boston firemen beating 200 anvils. Last night there were two anvils.

Meeting, Feb. 26, Of [illegible] Friends

The [illegible] Friends of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, will hold its annual meeting in Symphony Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 26, at 4 P. M. Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends, will address the meeting. There will be a special program of music arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, and afterwards Mr. Koussevitzky will receive the members at tea in the upper foyer. It is still possible to become a friend of the Boston Symphony by mailing a contribution to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

[illegible]WARK, N. J. [illegible]

[illegible] 1947

Princeton to Hear Boston Symphony

Concert June 15 Is Feature for Closing Program of Bicentennial

PRINCETON — Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert June 15 in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium as part of Princeton's final four-day bicentennial celebration series which will begin with the dedication of the gymnasium June 14 and close with an address by President Truman June 17.

Featured on the program will be Beethoven's Third "Eroica" Symphony in E-flat and the finale of "The Testament of Freedom" posed for the Thomas Jeffer centennial in 1943 by Thompson, American com member of Princeton's of music.

Assisting the 105-piece in "The Testament of choral setting for orch choir of four texts of Th ferson will be an 80-voice from the Princeton Glee C the University Chapel Choi leadership of their direct Merrill Knapp and Carl We Marking the first time gymnasium has been used public event, the program also will include J. S. Bach's Number 3 in D Major for estra and Grahms's Festival Overture," is attract an audience of 3,000, including from 450 educational and societies all over

---

[illegible] NEWS

JUL 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last [illegible] Olga Naumoff, 4[illegible]

CHICAGO [illegible] HERALD-AME[illegible]

JUL 16 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Marries

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

the score of the Ninth Symphony, which I edited, was published in Moscow in a large edition, and has been performed frequently, both in concert and over the radio, and with much acclaim. Turning a few pages, we also read on page 14 an editorial article entitled "Curiouser and Curiouser," which expresses the editor's condolences "that for the second time in his comparatively short career, Dmitri Shostakovich finds himself under the scourge of the official arbiters of public taste."

This piece of information, offered by the editor of "Musical America," and reinforced by references to articles in "Pravda" in 1936 and to a recent article by I. Nestiev in "Culture and Life," was astounding news to us—not as to the facts contained, which were untrue, but that anyone could imagine a justification for such false statements.

Boris Asafiev, a member of the Academy, emphasized in one of his works, that the articles in "Pravda" were not in the nature of an attack on Shostakovich, but a defence of a talented composer from influences alien to him. As a matter of fact, it was soon after these articles had appeared that he wrote the Fifth Symphony, the String Quartet and the Piano Quintet which are among his best compositions. The editor of "Musical America," with a deplorable and incomprehensible bias, selected two or three sentences from Nestiev's lengthy article on which he proceeded to build up a false thesis, whereas Nestiev's article, taken as a whole, places an extremely high value on Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony.

Even this is more or less aside from the point. After the Seventh Symphony's triumphal tour of the world, and after the tragic imagery of the Eighth Symphony, the composer himself stated that he intended to bring his symphonic war trilogy to its culmination with a Ninth, as a symphony of victory. News of this reached the American press, in which the new symphony was spoken of as "Victory." As may rightly be supposed, the Russian public looked forward to this culmination with impatience. However, instead of a Victory symphony, Shostakovich wrote a composition in which satirical scherzo elements prevail.

"Musical America" observed in this connection that "The consensus of American opinion was that the symphon , while not the most ponderable work of Shostakovich's, is a light, gayly satirical work of considerable charm and, more important, that it represents the return of a talented composer to his natural idiom after having hauled political freight of an increasingly obvious and burdensome nature in all of his vehicles since the Fifth Symphony."

No Soviet musician is likely to agree with any such futile effort on the part of the editor of "Musical America" to limit the range of Shostakovich's splendid gifts to the sphere of "light gay satire." We appreciate Shostakovich's humor, even though we set a still higher value on the works in which he expresses the nobler passions and feelings, such as the Seventh Symphony.

It is understandable, that a Soviet public, while it showed full appreciation of the work, may have felt some disappointment in the fact that the imagery of larger passions and feelings of the Seventh and Eighth did not find its expected culmination in the Ninth. It must be presumed that this led Nestiev to question whether it was timely for "a famous artist to take a vacation and rest from modern problems." However, Nestiev's article in "Culture and Life" was not an "official" pronouncement, and when it was discussed in the Composers' Union, Tamara Tsytovich, a lecturer-docent at the Moscow Conservatory, expressed disagreement with its opinions, and called it a premature assertion. Her article was printed in full in No. 10 of "Soviet Music." Thus polemics continued, and Nestiev's article by no means represented "official censure" of Shostakovich or his Ninth Symphony, as the American reader might infer from the articles in "Musical America."

As for public opinion in Russia, and its attitude toward Shostakovich, despite the Musical America statement that he "finds himself under the scourge of the official arbiters of public taste," it might be well to note that on December 20th, 1946 Shostakovich received the highest order in the Soviet Union, the Order of Lenin; and that on February 9th, 1947, he was elected deputy by the Leningrad citizens to the Supreme Soviet of the RSFSR. These facts are evidence of the high esteem in which Shostakovich, his music, and all his activities, are held by the Soviet Government, and by public opinion in his country, sufficient to refute Musical America's gratuitous slur upon the integrity of our Russian composers.

I want to add a postscript concerning another disagreement between Nestiev and the editor of "Musical America," and I hope Mr. Ronald Eyer will understand my motives. When Nestiev spoke of Igor Stravinsky as "an artist without a fatherland, "Musical America replied: "Mr. Stravinsky is an American citizen." I hold an entirely different opinion, and I think I can, without seeming to take too much for granted, say that my opinion is shared by many Soviet composers. While I have not seen Stravinsky's passport and I have no idea how often he may have changed his citizenship, I know his compositions and value them highly. Therefore I ask: are not "The Fire Bird," "Petrouchka," Le Sacre du Printemps" (Scenes of Pagan Russia), "Renard" (after Russian folk tales), "Les Noces" (Russian Scenes), "Histoire du Soldat" (probably a Russian soldier), "Mavra" (after Pushkin), "LeBaisier de la Fee" (upon Tschaikowsky themes) among the best of Stravinsky's compositions, and do they not clearly show the Russian national sources of the work of a composer trained in the school of Rimsky-Korsakov, to whose memory he dedicated his "Funeral Chanté"

In this respect Stravinsky has a country, and to which he is indebted for his rare talent and its development. Whether Stravinsky is aware that he is a Russian composer, to our great regret, we are no longer sure. That is why Nestiev spoke so bitterly about him as a musician who ought to think more often of his great teacher, and of his father, Feodor Stravinsky—a Russian singer of genius, who named his son Igor after that fearless and renowned Russian prince who was the hero of Borodin's opera.

With Shostakovich and Stravinsky, around whom involuntarily my article centers, I should like to include another remarkable Russian composer, well known in the United States, Sergei Prokofieff, whose work at present focuses the attention of music critics: Two operas now in performance at the Leningrad theatres—"War and Peace" after the famous novel by Leo Tolstoy, and "The Duenna" after Sheridan's play; and two ballets, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Cinderella."

Prokofieff is one of the foremost Soviet composers and is very popular. However, this does not mean that his work is not the subject of controversy. Yet I am sure he would feel deeply annoyed if even one of the articles of critical comment on his works reflected the same bias as did Nestiev's article on Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony.

We are not accustomed to look upon criticism of art, no matter how severe it may be, as a means of censuring the author but as a creative stimulus; and the numerous facts that bespeak this can hardly be ignored in study of the musical life of the Soviet Union.

On The Record—

Shoshtakovich Ninth Gets Double Play

Shoshtakovitch's Victory Symphony (No. 9) gets two nods from the major manufacturers this week. The Russian modernist went all the way back to Haydn as a starting place for this one, and paused long among the 19th Century romantics before he completed the five movements.

Efrem Kurtz and the New York Philharmonic in Columbia Set 688 bear down harder on the victoriousness. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1134 linger more lovingly in the neo-classic and late romantic atmospheres.

* * *

Two of the younger top-flight American violinists display their wares in two disparate concertos. Isaac Stern, with the backing of Kurtz and the New Yorkers, has himself a field day in Wieniawski's romantic No. 2 in Columbia's Set 656. Yehudi Menuhin cracks a tougher nut in Bela Batrok's concerto. With the able assistance of the Dallas Orchestra, he gets most of the meat from this one in RCA-Victor Set 1120. But you've got to help, too, especially when they go into 9-8 time.

* * *

Getting a little tired of romantic saccharine? Don't feel quite up to wandering in atonal mazes? What you're looking for is some Bach and Handel. Koussevitsky and his Bostonians give performances which long should stand as definitive of Bach's Brandenberg Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 in RCA-Victor Set 1118. Eugene Normandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra do an Ormandy arrangement of Handel's Water Music in Columbia Set X-279. Both sets are as refreshing as long drinks of icy water on a hot day.

* * *

The Farm Security Administration's documentary movie, "The Plow that Broke the Plains," broke a lot of records for honest and beautifully effective movie making back in the 30's. One of its greatest assets was its musical score by Virgil Thompson. Now Leopold Stokowski and the Hollywood Bowl Symphony give an effective reading of the earthy music in RCA-Victor Set 116.

Also new: Horowitz applies his metronomic fingers to three Mendelssohn pieces including the wedding march in RCA-Victor Set 1121 . . . The Boston Pops Orchestra in RCA-Victor Set 1119 lushes up that Chopin medley to which Les Sylphides is danced . . . Piatigorsky resins his most lyric bow for a go at a half dozen Russian melodies, among them "None But the Lonely Heart," in Columbia Set 684 . . . What sounds like an assortment of all the types of chairborne Air Force men get together for a performance of Marc Blitzstein's Airborne Symphony in RCA-Victor Set 1117. They run up the engines all right, but somebody seems to have forgot to take the chock from under the wheels.—D.L.

PROGRAM

◆

Thompson "The Testament of Freedom," for Men's Voices with Orchestra

Finale: Lento tranquillo

The Princeton University Glee Club
J. Merrill Knapp, Conductor

The Princeton University Chapel Choir
Carl Weinrich, Conductor

Bach Suite No. 3 in D major, for Orchestra

I. Overture
II. Air
III. Gavotte I; Gavotte II
IV. Bourrée
V. Gigue

Brahms Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

INTERMISSION

Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro

SUN
JUL 3 - 1947

1872 ANVIL CHORUS JUST CLINKS NOW

Boston, July 3 (A. P.).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's hopes of approaching the noise made by the city's Anvil Chorus of 1872 fell short by 198 anvils last night. The idea was to obtain a chorus of 20,000 singers to compare with those of the World Peace Jubilee and International Music Festival of nearly three-quarters of a century ago. Only thirty-eight registered for the chorus.

The audience, estimated by the police at 34,000, and Arthur Fielder's musicians made a brave try as voices were raised in rendition of the Anvil Chorus from Verdi's "Il Trovatore," but their efforts were nothing as compared to the jubilee, which had 20,000 choristers and red-shirted Boston firemen beating 200 anvils. Last night there were two anvils.

Meeting, Feb. 26, Of S[illegible] Friends

The S[illegible] Friends of the Boston S[illegible] Orchestra, will hold its annual meeting in Symphony Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 26, at 4 P. M. Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends, will address the meeting. There will be a special program of music arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, and afterwards Mr. Koussevitzky will receive the members at tea in the upper foyer. It is still possible to become a friend of the Boston Symphony by mailing a contribution to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

NEWARK, N.J.
NEWS
1947

Princeton to Hear Boston Symphony

Concert June 15 Is Feature for Closing Program of Bicentennial

PRINCETON — Serge Koussevitszky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert June 15 in Princeton University's new $2,000,000 Herbert Lowell Dillon Gymnasium as part of Princeton's final four-day bicentennial celebration series which will begin with the dedication of the gymnasium June 14 and close with an address by President Truman June 17.

Featured on the program will be Beethoven's Third "Eroica" Symphony in E-flat and the finale of "The Testament of Freedo posed for the Thomas Jeffe centennial in 1943 by Thompson, American comp member of Princeton's of music.

Assisting the 106-piec in "The Testament of choral setting for orc choir of four texts of Th ferson will be an 80-voice from the Princeton Glee C the University Chapel Choir leadership of their direc Merrill Knapp and Carl W

Marking the first time th gymnasium has been used f public event, the program also will include J. S. Bach's Number 3 in D Major" fo estra and Grahms's Festival Overture," is expe attract an audience of 3,000, including represe from 450 educational inst and societies all over the

---

NEWS
JUL 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today [illegible] he was married yesterd[illegible] secretary of the last [illegible] Olga Naumoop, 4[illegible]

CHICAGO
HERALD-AMERICAN
JUL 16 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Marries

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

[175]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JUL 3 - 1947

The New Records

Handel's 'Concerti Grossi' Complete—Ravel by Muench—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

One of the immemorial promises of the phonograph to its votaries has finally been fulfilled, if not by the company which originally made it. It was Decca which asserted, pre-war, that it would do the twelve "Concerti Grossi" of Handel; but that it has finally been accomplished by Columbia can be nothing but an additional pleasure for the listener. Especially since Adolf Busch and his fine Chamber Music Players are the custodians of a trust faithfully protected.

It is hard to think of another segment of the greater musical literature—one has no claim at all to calling it part of the repertory—which has so long languished for want of proper treatment. The start made by Decca (in inferior recordings) covered but half of the twelve works; and independent efforts added little to this sum. It is much as though a dozen plays by Shakespeare long known to exist in manuscript were finally offered to the public in a form that any one with an interest could claim for his own.

Perhaps to give a proper gloss of scholarship to this notice I should cite a movement from this or that obscure concerto which would whet the appetite of the listener. All I can say, however, is that if the mere idea of this incomparable music being available in recorded form is not sufficient, no words of mine could add to its appeal.

There is more legitimate reason for considering the suitability of Busch and his players to this music, for the fact that they have done some superb Bach (the suites and Brandenburg concerti) is no guarantee of an equal feeling for Handel. However, the music flows irresistibly from the first disk to the last, with a fitness and flexibility altogether cherishable. What is most precious is the feeling that the players are actually taking part in the experience rather than obeying the directions of an "inspired" conductor. The strings are beautifully reproduced, and the value of the whole is much enhanced by an informative booklet by Emanuel Winternitz of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. (Columbia Album 685, parts 1, 2 and 3).

Ravel by Muench.

One of the notable events of the last music season—Charles Muench's conducting of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe"—is available now from English Decca, in a recording whose splendor compels, again, the admiration which has become something of a formula. As long as the issues are of this quality, however, it is a formula which can yield nothing but satisfaction to the listener. In distinction to previous American issues, Muench includes all the music of the ballet, as arranged in Suites I and II by Ravel (the first suite has not been available here before in recorded form).

Muench conducts the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, which is not noted as a virtuoso ensemble in the American tradition, but it plays with enormous spirit and technical address in this album, and a kind of finesse in the solo woodwinds that beggars praise. Moreover, though the recording was apparently made in France (in any case, not in the London hall associated with English Decca), it has the magnificent range and faithfulness characteristic of FFRR. I do not relish placing an additional burden on already strained purses, but the fact is neither the ~~Koussevitzky~~ nor the Rodzinski versions is in the class of this, as performance or recording. (ED. Album No. 29).

The Lighter Side.

If you've wondered what has become of the celesta in jazz, since Tommy Dorsey made his notable record of "I'll Never Smile Again" and Meade Lux Lewis created his "Celesta Blues," you can find it employed by Page Cavenaugh on his trio's recording of "Heartbreakin'." Lloyd Pratt is content with the bass here and Al Viola clings to his guitar, as usual, but Cavenaugh's neat manipulation of the keys and chimes is what makes the disk listenable. Overside, they are heard in a more customary vein, doing a quietly confidential vocalization of "Walkin' My Baby Back Home." (Victor 20-2246).

DAYTON, O.
HERALD
JUL 5 - 1947

Boston Orchestra Plays Bach Suites

Two of Bach's Suites have been recorded for Victor by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. They are ~~Suite No.~~ 2 in B minor and Suite No. 3 in D.

Victor gives an album to modern violin transcriptions played by Jascha Heifetz with Emanuel Bay at the piano. Among composers represented are Bax, Poulenc, Ravel, Debussy, Nedtner, Rachmaninoff and Halfftner.

Gladys Swarthout sings pleasing songs for Victor. Among the selections are "Falling in Love With Love" by Rodgers and Hart; "You're Everywhere" by Edward Heyman and Vincent Youmans; "September Song" by Maxwell Anderson and Kurt Weill.

Marian Anderson sings the Columbia Thomas "Oh! Men From the Fields" and Hook's "Bright Phoebus" on a single disc. Jeanette MacDonald accompanied by the RCA orchestra sings a single record for Victor which carries "My Name Is Mimi" from Puccini's "La Boheme" and "One Fine Day" from Madame Butterfly.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
JUL 6 - 1947

SHOSTAKOVICH: SYMPHONY NO. 9, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. RCA ~~Victor Set DM~~-1134. Six 12-inch sides.

RCA Victor's version of Dimitri Shostokovich's gayest and most exuberant symphony, of which the composer said "musicians will delight in playing it and critics delight in lambasting it," is by the orchestra which introduced it to America. It was first played in this country at the Berkshire festival on July 25 last year by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra.

Most listeners, I think, will agree with me in preferring the Columbia version by Efrem Kurtz and the New York Philharmonic which came out last month, too, and was reviewed here last Sunday. Mr Koussevitzky tries too hard to make dramatic music out of what is intended to be joyous and witty. The result is that the sound of the orchestra is harsh and sharp while the playing of the New Yorkers is mellow and pleasant, and manages better to capture the buoyant spirit of the work. Mr. Koussevitzky, too, by taking it at a faster clip, especially the second slow movement, gets the symphony on one less disc than does Mr. Kurtz.

In each case, the recording itself is excellent.

HANDEL: WATER MUSIC—SUITE, The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. Columbia, Set MX-279. Four 12-inch sides.

This is Mr. Ormandy's arrangement of six sections he has selected from the 20 that Handel wrote in 1717 to entertain King George I of England one night as his royal barge floated down the Thames.

Try playing it on a balmy summer evening and you'll find it pleasant listening. Even a little light conversation won't spoil the effect. Good recording.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
JUL 6 - 1947

Album of Bach Concertos Faithful to Composer's Aim

By Col. L. R. Boals

The concerto of Bach's time was not a display piece fo a solo instrument accompanied by orchestra, but was writter for two groups of instruments—usually a quartette of sol instruments against the main body of strings. Example are the six Brandenburg Concertos, written by Bach for th eccentric Margraf of Brandenburg, who collected concerto as one might collect stamps.

Each of the six concertos was written for a different group of instruments. There is no evidence that the Margraf ever heard them, and the value placed upon them at the auction of his effects was no more than a few cents.

A year ago, RCA Victor released the third and fourth of these concertos played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky. They were recorded by the orchestra at its theater at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., during the Berkshire Music Festival. At that time the orchestra also recorded the No. 2, in F, and the No. 5, in D, and RCA Victor now releases these two recordings in the four-12-inch disk set DM-1118.

This recording employs an orchestra with a complement of instruments approximating the size of the orchestra used in Bach's time; so, for those who like the music of Bach played as it should be, Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provide superb musical fare.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD
JUL 6 - 1947

Permanent

BACH: BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS NOS. 2 AND 5—Soon the music capital of America will again be Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., where Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra present the Berkshire festival. Whether you can or can't be at Tanglewood, you may hear the Bostonians playing there on records, as in the superb disk performance of the Brandenburg concertos No. 2 in F and 5 in D. The former is the news-maker, for it features Roger Voisin playing the concertino part on a nine-inch 20-ounce D flat brass trumpet, an instrument beyond all but the most gifted instrumentalists. Featured, too, in this excellent Bach set are flautist Georges Laurent, oboist Fernand Gillet, pianist Lukas Foss and violinist Richard Burgin. Brilliant recording. (Victor)

SIBELIUS: FOURTH SYMPHONY—We admire the candor of Bridgeport musicologist Paul Affelder, who in the notes that come with the records acknowledges that of the Sibelius symphonies "the last of the seven that will win acclaim will be the Fourth." And he is right as well as honest, for the starkness and gloom of the work can satisfy only the famed Finn's fans, who understand their man. The majority, which prefers the First, Second and Fifth, will nevertheless admit that the No. 4 is typical of the homeland of the composer and that its strength is effectively projected by the N. Y. Philharmonic musicians under Artur Rodzinski. Good recording. (Columbia)

LEO MILLER.

JUL 6 1947

New Records:

Koussevitzky and Associates Issue Some More Select Bach

By HUBERT ROUSSEL

Some unusually fine treatments of the music of J. S. Bach by the eminently qualified Boston Symphony are now coming from the presses of Victor.

Those who may have acquired the happy recordings of the Brandenburg concertos Nos. 2 and 5, recently noted with enthusiasm in this column, are now offered an equally tempting exploration of two Bach suites by the same company of players, again directed with felicitous style by Serge Koussevitsky.

From the four suites, Koussexitzky selects No. 2 in B Minor and No. 3 in D Major. There is a considerable contrast in weight, texture and aim in these numbers of Bach, the third suite being a brighter, more forward and showier work than the other, though the B Minor is just as wonderfully wrought in its more subdued, circumspect style.

This difference is exploited fully in these splendid interpretations, which reveal the virtuosic abilities of the Boston ensemble employed in a moment of inspiration. George Laurent, the solo flute, is a brilliant contributor, but the whole performance is marked by superior savor and spirit.

The recordings were made in Lennox, Mass., summer home of the Boston orchestra, where one might expect, perhaps, a little less than the famous acosutical niceties of its regular hall. However, no such difference is to be detected in these plates, which offer fine balance, volume and resonance.

The album, Victor's DM-1123, is a nourishing issue for select cabinets.

. . .

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
ILL. STATE REGISTER
JUL 1 4 1947

TeeNews

Handsome baritone Gordon MacRae is a rabid Dodger fan. . . . New Jersey's Marcella Roy of Tranquility and Robert Wheaton of Bridgeton have been chosen as delegates to the Northeastern Older Youth Conference to be held at Jackson's Mill, W. Va. . . . Students registering at Bergen Junior college and Berkshire Hills School for Girls revealed that they were very opposed to the new longer hemline. Out of 500 registrants polled the ratio was about 5 to 1 in favor of retaining shorter skirts. . . . Iowa State college predicts another housing problem for fall. There are more than 500 unfilled requests for apartments from married couples and single men.

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
JUN 5 - 1947

Boston Symphony Plans to Perform at Princeton

PRINCETON, N. J., June 5 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will perform Dr. Randall Thompson's "Testament of Freedom," in conjunction with an 80-voice chorus of the Princeton University Glee Club in the university's new two million dollar Herbert Lowell Dillon gymnasium on June 15.

The program will be the first public event to be held in the gymnasium, and is expected to draw an audience of about 3,000, including 450 educators from all over the world. The performance will be part of a four-day program concluding Princeton's bicentennial year.

Other works scheduled for the program include Bach's Suite No. 3 in D major, Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

WOOSTER, OHIO
RECORD
JUL 9 - [illegible]

One Man's Opinion

BY WALTER KIERNAN

It is surprising to find Petrillo still shaping the musical future of the nation . . . Many thought he was repealed by the last Congress.

Little Caesar now is fighting chain broadcasting of music . . . He wants to fix it so that Toscanini can visit every local station in a station wagon.

The present schedule reads: December . . . Musicians stop making records, January . . . Musicians stop making chain broadcasts, February . . . Musicians stop making money.

Fortunately Jimmy has no control over soap opera or John would have to have another wife in every broadcast city.

Twenty years ago the AFM leadership was fighting talking pictures . . . Petrillo demonstrates that he is the logical successor to that brilliant leadership.

Somehow he's got the idea that if the Boston symphony could be held to Boston there would be a brighter future ahead in Peoria for Willy Kiddle and his six fiddles.

This Clipping From
ALTON, ILL.
TELEGRAPH
JUL 1 6 1947

Conductor Koussevitzky Marries His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor ~~of the Boston~~ Symphonk Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's [illegible] who died in 1942.

The [illegible] at the [illegible] "Saranac," at Len[illegible] Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pas[illegible] Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JUL 1 6 19[illegible]

Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
JUL 10 1947

RECORDED MUSIC

Shostakovich Lacks Depth In His Music

BY WALTER A. HANSEN,
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

Serge Koussevitzky likens Dmitri Shostakovich to Beethoven. In 1942 he said: "Shostakovich is the bright torch of the Russian people and its creative forces—inexhaustible as the earth itself. That is why his music is so overwhelming and human and can be compared with the universality and humanism of Beethoven's genius, which, like that of Shostakovich, was born in an epoch of world-shattering events. His esthetics may be considered equal to the esthetics of Beethoven."

When Dr. Koussevitzky expresses a conviction concerning the ability of a composer, the world of music pricks up its ears and listens with rapt attention. One should bear in mind, however, that Shostakovich's works have called forth opinions which do not tally with the view held by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Graf, who for many years was the Nestor of the music critics in the Vienna of pre-Hitler days, admires the light and sure hand of Shostakovich "more than the head that coined the ideas." "Even the greatest formal constructions of Shostakovich," says Graf, "the most complicated rhythms and the most liberal harmony motions are masterful engineering art and elegant mathematical formulas rather than profound and serious experience. In the music is more spirit of a technical age than poetic, emotional and expressive power" ("Modern Music," Philosophical Library, New York, 1946).

Only the Spirit

Another statement from the pen of Graf is, I believe, worthy of the most serious attention. The able critic writes: "The depth of great art does not exist for one moment in the work of Shostakovich, only the spirit, the colored robe and the sparkling flexibility of virtuosity."

My own appraisal of Shostakovich's music is identical with that expressed by Graf. I like to listen to the prolific young Russian's works, and I marvel at his phenomenal skill; but I find little emotional depth in what he has written.

Even though I cannot join in Dr. Koussevitzky's fulsome eulogy of the most profusely advertised composer in the history of music, I do admire the great conductor's expositions of the nimble-witted Russian's symphonies. His reading of Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 9, Op. 70" (RCA Victor Album 1134) is magnificent in every detail. Furthermore, the recording is of the best.

Premiere in 1945

Shostakovich completed his "Ninth" in 1945. The premiere took place in November of that year in Leningrad under Eugene Mravinsky, and the first performance in America was presented July 25, 1946, at Tanglewood.

Many of those who know Shostakovich's "Seventh" and "Eighth" are convinced that the two works are as longwinded as they are fascinating. The "Ninth" is much shorter. In it the Russian gives free play to his wit and his cleverness. There are traces of neo-classicism in the music. The more I listen to the "Ninth," the more I wonder whether Shostakovich tried to write a symphony which might vie in substance and in popularity with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Maybe this is a wicked and utterly baseless thought. If it is founded on truth, I, for one, believe that Prokofieff walks away with the crown.

Scoring Given

The "Ninth" is scored for two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, triangle, bass drum, cymbals, military drum, tambourine and strings.

In an album entitled "Gladys Swarthout Sings Popular Song Favorites" (RCA Victor Album 1127 the well-known mezzo-soprano with Russ Case and his orchestra is heard in Richard Rodgers' "Falling in Love with Love," Vincent Youman's "You're Everywhere" Kurt Weill's "September Song" Edmund Gouldings "The Love Song My Heart Is Singing," Cole Porter's "In the Still of the Night" and Don Raye's "I'll Remember April."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 13 1947

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

COLUMBIA is to be felicitated on its publication of Handel's Twelve Concerti Grossi performed by the Busch Chamber Players under the direction of Adolf Busch. The players constituting the concertino are Adolf Busch and Ernest Drucker, violins; Hermann Busch, cello, and Mieczyslaw Horzowski, harpsichord. Issued in three albums, the concerti occupy forty-nine twelve-inch sides; the fiftieth is given over to Geminiani's Siciliana from the Sonata in C minor set forth by Adolf Busch and Artur Balsam, pianist. A pamphlet containing program notes by Emanuel Winternitz and a copy of Thomas Hudson's portrait of the composer accompanies the set.

Hearing all twelve of these astounding varied works successively has renewed this writer's unbounded admiration and affection for these magnificent products of Handel's genius. The performances are rewarding in every way; Mr. Busch brings to his conceptions a true insight into Handel's style: incandescent intensity, exuberance, tenderness and nobility permeate and vitalize these performances. The recording, tonally regarded, is full-bodied, and the record surfaces, aside from crackling noises on a few of them, are satisfactory.

Shostakovitch's Ninth

Both Columbia and Victor have put forth versions of Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony. The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, directed by Efrem Kurtz, plays the work for Columbia and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, for Victor. In the end movements of this symphony the Russian composer expresses himself with a flippant banality which exceeds all other tendencies in this direction in his earlier products; in the slow movement, he makes a tour of the nineteenth century with Berlioz and Liszt as his panoramic highlights.

Of the two interpretations, Mr. Koussevitzky's is preferable because of quicker pacing, which permits the inclusion of the first movement on the record side and makes it possible to include the entire work on three twelve-inch disks. Columbia's recording, which requires four twelve-inch disks, is, however, mechanically superior to Victor's, because of its consistent transparency of sound and relatively smooth surfaces as opposed to the fuller sounding but more diffused tonal values and often noisy surfaces of the latter's.

Another Columbia set holds Isaac Stern's effective unfolding of Wieniawski's Second Violin Concerto in D minor with the assistance of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra directed by Efrem Kurtz. Good recording.

Decca Imported Recordings

Quite as striking in its reproduction of the actual sounds of the instruments as was the Condin Decca recording of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite i sthe recording of the performance of both the first and second suites from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Orchestra de la Societe of Paris under the discerning leadership of Charles Muench. This is the first time that both of these suites have been issued in a single album.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 is performed by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra, Boyd Neel, conductor. The excellent solo trumpeter, George Eskdale, did similar service for Columbia some years ago when that organization published its recording of all six Brandenburg Concerti. The other solo players in this well-recorded performance are Frederick Grinke, violinist; Arthur Cleghorn, flutist, and Evelyn Rothwell, oboist.

On a single twelve-inch disk, Kathleen Ferrier, contralto, sings "Oh Rest in the Lord" and "Woe Unto Them," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," accompanied by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra. Miss Ferrier's voice is unusually persuasive in texture and skillfully produced. Her taste and musicianship are flawless. This singer has been engaged to appear here under the direction of Bruno Walter in Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next season and her work in these arias indicates that her qualifications are of a kind which should enable her to give an affecting interpretation of Mahler's touching music.

With the London Philharmonic Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a telling traversal of Weber's "Freischuetz" Overture. Here again the veracity and sensuousness of sound attained in the recording process are remarkably impressive. Similarly good results are noticeable in the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slav," by the National Symphony conducted by Anatole Fistoulari.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH
JUL 17 1947

Mozart Opera To Be Given

"Idomeneo," often described as one of the greatest operas by Mozart, but hitherto unheard in this country, will be produced at Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Western Massachusetts.

The opera is being prepared by the Berkshire Music Center, the school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this the orchestra' summer home at Lenox where th Berkshire festival, conducted b Serge Koussevitzky, will still be i progress. Boris Goldovsky, head c the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center will direct an conduct the performance.

The opera will be performe twice, in the Theatre-Concert Ha at Tanglewood, on Monday ar Wednesday evenings, August 4 ar 6. Admision will be by invitatic to the friends of the Berkshi Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomene King of Crete" in 1780, for tl Court Opera in Munich, in h 24th year. It is, in the opinion Mozart authorities, his greate "Opera Seria" or classical grai opera, and this opinion is bor out by Mozart's devotion to h task and his pride in the result explained in his letters to h father at the time.

Difficulties which have stood the way of performances "Idomeneo" are the length and ii volved character of the librett and the absence of printed part which have never been publishe (the engraved plates of the fu score were destroyed in the bomb ing of Leipzig.) "Idomeneo" ha been performed in Central Europ on several occasions, and twic freely edited for such perform ances—by Wolf-Ferrari and b Richard Strauss. These difficultie will be met in Tanglewood by th copying of the complete parts, an by the editing of the score fo practical uses by Boris Goldovsky the director of the opera depart ment of the Berkshire Music Cen ter. Mr. Goldovsky has brough the opera to performable lengtl by omitting extraneous subplots ii the original text of the Abb Varesco, shortening the recitatives and re-ordering scenes for the sak of dramatic continuity. In doing this he has scrupulously respectec Mozart's score, and in cutting, ha sacrificed none of its great moments. The part of Idamante, written for a castrato, has not been transposed, and will be sung by a soprano. The opera will be given in the original Italian.

Idomeneo, the King of Crete, returning from the Trojan Wars, according to Greek legend, narrowly escapes shipwreck, and in gratitude to the god Neptune promises to sacrifice the first person whom he shall meet on the shore of Crete. That person proved to be his son, Idamante. In dismay, the king tries to send Idamante away from the island to safety, but the gods proclaim that Idomeneo shall abdicate, and Idamante and his bride Ilia shall reign in his stead.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JUL 17 194

Enesco, Stravinsk Hannikainen Sign To Lead Symphon

Three guest-conductors Geo Enesco, Igor Stravinsky and T Hannikainen have been engage the National Symphony Associa to lead the orchestra during its series of concerts this coming se in Constitution Hall. Dr. H Kindler, who has been conducto the orchestra since its organiza 17 years ago, will direct the jority of the concerts.

Mr. Enesco, who is considered of the greatest musicians of present day, will appear both on Wednesday and Sunday series. "Roumanian Rhapsody in A Ma is one of the most popular wo in the orchestral repertoire of country. The Paris Opera gav premiere to his four-act lyr tragedy "Oedipus Rex" in 1938. Enesco is besides, a violinist of tinction and appeared here in capacity several times in the p

A native of Finland, Mr. Han kainen is assistant conductor of Chicago Symphony, appointed that post by Artur Rodzinski, has a high opinion of his abil Both of the young conductor's p ents were music teachers and tered the talent of their three s who formed a trio and concert through Finland and Continen Europe. Mr. Hannikainen was honor student at the Sibelius Ac emy in Helsinki. He was sent the Finnish government to country nine years ago to cond a special concert commemorat the landing of the first Finnish tlers in America. Later he retur to the United States at an invita of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to c duct the Boston Symphony in C negie Hall, New York, in Boston Brooklyn, and became perman conductor of the Duluth Symph a post he held until joining Chicago Symphony.

Mr. Stravinsky has made his h in Beverly Hills, Calif., since In the past he visited the Un States many times, one of these ing at the invitation of the Bos Symphony Orchestra to assist the celebration of its 50th an versary.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
JUL 17 194

Koussevitzky wed

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Kousvitzky, 73-year-old conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, closed yesterday that he was m ried Friday to his secretary of past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof

---

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
JUL 17 1947

Conductor Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 17—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old co ductor of the Boston Symphony o chestra, disclosed today that he w married yesterday to his secretar of the last 18 years, Miss Olg Naumoff, 46.

WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
JUL 14 1947

OVERFLOW CROWD

LENOX, Mass. July 13—(AP)—Some 2,000 persons filled the Tanglewood Concert Hall to overflowing today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 1947 Berkshire Festival with an all-Bach program.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretar

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP) Serge Koussevitky, seventy-thr conductor of the Boston Symphc Orchestra, and Miss Olga N moff, forty-six, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

TIMES HERALD
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky Marries Again

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP). Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 20 1947

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE Berkshire Festival gets under way in real earnest this week. There has been activity at Tanglewood ever since the Berkshire Music Centre opened there three weeks ago and there have already been two Bach programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall. But this Thursday there will be the first of the eleven concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the famous Shed, with general admission being sold to members of the public who want to hear the program from the shady lawns of the Lenox estate.

The festival will continue for three successive week-ends. It includes more concerts than in the past and there is little doubt that it will attract larger crowds than ever. An all-Mozart program will be presented this afternoon in the smaller auditorium. It will be repeated Tuesday night. This week, too, the students of the Berkshire Music Centre will start giving orchestral and choral concerts and on Aug. 4 and 6 the opera department will present Mozart's "Idomeneo."

First of Three Week-End Programs to Be Given at Tanglewood Thursday

---

AURORA, ILL.
BEACON-NEWS
JUL 17 1947

Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

This Clipping From NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
JUL 10 1947

RECORDED MUSIC

Shostakovich Lacks Depth In His Music

BY WALTER A. HANSEN,
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

Serge Koussevitzky likens Dmitri Shostakovich to Beethoven. In 1942 he said: "Shostakovich is the bright torch of the Russian people and its creative forces—inexhaustible as the earth itself. That is why his music is so overwhelming and human and can be compared with the universality and humanism of Beethoven's genius, which, like that of Shostakovich, was born in an epoch of world-shattering events. His esthetics may be considered equal to the esthetics of Beethoven."

When Dr. Koussevitzky expresses a conviction concerning the ability of a composer, the world of music pricks up its ears and listens with rapt attention. One should bear in mind, however, that Shostakovich's works have called forth opinions which do not tally with the view held by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Graf, who for many years was the Nestor of the music critics in the Vienna of pre-Hitler days, admires the light and sure hand of Shostakovich "more than the head that coined the ideas." "Even the greatest formal constructions of Shostakovich," says Graf, "the most complicated rhythms and the most liberal harmony motions are masterful engineering art and elegant mathematical formulas rather than profound and serious experience. In the music is more spirit of a technical age than poetic, emotional and expressive power" ("Modern Music," Philosophical Library, New York, 1946).

Only the Spirit

Another statement from the pen of Graf is, I believe, worthy of the most serious attention. The able critic writes: "The depth of great art does not exist for one moment in the work of Shostakovich, only the spirit, the colored robe and the sparkling flexibility of virtuosity."

My own appraisal of Shostakovich's music is identical with that expressed by Graf. I like to listen to the prolific young Russian's works, and I marvel at his phenomenal skill; but I find little emotional depth in what he has written.

Even though I cannot join in Dr. Koussevitzky's fulsome eulogy of the most profusely advertised composer in the history of music, I do admire the great conductor's expositions of the nimble-witted Russian's symphonies. His reading of Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 9, Op. 70" (RCA Victor Album 1134) is magnificent in every detail. Furthermore, the recording is of the best.

Premiere in 1945

Shostakovich completed his "Ninth" in 1945. The premiere took place in November of that year in Leningrad under Eugene Mravinsky, and the first performance in America was presented July 25, 1946, at Tanglewood.

Many of those who know Shostakovich's "Seventh" and "Eighth" are convinced that the two works are as longwinded as they are fascinating. The "Ninth" is much shorter. In it the Russian gives free play to his wit and his cleverness. There are traces of neo-classicism in the music. The more I listen to the "Ninth," the more I wonder whether Shostakovich tried to write a symphony which might vie in substance and in popularity with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Maybe this is a wicked and utterly baseless thought. If it is founded on truth, I, for one, believe that Prokofieff walks away with the crown.

Scoring Given

The "Ninth" is scored for two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, three trombones tuba, kettledrums, triangle, bass drum, cymbals, military drum, tambourine and strings.

In an album entitled "Gladys Swarthout Sings Popular Song Favorites" (RCA Victor Album 1127 the well-known mezzo-soprano with Russ Case and his orchestra is heard in Richard Rodgers' "Falling in Love with Love," Vincent Youman's "You're Everywhere" Kurt Weill's "September Song" Edmund Gouldings "The Love Song My Heart Is Singing," Cole Porter's "In the Still of the Night" and Don Raye's "I'll Remember April."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 13 1947

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

COLUMBIA is to be felicitated on its publication of Handel's Twelve Concerti Grossi performed by the Busch Chamber Players under the direction of Adolf Busch. The players constituting the concertino are Adolf Busch and Ernest Drucker, violins; Hermann Busch, cello, and Mieczyslaw Horzowski, harpsichord. Issued in three albums, the concerti occupy forty-nine twelve-inch sides; the fiftieth is given over to Geminiani's Siciliana from the Sonata in C minor set forth by Adolf Busch and Artur Balsam, pianist. A pamphlet containing program notes by Emanuel Winternitz and a copy of Thomas Hudson's portrait of the composer accompanies the set.

Hearing all twelve of these astounding varied works successively has renewed this writer's unbounded admiration and affection for these magnificent products of Handel's genius. The performances are rewarding in every way; Mr. Busch brings to his conceptions a true insight into Handel's style: incandescent intensity, exuberance, tenderness and nobility permeate and vitalize these performances. The recording, tonally regarded, is full-bodied, and the record surfaces, aside from crackling noises on a few of them, are satisfactory.

Shostakovitch's Ninth

Both Columbia and Victor have put forth versions of Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony. The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, directed by Efrem Kurtz, plays the work for Columbia and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, for Victor. In the end movements of this symphony the Russian composer expresses himself with a flippant banality which exceeds all other tendencies in this direction in his earlier products; in the slow movement, he makes a tour of the nineteenth century with Berlioz and Liszt as his panoramic highlights.

Of the two interpretations, Mr. Koussevitzky's is preferable because of quicker pacing, which permits the inclusion of the first movement on the record side and makes it possible to include the entire work on three twelve-inch disks. Columbia's recording, which requires four twelve-inch disks, is, however, mechanically superior to Victor's, because of its consistent transparency of sound and relatively smooth surfaces as opposed to the fuller sounding but more diffused tonal values and often noisy surfaces of the latter's.

Another Columbia set holds Isaac Stern's effective unfolding of Wieniawski's Second Violin Concerto in D minor with the assistance of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra directed by Efrem Kurtz. Good recording.

Decca Imported Recordings

Quite as striking in its reproduction of the actual sounds of the instruments as was the Condin Decca recording of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite i sthe recording of the performance of both the first and second suites from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Orchestra de la Societe of Paris under the discerning leadership of Charles Muench. This is the first time that both of these suites have been issued in a single album.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 is performed by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra, Boyd Neel, conductor. The excellent solo trumpeter, George Eskdale, did similar service for Columbia some years ago when that organization published its recording of all six Brandenburg Concerti. The other solo players in this well-recorded performance are Frederick Grinke, violinist; Arthur Cleghorn, flutist, and Evelyn Rothwell, oboist.

On a single twelve-inch disk, Kathleen Ferrier, contralto, sings "Oh Rest in the Lord" and "Woe Unto Them," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," accompanied by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra. Miss Ferrier's voice is unusually persuasive in texture and skillfully produced. Her taste and musicianship are flawless. This singer has been engaged to appear here under the direction of Bruno Walter in Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next season and her work in these arias indicates that her qualifications are of a kind which should enable her to give an affecting interpretation of Mahler's touching music.

With the London Philharmonic Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a telling traversal of Weber's "Freischuetz" Overture. Here again the veracity and sensuousness of sound attained in the recording process are remarkably impressive. Similarly good results are noticeable in the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slav," by the National Symphony conducted by Anatole Fistoulari.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH
JUL 17 1947

Mozart Opera To Be Given

"Idomeneo," often described as one of the greatest operas by Mozart, but hitherto unheard in this country, will be produced at Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Western Massachusetts.

The opera is being prepared by the Berkshire Music Center, the school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this the orchestra' summer home at Lenox where th Berkshire festival, conducted b Serge Koussevitzky, will still be i progress. Boris Goldovsky, head c the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center will direct an conduct the performance.

The opera will be performe twice, in the Theatre-Concert Ha at Tanglewood, on Monday ar Wednesday evenings, August 4 ar 6. Admision will be by invitatic to the friends of the Berkshi Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomene King of Crete" in 1780, for tl Court Opera in Munich, in h 24th year. It is, in the opinion Mozart authorities, his greate "Opera Seria" or classical gra opera, and this opinion is bor out by Mozart's devotion to h task and his pride in the result explained in his letters to h father at the time.

Difficulties which have stood the way of performances "Idomeneo" are the length and i volved character of the librett and the absence of printed part which have never been publishe (the engraved plates of the fu score were destroyed in the bomb ing of Leipzig.) "Idomeneo" ha been performed in Central Europ on several occasions, and twic freely edited for such perform ances—by Wolf-Ferrari and b Richard Strauss. These difficultie will be met in Tanglewood by th copying of the complete parts, an by the editing of the score fo practical uses by Boris Goldovsky the director of the opera depart ment of the Berkshire Music Cen ter. Mr. Goldovsky has brough the opera to performable lengt by omitting extraneous subplots i the original text of the Abb Varesco, shortening the recitatives and re-ordering scenes for the sak of dramatic continuity. In doin this he has scrupulously respecte Mozart's score, and in cutting, ha sacrificed none of its great moments. The part of Idamante, written for a castrato, has not been transposed, and will be sung by a soprano. The opera will be given in the original Italian.

Idomeneo, the King of Crete, returning from the Trojan Wars, according to Greek legend, narrowly escapes shipwreck, and in gratitude to the god Neptune promises to sacrifice the first person whom he shall meet on the shore of Crete. That person proved to be his son, Idamante. In dismay, the king tries to send Idamante away from the island to safety, but the gods proclaim that Idomeneo shall abdicate, and Idamante and his bride Ilia shall reign in his stead.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JUL 17 1947

Enesco, Stravinsky, Hannikainen Sign To Lead Symphony

Three guest-conductors Georges Enesco, Igor Stravinsky and Tauno Hannikainen have been engaged by the National Symphony Association to lead the orchestra during its two series of concerts this coming season in Constitution Hall. Dr. Hans Kindler, who has been conductor of the orchestra since its organization 17 years ago, will direct the majority of the concerts.

Mr. Enesco, who is considered one of the greatest musicians of the present day, will appear both on the Wednesday and Sunday series. His "Roumanian Rhapsody in A Major" is one of the most popular works in the orchestral repertoire of this country. The Paris Opera gave a premiere to his four-act lyrical tragedy "Oedipus Rex" in 1938. Mr. Enesco is besides, a violinist of distinction and appeared here in this capacity several times in the past.

A native of Finland, Mr. Hannikainen is assistant conductor of the Chicago Symphony, appointed to that post by Artur Rodzinski, who has a high opinion of his ability. Both of the young conductor's parents were music teachers and fostered the talent of their three sons, who formed a trio and concertized through Finland and Continental Europe. Mr. Hannikainen was an honor student at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki. He was sent by the Finnish government to this country nine years ago to conduct a special concert commemorating the landing of the first Finnish settlers in America. Later he returned to the United States at an invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to conduct the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, New York, in Boston and Brooklyn, and became permanent conductor of the Duluth Symphony, a post he held until joining the Chicago Symphony.

Mr. Stravinsky has made his home in Beverly Hills, Calif., since 1940. In the past he visited the United States many times, one of these being at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to assist in the celebration of its 50th anniversary.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky weds

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed yesterday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
[illegible] 7 1947

Conductor Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 17. [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that [illegible] married yesterday to his [illegible] of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
JUL 14 1947

OVERFLOW CROWD

LENOX, Mass. July 13—(AP)—Some 2,000 persons filled the Tanglewood Concert Hall to overflowing today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened [illegible] Berkshire Festival with an all-Bach program.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitky, seventy-three, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, forty-six, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky Marries Again

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP). Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in [illegible]

[illegible] was performed at [illegible] estate, "Saranac," [illegible] by the Rev. J. [illegible] pastor of the Con[illegible] Church on the Hill in [illegible] p.m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 20 1947

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

First of Three Week-End Programs to Be Given at Tanglewood Thursday

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE Berkshire Festival gets under way in real earnest this week. There has been activity at Tanglewood ever since the Berkshire Music Centre opened there three weeks ago and there have already been two Bach programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall. But this Thursday there will be the first of the eleven concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the famous Shed, with general admission being sold to members of the public who want to hear the program from the shady lawns of the Lenox estate.

The festival will continue for three successive week-ends. It includes more concerts than in the past and there is little doubt that it will attract larger crowds than ever. An all-Mozart program will be presented this afternoon in the smaller auditorium. It will be repeated Tuesday night. This week, too, the students of the Berkshire Music Centre will start giving orchestral and choral concerts and on Aug. [illegible] the opera department [illegible] Mozart's "Idomeneo."

[illegible] BEACON-NEWS
JUL 17 1947

Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by The Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

This Clipping From NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 17 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 20 1947

REICHHOLD FORMS NEW MUSIC AGENCY

Assails Eastern Booking Units for 'Monopolistic Practices' and Boycott of Detroit

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, July 19—Henry H. Reichhold, wealthy Detroit chemical manufacturer, who is a leading sponsor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and the Detroit Music Hall, today announced the formation of his own concert booking agency to combat what he termed the monopolistic practices of eastern bureaus.

Mr. Reichhold admitted that several of the eastern bureaus, which he charged engage in "restrictive and financially ruinous" tactics, are boycotting the Detroit Music Hall. He named specifically Arthur Judson's Columbia Concerts, Inc., and the National Concert and Artists Corporation.

"Because of my decision to fight rather than to yield to what amounts to an artistic dictatorship, these bureaus are withholding from the Music Hall artists whom I should have gladly signed to appear with the symphony," Mr. Reichhold declared.

He objected to the eastern bureaus' "package deals," whereby in order to get an artist desired, several have to be accepted. He also resented the practice of making the Middle West and other areas pay "through the nose" for artists who play for relatively small fees in New York.

Smaller Fees Charged

Mr. Reichhold explained that Columbia and NCAC, to build up the reputations of their artists, book them with the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and other major orchestras for a fraction of the fee demanded from Detroit, Indianapolis, Chicago and other western cities.

"I think I'm making those people a little nervous," Mr. Reichhold said. "I'm frankly presenting a rebellious attitude. We've got a record company (Vox) which soon will be producing recordings of our symphony and our recitalists on low-cost, unbreakable plastic records."

He declared that no name had been given to his booking agency, and he did not list any stars who might be under contract to it.

"But," Mr. Reichhold added, "we're bringing in excellent artists for whom I know we won't need to apologize. I do recognize that our transition from big-name stars has been a bit abrupt, but it's a step that we had to take in order to begin building up a more free and more brilliant musical center in Detroit."

Judson Calls Charges "Stupid"

Arthur Judson, president of Columbia Concerts, at his home in White Plains, N. Y., last night described Mr. Reichhold's charges as "stupid." Neither the charge of a boycott of Detroit nor that of "package deals" was true, he said. In reply to the statement that artists were booked for less money with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he asked Mr. Reichhold to name the artists.

"Columbia Concerts and the National Concert and Artists Corporation have been in the business a long time," he said. "They are doing a good job. If there was anything wrong, it would have shown a long time ago. As for Mr. Reichhold's going into the business, he's welcome. The more the merrier."

Marks Levine, director of the National Concert and Artists Corporation's concert division, was at his summer home in Connecticut for the week-end and could not be reached for comment.

The prospectus of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra's forthcoming season reached New York several days ago. It listed the soloists engaged and explained the choice of some comparative unknowns as a matter of policy.

The best known of the artists engaged are Witold Malcuzynski and Guiomar Novaes, pianists, and Ruggiero Ricci and Jacques Thibaud, violinists. None of the four is managed by either of the two big concert bureaus named. The lesser known artists, for the most part, are also managed by smaller bureaus. They are Andor Foldes, Leonard Shure, Leo Nadelman and Rudolph Reti, pianists; Georges Miquelle, 'cellist; Dirk Van Emmerik, oboist, and Eva Likova, coloratura soprano.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JUL 21 1947

Record Sales:

More Discounts Available . . . Sources for Special Buys

By MILTON ANSEL

Phonograph record sales have dropped considerably since Spring, with the result that record sources are beginning to offer discounts more openly, a survey by PM reveals. One reason for the slump is the usual Summer decline, worse this year than last, according to some dealers. Another reason is an evident resistance to high prices in general; and records, as luxury items, were bound to be hit.

Some stores give a flat 10 to 20 per cent reduction. Others have "Record Clubs" that give a free record for every 10 purchased. In another variation, classical albums in good condition are accepted as trade-ins. A number of neighborhood appliance stores, whose principal stock consists of popular records, are closing out their record departments because of the slump.

Market Close To Saturation

According to some dealers, the record market is close to saturation. If this is so, competition is bound to become keener and price-cutting more widespread. Record companies are reaching out for trade by filling in their catalogs and reissuing old numbers. Decca took a significant step recently when it began to make a 50c popular record, first of the big manufacturers to go below 60c since the war.

The following sources offer special values in records at the present time:

nx emont Ave., near ng out record decent off list prices.

ular and classical attan

61 Greenwich St.,

near Cortlandt St. Used playable classical albums 30 per cent off original list; takes trade-ins of classical albums in playable condition, allowing 6 per cent of original list toward albums.

RECORD COLLECTORS EXCHANGE W. 48th St., near Ave. of Amer. Sells two-record Victor albums (inch classical) for $1.75, 60c bel regular price. Titles include Beethoven Leonore Overture (Toscanini, Resphigi The Birds (Monteux), Ravel Daphnis and Chloe (Koussevitsky) and Brahms Alto Rhapsody (Marian Anderson and Monteux). Single 12-inch classical records (orchestral, vocal, instrumental, etc.) regularly $1.05 are 75c here.

20% off on Single Records

BRYANT PARK MUSIC SHOP, 55 W. 42d St. (store No. 17, Sixth Ave. Subway Arcade). All single records and albums 20 per cent off list prices. All permanent-type needles are 30 per cent off list. Has good stock popular music, fair stock classical.

GOODY DISTRIBUTING CORP., 853 Ninth Ave., near 55th St. Used classical albums in good condition 30 to 35 per cent off original list prices. Empty 10-inch albums, three and four pockets, at 5c each; limit 20 to a customer. These were made for particular sets, and have descriptive covers.

Queens

EMERGENCY RADIO HOSPITAL, 45-19 47th St., Woodside, near Greenpoint Ave. Closing out all single records and albums (mostly 10-inch records) at from 25 to 40 pe rcent off list prices.

LEWIN RECORD OUTLET, 45-53 45th St., Woodside, near Greenpoint Ave. Closing out Parlaphone English-pressed 10-inch swing records at 79c; these were $1.50. Artists include Harry James, Artie Shaw, Mildred Bailey, Duke Ellington, Benny Goodman. Jazz albums (10-inch records) are 10-15 per cent off list prices here. $8. Better-quality snakeskin bags

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
JUL 21 1947

Koussevitzky Isn't Raising Potatoes in the Berkshires

By ROBERT WAHLS

the Hutchinson River Parkway and the Merritt to U. S. Route 7. Follow Route 7 to Lenox, Mass., iles from Manhattan you'll find Tanglewood, site
kshire Music Festival, where Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is NOT raising f welcoming 425 emnposers, vocalists and lists from 40 states eign countries, George estra manager, reminded gsters that their profesareers would be a titanic tween art and commercial-

'll find yourselves a com-the market," he said, oes."
sevitzky listened quiet-sound advice from a e music wars and then wn epilogue. "A com-may become," he t potatoes—nevaire!"
battle cry of this er school has become evaire!"
d is a lovely 210-acre to the Boston Sym-
936 by two Boston
Irs. Mary Aspinwall
Mrs. Andrew Hepburn.
a hot weather haven
estra, the early con-held in a huge side ched on the lawn.

on the Roof.

e first season's con-Koussevitzky found eting with the roar of ent roof. Most of the s sweeping down Tyrey broke into crese tent, drowning even rited all-Wagner con-
8 the 6,000-seat music
ilt. In it the Berk-Festival will open
th an expected over-e of 6,000 to 7,000
the lawn.
nglewood, in addition where acoustics are isteneres within a city
s, has a Theatre Con-r opera and small or-ing 1,200. There is Chamber Music Hall
Your reporter caught ry all-Bach afternoon rt hall last week. A out 1,500 picnicked on the grass and license plates in the parking lot indicated they had come from all over the East and Middle West.

The Center school for aspiring music makers, largely financed by the Festival, runs for six weeks, the last three are concurrent with the Festival winding up on Aug. 10. The students are hand picked and many of them, their tuition paid by scholarship, work at odd jobs to pay their board.

The aspiring Traubels, Toscaninis, and whatnot sweat out the Summer under such eminent taskmasters as conductors Koussevitzky, and Leonard Bernstein, choral trainers Robert Shaw and Hugh Ross, composers Aaron Copland and Arthur Honneger, and opera commentator Boris Goldovsky of the sibilant Met Opera intermission delivery.

Honegger Gets Star Billing.

This season's star attraction is probably 55-year-old August Arthur Honegger, the Swiss-French composer, on leave from Paris and the Montmartre. Old friend Koussevitzky drafted the composer of "Le Roi David" and "Pacific 231" for service at Tanglewood. There his particular pet is a course in advanced composition for nine students, four of them ex-GIs.

Like most Europeans, this chubby cheerful musician is gorging himself, this second visit to the U. S., on citrus fruits. He greeted a reporter recently with an old fashioned lemon squeezer in his hand. "We have had no fresh fruit in France," he said, "and I'm adding a lemon a day to my diet until I get up to 12 a day. Then I'll taper off. It's a cure." Honegger didn't say for what.

Although most of the Center's students are from New York and New England, some have come from Greece, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Sweden, Palestine, Australia, Canada and South America to justify Dr. Kossevitzky's contention that a musician doesn't have to go to Europe to get "finished."

Most of the girls are billeted at the Lenox School, an Episcopal prep school for boys during other seasons. The boys live for the most part at Tracy Hall, a red sandstone mansion of many turrets built in 1892 by George Hall Morgan, first cousin of the late J. P. Morgan. The ghosts of society dowagers would wince to see the double decker bunks which fill the once luxurious bedrooms. The dining room and library are a cafeteria. And lone pianos furnish the other salons, now rehearsal halls.

The Berkshire Music Center and its annual festival are dreams come true for Serge Koussevitzky. He considers them America's long-delayed answer to the monopolies held by European festivals at Salzburg in Austria and Bayreuth, Germany. Plans for the future include expansion in all departments and perhaps an added drama festival.

Cupped in the Berkshires, Tanglewood is certainly worth a spot on your New England weekend or vacation schedule. And don't forget, picnic parties on the lawn are welcome. If Bach gives you indigestion—there's always Beethoven!

Serge Koussevitzky Rewed.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
JUL 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds; Leads Boston Orchestra

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at Koussevitzky's estate at Lenox, Mass.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's former wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said that not even his friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

Symphony Leader, Secretary Marry

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
17 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (INS)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, world- med conductor of the Boston mphony orchestra, revealed to- y his marriage to his secretary 18 years, Miss Olag Nauoof, 46, ece of his deceased first wife.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JUL 22 1947

To Give U. S. Premiere of Mozart Opera at Tanglewood

Idomeneo, often described as one of the greatest operas by Mozart, but hitherto unheard in this country, will be produced next month at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., where the Berkshire Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky will still be in progress.

The opera is being prepared by the Berkshire Music Center's opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldowsky, who will conduct the two performances, on Monday and Wednesday, Aug 4 and 6, in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. The settings will be designed by Richard Rychtarik. Admission will be by invitation only to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. A voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constitutes membership in the organization.

Mozart wrote his Idomeneo, King of Crete in 1780, for the Court Opera in Munich, in his 24th year. It is, in the opinion of Mozart authorities, his greatest Opera Seria or classical grand opera.

Difficulties which have stood in the way of performances of Idomeneo are the length and involved character of the libretto, and the absence of printed parts, which have never been published. The opera has been performed in Central Europe on several occasions, and twice freely edited for such performances—by Wolf-Ferrari and Richard Strauss. These difficulties will be met in Tanglewood by the copying of the complete parts, and by the editing of the score for Goldowsky has brought the opera to performable length by omitting extraneous subplots in the original text of the Abbe Varesco, shortening the recitatives, and reordering scenes for the sake of dramatic continuity. In doing this he has scrupulously respected Mozart's score, and in cutting, has sacrificed none of its great moments. The part of Idamante, written for a castrato, has been transposed, and will be sung by a soprano. The opera will be given in the original Italian.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION
JUL 17 1947

Noted Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16, (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

[178]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JUL 17 1947

The first domestic recording of music from Glazounoff's ballet, "Raymonda," features recent orchestral releases (RCA Victor four 12-inch disks); it is played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

The story of an unwelcome knight seeking the hand of a castle's lady already betrothed, it is 19th-century romantic ballet music with warm melodies and charming, animated "set" numbers for ballet solos and ensembles, such as the Dance of the Pages and Young Girls, the Valse Fantastique and the Grand Adagio. Though first given in 1898, the ballet had its American premiere only in March, 1946. The present recording is excellent.

PROKOFIEFF BALLET

Music from the second Suite which Serge Prokofieff made from his full-length ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor (RCA Victor, two 12-inch disks.) The episodes are "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," "Dance" and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave." The first section has bold writing in open harmonies, while the Dance has a touch of irony, and the final episode is deeply tragic.

The entire Suite No. 2 has been recorded on six disks, with the composer conducting the Moscow State Philharmonic (Disc).

SCHUMANN'S FOURTH

Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor is given a well-proportioned, admirably clear reading by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra conducted by Eugene Goossens (RCA Victor, three 12-inch disks).

Schumann's Fourth, employing the cyclic form to some extent, is generally regarded as his best symphony. The present reading, while perhaps not having the subtleties of that by Bruno Walter and the London Symphony, compares favorably with those by Ormandy and the

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 20 1947

REICHHOLD FORMS NEW MUSIC AGENCY

Assails Eastern Booking Units for 'Monopolistic Practices' and Boycott of Detroit

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, July 19—Henry H. Reichhold, wealthy Detroit chemical manufacturer, who is a leading sponsor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and the Detroit Music Hall, today announced the formation of his own concert booking agency to combat what he termed the monopolistic practices of eastern bureaus.

Mr. Reichhold admitted that several of the eastern bureaus, which he charged engage in "restrictive and financially ruinous" tactics, are boycotting the Detroit Music Hall. He named specifically Arthur Judson's Columbia Concerts, Inc., and the National Concert and Artists Corporation.

"Because of my decision to fight rather than to yield to what amounts to an artistic dictatorship, these bureaus are withholding from the Music Hall artists whom I should have gladly signed to appear with the symphony," Mr. Reichhold declared.

He objected to the eastern bureaus' "package deals," whereby in order to get an artist desired, several have to be accepted. He also resented the practice of making the Middle West and other areas pay "through the nose" for artists who play for relatively small fees in New York.

Smaller Fees Charged

Mr. Reichhold explained that Columbia and NCAC, to build up the reputations of their artists, book them with the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and other major orchestras for a fraction of the fee demanded from Detroit, Indianapolis, Chicago and other western cities.

"I think I'm making those people a little nervous," Mr. Reichhold said.
a rebelliou record com will be p our symph on low-cos records."

He decla been given and he did might be u

"But,"
"we're brin for whom to apologiz our transiti has been step that w to begin b and more in Detroit.'

Judson C

Arthur J
lumbia Co
White Pla described M as "stupid.'
a boycott
"package d
In reply t artists wer with the N
Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he asked Mr. Reichhold to name the artists.

"Columbia Concerts and the National Concert and Artists Corporation have been in the business a long time," he said. "They are doing a good job. If there was any-

---

The New Forstman
New and

Pier

S i a n

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 21 1947

Record Sales:

More Discounts Available . . . Sources for Special Buys

By MILTON ANSEL

Phonograph record sales have dropped considerably since Spring, with the result that record sources are beginning to offer discounts more openly, a survey by PM reveals. One reason for the slump is the usual Summer decline, worse this year than last, according to some dealers. Another reason is an evident resistance to high prices in general; and records, as luxury items, were bound to be hit.

Some stores give a flat 10 to 20 per cent reduction. Others have "Record Clubs" that give a free record for every 10 purchased. In another variation, classical albums in good condition are accepted as trade-ins. A number of neighborhood appliance stores, whose principal stock consists of popular records, are closing out their record departments because of the slump.

Market Close To Saturation

According to some dealers, the record market is close to saturation. If this is so, competition is bound to become keener and price-cutting more widespread. Record companies are reaching out for trade by filling in their catalogs and reissuing old numbers. Decca took a significant step recently when it began to make a 50c popular record, first of the big manufacturers to go below 60c since the war.

The following sources offer special values in records at the present time:

Bronx

CIRY, 394 E. Tremont Ave., near Webster Ave. Closing out record department at 20 per cent off list prices. Stock includes popular and classical music, all labels.

Manhattan

CHESTERFIELD, 161 Greenwich St., near Cortlandt St. Used playable classical albums 30 per cent off origina list; takes trade-ins of classical album in playable condition, allowing 6 per cent of original list toward n albums.

RECORD COLLECTORS EXCHANGE W. 48th St., near Ave. of Amer. Sells two-record Victor albums (inch classical) for $1.75, 60c bel regular price. Titles include Beethoven Leonore Overture (Toscanini), Respighi The Birds (Monteux), Ravel Daphnis and Chloe (Koussevitsky) and Brahms Alto Rhapsody (Marian Anderson and Monteux). Single 12-inch classical records (orchestral, vocal, instrumental, etc.) regularly $1.05 are 75c here.

20% off on Single Records

BRYANT PARK MUSIC SHOP, 55 W. 42d St. (store No. 17, Sixth Ave. Subway Arcade). All single records and albums 20 per cent off list prices. All permanent-type needles are 30 per cent off list. Has good stock popular music, fair stock classical.

GOODY DISTRIBUTING CORP., 853 Ninth Ave., near 55th St. Used classical albums in good condition 30 to 35 per cent off original list prices. Empty 10-inch albums, three and four pockets, at 5c each; limit 20 to a customer. These were made for particular sets, and have descriptive covers.

Queens

EMERGENCY RADIO HOSPITAL, 45-19 47th St., Woodside, near Greenpoint Ave. Closing out all single records and albums (mostly 10-inch records) at from 25 to 40 pe rcent off list prices.

LEWIN RECORD OUTLET, 45-53 45th St., Woodside, near Greenpoint Ave. Closing out Parlaphone English-pressed 10-inch swing records at 79c; these were $1.50. Artists include Harry James, Artie Shaw, Mildred Bailey, Duke Ellington, Benny Goodman. Jazz albums (10-inch records) are 10-15 per cent off list prices here. $8. Better-quality snakeskin bags

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 21 1947

Koussevitzky Isn't Raising Potatoes in the Berkshires

By ROBERT WAHLS

Take the Hutchinson River Parkway and the Merritt Parkway to U. S. Route 7. Follow Route 7 to Lenox, Mass., and 141 miles from Manhattan you'll find Tanglewood, site of the Berkshire Music Festival, where Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is NOT raising potatoes.

By way of welcoming 425 embryonic composers, vocalists and instrumentalists from 40 states and 14 foreign countries, George Judd, orchestra manager, reminded the youngsters that their professional careers would be a titanic battle between art and commercialism. "You'll find yourselves a commodity on the market," he said, "like potatoes."

Dr. Koussevitzky listened quietly to this sound advice from a veteran of the music wars and then added his own epilogue. "A commodity you may become," he purred, "but potatoes—nevaire!" And so the battle cry of this year's Summer school has become "Potatoes—nevaire!"

Tanglewood is a lovely 210-acre estate given to the Boston Symphony in 1936 by two Boston Brahmins, Mrs. Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Andrew Hepburn. Designed as a hot weather haven for the orchestra, the early concerts were held in a huge side show tent pitched on the lawn.

Rain on the Roof.

During the first season's concerts Poobah Koussevitzky found himself competing with the roar of rain on the tent roof. Most of the thunderstorms sweeping down Tyringham Valley broke into crescendo over the tent, drowning even the most spirited all-Wagner concerts. In 1938 the 6,000-seat music shed was built. In it the Berkshire Music Festival will open Thursday with an expected overflow audience of 6,000 to 7,000 listening on the lawn.

Today Tanglewood, in addition to the shed where acoustics are perfect for listeneres within a city block's radius, has a Theatre Concert Hall for opera and small orchestra seating 1,200. There is also a small Chamber Music Hall holding 300. Your reporter caught a preliminary all-Bach afternoon in the concert hall last week. A crowd of about 1,500 picnicked on the grass and license plates in the parking lot indicated they had come from all over the East and Middle West.

The Center school for aspiring music makers, largely financed by the Festival, runs for six weeks, the last three are concurrent with the Festival winding up on Aug. 10. The students are hand picked and many of them, their tuition paid by scholarship, work at odd jobs to pay their board.

The aspiring Traubels, Toscaninis, and whatnot sweat out the Summer under such eminent taskmasters as conductors Koussevitzky, and Leonard Bernstein, choral trainers Robert Shaw and Hugh Ross, composers Aaron Copland and Arthur Honneger, and opera commentator Boris Goldovsky of the sibilant Met Opera intermission delivery.

Honegger Gets Star Billing.

This season's star attraction is probably 55-year-old August Arthur Honegger, the Swiss-French composer, on leave from Paris and the Montmartre. Old friend Koussevitzky drafted the composer of "Le Roi David" and "Pacific 231" for service at Tanglewood. There his particular pet is a course in advanced composition for nine students, four of them ex-GIs.

Like most Europeans, this chubby cheerful musician is gorging himself, this second visit to the U. S., on citrus fruits. He greeted a reporter recently with an old fashioned lemon squeezer in his hand. "We have had no fresh fruit in France," he said, "and I'm adding a lemon a day to my diet until I get up to 12 a day. Then I'll taper off. It's a cure." Honegger didn't say for what.

Although most of the Center's students are from New York and New England, some have come from Greece, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Sweden, Palestine, Australia, Canada and South America to justify Dr. Kossevitzky's contention that a musician doesn't have to go to Europe to get "finished."

Most of the girls are billeted at the Lenox School, an Episcopal prep school for boys during other seasons. The boys live for the most part at Tracy Hall, a red sandstone mansion of many turrets built in 1892 by George Hall Morgan, first cousin of the late J. P. Morgan. The ghosts of society dowagers would wince to see the double decker bunks which fill the once luxurious bedrooms. The dining room and library are a cafeteria. And lone pianos furnish the other salons, now rehearsal halls.

The Berkshire Music Center and its annual Festival are dreams come true for Serge Koussevitzky. He considers them America's long-delayed answer to the monopolies held by European festivals at Salzburg in Austria and Bayreuth, Germany. Plans for the future include expansion in all departments and perhaps an added drama festival.

Cupped in the Berkshires, Tanglewood is certainly worth a spot on your New England weekend or vacation schedule. And don't forget, picnic parties on the lawn are welcome. If Bach gives you indigestion—there's always Beethoven!

OUIS, MO.
DISPATCH

JUL 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Rewed.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW YORK
PM

JUL 22 1947

To Give U. S. Premiere of Mozart Opera at Tanglewood

Idomeneo, often described as one of the greatest operas by Mozart, but hitherto unheard in this country, will be produced next month at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., where the Berkshire Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky will still be in progress.

The opera is being prepared by the Berkshire Music Center's opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldowsky, who will conduct the two performances, on Monday and Wednesday, Aug 4 and 6, in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. The settings will be designed by Richard Rychtarik. Admission will be by invitation only to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. A voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constitutes membership in the organization.

Mozart wrote his Idomeneo, King of Crete in 1780, for the Court Opera in Munich, in his 24th year. It is, in the opinion of Mozart authorities, his greatest Opera Seria or classical grand opera.

Difficulties which have stood in the way of performances of Idomeneo are the length and involved character of the libretto, and the absence of printed parts, which have never been published. The opera has been performed in Central Europe on several occasions, and twice freely edited for such performances—by Wolf-Ferrari and Richard Strauss. These difficulties will be met in Tanglewood by the copying of the complete parts, and by the editing of the score for Goldowsky has brought the opera to performable length by omitting extraneous subplots in the original text of the Abbe Varesco, shortening the recitatives, and reordering scenes for the sake of dramatic continuity. In doing this he has scrupulously respected Mozart's score, and in cutting, has sacrificed none of its great moments. The part of Idamante, written for a castrato, has been transposed, and will be sung by a soprano. The opera will be given in the original Italian.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JUL 17 1947

The first domestic recording of music from Glazounoff's ballet, "Raymonda," features recent orchestral releases (RCA Victor four 12-inch disks); it is played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

The story of an unwelcome knight seeking the hand of a castle's lady already betrothed, it is 19th-century romantic ballet music with warm melodies and charming, animated "set" numbers for ballet solos and ensembles, such as the Dance of the Pages and Young Girls, the Valse Fantastique and the Grand Adagio. Though first given in 1898, the ballet had its American premiere only in March, 1946. The present recording is excellent.

PROKOFIEFF BALLET

Music from the second Suite which Serge Prokofieff made from his full-length ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor (RCA Victor, two 12-inch disks.) The episodes are "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," "Dance" and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave." The first section has bold writing in open harmonies, while the Dance has a touch of irony, and the final episode is deeply tragic.

The entire Suite No. 2 has been recorded on six disks, with the composer conducting the Moscow State Philharmonic (Disc).

SCHUMANN'S FOURTH

Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor is given a well-proportioned, admirably clear reading by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra conducted by Eugene Goossens (RCA Victor, three 12-inch disks).

Schumann's Fourth, employing the cyclic form to some extent, is generally regarded as his best symphony. The present reading, while perhaps not having the subtleties of that by Bruno Walter and the London Symphony, compares favorably with those by Ormandy and the

---

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

JUL 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds; Leads Boston Orchestra

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at Koussevitzky's estate at Lenox, Mass.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's former wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said that not even his friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

JUL 17 1947

Koussevitsky, 73, Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, 73, world-famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, revealed today his marriage to his secretary of 18 years, Miss Olag Nauoof, 46, niece of his deceased first wife.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

Symphony Leader, Secretary Marry

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

JUL 17 1947

Noted Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16, (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

[178]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 20 1947

Music Festival Reaches Height In Berkshires

Koussevitzky to Conduct 4 Concerts This Week; Bernstein Next Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Mozart program today at 3:30 and next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the Berkshire Music Center's Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The first regular subscription series of the Berkshire Festival, Series A, will be held next Thursday and Saturday night at 8:15 and Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in Tanglewood's Music Shed. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the first two of these concerts, and Leonard Bernstein the third. The programs are:

Today, 3:30, and Tuesday, 8:30, Theater-Concert Hall: Mozart's Serenade for Winds (K. 361); Symphony No. 41, in C (Jupiter); Symphony No. 26, in E flat, and Divertimento for Strings and Horns (K. 287).

Thursday, 8:15, Music Shed: Symphony for Strings, Honegger; La Mer, Debussy; Symphony No. 2, Brahms.

Saturday, 8:15, Music Shed: Overture to "The School for Scandal," Barber; Symphony No. 3, Copland; Symphony, Harold in Italy, Berlioz (viola solo, William Primrose).

Sunday, July 27, 3:30, Music Shed: Leonard Bernstein conducting; Overture to "The Magic Flute," Mozart; Le Sacre du Printemps, Stravinsky; Symphony No. 7, in C major, Schubert.

The orchestra will give public rehearsals next Saturday morning and the two following Saturdays at 10 o'clock for the benefit of its Pension Fund. All seats have been sold for this afternoon, but general admission is still available.

The Berkshire Music Center has scheduled the following events for this week:

Tuesday, 4:30, Orchestra, Department 3, Richard Burgin conducting.

Wednesday, 8:15, Juilliard String Quartet: American program, Quartet No. 3, Schuman; Two Pieces for String Quartet, Copland; Quartet, Harold Shapero (first performance).

Thursday, 4:30, Choral Concert, Department 5.

Friday, 8:30, Orchestra, Department 2, Leonard Bernstein conducting.

The Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center will give the first performances in this country of Mozart's opera "Idomeneo, Re di Creta" at Tanglewood on Monday and Wednesday nights, Aug. 4 and 6, under the conductorship and stage direction of Boris Goldovsky. Richard Rychtarik is designing the sets. The cast and orchestra will consist of the center's students. Admission to these performances and the other programs of the center is open by invitation to subscribing members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Tuesday evening, July 29, there will be a special program titled "Music for All" at 8:30 in the Music Shed, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony and Ella Goldstein, Palestinian pianist, as soloist in Tchaikovsky's concerto in B flat minor. Part of the program will be played by this orchestra both on the stage and in recordings made at various periods of its career from 1915 on. This will be prefaced by a program of excerpts from film with scores by contemporary composers in the Theater-Concert Hall at 7 o'clock.

As already announced, the concerts of the Festival's Series B, Thursday and Saturday nights, July 31 and Aug. 2, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3, will be devoted to Beethoven's music. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct an extra Beethoven concert including the eighth and ninth symphonies on Tuesday night, Aug. 5, at 7:30.

In Series C, Mr. Bernstein will conduct on Thursday night, Aug. 7; Robert Shaw will conduct a choral program Saturday night, Aug. 9, including Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and Mozart's Requiem, and Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the closing program on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10.

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH
AUG 14 1947

New Records---

A first recording of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet Suite No. 2 has been issued in a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky (RCA Victor DM-1129, two 12-inch records). This work was composed about 12 years ago after the composer ended his post-Societ exile in Russia.

It offers quite a contrast with the more romantic "Romeo and Juliet" music by Tschaikowsky, Gounod, Berlioz and others, abounding in the newer dissonances and noisinesses. Well played by t Boston and Koussevitzky, it w be interesting to modern mu fans.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
GAZETTE
AUG 14 1947

Ask The Gazette

A reader can get the answer to any question of fact by writing The Charleston Gazette Information Bureau, 316 Eye St., N. E., Washington 2, D. C. Please enclose three (3) cents for return postage.

Q. Does a racing swimmer get he most power from his hands or from his feet?—R. B.

A. A racing swimmer gets more power from his hands than he does from his feet.

Q. If a cut is made in the trunk of a tree at a certain height above ground, does this spot remain at he level as the tree grows or does t move higher up?—W. P.

A. The Forest Service says that given spot on the trunk of a tree does not rise higher from the round as the tree grows.

Q. Who were the parents of Brigam Young?—M. J. H.

A. Brigham Young was born at Whitingham, Vermont, of a well-nown colonial family. He was the on of John and Nabby (Howe) Young. His great-grandfather, Wilam Young, was a worshipper at he Old South Church, Boston; his randfather Joseph served as a hysician and surgeon in the rench and Indian Wars, and his ather fought with Washington in he Revolution.

Q. What proportion of a normal erson's weight is stored fat?—S. E.

A. In the normal individual aproximately one-sixth of the body weight represents stored fat.

Q. How many musicians compose he Boston Symphony Orchestra? —R. H.

A. In the season of 1946 there were 103 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Q. Does the FBI guard the President of the United States?—E. S. B.

A. The Federal Bureau of Investigation says that the protection of the President is the responsibility of the United States Secret Service and is not under the jurisdiction of the FBI.

Q. Who were the "Midnight Judges"?—K. A. R.

A. Just before President John Adams' term expired, Congress passed an act creating 23 new judicil judgeships and President Adams filled these offices having life tenure with members of his own party. The name alludes to their last-minute appointments.

Q. Are there serpents in the sea? —P. B. L.

A. Fishermen along the coasts of southern Asia, Australia, and the Pacific islands often pull up real "sea serpents" in their nets. These snakes are all poisonous.

Q. How many persons were killed in the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 70?—H. H. P.

A. Josephus reports that 1,100,000 Jews were killed and 97,000 made captives by the Romans. Whether this is an exaggeration or not cannot be definitely proved, but history records that the city was left in utter desolation.

Q. What State produces the most timber?—E. V. H.

A. Oregon, with a cut of 4,540,000,000 board feet in 1946 held its place as the leading state in timber production.

Q. Which came first, the Mayan or Aztec civilization?—V. A. R.

A. The Mayan civilization came first beginning about A. D. 200-600 The Aztecs did not enter the Valley of Mexico until about A. D. 1325.

Q. Into how many shares is the purse of a horse race divided?—H. H.

A. Purses are usually divided into four shares. The largest is given to the winner and the others diminish in amount so that the first four horses share in the total stake.

Q. How much of the paper collected during the war was gathered by school children?—C. W.

A. Out of the 25 million tons of paper obtained, it was estimated in 1946 that at least 2½ million tons had been collected by the schools.

Q. What is the proposed standard height for automobile bumpers?—C. T. E.

A. The new standards approved by the Automobile Manufacturers Association provide that bumpers should not rise above or extend below 18.25 inches on a normal stop.

Q. What is the correct width for a mourning band on a man's sleeve?—W. H. S.

A. Mourning bands should be three and one-quarter inches in width and should be sewn on half way between the elbow and the shoulder.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
NEWS
AUG 14 1947

Life In Soviet Union

Police In Orchestra

This is another of Paul W. Ward's articles in the series, "Life In The Soviet Union," reprinted from The Baltimore Sun.

By PAUL W. WARD

ALTHOUGH the nonverbal arts are not readily adaptable to Communist expression, musicians in the Soviet Union have not entirely escaped criticism for failure so to compose their scores as to inspire only Bolshevik emotions in the listening audience. Both Shostakovich and Prokofiev have recently felt the lash of official criticism to a degree which may have helped reverse their acceptance of invitations to visit the United States as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony.

Until last October, Soviet music had escaped the attention of the "thought police" who comprise the "propaganda and agitation" division of the Communist Party's central committee. Then, however, Culture and Life, the journal brought out last Summer to whip Soviet culture back into the paths of Communist ideological orthodoxy, cracked down on the sharps and flats boys.

SOUR NOTES

Shostakovich was one of the first hit. It was not the first time that he had been singled out for official attack. In 1936 his ballet, "Limpid Stream", and his "Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk" had incurred the displeasure of the party bosses who decide what is good for Russians to hear as well as what they shall eat, wear and make.

At that time, however, Shostakovich was criticized only on musical grounds; his music was assailed as cacophonous. Now the criticism is political. His latest, or Ninth, symphony was officially attacked in Culture and Life as showing ideological weakness and not reflecting the true spirit of the Russian people. It lacked "warm, ideological conviction" and revealed its author as under the influence of the self-exiled Igor Stravinsky, "an artist without a fatherland and without deep ethical principles."

Such attacks put Shostakovich and his music under a cloud; only an extraordinarily audacious concert or radio broadcast manager would, in their wake, include any of Shostakovich's recent works in a program for Soviet listeners. They do not, however, cost Shostakovich much more than mental anguish. He retains the apartment on Mozhaisk highway where he lives with two Steinway grands, his wife, Nina, a physicist specializing in cosmic-ray research, and their two children, Galina, 11, and Maxim, 9.

"TRIVIAL" JAZZ

The demands of the Communist hierarchy that music henceforth impart only the pure doctrine of Marx have not been addressed solely to composers of the stature of Shostakovich and Prokofiev. Even such musicians as Harlem-trained Eddie Rozner have had the Red light flashed in their faces. Rozner is director of the "Byelorussian State Jazz Band", which has been indicted for "triviality and banality" in its programs.

The Kremlin's cultural watchdogs have not yet reverted to their pre-war custom of embargoing jazz as "American slave music designed to lull the exploited masses into acquiescence." Their insistence, however, that in general Western music is an instrumentality of capitalism to be shunned lest it corrupt the dutiful souls of Soviet citizens is in sharp contrast with their propaganda outside the Soviet Union.

In truth, a rigorous campaign to keep American music and plays from the Russian masses has been under way since last Summer. Through such media as Culture and Life theater directors are warned that they will be guilty of "sabotage" if they include Western society plays in their repertoires. Russian theaters are organized on stock-company lines and the Communist Party's central committee ordered all of them last September to revise their programs.

They were directed to stop presenting merely "entertaining" plays or those which depicted the luxurious life of "czars, magnates and khans." Western society plays which take capitalism for granted and use "love themes aimed at sated and corrupt bourgeois tastes" were also put on the Kremlin's index expurgatorius.

SHAW STILL SHOWS

Plays by Britain's W. Somerset Maugham and by the Hungarian exile, Ferenc Molnar, who now lives in New York, were specifically banned. Those of the American playwright, Lillian Hellman, however, escaped the ban. It is still all right for a Soviet citizen to like Miss Hellman's "The Little Foxes" or almost any of George Bernard Shaw's plays, as well as those of Shakespeare, Lope de Vega, Sheridan and Calderon.

WATERLOO, IOWA
COURIER
AUG 14 1947

Charles City Boy Home From 1,000 Mile Bicycle Trip

(Courier Special Service)

Charles City, Ia.—Keith Young, son of Mr. and Mrs. Mark Young, and a student at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, has returned home after taking a 1,000 mile bicycle trip to Montreal, Quebec and the Gaspe penninsula, all in the Province of Quebec, Canada.

Accompanying him on the trip was a friend and classmate, Frank Gill, Sioux City. The two cyclists were the first to pedal all the way around Gaspe penninsula, Young stated. Others had made part of the trip by bicycle but took a truck through the most tortuous part of the penninsula.

The youths took a train from New Brunswick to Boston, Mass., and attended the Tanglewood music festival on the Berkshire mountains before returning to Iowa last Thursday with the Frank Huntsman family of Sioux City.

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

YORK —UP— Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed yesterday as he sailed on he liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he was married Friday at his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the past 8 years. She sailed with him.

The conductor said the wedding was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill n Lenox, at his estate. The bride s the niece of Koussevitzky's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky said he planned a trip rough several European counies to seek compositions written uring the war years.

Koussevitzky's first marriage ok place in Russia in 1905 when was a struggling young conctor. His wife, Natalya Konntinova Ouchkoff, was the ughter of a wealthy manufacer and helped to finance her sband's early concert tours.

Great Barrington, Mas
Courier
8/14/47

New Records Set at Music Festiva

Total Attendance of 145,00 Heard All Events

Interpretation of Ravel's "Bolero" b Boston Symphony Orchestra Unde Dr. Koussevitzky At Closing Co cert Draws Tremendous Applaus —Robert Shaw Gets Ovation.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the tenth Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a crowd of 12,000 present, which brought the total attendance for the concerts for the year to more than 106,000, a new record for the events. Counting the student concerts and the rehearsals, the total attendance this season was estimated by the directors at 145,000, a gain of 20,000 over last year.

The twelfth and final concert o the festival took place Sunday afternoon under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. It began with Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by Bohuslax Martinu, with Lukas Foss an Bernard Zighera, piano soloists. Wit a vigorous and brilliant opening, th pianos furnished a flashing filigre to the sharp harmonies of the orchestra. The cellos introduced the second movement with an interestin melody, the strings taking it later. I all was in striking scoring. A fast moving third movement with the pianos executing brilliant musica maneuvers in the grand manner, th orchestra playing superbly. M Martinu came down to the front o the auditorium to acknowledge th applause of the audience.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infant defunte" followed. It began softl with a haunting melody, subdued bu smoldering like an opal, with exquisite contrasts in strings an horns. It was a delicate lace o musical beauty with harp arabeques, Dr. Koussevitzky giving transparently beautiful reading o the score.

Ravel's famous "Bolero" concluded the first part of the program Opening with its ingratiating melod with the snare drum emphasizing th rhythm and gradually increasing i force, the same melody runs throughout the score in different instrument and reaches a tremendous climax wit full orchestra. It made a terrif impression and elicited great applause.

Tchaikovsky's great Symphony N 4 in F minor finished the program The symphony began with the triumphant melody of the brass. The followed the graceful melodies o the andantino with its beautifu quiet ending, followed by the exciting scherzo with pizzicato string The finale, fiery and full-bloode music played at a breath-takin pace and with tremendous verve b the orchestra, finished in a blaze o musical fireworks.

The audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and orchestra the usual farew ovation. The Berkshires can w thank Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and management for their efforts to ma Tanglewood the musical goal of t world. Greater things are expect as the years go by, and now we lo forward to the 1948 Berkshire Fesval.

The eleventh program of the fetival, Robert Shaw conducting, opeed Saturday evening with Bach Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil un die Kraft" for double chorus and ochestra. With no introduction proceeded on its stately way with majestic harmonies, the chorus singing with beautiful tone and precisio Symphony of Psalms for Orchetra and Chorus by Igor Stravinsk followed the Bach number. A highly dramatic work of great difficulty with striking effects with choru against the astringent harmonies o Stravinsky, there were lovely paages of flowing complex harmonie vigorous passages of flashing briliance by the orchestra, and wondeful singing by the chorus under M Shaw's brilliant direction.

After the intermission Mozart great Requiem Mass in twelve part was sung. Soloists were Fran Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, cotralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and Jam Pease, bass. Opening with a majetic orchestral introduction, the Mas unfolded Mozart's glorious music stunning choruses, richly harmonized with inspiring orchestral accompaniment. The soloists and choru gave a great performance and a ovation followed for Mr. Shaw an the assisting artists

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

AUG 14 1947

Tanglewood — BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand American, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

Eight Hours For One

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive —in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year— stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never —or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

Young, With Mature Tastes

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enriched a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

Joy of Free Participation

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright 1947, King Features Synd.)

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 1 - 1947

World of Music

NEW YORK — (UP) — Mozart's opera "Idomeneo" will be performed for the first time in America by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, of which Serge Koussevitzky is director.

The production will be directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky. Richard Rychtarik will design the sets. The orchestra and singers, as in the production of "Peter Grimes" last season, will consist of pupils of the Berkshire Music Center.

Two perfmances will be given during the last week of the festival on Monday and Wednesday evenings, Aug. 4 and 6. Admission will be by invitation to friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomeneo, King of Crete" in 1780, in his twenty-fourth year. It is considered by some one of his greatest works, but because of its length and the absence of printed parts, it has been performed only occasionally in Europe. Since no parts exist in America, a full set is being copied for the Tanglewood production.

American music needs consistent promotion and more frequent performances to achieve its proper place, in the opinion of Charles Adler, conductor of the Saratoga Music Festival which opens at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on Sept.6.

"We glorify all kinds of American things, from antiques and ancestors to hot dogs and chorus girls," Adler observed. "Why not take a little time out and glorify American culture? Let's give American music a chance to be heard."

Adler, who has a fondness for listing premieres on his programs, gave 43 first performances at the Saratoga Festival last year. He has about 30 this year.

"We will never develop a musical culture," Adler continued, "until we foster American music. We have a large body of men and women in this country today writing music in a rich and varied tradition and experimenting with the future. They cannot live, they cannot learn, they cannot grow unless their music is played.

"New music admittedly is controversial — especially that by Americans. Audiences are said to stay away from it, although it has been our experience that an audience not only accepts but enjoys the new when it is interestingly introduced.

"No audience should be asked to listen to 'all - American' programs. The listener should have variety, so that he may compare the present with the past. The composer should likewise be asked to measure his creative work against the accepted art of the past."

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 1 - 1947

Tanglewood Plans Opera for Monday

First Performance in U. S. of Mozart's "Idomeneo" to be Given by Berkshire Music Center.

The first performance in this country of Mozart's three-act opera, "Idomeneo," will be the highlight of the Berkshire Music center's season at Tanglewood, which opens Monday evening, when members of the center's opera department, directed by Boris Goldovsky, will present the pera which hitherto has been heard nly in Austria and Germany and nce in London. A second performnce will be given Wednesday eveing.

Joseph Laderoute will sing the itle role, while Elizaethb Ann Bolnger and Dorothy Dawson will alernate at the two performances in he part of Idamante. Nancy Trickey ill sing the part of the Princess ia of Troy, with Paula Lenchner as lettra and Frank Guarrera as the igh Priest of Neptune.

The libretto concerns the dilemma the king of Crete, who, grateful r escaping shipwreck, vows to ptune to sacrifice the first person meets on his own shore. Idaante, his own son, is the first to eet him, posing the problem ound which the opera revolves.

Admission to the two performces will be by invitation to the iends of the Berkshire Music cenr.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 1 - 1947

Students Concert For Tanglewood

Students of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will offer a concert in the festival shed this evening at 8.15. The concert will be conducted by students of Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, and his assistant, Dr. Stanley Chapple.

Officials of the Music Center announced yesterday the center will benefit by $8832 from the "Music for All" program presented Tuesday.

A second event scheduled for today is a concert this afternoon at 4.30 with a program of excerpts from six operas. The concert will be presented in the Theater Concert Hall.

The program for this evening's concert follows:—

"Overture to Fidelio" ... Beethoven
"Spirituals" .... Morton Gould
"2d Piano Concerto" .. Rachmaninoff
(Conducted by Dr. Chapple)

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG 1 - 1947

☆ COMING AND GOING ☆

WILLIAM S. PALEY, chairman of the board of CBS, and MRS. PALEY, who were married Monday in Manhasset, L. I., leave today aboard the S.S. Queen Elizabeth for a wedding trip in England and Europe.

JACK RYAN, manager of the press department in the central division of NBC, has left for Tanglewood, Mass., where he'll attend the Berkshire Music Festival, and then continue on to New York for conferences at the headquarters of the web.

Concerts Scheduled

New bookings for the coming musical season are being announced these days. On Nov. 4 the famous Philadelphia orchestra, directed by Eugene Ormandy, will return to the Milwaukee Auditorium under the local sponsorship of Margaret Rice.

The Boston orchestra will be unable to visit Milwaukee this season because the Auditorium cannot provide a date.

The Arion club, which annually sponsors the Bostonians, has announced its series of concerts as follows: Nov. 7, Rise Stevens, mezzo soprano; Jan. 29, Yehudi Menuhin, violinist; Feb. 21, Yolanda Petris, soprano; Apr. 4, the Arion chorus in Bach's B minor Mass; Apr 20, Artur Rubinstein, pianist. Outside the series the Arions will present the Don Cossacks chorus of Serge Jaroff Dec. 4; "Messiah" Dec. 16; and the junior concert May 22.

* * *

Lauretta Rossiter Cotton, Milwaukee organist, will play Aug. 24 at the national session of Sigma Alpha Iota society in Detroit.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 1 - 1947

Tanglewood Season Closes On August 10th

In the last week of the Tanglewood season that will close August 10, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances.

Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday evening, July 31, and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" in which Jacob Lateiner will be the soloist Saturday evening, August 2, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, August 3, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday, August 5, at the earlier hour of 7.30.

Joseph Battista will be the soloist Sunday and the Festival chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy," with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

For the last week-end, Leonard Bernstein will conduct on Thursday evening, August 7, Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Ruth Posselt, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No .2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday evening's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem," with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun is das Heil", and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, August 10 with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra, with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero," and Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 1 - 1947

7,500 Hear First Beethoven Concert

First Program in Series of Three Given at Tanglewood—Second Concert Scheduled Saturday.

Acclaimed by critics as a memorable performance, the first concert in Series B of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was heard by an audience of 7,500 persons last night, as the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offered the first of three concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven.

The 1st and 2nd symphonies delighted the throng in the music shed, but the greatest and most sustained applause came when the last notes of the 3rd symphony, "Eroica," faded away. The concentrated force of this opus offered a decided contrast to the simple melodies of the first part of the program, where Dr. Koussevitzky used a slightly reduced orchestra.

The second concert in the Beethoven cycle will be given Saturday evening, when the 4th and 5th symphonies and the piano concerto No. in E Flat major will be heard. The 6th and 7th symphonies and the piano concerto No. 4 will be presented Sunday afternoon and the 8th and 9th symphonies will be heard Tuesday evening at 7.30 o'clock at an "extra" concert.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

JUL 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP). — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

AUG 14 1947

Tanglewood

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand American, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

Eight Hours For One

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year— stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

Young, With Mature Tastes

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enriched a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

Joy of Free Participation

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright [illegible] King Features Synd.)

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 1 - 1947

World of Music

NEW YORK — (UP) — Mozart's opera "Idomeneo" will be performed for the first time in America by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, of which Serge Koussevitzky is director.

The production will be directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky. Richard Rychtarik will design the sets. The orchestra and singers, as in the production of "Peter Grimes" last season, will consist of pupils of the Berkshire Music Center.

Two perfmances will be given during the last week of the festival on Monday and Wednesday evenings, Aug. 4 and 6. Admission will be by invitation to friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomeneo, King of Crete" in 1780, in his twenty-fourth year. It is considered by some one of his greatest works, but because of its length and the absence of printed parts, it has been performed only occasionally in Europe. Since no parts exist in America, a full set is being copied for the Tanglewood production.

American music needs consistent promotion and more frequent performances to achieve its proper place, in the opinion of Charles Adler, conductor of the Saratoga Music Festival which opens at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on Sept. 6.

"We glorify all kinds of American things, from antiques and ancestors to hot dogs and chorus girls," Adler observed, "Why not take a little time out and glorify American culture? Let's give American music a chance to be heard."

Adler, who has a fondness for listing premieres on his programs, gave 43 first performances at the Saratoga Festival last year. He has about 30 this year.

"We will never develop a musical culture," Adler continued, "until we foster American music. We have a large body of men and women in this country today writing music in a rich and varied tradition and experimenting with the future. They cannot live, they cannot learn, they cannot grow unless their music is played.

"New music admittedly is controversial — especially that by Americans. Audiences are said to stay away from it, although it has been our experience that an audience not only accepts but enjoys the new when it is interestingly introduced.

"No audience should be asked to listen to 'all - American' programs. The listener should have variety, so that he may compare the present with the past. The composer should likewise be asked to measure his creative work against the accepted art of the past."

TRANSCRIPT

AUG 1 - 1947

Tanglewood Plans Opera for Monday

First Performance in U. S. of Mozart's "Idomeneo" to be Given by Berkshire Music Center.

The first performance in this country of Mozart's three-act opera, "Idomeneo," will be the highlight of the Berkshire Music center's season at Tanglewood, which opens Monday evening, when members of the center's opera department, directed by Boris Goldovsky, will present the pera which hitherto has been heard nly in Austria and Germany and nce in London. A second performnce will be given Wednesday eveing.

Joseph Laderoute will sing the itle role, while Elizaethb Ann Bolnger and Dorothy Dawson will alernate at the two performances in he part of Idamante. Nancy Trickey ill sing the part of the Princess ia of Troy, with Paula Lenchner as ettra and Frank Guarrera as the igh Priest of Neptune.

The libretto concerns the dilemma the king of Crete, who, grateful escaping shipwreck, vows to ptune to sacrifice the first person meets on his own shore. Idaante, his own son, is the first to eet him, posing the problem ound which the opera revolves.

Admission to the two performces will be by invitation to the iends of the Berkshire Music cen-

---

AUG 1 - 1947

Students Concert For Tanglewood

Students of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will offer a concert in the festival shed this evening at 8.15. The concert will be conducted by students of Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and his assistant, Dr. Stanley Chapple.

Officials of the Music Center announced yesterday the center will benefit by $8832 from the "Music for All" program presented Tuesday.

A second event scheduled for today is a concert this afternoon at 4.30 with a program of excerpts from six operas. The concert will be presented in the Theater Concert Hall.

The program for this evening's concert follows:—

"Overture to Fidelio" .... Beethoven
"Spirituals" .... Morton Gould
"2d Piano Concerto" .. Rachmaninoff
(Conducted by Dr. Chapple)

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG 1 - 1947

☆ COMING AND GOING ☆

WILLIAM S. PALEY, chairman of the board of CBS, and MRS. PALEY, who were married Monday in Manhasset, L. I., leave today aboard the S.S. Queen Elizabeth for a wedding trip in England and Europe.

JACK RYAN, manager of the press department in the central division of NBC, has left for Tanglewood, Mass., where he'll attend the Berkshire Music Festival, and then continue on to New York for conferences at the headquarters of the web.

Concerts Scheduled

New bookings for the coming mu ical season are being announced these days. On Nov. 4 the famous Philadelphia orchestra, directed by Eugene Ormandy, will return to the Milwaukee Auditorium under the local sponsorship of Margaret Rice.

The Boston orchestra will be unable to visit Milwaukee this season because the Auditorium cannot provide a date.

The Arion club, which annually spon-'s the Bostonians, has announced its eries of concerts as follows: Nov. 7, Rise Stevens, mezzo soprano; Jan. 29, ehudi Menuhin, violinist; Feb. 21, olanda Petris, soprano; Apr. 4, the Arion chorus in Bach's B minor Mass; Apr. 20, Artur Rubinstein, pianist. Outside the series the Arions will present the Don Cossacks chorus of Serge Jaroff Dec. 4; "Messiah" Dec. 16; and the junior concert May 22.

* * *

Laurette Rossiter Cotton, Milwaukee organist, will play Aug. 24 at the national session of Sigma Alpha Iota society in Detroit.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 1 - 1947

Tanglewood Season Closes On August 10th

In the last week of the Tanglewood season that will close August 10, the Boston Symphony orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances.

Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday evening, July 31, and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" in which Jacob Lateiner will be the soloist Saturday evening, August 2, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, August 3, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday, August 5, at the earlier hour of 7.30.

Joseph Battista will be the soloist Sunday and the Festival chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy," with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

For the last week-end, Leonard Bernstein will conduct on Thursday evening, August 7, Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Ruth Posselt, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No .2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday evening's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem," with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun is das Heil", and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, August 10, with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra, with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero," and Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 1 - 1947

7,500 Hear First Beethoven Concert

First Program in Series of Three Given at Tanglewood—Second Concert Scheduled Saturday.

Acclaimed by critics as a memorable performance, the first concert in Series B of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was heard by an audience of 7,500 persons last night, as the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offered the first of three concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven.

The 1st and 2nd symphonies delighted the throng in the music shed, but the greatest and most sustained applause came when the last notes of the 3rd symphony, "Eroica," faded away. The concentrated force of this opus offered a decided contrast to the simple melodies of the first part of the program, where Dr. Koussevitzky used a slightly reduced orchestra.

The second concert in the Beethoven cycle will be given Saturday evening, when the 4th and 5th symphonies and the piano concerto No. in E Flat major will be heard. The 6th and 7th symphonies and the piano concerto No. 4 will be presented Sunday afternoon and the 8th and 9th symphonies will be heard Tuesday evening at 7.30 as an "extra" concert.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
JUL 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP). — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WATERBURY, CONN. AMERICAN
AUG 1 1947

Beethoven Series Opens At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~continuing the~~ Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., opened its cycle of four Beethoven programs last night with presentation of the First, Second and Third Symphonies.

Completed, the cycle will have offered all of Beethoven's nine symphonic works and the well-known "Emperor" concerto with Jacob Lateiner as piano soloist. The magnificent Ninth, or "Choral" Symphony, will conclude the series Tuesday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led the orchestra in the three works which clearly reflect the growth of Beethoven's creative genius. Warming up only slowly to the fresh, swift tempo of the First (C-major) Symphony, the orchestra better responded to Dr. Koussevitsky in the suave, contrapuntal rhythms of the Second (D-major) Symphony.

The orchestra last night took the dramatic contrast from the Second to Third in stride, giving a rich fullness to the ebb and flow of the lengthy opening movement which made the classic sorrow of the ensuing funeral march trite by comparison.

Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, and the Fifth Piano Concerto comprise the Saturday night program, while the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies and the Fourth Piano Concerto will be given Sunday afternoon. Closin the cycle Tuesday are the Eight and Ninth Symphonies.

F. Z.

GLOUCESTER, MASS. TIMES
AUG 1 - 1947

North Shore Arts Will Present Concert by String Quartette

The North Shore Arts Association announces a concert by the North Shore String Quartette of Marblehead, in the galleries of the association Sunday evening at 8.30 o'clock. The quartette consists of Harry Kobialka, first violinist; Florence C. Pearson, second violinist; Ann Very, viola and Esther Parshly, violoncello. All have achieved distinction and merited recognition in the musical world.

Mr. Kobialka is a member of the Springfield Orchestra; conductor of orchestra, instructor of violin and chamber music at Wellesley college. He is to be concert master of the Greater Boston Orchestral project for the coming season. He is serving on the faculties of Longy School of Music, South End Music school and Phillips Exeter Academy. Mrs. Pearson is a former member of the Concord and Lanier String quartettes and has served on the faculties of The Beaver Country Day School, Longy School of Music and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Miss Very, a graduate with highest honors of the New England Conservatory of Music, studied under Harrison Keller and is at present instructor of violin and theory at Connecticut College for women. Miss Very began her musical studies in Munich, Germany.

Miss Parshley, a former Teaching Fellow of Smith College, plays with the Springfield Symphony and is teaching at Milton Academy. She has studied cello with Yves Chardon, Horace Britt and Alfred Zignera. Both Miss Very and Miss Parshley have played with the Boston Pops Orchestras and they, as well as Mrs. Pearson have studied at The Institute For Advanced Study at the Berkshire Music Center.

~~The program will include~~ the following, and played by these accomplished musicians should be a great treat and a pleasant interlude to the North Shore colony.

Schubert—Quartette in F flat Major
Opus 125, No. 1
Allegro Moderato
Scherzo Prestissimo
Adagio
Allegro
Dvorak—Quartette in F Major,
Opus 96
Allegro Ma Non Troppo
Lento
Molto Vivace
Vivace Ma Non Troppo
Haydn—Quartette in G Major,
Opus 76, No. 1
Allegro Con Spirito
Adagio Sostenuto
Menuetto Presto
Allegro.

PORTLAND, ME. PRESS HERALD
AUG 1 1947

INSIDE RADIO

By

Paul Luther

Mel Blanc and Cliff Arquette, both of whom received the bad news from their respective sponsors during the past few months, are set to return to the air lanes sometime during October. They will co-star in a feature titled Point Sublime. A top rated program on the West Coast for several years, Point Sublime was shelved recently at the request of Blanc and Arquette because of the limited coverage. But now it's for a coast-to-coast hookup to be sponsored by the insurance company which last year backed the ~~Boston Symphony Orches~~tra. Time and network are yet to be selected with ABC most likely to get the nod.

This is really going back but I wonder how many of you remember the crystal days of 1924 and Jerry Sullivan, who became famous for his "WQJ the Calumet Baking Powder, Rainbow Garden station, Chi-cago?" Remember? Anyway, Jerry and the wife dropped in to see us the other evening on their first visit to the East. He tells me that while he's long since retired from the mike, he still misses it and keeps in touch with a number of the old timers who were the real pioneers of broadcasting. His unusual station identification was partly responsible for making him one of the best-known announcers of the mid '20's and he got his job when the station owner fired the regular announcer because he talked too much. Sometimes I think we could use more managers with ideas along those lines today.

This will probably be denied, but I hear that the sponsors are far from happy with the new ABC morning feature Welcome Traveller. A replacement is being sought to take over at an early date. Some bankroller is committed to another 13-week cycle of Mystery of the Week and will also part company with this one about Jan. 1.

Interesting note on "whodunits" is this. While they are considered one of the best commercial features, 30 minutes once a week, they have so far failed to pay off on a five-a-week basis. Proving that while fans enjoy their murders and chills, they prefer to have them dished up at one and the same sitting. Leave us not let death linger.

Every season brings a new crop of show ideas and this year is no exception. Two of the better ones now making the agency rounds are H. T. Webster's The Timid Soul and Jimmy Hatlo's They'll Do It Every Time. You should be hearing them if a couple of smart sponsors can be weaned away from present program patterns.

"Is Bret Morrison singing on the air now? If so, what time and station?" asks Mrs. C. L. Duprey, 26 Dianne Street, South Portland, Me.

Not at the moment. He has, however, been signed for a five-minute series to begin some time next month over the Mutual network at 3.30 p. m., Monday through Friday. I understand, too, that following the success of his two previous appearances on the CBS Aunt Jenny strip, for which he wrote the script, played the lead, and also sang, he has been scheduled for a return visit at a time still to be selected.

H. M. Maxon of Waterville, Me., writes, "I haven't heard Pat Barnes on the air for a good number of years and I just wondered if he's still broadcasting and if so, what program is he on?"

Pat is still very much on the air but I don't believe he has a network show right now. He has been associated with the New York outlet of ABC for several years, doing an early morning disc jockey show. He is very hale and hearty even though he can boast of one of the longest careers in wireless.

"Would you please tell me who plays the part of 'Agatha' on The Romance Of Helen Trent; also, something about her?" asks Mrs. J.F.L.

Originally the part was portrayed by a Chicago actress, Marie Nelson, but following her death, three years ago, Bess McCammon took over and has played it ever since. Bess is a native of Cincinnati, O., where she first entered radio in 1934. After seven years in the Ohio city, she moved to Chicago and played featured roles on such well-known strips as Women In White, Stepmother, Today's Children, and many others. A resident of New York now for nearly two years, she may be heard as "Mrs. Evans" on Road Of Life and "Mrs. King" on Lone Journey. A widow, Bess has two sons for whom she finds time to keep house in addition to maintaining a very active air schedule.

A Listener of Sebago, Me., writes, "Is comedian George Jessel on the air? If so, what time and station?"

No, Mr. Jessel is off the air. He is now a motion picture producer in Hollywood.

If you have a question about radio or some network personality, just address your card or letter to Portland Press Herald, Inside Radio, Larchmont, N. Y.

WORCESTER, MASS. TELEGRAM
AUG 1 - 1947

Beethoven Cycle Heard at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Friday—The second series of Berkshire Festival concerts began last night in Tanglewood's music shed before 7600. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first three of Beethoven's nine symphonies.

This Beethoven cycle will be completed Saturday night, Sunday afternoon, and Tuesday night. It affords a rare opportunity to witness the gradual but persistent growth of the greatest of symphonists.

Development Cite

Throughout the series, however, there will be no more vivid example of development than that illustrated last night. The progress in structural and inspirational elements from the frolicksome "symphony in C Major, No. 1" to the rebellious "Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)" can be likened to the growth from carefree youth to full maturity. Yet, all three works were written during Beethoven's early thirties.

Koussevitzky took full cognizance of the vast gulf between the structural and emotional qualities involved to a degree that musical values transcended virtuosic considerations.

Light And Lyrical

The first symphony was marked by light, lyrical, "Mosartian" tendencies. It was in a more aggressive vein than Mozart but far from mature Beethoven. The "Scherzo", for example, had whimsial characteristics not to be found in the later symphonies.

The second symphony (No. 2 in D Major, Opus 36) brought to light a suave, fullsome nature not existent in the work that preceded. Koussevitzky gave a new luminous quality to individual instruments and indulged in a more adventurous use of melody giving slight but unmistakable indication of the intensity to follow.

Finale Step Forward

The "Larghetto" was abundant in singing melody, however naive it is at times in treatment.

The "finale", obvious with reiteration, nevertheless took bold steps forward.

With the powerful "two-fisted" chords that open the "Eroica", the concert entered a new sphere. This was heroic, rebellious Beethoven. The four movements were endowed with emotional qualities that make exciting the expected transition to the massive scores to follow.

On Saturday night the fourth and fifth symphonies will be played, also the "Concerto No: 5 in E-Flat Major, Opus 73" with Jacob Lateiner as piano soloist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 1 - 1947

Beethoven Programs Open Before 7600 at Tanglewood

Koussevitzky and Orchestra in Top Form As They Present First Three Symphonies Next Concert Tomorrow Night

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~under the direction of their re~~nowned leader, Serge Koussevitzky, played the first three symphonies of Beethoven last night in the Shed at Tanglewood. This was the sixth program of the 10th Berkshire Festival and the first of four exclusively Beethoven programs, in which all the symphonies will be played, in addition to two of the piano concertos.

On another evening of our best, even if slightly chilled, Berkshire weather, another gala audience numbering about 7600, gathered for the inauguration of this second week of the Festival. The decision to play the symphonies in chronological order need not be debated. It provides an excellent opportunity to observe the step-by-step progress of the young Beethoven from his earliest essay, written while Haydn was still alive and Mozart's memory still vividly present, through the various phases of his development, and as an exhibit in that sense it is interesting. Under any other circumstances a greater contrasting selection between symphonies one or two would be desirable.

Orchestra at Best

The performance, however, was again in the orchestra's most remarkable manner. These early symphonies are among the basic repertory and therefore the most mature studies of both the conductor and the men of the orchestra. Last night they played with a freshness and an adaptibility which they have rarely equalled to depict the details and the greater perspective of the respective symphonies in their proper and most glorious aspects. To spotlight particular passages would be to seem to raise them above others. We can only point out such things as the preciously worked out short introduction to the finale of the first symphony or the reassuringly gratifying natural divisions of the Eroica Marcia funebre, achieved by Koussevitzky's superb sense of timing and dramatic effect.

AUG 1 - 19
Hartford Co

Students Will Present Concert at Tanglewood

A student concert will be presented tonight at 8:15 at the festival shed, Tanglewood, Lenox Mass., the Berkshire Music Center announced today.

Students of Serge Koussevitzky and Dr. Stanley Chapple, assistant to Dr. Koussevitzky and dean of the music school, will conduct the concert.

The program includes: Overture to "Fidelio," Beethoven; serenade and music for 16 solo voices and Spirituals, Morton Gould; Second Piano Concerto, Rachmaninoff.

Koussevitzky's Beethoven Masterful

Aug 2 Hartford Times

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IT WAS a new experience at Tanglewood last night to sit through three Beethoven symphonies in a row—the first three at that.

From the suave, uncomplicated opening bars of the First to the closing pages of the Eroica is a mere two hours or so of elapsed time, but from the restive awe with which the young Beethoven looked out upon the prim formalism of Haydn's Vienna in its phosphorescent decay to the completed revolution of his disillusionment in "the memory of a great man" is a long, long way to come, for within this space musical history traverses its most epochal chapters from the begats to the apocalypse.

I was pleased and refreshed that Dr. Koussevitzky did not, however, give us an historical interpretation. There wasn't the slightest suggestion that he saw anything Haydnesque in the First Symphony. It is prissy and stupid to pretend that this delightful symphony is in any sense derivative. It shocked its first audiences and that was because it was the speech of Beethoven and not the product of the aging Haydn's pupil.

* * *

NEVER HAS anyone made this work more Beethovenish than Koussevitzky did last night. Not because it was big; it was manly. There was no idol-breaking particularly; merely intimations of humanity.

These things are not subtle or theoretical. Koussevitzky produces a composer's style right out of factual facilities of his superb orchestra. One could write a book about his method of producing a sforzando. It is more than an accent or an intensification; it is a locution. You know that it is the way Beethoven spoke and that Mozart and Haydn didn't express themselves that way.

Similarly with the creation of a crescendo. Nuance began with Beethoven; it is the essence of his harmony his instrumental coloring. His predecessors created their music on contrasting planes, all kept neatly and strictly apart and there was no washing together of the tonal elements. With Beethoven, naturalism was afoot.

These differences are elementary, even obvious, but it takes the great interpreter like a Koussevitzky to accept the obvious to let it speak for itself. Only lesser men strain for the personal interpretation.

* * *

UNTIL LAST NIGHT I have always found the Second Symphony something of a bore. It has contained a good deal of the Beethoven sweetness which for me borders on the vapid. The fault has been with this listener for last night what had once been "linked sweetness long drawn out" became in the slow movement an elevating and healthy songfulness. Again Koussevitzky did not strive for bigness or boisterousness in the scherzo and the thing came off the more happily for it.

It was interesting to note how Koussevitzky successively built up his orchestra from six basses and six violas in the First, an extra pair of each for the Second, and a full complement of 10 basses in the Third with 12 chairs in each of the other string sections.

The Eroica has always been a favorite with Koussevitzky. Here again there is nothing that could be construed as a personal perspective. He arrived at this Beethoven with an artistic rectitude beyond cavil. His account of the funeral march was one of the noblest things in music. It is an emotional experience that left one in a spent condition for which there was no restorative but the matchless scherzo.

The instrumental perfection, the balance of the woodwind chords, the dazzling horn playing, the luster of the strings was something even beyond what the Bostonians have accustomed us to.

The success of this concert, as is so often the case in musical performance, was created in the first few moments. It was a daring thing to program these three symphonies together. Not many interpretative artists would run the risk.

If Koussevitzky was concerned—and he must have been—all doubt was resolved within five minutes' time. The performance kindled. It spread through the players; the leader was lifted up. You can see when Koussevitzky is inspired and happy. He remained so all evening.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL

AUG 2 - 1947

In the last week of the Tanglewood season which will close Aug 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances. Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday evening, July 31, and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" Saturday evening, Aug. 2, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday, Aug. 5 at the earlier hour of 7:30.

OAKLAND, CAL
POST-ENQUIRER

AUG 2 1947

There are two albums out, Victor's 1134 by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston, and Columbia's 688 by Efrem Kurtz conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York. Differences in the two are relatively minor.

AMERICAN MERCURY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG - 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith. $4.00. Allen, Towne & Heath. Now that Koussevitzky's ill-advised attempt to have the courts suppress this book has come to nothing, it is difficult to understand what led him to make so unfortunate a spectacle of himself. Mr. Smith is a reputable and able music critic, having written music criticism for many years for the defunct Boston Evening Transcript. He admits time and again that Koussevitzky is one of the great conductors of our day. But he also points out, what professionals have known for many years, that while the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a master at drawing almost miraculous tones from his men, he is rather deficient in giving a truly mature reading of a score, especially if the score is laden with lyricism and philosophical content. Mr. Smith also points out that Koussevitzky's late wife, who had considerable means, saved him many a hard road. Surely this is no reflection on her name or on him. A man without ability could not have been so worthy of such providential help. Altogether, this is an able volume, well written and amply documented. One only wonders whether the subject was really worth so much effort. A mere conductor, unless he be a great deal more, is at best only a middle-man, worthy of admiration but not of lengthy analysis. There are four valuable appendices and a good index, plus several reproductions of photographs.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

UG [illegible] - 1947

Festival Week End Concerts To Feature Young Pianists

Joseph Battista

Jacob Lateiner

Two young pianists who studied in Philadelphia will be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Beethoven concerts at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this week end.

Jacob Lateiner, 18, will play the 5th piano concerto Saturday night and Joseph Battista, 29, the 4th concerto Sunday afternoon. The former was born in Cuba; Battista, in Philadelphia of Italian parents. Both were winners of the youth contest sponsored by the Philadelphia Orchestra, which earned them an appearance with that orchestra under Eugene Ormandy.

Lateiner, who studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, made a nationwide concert tour in 1945-46, playing with the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra and last June as guest soloist with the NBC Orchestra. During the war he gave many concerts at camps and at the Hollywood Canteen.

Battista, who studied at the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music with Mme. Olga Samaroff, is one of a family of 11. He played in music halls, restaurants and at resort hotels to earn his living while working at language, theory, ensemble and piano, before he won a fellowship in the Juilliard Graduate School in New York. After his debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra he won a trip to Brazil with a concert tour through the country. With the Army for three years, he appeared at bond rallies, Red Cross drives, Army posts and was discharged as a corporal, music director at Camp Lee, Va. He has played with leading orchestras, including those of Rochester, Baltimore, Harrisburg, Reading and the National Symphony of Washington, D.C.

The Beethoven cycle will extend through Tuesday, when at 7.30 the last program, including the 8th and 9th symphonies, will be given. It will be broadcast, starting at 8.30. Tickets for seats in the Shed for Tuesday's concert are available at the box office at Tanglewood. General admission to the week-end concerts will be on sale three hours before each program.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

AUG 2 - 1947

* * *

Joseph Laderoute, Canadian tenor, is to sing a leading part in the first American performance of Mozart's opera "Idomeneo", which will be given next Monday in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. The opera is to be repeated on Wednesday. Mr. Laderoute was chosen a year ago by Toscanini to sing the part of Jacquino in the performance of "Fidelio" with the N.B.C. orchestra.

TOPEKA, KANS.
STATE JOURNAL
AUG 2 1947

These Days—

Music of Melody Contrasted to the Arithmetic of Music

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the philharmonic.

SOKOLSKY

During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival. I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae. I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, altho I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

* * *

I KNOW that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicans spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all had to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

* * *

THE CRITICS say this is obsolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the criticsl ike the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege. Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions thru the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, for Topeka State Journal)

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Concerts Set Attendance Mark

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1947

Festival Air

Tanglewood, Mass., Aug. 2—In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard on Tuesday, Aug. 5 over ABC in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 p. m., EDT, so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Centre courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

Box Office
New York, N.Y.

AUG 2 - 1947

Stories in the Knickerbocker News Tuesday said that "Music in the Movies" would be observed that night at the Berkshire festival in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and that scenes would be taken for a Metro picture to be called "The Story of Tanglewood." It was described as "the first time the Boston Symphony orchestra and its summer home have been filmed." The local MGM exchange knew nothing of the matter, although it had received a call Tuesday morning from an Albanyite asking if tickets were for sale.

[182]

Koussevitzky's Beethoven Masterful

Hartford Times

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IT WAS a new experience at Tanglewood last night to sit through three Beethoven symphonies in a row—the first three at that.

From the suave, uncomplicated opening bars of the First to the closing pages of the Eroica is a mere two hours or so of elapsed time, but from the restive awe with which the young Beethoven looked out upon the prim formalism of Haydn's Vienna in its phosphorescent decay to the completed revolution of his disillusionment in "the memory of a great man" is a long, long way to come, for within this space musical history traverses its most epochal chapters from the begats to the apocalypse.

I was pleased and refreshed that Dr. Koussevitzky did not, however, give us an historical interpretation. There wasn't the slightest suggestion that he saw anything Haydnesque in the First Symphony. It is prissy and stupid to pretend that this delightful symphony is in any sense derivative. It shocked its first audiences and that was because it was the speech of Beethoven and not the product of the aging Haydn's pupil.

* * *

NEVER HAS anyone made this work more Beethovenish than Koussevitzky did last night. Not because it was big; it was manly. There was no idol-breaking particularly; merely intimations of humanity.

These things are not subtle or theoretical. Koussevitzky produces a composer's style right out of factual facilities of his superb orchestra. One could write a book about his method of producing a sforzando. It is more than an accent or an intensification; it is a locution. You know that it is the way Beethoven spoke and that Mozart and Haydn didn't express themselves that way.

Similarly with the creation of a crescendo. Nuance began with Beethoven; it is the essence of his harmony his instrumental coloring. His predecessors created their music on contrasting planes, all kept neatly and strictly apart and there was no washing together of the tonal elements. With Beethoven, naturalism was afoot.

These differences are elementary, even obvious, but it takes the great interpreter like a Koussevitzky to accept the obvious to let it speak for itself. Only lesser men strain for the personal interpretation.

* * *

UNTIL LAST NIGHT I have always found the Second Symphony something of a bore. It has contained a good deal of the Beethoven sweetness which for me borders on the vapid. The fault has been with this listener for last night what had once been "linked sweetness long drawn out" became in the slow movement an elevating and healthy songfulness. Again Koussevitzky did not strive for bigness or boisterousness in the scherzo and the thing came off the more happily for it.

It was interesting to note how Koussevitzky successively built up his orchestra from six basses and six violas in the First, an extra pair of each for the Second, and a full complement of 10 basses in the Third with 12 chairs in each of the other string sections.

The Eroica has always been a favorite with Koussevitzky. Here again there is nothing that could be construed as a personal perspective. He arrived at this Beethoven with an artistic rectitude beyond cavil. His account of the funeral march was one of the noblest things in music. It is an emotional experience that left one in a spent condition for which there was no restorative but the matchless scherzo.

The instrumental perfection, the balance of the woodwind chords, the dazzling horn playing, the luster of the strings was something even beyond what the Bostonians have accustomed us to.

The success of this concert, as is so often the case in musical performance, was created in the first few moments. It was a daring thing to program these three symphonies together. Not many interpretative artists would run the risk.

If Koussevitzky was concerned—and he must have been—all doubt was resolved within five minutes' time. The performance kindled. It spread through the players; the leader was lifted up. You can see when Koussevitzky is inspired and happy. He remained so all evening.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 1 - 1947

Festival Week End Concerts To Feature Young Pianists

Joseph Battista

Jacob Lateiner

Two young pianists who studied in Philadelphia will be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Beethoven concerts at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this week end.

Jacob Lateiner, 18, will play the 5th piano concerto Saturday night and Joseph Battista, 29, the 4th concerto Sunday afternoon. The former was born in Cuba; Battista, in Philadelphia of Italian parents. Both were winners of the youth contest sponsored by the Philadelphia Orchestra, which earned them an appearance with that orchestra under Eugene Ormandy.

Lateiner, who studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, made a nationwide concert tour in 1945-46, playing with the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra and last June as guest soloist with the NBC Orchestra. During the war he gave many concerts at camps and at the Hollywood Canteen.

Battista, who studied at the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music with Mme. Olga Samaroff, is one of a family of 11. He played in music halls, restaurants and at resort hotels to earn his living while working at language, theory, ensemble and piano, before he won a fellowship in the Juilliard Graduate School in New York. After his debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra he won a trip to Brazil with a concert tour through the country. With the Army for three years, he appeared at bond rallies, Red Cross drives, Army posts and was discharged as a corporal, music director at Camp Lee, Va. He has played with leading orchestras, including those of Rochester, Baltimore, Harrisburg, Reading and the National Symphony of Washington, D.C.

The Beethoven cycle will extend through Tuesday, when at 7.30 the last program, including the 8th and 9th symphonies, will be given. It will be broadcast, starting at 8.30. Tickets for seats in the Shed for Tuesday's concert are available at the box office at Tanglewood. General admission to the week-end concerts will be on sale three hours before each program.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL

AUG 2 - 1947

In the last week of the Tanglewood season which will close Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances. Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday evening, July 31, and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" Saturday evening, Aug. 2, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday, Aug. 5, at the earlier hour of 7:30.

OAKLAND, CAL.
POST-ENQUIRER

AUG 2 1947

There are two albums out, Victor's 1134 by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston, and Columbia's 688 by Efrem Kurtz conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York. Differences in the two are relatively minor.

AMERICAN MERCURY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG - 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith. $4.00. Allen, Towne & Heath. Now that Koussevitzky's ill-advised attempt to have the courts suppress this book has come to nothing, it is difficult to understand what led him to make so unfortunate a spectacle of himself. Mr. Smith is a reputable and able music critic, having written music criticism for many years for the defunct Boston Evening Transcript. He admits time and again that Koussevitzky is one of the great conductors of our day. But he also points out, what professionals have known for many years, that while the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a master at drawing almost miraculous tones from his men, he is rather deficient in giving a truly mature reading of a score, especially if the score is laden with lyricism and philosophical content. Mr. Smith also points out that Koussevitzky's late wife, who had considerable means, saved him many a hard road. Surely this is no reflection on her name or on him. A man without ability could not have been so worthy of such providential help. Altogether, this is an able volume, well written and amply documented. One only wonders whether the subject was really worth so much effort. A mere conductor, unless he be a great deal more, is at best only a middle-man, worthy of admiration but not of lengthy analysis. There are four valuable appendices and a good index, plus several reproductions of photographs.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

AUG 2 - 1947

* * *

Joseph Laderoute, Canadian tenor, is to sing a leading part in the first American performance of Mozart's opera "Idomeneo", which will be given next Monday in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, in Massachusetts. The opera is to be repeated on Wednesday. Mr. Laderoute was chosen a year ago by Toscanini to sing the part of Jacquino in the performance of "Fidelio" with the N.B.C. orchestra.

TOPEKA, KANS.
STATE JOURNAL

AUG 2 1947

These Days—

Music of Melody Contrasted to the Arithmetic of Music

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the philharmonic.

SOKOLSKY

During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival. I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae. I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, altho I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

* * *

I KNOW that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicans spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all had to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

* * *

THE CRITICS say this is obsolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critical ike the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions thru the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, for Topeka State Journal)

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Concerts Set Attendance Mark

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1947

Festival Ai

Tanglewood, Mass., Aug. 2—In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard on Tuesday, Aug. 5 over ABC in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 p. m., EDT, so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Centre courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

BOX OFFICE
NEW YORK, N.Y.

AUG 2 - 1947

Stories in the Knickerbocker News Tuesday said that "Music in the Movies" would be observed that night at the Berkshire festival in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and that scenes would be taken for a Metro picture to be called "The Story of Tanglewood." It was described as "the first time the Boston Symphony orchestra and its summer home have been filmed." The local MGM exchange knew nothing of the matter, although it had received a call Tuesday morning from an Albanyite asking if tickets were for sale.

Box Office
New York N.Y.
AUG 2 - 1947

375 Simultaneous Bows For 'Long Night' in East

HOLLYWOOD—RKO Radio will launch what it claims to be the biggest day-and-date opening of a picture in any one region in film history with simultaneous bookings of "The Long Night" at 375 theatres in New England and upstate New York August 7. At the same time, the company will stage a unique ballyhoo stunt—that of a public mock trial to be staged on the night of August 13 at Boston's Symphony hall, posing the "unwritten law" situation in the picture. The performance will be duplicated in Buffalo August 14.

William Courtney, who prosecuted the late Al Capone in Chicago, will handle the "prosecution," with Herbert F. Callahan, prominent criminal lawer, selected for the "defense." Governors of the six New England states will attend, and the public will be the jury. A delegation of Hollywood personalities will attend.

Boston got another tumble from the premiere planners when the world debut of "The Romance of Rosy Ridge" was held at the Loew's State Theatre there July 31.

Radio Retailing
Phila. Pa.
AUG - - 1947

CLASSICAL WORKS

BACH: "Suites," No. 2, in B Minor, No. 3, in D, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, George Laurent, solo flute. RCA Victor DM 1123

Bach Suites were recorded in the Tanglewood Concert Theater at last year's festival, and are particularly timely because Koussevitzky is appearing at the current Berkshire Festival. An interesting note is that relatively the same size orchestra as was common in Bach's time was used for this recording.

DAYTON, OHIO
HERALD
AUG 2 - 1947

American Conductors Appear In Lewisohn Stadium Series

Two American conductors, Bernard Herrmann and Richard Korn, made their first appearances this week at the Lewisohn Stadium, New York City. The former is well-known as conductor of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. Korn began his career as a lawyer before adopting music as his profession. He studied conducting at the Berkshire Music Center with Serge Koussevitsky and was assistant conductor of the National Orchestral association in 1941 and 1942. During the war he served as a lieutenant with the Coast Guard.

ST. MARY'S, PA.
PRESS
AUG 2 - 1947

Two Former Pilots Now at Tanglewood

Members of Quartet That Will Sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy" at Final Beethoven Concert Tuesday.

Two former pilots, James Pease, bass, who served three years in the army air corps, and David Lloyd, tenor, will be members of the quartet that will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy" as a feature of the final concert of the Beethoven cycle at Tanglewood next Tuesday evening.

The concert will begin at 7.30 o'clock instead of the usual hour 8.15 o'clock, and the audience will hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting [illegible] symphonies and the Schiller ode. Other members of the quartet will be Miss Frances Yeend and Miss Eunice Alberts.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 2 - 1947

Festival Programs Will End Aug. 10

Four Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra and Seven Performances by Students Listed in Final Week.

Four concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra and seven performances by students of the Berkshire Music center will be given at Tanglewood during the last week of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which ends Sunday, Aug. 10.

Concerts Sunday afternoon and next Tuesday evening, featuring the music of Beethoven, will be followed next Thursday evening by the first program in Series C, when Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra in Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the violin concerto by Hindemith, with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday evening's concert, which will include Mozart's "Requiem," the Bach cantata No. 50, and the "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky.

The final concert of the season, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, will find Dr. Koussevitzky conducting in Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra with two pianos, the "Pavane" and "Bolero" by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

Concerts by the Berkshire Music center during the final week will include a chamber music concert Sunday morning at 10.30 o'clock, an auditor's orchestral concert Monday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock, performances of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo," Monday and Wednesday evenings, a chamber music concert Wednesday afternoon at 4.30 o'clock, with Eleazar deCarvalho conducting, a student orchestral concert Friday evening, opera scenes Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock, and a chamber music concert Sunday morning, Aug. 10.

Rehearsals for Festival concerts will be open to the public each Saturday morning for the benefit of the pension fund.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 2 - 1947

Beethoven Series Opens At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra continuing the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. opened its cycle of four Beethoven programs Thursday with presentation of the First, Second and Third Symphonies.

Completed, the cycle will have offered all of Beethoven's nine symphonic works and the well-known "Emperor" concerto with Jacob Lateiner as piano soloist. The magnificent Ninth, or "Choral" Symphony, will conclude the series Tuesday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led the orchestra in the three works which clearly reflect the growth of Beethoven's creative genius. Warming up only slowly to the fresh, swift tempo of the First (C-major) Symphony, the orchestra better responded to Dr. Koussevitsky in the suave, contrapuntal rhythms of the Second (D-major) Symphony.

The orchestra Thursday night took the dramatic contrast from the Second to Third in stride, giving a rich fullness to the ebb and flow of the lengthy opening movement which made the classic sorrow of the ensuing funeral march trite by comparison.

Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, and the Fifth Piano Concerto comprise the tonight's night program, while the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies and the Fourth Piano Concerto will be given tomorrow afternoon. Closing the cycle Tuesday are the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies.

F. Z.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 2 - 1947

Steven Malycks of Continental Ave., won a master of music degree in oboe at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music last week. . . . Steve is a member of the Dayton Symphony Orchestra now and teacher there. . . . He is a John Hay grad, attended Baldwin-Wallace and Ohio University. . . . Walter Blodgett, organist at the Cleveland Museum of Art, will attend the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood next week.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD
AUG 2 - 1947

Sokolsky

MUSIC IN THE HILLS

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic: During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it there when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the nazi or communists or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music: as for me, give me plenty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

([illegible] Synd., Inc.)

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 2 - 1947

Final Ten Days For Tanglewood

In the last week of the Tanglewood season that will close Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances.

Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" in which Jacob Lateiner will be the soloist this evening, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday at the earlier hour of 7:30.

* * *

JOSEPH BATTISTA will be the soloist Sunday and the Festival chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy", with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

For the last weekend, Leonard Bernstein will conduct next Thursday evening Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Ruth Posselt, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem", with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun is das Heil"; and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero", and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

* * *

THE STUDENT EVENTS for this coming weekend include opera scenes this afternoon and symphony concert tonight by a student orchestra, conducted by students and Dr. Stanley Chapple; a chamber music concert Sunday at 10:30. an auditors' orchestral concert Monday at 1:30 p. m., the first performance in America of Mozart's "Idomeneo", Monday evening; a chamber music concert, Eleazer deCarvalho conducting, Wednesday at 4:30; a second performance of "Idomeneo" Wednesday evening; a symphony concert Thursday afternoon, the last student orchestral concert of the season, Friday evening; opera scenes Saturday afternoon at 2:30 and a chamber music concert Sunday morning.

Rehearsals for Festival concerts will be open to the public each Saturday morning for the benefit of the pension fund.

[183]

AUG 2 - 1947

375 Simultaneous Bows For 'Long Night' in East

HOLLYWOOD—RKO Radio will launch what it claims to be the biggest day-and-date opening of a picture in any one region in film history with simultaneous bookings of "The Long Night" at 375 theatres in New England and upstate New York August 7. At the same time, the company will stage a unique ballyhoo stunt—that of a public mock trial to be staged on the night of August 13 at Boston's Symphony hall, posing the "unwritten law" situation in the picture. The performance will be duplicated in Buffalo August 14.

William Courtney, who prosecuted the late Al Capone in Chicago, will handle the "prosecution," with Herbert F. Callahan, prominent criminal lawer, selected for the "defense." Governors of the six New England states will attend, and the public will be the jury. A delegation of Hollywood personalities will attend.

Boston got another tumble from the premiere planners when the world debut of "The Romance of Rosy Ridge" was held at the Loew's State Theatre there July 31.

RADIO RETAILING
PHILA. PA.
AUG - - 1947

CLASSICAL WORKS

BACH: "Suites," No. 2, in B Minor, No. 3, in D, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, George Laurent, solo flute. RCA Victor DM 1123

Bach Suites were recorded in the Tanglewood Concert Theater at last year's festival, and are particularly timely because Koussevitzky is appearing at the current Berkshire Festival. An interesting note is that relatively the same size orchestra as was common in Bach's time was used [illegible]

DAYTON, OHIO
HERALD
AUG 2 - 1947

American Conductors Appear In Lewisohn Stadium Series

Two American conductors, Bernard Herrmann and Richard Korn, made their first appearances this week at the Lewisohn Stadium, New York City. The former is well-known as conductor of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. Korn began his career as a lawyer before adopting music as his profession. He studied conducting at the Berkshire Music Center with Serge Koussevitsky and was assistant conductor of the National Orchestral association in 1941 and 1942. During the war he served as a lieutenant with the Coast Guard.

ST. MARY'S, PA.
PRESS
AUG 2 - 1947

Two Former Pilots Now at Tanglewood

Members of Quartet That Will Sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy" at Final Beethoven Concert Tuesday.

Two former pilots, James Pease, bass, who served three years in the army air corps, and David Lloyd, tenor, will be members of the quartet that will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy" as a feature of the final concert of the Beethoven cycle at Tanglewood next Tuesday evening.

The concert will begin at 7.30 o'clock instead of the usual hour 8.15 o'clock, and the audience will hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting [illegible] symphonies and the Schiller ode. Other members of the quartet will be Miss Frances Yeend and Miss [illegible]

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 2 - 1947

Festival Programs Will End Aug. 10

Four Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra and Seven Performances by Students Listed in Final Week.

Four concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra and seven performances by students of the Berkshire Music center will be given at Tanglewood during the last week of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which ends Sunday, Aug. 10.

Concerts Sunday afternoon and next Tuesday evening, featuring the music of Beethoven, will be followed next Thursday evening by the first program in Series C, when Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra in Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the violin concerto by Hindemith, with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday evening's concert, which will include Mozart's "Requiem," the Bach cantata No. 50, and the "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky.

The final concert of the season, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, will find Dr. Koussevitzky conducting in Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra with two pianos, the "Pavane" and "Bolero" by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

Concerts by the Berkshire Music center during the final week will include a chamber music concert Sunday morning at 10.30 o'clock, an auditor's orchestral concert Monday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock, performances of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo," Monday and Wednesday evenings, a chamber music concert Wednesday afternoon at [illegible] o'clock, with Eleazar [illegible] conducting, a student [illegible] concert Friday evening, [illegible] scenes Saturday afternoon at [illegible] o'clock, and a chamber music concert Sunday morning, Aug. 10.

Rehearsals for Festival concerts will be open to the public each Saturday morning for the benefit of the pension fund.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 2 - 1947

Beethoven Series Opens At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, continuing the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. opened its cycle of four Beethoven programs Thursday with presentation of the First, Second and Third Symphonies.

Completed, the cycle will have offered all of Beethoven's nine symphonic works and the well-known "Emperor" concerto with Jacob Lateiner as piano soloist. The magnificent Ninth, or "Choral" Symphony, will conclude the series Tuesday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky led the orchestra in the three works which clearly reflect the growth of Beethoven's creative genius. Warming up only slowly to the fresh, swift tempo of the First (C-major) Symphony, the orchestra better responded to Dr. Koussevitsky in the suave, contrapuntal rhythms of the Second (D-major) Symphony.

The orchestra Thursday night took the dramatic contrast from the Second to Third in stride, giving a rich fullness to the ebb and flow of the lengthy opening movement which made the classic sorrow of the ensuing funeral march trite by comparison.

Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, and the Fifth Piano Concerto comprise the tonight's night program, while the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies and the Fourth Piano Concerto will be given tomorrow afternoon. Closing the cycle Tuesday are the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies.

F. Z.

[illegible] N. Y.
TIMES HERALD
AUG 2 - 1947

Sokolsky

MUSIC IN THE HILLS

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic: During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it there when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the nazi or communists or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me plenty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro [illegible] protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a [illegible] age!

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 2 - 1947

Final Ten Days For Tanglewood

In the last week of the Tanglewood season that will close Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music Center will give seven performances.

Following the program of Beethoven's first three symphonies Thursday and the fourth and fifth symphony with Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emperor" in which Jacob Lateiner will be the soloist this evening, the week will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 Sunday afternoon, and the conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies Tuesday at the earlier hour of 7:30.

* * *

JOSEPH BATTISTA will be the soloist Sunday and the Festival chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will sing Schiller's "Ode to Joy", with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

For the last weekend, Leonard Bernstein will conduct next Thursday evening Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Ruth Posselt, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem", with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun is das Heil'; and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero", and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

* * *

THE STUDENT EVENTS for this coming weekend include opera scenes this afternoon and symphony concert tonight by a student orchestra, conducted by students and Dr. Stanley Chapple; a chamber music concert Sunday at 10:30, an auditors' orchestral concert Monday at 1:30 p. m., the first performance in America of Mozart's "Idomeneo", Monday evening; a chamber music concert, Eleazer deCarvalho conducting, Wednesday at 4:30; a second performance of "Idomeneo" Wednesday evening; a symphony concert Thursday afternoon; the last student orchestral concert of the season, Friday evening; opera scenes Saturday afternoon at 2:30 and a chamber music concert Sunday morning.

Rehearsals for Festival concerts will be open to the public each Saturday morning for the benefit of the pension fund.

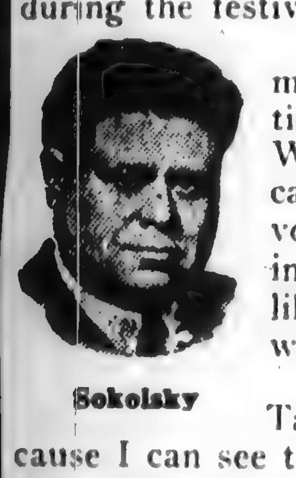
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 2 - 1947

Steven Malycks of Continental Ave. won a master of music degree in oboe at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music last week. . . . Steve is a member of the Dayton Symphony Orchestra now and teaches there. . . . He is a John Hay grad, attended Baldwin-Wallace and Ohio University. . . . Walter Blodgett, organist at the Cleveland Museum of Art, will attend the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood next week.

Lebanon, Mo.
Record
8/2/47

George Sokolsky Says:
Music In The Hills

I am not a musician, nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday during the winter when I am in New York I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.



Sokolsky

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Somtimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood, up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1, or No. 5, or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music, because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man, or the Nazi, or Communists, or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terriffic.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Etravinsky, which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too. Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arthmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, Boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critic. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts, who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

AUG 2 - 1947

These Days
By George E. Sokolsky

MUSIC IN THE HILLS

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of Common Man or the Nazi or the Communist or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I came the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his prestige, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

AUG 2 - 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Copland and Stravinsky Are a Lot of Boom to Him

NEW YORK, Aug. 1.—I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

* * *

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

* * *

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

* * *

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

* * *

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 2 - 1947

These Days
Music In The Hills
By George E. Sokolsky

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian Springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian Springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms., Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

ROCHESTER, MINN.
POST BULLETIN
AUG 2 1947

George E. Sokolsky—

Concert-Goer Likes Melody, Not Thunder

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9; No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stavinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1947

"THESE DAYS"
MUSIC IN THE HILLS
By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Copyright 1947 by King Features Syndicate Inc

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I don't try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian Springtime ritualistic dance. If that is Russian Springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams. Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

1947

THESE DAYS

by
George E. Sokolsky

Music in the Hills

I am not a musician nor even music critic. But I like to go t concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During th summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week t listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I came the next day and they gave me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. am told that it has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics says this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noises, too? Do have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as ofr me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copeland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitsky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 2 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY SAYS—

Music Cannot Be Enjoyed If It Becomes Just Noise

Special to The Buffalo Evening News.

NEW YORK, Aug. 2.—I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understand music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order.

I KNOW THAT I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazis or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G. I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

THE CRITICS SAY this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper pressroom? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

AUG 2 - 1947

THESE DAYS

by GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY
COPYRIGHT BY KING FEATURES

Music in the Hills

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

* * *

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or e Nazi or Communists or other sy-bodies. It is a factory, a l, a mine. It is terrific—that e noise is terrific.

n I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsk which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on ti washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has t do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance If that is a Russian springtime then those people have neve walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the yea If that is the music they used t dance to, it must have been don with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolut music, but I am a simple fellov who likes Beethoven, Brahams Schubert and even Jerome Ker and Gershwin. But do I have t like noise, too? Do I have to g to Tanglewood to hear the Bostor Symphony produce the sounds of newspaper press room? Maybe th critics like the arithmetic of music as for me, give me beauty o melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave th physics of the celestial orbs of th atomic scientists. Their music i boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like t me—just a lot of boom.

* * *

Maybe I ought not to step int the domain of the music criti They apparently know what it i all about and like it. Or mayb up at Tanglewood, they ought t have special sessions for critic and musicologists and such expert who can do their calculus whil they watch Maestro Koussevitzk or his protege, Leonard Bernstei belabor their minions through th cacophony called modern musi But for simple folks who jus want to listen to beauty, this far is too heady like vodka spiked wit anisette.

And the question arises: Wh must everything modern be so exhibionistic, so bombastic, so toug on the ear and the soul? Wh must it all sound like a lie—lik a small boy's lie? Why must eve music be so unmannerly, so gros so grotesque? Youth tells me is the spirit of the age—two wa with a depression in betwee What a spiritless age!

WHEELING, W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER

AUG 2 - 1947

SOKOLSKY: Music in the Hills

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

George E. Sokolsky

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 2 - 1947

These Days:

Music In The Hills And This Spiritless Age

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

George Sokolsky

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pinecovered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright 1947, King Features Syndicate)

HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE

AUG 2 1947

Why Must Everything Modern Be So Hard?

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires, in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week, to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists, who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other, in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood, up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

* * *

Just to Listen.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music, because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G. I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

* * *

A Simple Fellow.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper pressroom?

Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, Boom! That is really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot o' Boom!

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitsky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG-2-1947

FIRST WOMAN CONDUCTOR: Dr. Stanley Chapple, dean of the Berkshire Music Center and assistant conducting teacher, congratulates Miss Iva Dee Hiatt of Berkeley, Cal., following her appearance last night at Tanglewood as the first woman to conduct a student symphony orchestra in the Music Shed. Other students in Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting class who appeared last night were Harry ~~John Brown~~ and Claude Frank. Emmanuel Zambelli was the piano soloist with the orchestra in Rachmaninoff's concerto for piano and orchestra with Dr. Chapple conducting before 2000.

Two Ex-Pilots To Be Soloists In Ninth Symphony at Festival

Two ex-pilots will be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Ninth Symphony that will bring to a close the Beethoven cycle of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Tuesday evening. James Pease, bass, who was for three years in the Army Air Forces, and David Lloyd, tenor, a Naval Air Forces pilot, will sing with Miss Frances Yeend and Miss Eunice Alberts to form the quartet for "Schiller's Ode to Joy."

The concert, which will open with the Eighth Symphony, will start at 7.30 instead of 8.15. The entire Ninth Symphony will be broadcast over the nationwide network of the American Broadcasting Company, which will extend the time over the usual hour so that the radio audience may hear the complete work.

The Festival chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will sing the choral part. Miss Yeend, Miss Alberts and Mr. Pease sang in the quartet for the same work last summer at Tanglewood, and in the opera "Peter Grimes." Mr. Lloyd, a student at the Berkshire Music Center, is at the school this season for the first time.

Sang Twice With BSO

Miss Yeend, a native of the state of Washington, sang twice with the orchestra at Symphony Hall in the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Pease, who appeared at Tanglewood as Falstaff in "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and as the captain in "Peter Grimes," has sung this season in Central City, Col., in "Fidelio" and "Martha." A native of Indianapolis, he was admitted to the Indiana Bar before winning a competition at the Academy of Vocal Arts, Philadelphia.

Born in Minneapolis, Mr. Lloyd won the 1946 "Voice of America" competition sponsored by the Philadelphia Inquirer. While a student at Minneapolis College of Music, where he sang in six choirs learned to play the violin and was third trumpet in the college orchestra, he sang for Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra who encouraged him to study in the East. At the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, studying under Richard Bonelli, he met his wife, also a student at Tanglewood, who is concert-master of the advanced school orchestra.

Miss Alberts, a native Bostonian, studied at the New England Conservatory and the Longy School of Music, Cambridge. She studied with Fritz Lehmann and George Kitzinger, and with Rosalie Miller of New York. She sang with the Boston orchestra last winter.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, given its first performance in America by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra 101 years ago, was first played in Boston by the Germania Musical Society in 1853, assisted by a chorus from the Handel and Haydn Society. Written in 1824, it was dedicated to Wilhelm 3d of Prussia.

The Eighth Symphony, scored for a small orchestra, was first performed at the Redoutensaal in Vienna in 1814.

Tickets for Tuesday's concert and the third series of the Festival the following week end are on sale at the box office.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 3 - 1947

KLX DINNER CONCERTS

MONDAY—Harold In Italy (Berlioz), William Primrose, violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge K[illegible] conducting.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
AUG 3 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard Tuesday, over WBIR, in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The broadcast will be on extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 p. m., so that the entire symphony may be heard. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast.

WORC[illegible] MASS.
TELEGRAM
AUG [illegible] 1947

Tanglewood Series Ends Tuesday

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kous~~sevitzky~~ conducting, ~~will be~~ heard Tuesday night over WORC-ABC in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8.30 and concluding at 9.45 p. m. EDT, so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Centre courses this Summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 2 - 1947

Critics To See Rehearsal of 'Idomeneo'

Preview of Mozart's Opera Tomorrow Night

More than 40 newspaper and magazine crtics of music and drama from all sections of the country and 400 students at the Berkshire Music Center will attend a preview of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo" tomorrow evening in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood. In order that as many persons as the limited space can hold will see the first performance of the opera in America, the dress rehearsal will be open to students and press. Performances for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, as far as seats ~~will permit~~, will be held Monday and Wednesday evenings.

The opera, written in 1780 and 1781, has been seldom performed, due to difficulties of production. The first performance was given in Munich in January, 1781. It was written on commission by Karl Theodore, elector of Bavaria, based on a French libretto by Danchet for a five-act opera, "Idomeneo" by Campra, produced in Paris in 1712.

Performed occasionally in Germany and Austria, the opera was revived in 1931, the 150th anniversary of the first performance, at the Vienna State Opera, later at Munich, and again in 1938 in London.

Edited for production by Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, it has been shortened by him to performable length, but the musical score has been scrupulously respected. . .

WASHINGTON D.C.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1947

Pfohl to Be Director Of Brevard Festival

The second annual Music Festival in Brevard, North Carolina, will take place August 15, 16 and 17 and August 22, 23 and 24. The musical director is James Christian Pfohl who was guest conductor of the National Symphony at the Water Gate on July 8, 1945. The Festival is the outgrowth of the Transylvania Music-School Camp, organized by Mr. Pfohl several years ago. The success of this enterprise, made possible by the co-operation of local musicians and others from Eastman, Curtis Institute and the Juilliard Music School who were on the faculty or were students at the camp, caused a group of 35 Brevard citizens to organize the Festival season which was inaugurated last summer.

The concerts this summer are scheduled for the Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings of each weekend. The first program on August 15 will have Eugene Istomin pianist as soloist in Beethoven's "Concerto No. 4." Adelaide Van Wey, contralto, will give two groups of songs on the Brevard Symphony program the following night and Frances Yeend, soprano, who created the leading role in Koussevitsky's presentation of ~~Britten's~~ "Peter Grimes" at Tanglewood, will be the soloist on Sunday.

The popular young violinist, Patricia Travers, will play the Brahms "Concerto in D major" on August 22 and Edna Phillips, soprano and Julius Huehn, baritone, will be the soloists on the final program, August 24. That of Saturday, August 23, will be all orchestral. A special concert for children will be given on the afternoon of August 23 with the [illegible] year old violinist, Raymond Page of Atlanta [illegible]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
AUG 2 - 1947

Joseph Battista Will Be Soloist

Young American in Beethoven Concerto at Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 1—Joseph Battista, who will be the soloist in the 4th Piano Concerto of Beethoven Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, is a native of Philadelphia.

JOSEPH BATTISTA

Made His Own Way

Born 29 years ago, he won the All-Junior High contest for pianists while attending Philadelphia public school, and later won a scholarship for the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music. Of parents who came from Italy, he was one of nine children, supporting himself while studying music by playing in music halls and restaurants and by summer jobs at resort hotels playing jazz.

After a year at the conservatory, studying under Mme. Olga Samaroff, he won a fellowship in the Juilliard Graduate School and went to New York. When he was 21 he was awarded an appearance under Eugene Ormandy in the Rachmaninoff C minor Concerto in the Youth Contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and soon after the Pennsylvania State Contest of the National Federation of Music Clubs.

In July 1941 he sailed for Rio de Janeiro as winner of a contest sponsored by Columbia Concerts. In Brazil he played for two months before cultural societies, schools of music, colleges, over the radio, with a symphony orchestra and in recital. Assigned to Special Services during the war, he appeared for three years at bond rallies, Red Cross drives, and concerts at Army posts.

He has played with orchestras of Philadelphia, Rochester, Baltimore, Harrisburg, Reading, San Paulo, Brazil, and the National Symphony of Washington.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 3 - 1947

WNBH-ABC marks a musical high spot this Tuesday night with the presentation of Beethoven's 9th Symphony in its entirety, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ conducts the orchestra on one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony is broadcast. The program will be extended 15 minutes so that the entire symphony may be heard. It will start at 8:30 p. m. and continue until 9:45.

The broadcast will be the final one of the season from the Music Festival and the Festival chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center, will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

* * *

Sports fans and fight followers in particular will get a good dose of that sport over WNBH-ABC. The station will carry fight broadcasts on Monday, Tuesday and Friday nights. The Tuesday and Friday night affairs will be the regular bouts from New Bedford's Sargent Field and New York's Madison Square Garden. The Monday bout is a bonus served to listeners. It's the battle for the lightweight championship of the world between Ike Montgomery and Bob Williams. Don Dunphy and Bill Corum will broadcast the 15-round fray from Philadelphia's Municipal Stadium starting at 10 tomorrow night.

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS & POST
AUG 3 1947

Words About Music

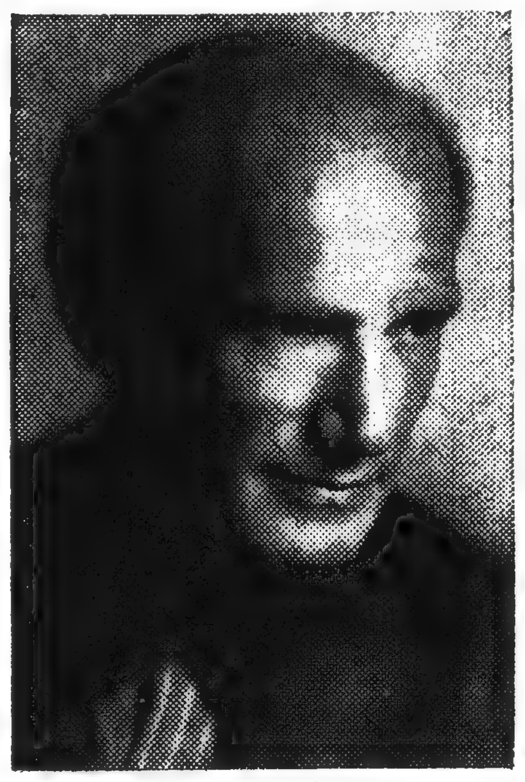
By CHARLES D. PERLEE

TODAY—Pianist Earle Voorhies, Los Angeles Conservatory, 4 p. m.
TODAY—Conductor James Sample, Pianist Sylvia Zaremba, Hollywood Bowl, 7:30 p. m.
TODAY—"Pirates of Penzance," El Patio Theater, 8:30 p. m.
MONDAY—"Bitter Sweet," Greek Theater, 8:30 p. m. (Nightly except Sunday, 8:30.)
TUESDAY—"The Gondoliers," El Patio Theater, 8:30 p. m. (Nightly through Aug. 10, 8:30; matinee Saturday, 2:30.)
TUESDAY—Ballet Russe, Redlands Bowl, 8 p. m.
TUESDAY—Conductor and Pianist Jose Iturbi, Hollywood Bowl, 8:30 p. m.
THURSDAY—Ballet Russe, Hollywood Bowl, 8:30 p. m. (Also Friday, Saturday, 8:30.)
FRIDAY—Soprano Elva Rita, Cellist Gilbert Reese, Redlands Bowl, 8 p. m.

Musical Growth of Pasadena Seen in Lert Appointment to City College

Appointment of Richard Lert as conductor of the new Pasadena City College Symphony and as director of the school's Music Laboratory promises much to the musical future of Pasadena. The orchestra will not only serve as a "feeder" to the Pasadena Civic Orchestra, of which Dr. Lert will remain as conductor, but will perform concerts on its own. Young people at the college may perform in both the C. C. Orchestra and the Civic Orchestra, thus being better prepared for the more advanced group.

Concerts given at City College's Sexson Auditorium will add immeasurably to young people's enjoyment and understanding of music, thus gradually improving the city's musical taste. "Growing up with music" is the best way to musical "appreciation" and with the addition of the C. C. Orchestra the City Schools' Music Department completes the cycle of a good musical education, from kindergarten to the first two years of college. As Music Department Director John Henry Lyons pointed out last week, Pasadenans should be proud of the fact that the city is first in the United States to obtain a distinguished conductor to head a public school orchestra.



RICHARD LERT
City College Conductor

Dr. Lert's work at the school will not in any way interfere with that of the Civic Orchestra. In fact, the arrangement will benefit the Civic Orchestra, because Dr. Lert will be in Pasadena more frequently than in the past.

Two important phases of Dr. Lert's duties at the school will be the training of young conductors and the performing of compositions by students.

Dr. Lert is one in a thousand among conductors and Pasadenans should be everlastingly grateful that they have his services. Here is a man who would rather work with young musicians than conduct a routine professional orchestra. He has turned down engagements time and time again with major orchestras because of the players' lack of enthusiasm for their work. I recall the time "Hans" was rehearsing one such orchestra in Brahms' Symphony No. 1. The players yawned, looked at their watches and most of them presented the attitude that they were superior to Brahms. After 20 minutes of a ragged performance, Hans dismissed the orchestra, saying: "You people are so bored that you might as well go home. Rehearsing won't make you play any better tonight."

I look for great things from City College, even though I'm not acquainted with the talent that will be there in the fall. But I do know what Hans did with the All-Southern California High School Orchestra last spring at Santa Barbara. It took him only two and a half days of rehearsal to make 100 fledgling musicians into a creditable orchestra.

CIVIC ORCHESTRA MOURNS SCHULL LIPSCHUTZ

Pasadena Civic Orchestra members were stunned this week by the news of the death of their assistant conductor, I. Schull Lipschutz, who also had been principal bass and coach of the bass section for eight seasons. Mr. Lipschutz, second only to Koussevitzky as a performer on the bass viol, apparently had recovered [illegible] an illness of several months. Three days before his sudden death from a heart attack he had been rejoicing that he was going to be able to return to his Pasadena duties in the fall.

Mr. Lipschutz was well-loved by all members of the orchestra. He was not only a fine artist, a good teacher and capable conductor, but he was fun. He will be missed greatly, but his high ideals of performance will be carried on by his many pupils, who are not only in the local orchestra but with major symphonies all over the country.

AMARILLO, TEXAS
AMARILLO GLOBE
AUG 3 - 1947

IN THE GROOVE

Kapell Plays Beethoven in New Album

Albums by Koussevitzky and Kapell and singles by Fiedler and Heifetz are presented by RCA Victor's featured Red Seal list for August. The program includes:

Prokofieff: Romeo and Juliet Ballet, Suite No. 2—M-DM-1129.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Two 12 inch Red Seal records.

Beethoven: Concerto No. 2 in B-Flat, Op. 19—M-DM-1132.

Brahms: Intermezzo in E, Op. 116, No. 6 (Included as final side in this album.)

William Kapell, pianist, NBC Symphony Orchestra, Valadimir Golschmann, conductor. William Kapell, pianist, on final side. Four 12-inch records.

Strauss (Johann, Jr.,): Die Fledermaus: Waltzes—No. 10-1310.

(Symphonic transcription by Leopold Stokowski)

Leopold Stokowski and the Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra.

Ponce Estrellita (My Little Star)—No. 10-1314.

(Transcribed by Jasha Heifetz)

Korngold: March (From the Suite "Much Ado About Nothing."

Jascha Heitfetz, violinist, with Emanuel Bay at the piano.

* * *

Release of excerpts from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" in a performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony offers the most important portions of a composition destined to figure prominently in the annals of music history. The two 12-inch records feature four episodes and comprise the first, second, fourth and seventh movements from the second of two suites arranged by the composer when he found the original form of the ballet somewhat unwieldly because of its length.

Koussevitzky and the orchestra extract the full flavor of the brilliant music, which alternates between profound tragedy and exquisite tenderness. Throughout can be detected musical the bitter irony of a situation brought about by the hostility of the lovers' families. Never in modern times has the story been told more eloquently through music than in this superb recording.

As a piece of art work the ballet has twofold importance. It marked a turning point in Prokofieff's life when, after a 15-year absence from his native Russia he had to face the problem of reconciling his creative outlook with the artistic trends of the day. It is the fourth great representation in music of Shakespear's immortal tragedy, others having been done by Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikowsky.

* * *

William Kapell has enjoyed as much success in his concert performances of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-Flat, as in his performances of Soviet composer Anam Khatchaturian's Piano Concerto, which he recorded for RCA Victor with the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, and which became one of the five top selling albums less than two months after its release last February. The release marks Kapell's record debut in a concerto by one of the great classic masters.

While Beethoven's score has lost none of its rare beauty and vitality since it was written 152 years ago, it takes a discerning master of the keyboard like Kapell to bring out its true glories. In the hands of the artist, who's brilliant musicianship is apparent in every note, the concerto sparkles from beginning end.

* * *

While his name adds distinction to whatever he chooses to conduct, Stokowski will always be remembered for his interpretations of Johann Strauss' waltzes, "The Blue Danube" and "Tales From the Vienna Woods," both of which he recorded many years ago. With the present recording of waltzes from "Die Fledermaus," Stokowski adds to his memorable performances of music that never fails to delight young and old alike. Remarkable clarity and precision of playing are noteworthy in this topnotch interpretation by the Hollywood Bowl Symphony.

* * *

Even the most familiar music takes on new appeal when it is played by a top artist. This is the case with Ponce's "Estrellita," which is rarely missing as an encore in a recital by Heifetz, and the less familiar "March" from Erich Korngold's suite, "Much Ado About Nothing." Aside from the fact that Heifetz is at home in his own transcription of the piece, the limpid quality of "Estrellita" gives the violinist an unusual opportunity to display the fullblooded tone for which he is famous. The "March" affords pleasant contrast and helps provide perfect musical fare in this release.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DISPATCH
AUG 3 - 1947

RECORD NOTES

RCA Victor's release of excerpts from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," in a performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to records the most important portions of a composition destined to figure prominently in the annals of music history. The episodes from "Romeo and Juliet" featured on these discs are four in number and comprise the first, second, fourth and seventh movements from the second of two suites arranged by the composer when he found the original form of the ballet unwieldy because of its length.

Prokofieff began work on the score for "Romeo and Juliet" following the completion of his lyrical and brilliant Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, which is available on RCA Victor Records in a recording by Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Completed in September, 1935, and first played in concert form a month later in Moscow with the composer conducting, the ballet was the subject of furious controversy when it became known that it was to have a happy ending, contrary to Shakespeare's drama. Later, it was decided to adhere to the original Shakespearean plot.

As a piece of artwork the Romeo and Juliet" ballet has twofold importance. It marked a turning point in Prokofieff's life when, after a 15-year absence from his native Russia he had to face the problem of reconciling his creative outlook with the artistic trends of the day. Also, it is the fourth great representation in music of Shakespeare's immortal love tragedy, others having been done by Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikowsky.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony extract the full flavor of this brilliant music, which alternates between profound tragedy and exquisite tenderness. Throughout can be detected musically the bitter irony of a situation brought about by the hostility of the lovers' families. Never in modern times has the story of Romeo and Juliet been told more eloquently through music than in this superb recording.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
AUG 11 1947

New Attendance Record set At Berkshire Music Fest

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11, (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and founder and director of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16, for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

PORTSMOUTH, VA.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1947

The Music Box

By KIT HARDY

GIAN-CARLO MENOTTI'S opera, "The Medium," will be given its radio premiere Sunday, August 10, at 2 p. m. (EST) over CBS. Alfredo Antonini will conduct the CBS Symphony Orchestra, and the original Broadway cast will sing. The hour and one-half broadcast also will include Menotti's short opera, "The Telephone."

ON TUESDAY, August 21, Mutual brings to the airwaves for the first time a three-movement musical opus of Sgt. Paul Siegel, of Brooklyn, N. Y., currently attached to headquarters, Vienna Area Command. The work, entitled, "Symphonic Diary," will be played by the Chicago Symphonic Orchestra directed by Henry Weber. In Siegel's words, the opus is "the diary of a GI who wanted to put down his musical impressions." Contained in the three movements are the impressions of the rookie city-bred soldier as he trains in rural Alabama, California, and then at Lowry Field, Colorado.

WINNING name for the self-composed theme song of band-leader Ray Anthony is "Dreamy Serenade," and was supplied by Peggy J. Dunn, of Philadelphia. The melody which regularly introduces Anthony's Mutual show, "Bands for Bonds" (12:30 p. m., EST), will no longer be nameless.

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will be heard in its final broadcast of the season Tuesday evening on a program of extended time beginning at 7:30 p. m. (EST) over ABC. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in the Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The entire symphony will be heard and appearing with the orchestra will be Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

STILL going strong after lo, these many months, is the lovely waltz, "Anniversary Song," which overshadowed all other of the array of tunes heard in "The Jolson Story." No. 1 in sheet music sales in this country, it also heads the list of sales in England.

[185]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 3 - 1947

Record Throng of 14,000 At Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Sunday—An all-time record audience of 14,000 attended the second of four concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven last night in Tanglewood's Music Shed. This seventh concert of the Berkshire Music Festival was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Jacob Lateiner, 18-year-old Cuban pianist was soloist.

The works performed were "Symphony No. 4 in B-Flat Major, Opus 60," "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Opus 67," and "Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-Flat Major, Opus 73."

Jacob Lateiner, who received a rousing ovation for his performance of the Piano Concerto, is an extraordinarily gifted pianist for his age or any other. His technic is more than adequate, but does not match that of an increasingly large number of young pianistic giants who are invading the concert stage. The "Emperor Concerto" does not require the Bravura style of technic, but it is far from lacking in extravagant demands.

Diction Clear

Lateiners approach to the "Emperor" was academic rather than spiritual. The diction was clear, phrasing immaculate, and out and transmitted with taste and well-founded musicianship.

The quality it lacked was a subtle but essential abandon. Beethoven felt a "Joie-de-Vivre" in this work that absorbs its moments of serious contemplation. The absence of this quality was particularly in evidence at the conclusion of the last movement. It was not a question of distortion but rather of a misconception of its spiritual essence.

Lateiner was at his best in the "Adagio." His melodies were beautifully balanced and the movements pensiveness was sensitively reflected.

Theory Upset

The analyst who has settled on the theory that the "even-numbered" symphonies by Beethoven are of dramatic inconsequence was upset in his conclusions by Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony (and by the Second of Thursday night for that matter.) These performances (five symphonies thus far) rather have proved that the odd-numbered are epic rather than lyric.

This may also sound like fruitless theorizing but in pure matters of technical execution such a high point has been consistently reached that a comprehensive analysis must be concentrated on underlying impressions. The most prevalent fact is that Koussevitzky has a lucid picture of what he wants to hear in each work and he has been eminently successful in extracting the most detailed content from his orchestra.

Cycle Resumes Tomorrow

The Fourth Symphony was perhaps rescued from its fate of being a shadow of the rebellious Third ("Eroica") by being played on a different night. However, the breeziness of its themes and disarming lyricism were dominating influences.

Even after a war-torn career, the Fifth Symphony (now called "Victory") has lost none of its power of invigoration. It required only to hear the opening movement, which is all our deadline permitted, to realize that it towers over its predecessors in drama and strength.

The Beethoven cycle will be resumed tomorrow afternoon with the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies. Joseph Battista, 29-year-old pianist from Philadelphia will play the "Concerto in G Major, No. 4 Opus 58."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 3 - 1947

These Days

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I AM not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to undertanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

THIS year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, althongh I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones.

All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

SO the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around.

It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome.

I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

THE critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room?

Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling.

I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

MAYBE I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitsky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music.

But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

AUG 3 - 1947

Eddy in Movie Score

Nelson Eddy is presented in songs from his movie, "Northwest Passage", in a Columbia album of three 12-inch discs. In a romantic vein, the handsome baritone sings "Love Is the Time", "Nearer and Dearer" and "Tell Me With Your Eyes." Two of Friml's lovely march songs, "One More Mile" and "Raindrops on a Drum" receive typical Eddy interpretations, but a high point of the album is maestro, Robert Armbruster's arrangement of the traditional Russian hymns sung during the Easter service.

Columbia and Victor have both issued "Student Prince" albums, but Columbia's is the more complete, containing some 20 selections from Romberg's beloved musical. Marek Weber conducts the orchestra, chorus and soloists in the Columbia album which contains four 10-inch discs. Victor's album, containing the same number of records but fewer selections, is performed by Al Goodman's orchestra with Earl Wrightson, Donald Dame, Mary Martha Briney and Frances Greer.

Two albums of Johann Sebastian Bach music, recorded by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Festival last year, are now released by Victor. His Brandenburg Concertos, No. 2 in F and No. 5 in D, are both contained in an album of four 12-inch records, with Roger Voison playing solo trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin, and Lukas Foss, piano. The other album, containing five 12-inch discs, offers Suites Nos. 2 (B Minor) and 3 (in D) with Laurent as solo flutist.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

AUG 3 - 1947

Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff, ballet dancers, will be featured stars for the Music Under the Stars concert at Washington Park Tuesday night, along with Robert Merrill, baritone. Tauno Hannikainen will be guest conductor.

Ballet Dancers, Baritone Featured On 'Music Under the Stars' Program

Robert Merrill, baritone and star of radio program, and Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff, ballet dancers, along with Tauno Hannikainen as guest conductor, will be the featured artists for the Music Under the Stars concert Tuesday, at the Emil Blatz Temple of Music in Washington Park.

Merrill, although only 28 years old, made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in December, 1945, and was selected to open the Carnegie Pops series at Carnegie Hall in 1946. Since then he has been signed to open the series yearly for the next 10 years.

Miss Woicikowska and Mouradoff are members of the Foxhole Ballet which receives its name from the fact that it was the first ballet group organized to perform for American soldiers overseas. Both have also been members of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Miss Woicikowska revealed her versatility as a comedienne dancer when she toured with "Oklahoma" last year. Both of them were educated in European ballet schools.

Hannikainen is associate conductor of the Chicago Symphony and has been guest conductor of the Minneapolis, Boston and New York City Symphony Orchestras. He has also conducted the Duluth and Toronto Symphonies. Before his arrival in this country in 1940 from his native Finland, Hannikainen was guest conductor of symphony orchestras in Berlin, Warsaw, Stockholm, Helsinki, Riga and Leipzig.

The program for Tuesday follows:

Rienzi (Overture) .... Wagner
Orchestra
Di Provenza al mar (from "La Traviata") .... Verdi
Largo al factotum (from "The Barber of Seville") .... Rossini
Robert Merrill
Slavonic Dance, Opus 72, No. 2 . Dvorak
Orchestra
Falling in Love With Someone (from "Naughty Marietta"). .... Victor Herbert
Play Gypsy, Dance Gypsy .... Lehar
Robert Merrill
Intermission
Finlandia .... Sibelius
Orchestra
Valse .... Chopin
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Waltz "Dorfschwalben aus Oesterreich" (Village Swallows of Austria) .... Josef Strauss
Orchestra
Grand Pas de Deux (from "Swan Lake") .... Tschaikowsky
(a) Adagio
(b) Variation
(c) Variation
(d) Coda
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Dance of the Hours (from "Gioconda") .... Ponchielli
Orchestra
Chinese Ribbon Dance . . Victor Crandall
Grant Mouradoff
Kuyawiak (Polish Dance) . . Wieniawski
Sonia Woicikowska
Polonaise .... Tschaikowsky
Orchestra
Sardar (Caucasian dances) .... Ippolitov-Ivanoff
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Romeo and Juliet .... Tschaikowsky
Orchestra

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 1 7 1947

Koussevitsky Weds First Wife's Niece

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 16 (INS).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was revealed today to have married Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, niece of his first wife, yesterday in secret ceremony.

The marriage was disclosed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church, who performed the ceremony.

NEW YORK, [illegible] RETAILING
(Ho[illegible])

AUG 7

● ● ● Berkshire Music Festival: Arthur Crawford of A. A. Crawford, Inc., Beverly Hills, Cal., was on hand when RCA Victor unveiled its custom-built line at Tanglewood, Mass., [illegible] a special interest in the new line having been in part responsible for the development of the remote-control unit used which enables stations to be dialed from any room in the house . . . Another on hand was Louis M. LeMair of Lyon & Healy, Chicago, who is also prexy of the NAMM. He brought his wife and daughter along . . . A lively time was had by three New York competitors: Jack Winer of Dynamic Electronics, Abe Kaye of Liberty Music Shops, and George Lohman of Haynes-Griffin, who were thrown together in the same drawing room . . . Miss Beryle Davis, the firm's new English recording star, was on hand and well chaperoned by John Murray, V.P. in charge of records; Joe Elliott, V.P. in charge of home receivers; and Mr Crawford . . .

[186]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 3 - 1947

Koussevitzky Thrills Crowds in Berkshires

By Thalia

PITTSFIELD, Mass.—[Special]—Music is in the air both actually and conversationally for miles around. The nationally and internationally famous Berkshire Music festival is held in Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge for three weeks each season and every summer place is filled with music lovers. The Berkshire festival has become a pilgrimage in the less than a decade of its life. Other great music festivals, like Salzburg, for instance, took much longer to achieve the dual halos of musical and social sanctity.

But this part of Massachusetts has been a summer retreat of intellectual society since the days when Hawthorne wrote his Tanglewood Tales for the children who used to gather round a fireplace which still stands in the home of Mrs. William Bullard in whose husband's family it has been for generations. Her house, like all of the old houses hereabouts has been remodeled with its historic shrine reverently preserved

It adjoins the 210 acre musical Valhalla to which fortunate music lovers are translated before, not after, they die, and which is named for the classic Hawthorne stories. The estate belonged to a Boston family devoted to culture and in 1936 it was given to the Boston Symphony orchestra by Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Andrew Hepburn, and Tanglewood as a music center became a reality.

• • •

Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the Boston Symphony, is not only in the top stratum of musicianship but he is in the stratosphere of dreamers who manage to get their dreams realized. For if ever a man has watched a dream walking and playing a violin and holding a baton and singing and carpentering a stage set that man is Mr. Koussevitzky. He dreamed of founding a school of music and opera and here it is. They say that he is now dreaming a Greek theater and he may be again an Aladdin—with the tr[illegible]s of the Boston Symphony and the friends of the Berkshire Music center playing genii to him. Mrs. Donald Mc Pherson and Mrs. William G. Hibbard are Chicago members of the friends.

For six weeks the schools are in a flurry of ecstatic work. For three of those weeks the Berkshire festival is held, and if one could manage it physically one could listen to 14 regular concerts by the full Boston Symphony orchestra, concerts by the student orchestra, chamber music concerts, performances of opera and choral music and rehearsals of all of them.

• • •

Hostesses invite their music loving friends especially for the weekends of the festival, and at the spinning round of luncheons, cocktail and dinner parties the conversation is as often straight out of Grove's Musical dictionary as it is out of a smart novel.

For the dinner parties the women wear their choicest gowns and in the chill of the evening their bare shoulders are cosy under mink and sable. The gentlemen who belong to the dinner jacket every night school look upon those who appear in sports jackets as rebels. Every one doesn't dress, however. Those who bring blankets and sit or lie outside are in every stage of dress and undress, and on Sunday the wide grass lands within hearing distance disclosed more than one pair of stockings laid out to dry and bare toes twinkled contentedly.

• • •

The fortunate boxholders for the concerts can drive up to the entrance of "The Shed" for the full orchestra concerts. Others park a block or more away and walk. "The Shed" is a pie shaped structure which shelters 6,000. Even those who have a passion for modern architecture must call it purely functional. The gossip is that its acoustics don't do right by soloists, but there is such a sacrosanct air about everything concerning the festival that those doubts are whispered. It is also whispered that there is still an unfulfilled desire on the part of many of those emotionally entangled in Tanglewood for a typically New England "Shed."

Chicago may be a thousand miles away but it has had an intimate part in the Berkshire music, greater than many of the visitors here realize. It was a former Chicagoan, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge who sponsored the internationally famous chamber music concerts which antedated the Tanglewood festival. They were held in her music temple on South Mountain, now not open, but the magnificent Mrs. Coolidge is still here, honored by every one, when she appears at the festival. The late Miss Kate Buckingham who gave Chicago its beautiful lake front fountain lived in the big white house on the mountainside looking down over the lake called the Stockbridge bowl and Tanglewood itself which Mr. Koussevitzky now owns. Miss Buckingham willed the estate to Walter Byron Smith from whom Koussevitzky bought it.

• • •

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
AUG 3 - 1947

Music

CAREER, MARRIAGE BUGABOO DISPROVED

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Sunday—The answer to Hollywood's time-worn question whether marriage and a career can be successfully combined is to be found in a little white cottage at Tyringham. It is here that Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz spend active Summers preparing for heavy Winter tours that are matched by no artists on the concert stage.

Genia and Pierre Luboshutz, a happy marital and professional pair, do their practicing in the morning. As Mr. Luboshutz will tell you—"Please call us in the morning—before ten." As you know, they will play the Mozart "Concerto for two Pianos," at the Worcester Festival in October.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz admire each others' playing for different reasons. "Genia has an amazing faculty for reading music freely—she can play it fluently, almost as soon as she has read it through," says Pierre.

Has Good Memory

Genia, on the other hand, admires her husband's memory—"He can remember every detail of what he has studied," she confdes. "Sometimes he postpones hearing something he is to play until a short time before the concert . . ."But here Pierre interrupted—"It is while Genia is out shopping that I practice on the sly."

Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz have been married sixteen years. It has been widely publicized that she was his pupil in Paris, but the fact is that she studied with him but for a few weeks. They fell in love and the piano lessons came to an end.

Their association as duo-pianists happened quite by chance. Mr. Luboshutz had made his debut in Russia under Serge Koussevitzky many years before and Mrs. Luboshutz was embarked on a brilliant career.

FESTIVAL ARTISTS

Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz relax at their Summer home at Tyringham. The noted duo-pianists will appear at the Worcester Music Festival in October.

Her New York Debut

He likes to tell about her New York debut in 1933. "It was a wonderful performance. Not a wrong note, everything was perfect. But it was always the same. After each New York concert we went in different directions—Genia would leave for a concert in one place, and I in another. We were tired of saying goodbye in railroad stations. Then we were engaged for a series of two-piano recitals over the air. Our managers were impressed with the quantity of fan mail, and we decided to team up permanently—and be together."

Brilliant Arranger

Mr. Luboshutz is the builder of their programs. He selects the repertory, and as you probably know, is a brilliant arranger. Mrs. Luboshutz is "secretary" for the pair—that is when she gets an opportunity to answer letters they receive.

"Pierre keeps misplacing correspondence, she says. "He reads letters and then they disappear. I don't know what he does with them."

If there is a royal family among musicians, I presume it is the Luboshutz family. Pierre's sister is Lea Luboshutz, who gave a brilliant violin recital at the Art Museum a few seasons ago. Their nephew is Boris Goldowsky, who has also appeared at the Art Museum in piano recitals.

Story About Nephew

They gleefully tell a story about their nephew. Although Pierre has an excellent English vocabulary and manages to make himself understood very well, he does have a Russian accent and sometimes translates his English in Russian.

It happened not so long ago. Pierre and Genia, having no children of their own, their nephew holds an important place in their lives. They were jokingly discussing the eventual disposition of their worldly goods, enumerating their various possessions, when Pierre suddenly remarked—"and don't forget, we are accidentally insured, also."

Has Rare Books

One day Goldowsky was examing his aunt's impressive collection of rare books, when she exclaimed—"I'm so glad to see how interested you are in my books."

"Oh, I was just looking them over to see that I don't buy any duplicates." Don't misunderstand any of this—they are devoted to each other.

Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Luboshutz are given to say what they do not mean, merely because it [illegible] expected of them. [illegible] when they repeatedly expressed their pleasure at returning to Worcester, they meant just that.

There is not an ounce of conceit in [illegible] of them. Many artists re[illegible] criticism wi[illegible] varying degr[illegible] objecon that range from r[illegible]ach bitter resentment.

Test of True Artist

Mrs. Luboshutz speaks for her husband as well as for herself when she says—"We always read our reviews with great care. We have been fortunate in that we have played for critics who like us (that is her explanation, but I have another) and when we occasionally read critical suggestions, no matter who the critic is or where, we read them with care. We realize that he may very well be right."

That is the difference between true artist and a mediocre upstart who is convinced that he is his own best judge.

PITTSBURGH PA
PRESS
AUG 3 - 1947

Webster Aitken To Teach at Tech

Webster Aitken, internationally known pianist, will be a member of the Carnegie Tech music faculty for the fall semester. His rank will be visiting professor of piano.

Mr. Aitken

The American-born artist began studying piano at 7. When he was 17 he went to Europe to study and made his professional debut in Vienna in 1929, appearing with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra.

He made his American debut in 1935 in New York. During the war he played concerts in this country and Canada, appearing with the Boston Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the New York Philharmonic.

In Pittsburgh he played a recital at Carnegie Tech in 1946 for the Pittsburgh Chapter, International Society for Contemporary Music.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
AUG 3 - 1947

CLOSING concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, ~~Lenox, Mass.,~~ will be attended by Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Follet of Candee ave., who will leave Thursday for performances that evening, Saturday and Sunday, when the festival will close. Beginning on Thursday, July 17, the festival is presenting concerts in three series which have included programs by the full Boston Symphony orchestra, ~~Juilliard string~~ quartet of New York and numbers by the student orchestra of the Music Center. Mozart's three-act opera "Idomeneo" will be heard tomorrow and Wednesday. The Berkshire Music center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school, of which Serge Koussevitsky is the director.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
AUG 3 - 1947

Tanglewood Season Will Close Aug. 10

In the last week of the Tanglewood season that will close Aug. 10, the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra will play four concerts and the students of the Berkshire Music center will give seven performances.

This week's program will open with the playing of the sixth and seventh symphonies and Piano Concerto No. 4 this afternoon. The conclusion of the Beethoven cycle with the eighth and ninth symphonies is scheduled Tuesday at the earlier hour of 7.30 p. m.

For the last weekend, Leonard Bernstein will conduct on Thursday evening, Aug. 7, Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Hindemith's Violin Concerto. Ruth Posselt, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Robert Shaw will conduct Saturday evening's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem", with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun Is Das Heil"; and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, with 12 pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero", and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
AUG 3 - 1947

Album: J. S. Bach Suites Nos. 2 in B minor and 3 in D major, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting (five 12-inch Victor records, $6.15).

Truly without match is this recorded performance of the second and third Bach suites. Mr. Koussevitzky, the musicians of the Boston orchestra and Georges Laurent, solo flutist, perform as if each one of them were an expert on Bach—which probably is the case.

Not only is this entire album superbly performed, but it is recorded with exceptional fidelity of tone, balance and a broad dynamic range. Victor's engineers must be musicians, too. Often an otherwise good recording is marred by poor monitoring (control of volume, bass and treble tone, etc., by sound engineers). This album is notably free of that.

The third suite, in D major, is sonorous, emphatic and joyous. Its second movement, the familiar "Air for G String," is played slowly, with sensitivity and meticulous care.

MIAMI FLA.
NEWS
AUG 3 - 1947

Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 9, Op. 70: Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky, ~~conductor. Three 12"~~ RCA Victor records DM-1134: Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, of New York, Efram Kurtz, conductor. Four 12" Columbia Masterworks MM-688.

Both recordings of Shostakovitch's Ninth symphony deserve careful consideration as they present the score in two distinct styles. Both are noteworthy musical organizations. Each conductor reads different meanings in the work and it is interesting to compare their performances. Koussevitsky, in his interpretation of Prokofieff's Fifth pays close attention to the sultry details, and to the richness of the composer's melodic material. Kurtz, on the contrary, is clearer, and reads more "ultra-modern burlesque" into his performance. Koussevitsky introduced the work to American audiences last July at Tanglewood, and for sheer musical value, we favor his presentation over the Columbia set. Technically, both are first-rate.

4-10

AUG 3 - 1947

FROM THE HEART

Music With Something to Say Can Take Or Leave Fashions of Day

By OLIN DOWNES

THE aphorism of Schumann is well known: that you can conceal revolution within the four walls of a symphony, and the police be none the wiser.

We thought of this when they played Arthur Honegger's Symphony for strings with solo trumpet at Tanglewood last week. This symphony was composed by Honegger in Paris in 1941, during the German occupation. The Germans had made overtures to Honegger: that he should conduct in Germany; later, that he should be displayed to the public as an artist ideologically, if not racially, on the German side. He declined both offers, and penned, during the period of occupation, this symphony.

We believe that if Hitler's henchmen had had the perception to grasp the significance of this "materiel," they certainly would have suppressed its appearance For this score impresses us as music not only of tragedy but revolt; or even worse from the viewpoint of the aggressor—of faith in deliverance.

True, it could be contended—Mr. Honegger might himself contend—that there was no such notion as this in his mind when he composed the symphony. Indeed it is not customary today for composers to proclaim their states of mind as they used to do in the vociferous nineteenth century. They now think it more desirable to describe their scores as a salesman would the machinery of an automobile. For this shows that they are writing not programmatic, or romantic, or merely emotional, but "pure" music.

Communication

But the final test of the pudding is its eating. The final test of music is what it communicates to listeners. For the present writer this score of Honegger communicates intense feeling that comes from deep within, and not merely characteristics of style or form. Indeed it is more related to the inner than to the phenomena of the outer world.

The capital joke and jeux d'esprit, "Pacific 231," the locomotive piece, by the musician who gaily observed that he loved locomotives as other men loved women and horses! That best seller of a dramatic cantata, with voices, orchestra, and speaker, "Roi David"—these were scores which made one believe that in essence Mr. Honegger was a musician for the theatre or screen, and a composer without mezzotints or heed for the inner recesses of the spirit. His laughter in such pieces as the "Pacific" was contagious, Chabriesque. His sense of theatre was evident on every page of "Roi David" and related scores. His workmanship, from the beginning—as for example in the early score of "Horace victorieux"—was brilliant and sure. He had a rich musical vein, and inexhaustible vitality.

But see what has happened in the pages of this symphony.

Interior Music

It is in the first place music without exterior connection. It bears no title, other than the generic and appropriate one of "Symphony for Strings." The addition of the solo trumpet at the last may or may not have been an afterthought. The craftsmanship is the essence of concentrated thought, consequent upon the inner dynamism of the musical ideas themselves. A main theme, immediately announced, is central to the structure and to the spiritual action of the entire three-movement work. In the finale the apparition of the trumpet is no mere gesture; its chorale-theme has already germinated in previous pages.

The devices used in the music, as such, can be found in a hundred contemporaneous scores. Thus they appear oftenest as instrumental gadgets and tricks of the trade, just as plausible in the musical literature of today as the bumbling counterpoint of contemporaries of J. S. Bach was in the early eighteenth century, and no more important to posterity. What matters in this new symphony, yet to be heard in New York, is the composer's emotion which has wrung from him richly expressive music. For Mr. Honegger, in these pages, is speaking, willy-nilly, from the depths of his heart. One would say that what he is saying has gripped him hard, and was not to be evaded by him, or referred to in terms of artistic casuistry.

Result of [illegible]

AT THE STADIUM

TANGLEWOOD, WHERE ANNUAL BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL WILL END NEXT SUNDAY

At top, the Music Shed where the symphonic concerts by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, are held. Lower left, Boris Goldovsky directs a rehearsal of Mozart's "Idomeneo," which will be performed for the first time in this country tomorrow night. Lower right, students of stagecraft work on sets of "Idomeneo."

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

AUG 3 - 1947

One of those friends is the aforesaid Mr. Robinson, at the moment preoccupied with Koussevitzky's birthday party, which took place at Tanglewood July 26. The program was kept a secret from the guest of honor, who arrived with his party just as the lights were going down.

"After the intermission," says our observant reporter, "Leonard Bernstein came on the stage and announced the first performance of a new work by himself. To appreciate it, he said, you must know two facts: First, that Bima is the name of the Koussevitzky cocker spaniel; and second, that the principal theme of the new work is the tune to which, when whistled by his master, Bima responds. Would the trombone please sound it? The trombone obliged. The work was scored for solo violin and 11 brass instruments, took 59 seconds to play and you thought the roof would come down.

Serge Koussevitzky

Ruth Gordon

"Before all this the chorus had assembled at either side of the stage. Hugh Ross came on and announced that the composer of the next work would be easily recognizable and that after 300 years they at last had the right words for the music—and here they are: The Drinker translation of the Bach Wedding Cantata with of course Koussevitzky's name inserted in place of the happy couple. Mr. Biggs [J. Power] took his place at the organ and a lone trumpeter played those long figurations. What a tribute! The place went crazy and afterward there was an enormous cake in the green room. This morning at the public rehearsal the symphony men disregarded the music for the Samuel Barber overture on their stands and when Koussevitzky gave them the downbeat went fortissimo into 'Happy Birthday to You'."

MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL

AUG 3 - 1947

IT MIGHT be expected that the Boston symphony and Serge Koussevitzky would do a good job with the second and fifth "Brandenburg" concertos of Bach. In any event, they do and the RCA Victor album containing recordings of the two is heartily recommended. This is stuff for true music lovers who will never cease to find huge satisfaction in the strength and nobility of the incomparable Bach.

As for the recording, it is apparent that Koussevitzky and his men have given the work their best and surely they have the resources to make a great thing of it.

The Boston people, not so long ago, recorded the third and the fourth of the "Brandenburg" series. That was also a fine chore.

COLUMBIA contributes an album of special interest to the public that feels kindly toward the moderns. It is a recording of Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements," recently finished in a bit of a fever.

It is the comment of the composer that the "sharp and shifting events of our arduous time" with its "continual torments and, at last, cessation and relief" may have left traces upon his work. He doesn't say yes, and he doesn't say no, but the listener will doubtless conclude that "continual torments" have indeed played a part in the Stravinsky inspiration. In any case, the music sounds that way and it's all quite disturbing.

The composer himself conducts the Philharmonic symphony orchestra of New York and you may be sure there is no coasting. Stravinsky, as a matter of fact, is always exciting as a conductor and in this exercise he really goes to town.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

AUG 3 - 1947

Mozart 'First' To Be Presented At Tanglewood

New York, Aug. 2 (UP)

MOZART'S OPERA "Idomeneo" will be performed for the first time in America by the Berkshire Music Center, the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., of which Serge Koussevitzky is director.

The production will be directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky. Richard Rychtarik will design the sets. The orchestra and singers, as in the production of "Peter Grimes" last season, will consist of pupils of the Berkshire Music Center.

Two performances will be given during the last week of the festival on Monday and Wednesday evenings, Aug. 4 and 6. Admission will be by invitation to friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomeneo, King of Crete" in 1780, in his 24th year. It is considered by some one of his greatest works, but because of its length and the absence of printed parts, it has been performed only occasionally in Europe. Since no part exists in America, a full set is being copied for the Tanglewood production.

AMERICAN music needs consistent promotion and more frequent preformances to achieve its proper place, in the opinion of F. Charles Adler, conductor of the Saratoga Music Festival, which opens at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., on Sept. 6.

"We glorify all kinds of American things, from antiques and ancestors to hot dogs and chorus girls," Adler observed. "Why not take a little time out and glorify American culture? Let's give American music a chance to be heard."

Adler, who has a fondness for listing premieres on his programs, gave 43 first performances at the Saratoga Festival last year. He has about 30 this year.

"We will never develop a musical culture," Adler continued, "until we foster American music. We have a large body of men and women in this country today writing music in a rich and varied tradition and experimenting with the future. They cannot live, they cannot learn, they cannot grow unless their music is played.

"New music admittedly is controversial—especially that by Americans. Audiences are said to stay away from it, although it has been our experience that an audience not only accepts but enjoys the new when it it is interstingly introduced.

"No audience should be asked to listen to 'all-American' programs. The listener should have variety, so that he may compare the present with the past. The composer should likewise be asked to measure his creative work against the accepted art of the past."

THE NBC Symphony Orchestra will shift to Saturday evening broadcasts starting Saturday, Oct. 4. It will be heard from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m., New York time.

The change, NBC announced, was made with the approval of Arturo Toscanini, permanent conductor. It moves the program to an evening listening period after years on the Sunday afternoon time.

Toscanini will resume his direction of the orchestra on Oct. 25. The symphony was formed in 1937 and has been heard on the air continuously since then with Toscanini as permanent conductor.

Joseph Szigeti, violinist, has left for a six-month concert tour of England and the Continent. He will appear in August at the Engadine Festival in Switzerland and at the Edinburgh International Festival of music and dance. Thereafter his tour will take him to France, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland and England. Szigeti returns to this country in mid-December for his annual coast-to-coast tour.

FRITZ MAHLER has been appointed conductor of the Erie (Pa.) Philharmonic. With his appointment the orchestra is being completely professionalized. Its coming season will be expanded and negotiations are under way for important concert artists to appear as soloists.

A nephew of the famous composer, Gustav Mahler, the conductor came to this country in 1936 and has since become an American citizen.

MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL

AUG 3 - 1947

Songs, Dance 'Under Stars'

Four Artists Coming

Four guest artists, headed by Robert Merrill, young baritone of the Metropolitan opera, will be featured on the seventh Music Under the Stars program of the season in Washington park at 8:15 p.m. Tuesday.

Besides Merrill, the entertainers include Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff, ballet dancers, and Tauno Hannikainen, Finnish conductor, who will direct the orchestra.

Merrill made his debut with the Metropolitan opera in December, 1945. In 1946 he opened the "Pops" series at Carnegie hall, and since then has been signed to perform that role for the next 10 years.

Miss Woicikowska and Mouradoff are members of the Foxhole Ballet, which claims to have been the first ballet group organized to entertain American soldiers overseas during the war. Both dancers formerly were with the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.

Hannikainen, who came to this country from his native Finland in 1940, is associate conductor of the Chicago symphony orchestra. He has served as guest conductor for the Minneapolis, Boston and New York symphony orchestras, as well as various orchestras ~~in European~~ centers.

The program will be as follows:

Rienzi (overture) .... Wagner
Orchestra
Di Provenza al Mar (from La Traviata) .... Verdi
Largo al Factotum (from The Barber of Seville) .... Rossini
Robert Merrill
Slavonic Dance, Opus 72, No. 2 ... Dvorak
Orchestra
Falling in Love With Someone (from Naughty Marietta) .... Victor Herbert
Play, Gypsy, Dance, Gypsy .... Lehar
Robert Merrill

INTERMISSION

Finlandia .... Sibelius
Orchestra
Valse .... Chopin
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Waltz Dorfschwalben aus Oesterreich (Village Swallows of Austria) .... Josef Strauss
Orchestra
Grand Pas de Deux (from Swan Lake) .... Tchaikovsky
Adagio
Variation
Variation
Coda
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Dance of the Hours (from Gioconda) .... Ponchielli
Orchestra
Chinese Ribbon Dance .. Victor Crandall
Grant Mouradoff
Kujawiak (Polish Dance) .. Wieniawski
Sonia Woicikowska
Polonaise .... Tchaikovsky
Orchestra
Sardar (Caucasian Dances) .... Ippolitov-Ivanoff
Sonia Woicikowska and Grant Mouradoff
Romeo and Juliet .... Tchaikovsky
Orchestra

A picture of Robert Merrill, baritone, appears in the Screen and Radio Section today.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

AUG 3 - 1947

Met Announces 18-Week Season Opening Nov. 10

New York, Aug. 2 (UP)

THE METROPOLITAN Opera Company has announced its performance schedule for 1947-48, calling for a season of 18 weeks starting next Nov. 10 and ending on March 13, 1948. That parallels the successful 1946-47 season, which opened on Nov. 11 and ran 18 weeks.

Plans for new productions and revivals, new singers, conductors, etc., will not be announced until the end of the summer, during which General Manager Edward Johnson will be engaged in his usual talent hunt and study of production possibilities.

ONE THING is fairly certain, however, that the American premiere of Serge Prokofieff's massive opera, "War and Peace," based on the Tolstoi novel, will be given, after having been held up a season by various difficulties.

Also, Wagner's complete "Ring" cycle will be resumed. It was dropped because the ancient sets were too shabby. It will be given a $100,000 new production, with the scenery designed by Lee Simonson. The entirely new settings were made possible by the work of the Metropolitan Opera Guild on behalf of the production fund.

BOSTON'S FAMED open-air concerts on the Charles River esplanade are being held again this summer under Arthur Fiedler's direction. It is the 19th consecutive season Fiedler has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians.

Concerts are given every night except Monday through July 20. The informality of the concerts, which have become part of the Boston "tradition," never fails to astonish newcomers who find patrons sitting on the lawn or sprawled out on the grass near the river banks listening to classical and semi-classical music.

Expenses for the concerts are borne by the contributions of patrons, by responses to an annual letter of appeal and by shares of chair rentals, which incidentally cost only a dime. The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the rescue in case of a deficit.

First presented in 1929 by Mr. Fiedler, the concerts have attracted audiences totaling about 250,000 listeners each summer.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

AUG 3 - 1947

Ninth Symphony By Beethoven in Concert Tuesday

BEETHOVEN'S great Ninth Symphony is to be performed in the Boston Symphony broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival at 7:30 ~~Tuesday evening on KXOK.~~ Serge Koussevitzky ~~will conduct.~~

The soloists will be Frances Yend, soprano; Eunice Alberts contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, basso. Robert Shaw will lead the chorus, whose members are students attending the Berkshire Festival.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

AUG 3 - 1947

Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 will be performed by the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra and Festival Chorus, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, during the final broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival on Tuesday, 7:30 to 8:45 p.m., over Station Winn.

SUNDAY

Bernard Herrmann conducts the C.B.S. Symphony Orchestra.
Overture to Abu Hassan ---------- Weber
Symphonic Suite, Antar, Opus 9 ---------- Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 8 in B minor, Unfinished ---------- Schubert
Les Preludes ---------- Liszt
WHAS 1 P.M.

Milton Katims conducts the N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra.
Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Scotch ---------- Mendelssohn
Oracion del Torero ---------- Turina
Gayane Suite ---------- Khatchaturian
WAVE 3 P.M.

Walter Poole conducts the Detroit Symphony Orchestra in an all-French program.
Chabrier's Marche Joyeuse: Overture to Offenbach's La Belle Helene; Debussy's Clair de Lune; Waltz from Delibes' Naila; Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' Samson et Delilah; Excerpts from Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1.
WINN 7 P.M.

Classical music on records.
Overture to Weber's Oberon (Fiedler); Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor (Menuhin - Enesco); Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, From the New World (Szell); Group of Italian Operatic Arias (Tagliavini); Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream M

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

AUG 3 - 1947

TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, basso, as soloists in Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in D minor, Opus 125.
WINN 7:30 P.M.

Herbie Koch and Gertrude Baer play.
Adagio, from Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata; Finale from Haydn's Symphony No. 16 in G major; excerpt from Rhapsody by Rachmaninoff.
WHAS 9 P.M.

The symphony was and has been hea continuously since scanini as perma
tor.
seph Szigeti, violini
a six-month conce
land and the Con appear in August
ne Festival in S at the Edinburgh al Festival of
ce. Thereafter his him to France, H n, Switzerland and eti returns to this -December for h
st-to-coast tour.

RITZ MAHLER ha ted conductor of ) Philharmonic. W
tment the orchest pletely profession
ing season will b negotiations are important concert ear as soloists.. nephew of the f r, Gustav Mahler tor came to this and has since rican citizen.

AUG 3 - 1947

Society Notes

By KATHLEEN M. PERKINS

M[illegible] Gill [illegible] Patricia [illegible] debu- [illegible] Gold [illegible] near Kent [illegible]

[illegible] Robert Harman, of [illegible] Charles street, [illegible] invitations to a reception on September 13 from [illegible] at the Sheraton Belvedere Hotel in honor of their daughter, Miss Anne Marie Harman, a debutante.

At Berkshire Festival

Mrs. John W. Garrett, of [illegible] avenue, and Mrs. [illegible] Sage, of Glyndon, are among Baltimoreans who recently attended the Berkshire Festival presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass.

Mrs. J. Harold Wheeler, of [illegible] this week will go to [illegible] N.J., to visit her [illegible] Mrs. Percy R. Pyne.

Mrs. Arunah S. Abell 3d, of [illegible] Mrs. Louise Pierce [illegible] of Kenmore road, and Mrs. Taylor McCormick, who is living temporarily on Bellemore road, will leave tomorrow to visit Mrs. R. Walter Graham, Jr., of Greenway, at her farm in Southern Maryland.

Guests Of Jamisons

Mr. and Mrs. Richard A. Jamison, of Elmhurst road, had as guests last week end Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs. Marshall Wallach of Warrenton, Va. Mrs. Eli Houston Brown 3d, of Louisville, Ky., and her young son also were recent guests of the Jamisons. Mrs. Brown, a cousin of Mr. Jamison, also visited her mother, Mrs. William P. Hamilton, in Hagerstown, Md.

Mrs. Jamison, with her young daughter and her mother, Mrs. J. Morrison Harris, on Saturday will go to Cape May.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur R. Wyatt, of Ruxton, have as guests this week end Mr. and Mrs. Theodore I. Berger, of Charlottesville, Va.

Visiting Johnsons

Mr. and Mrs. Levin Gale Shreve, of Glenelg, are spending the week end with State Senator and Mrs. Thomas F. Johnson on their farm in Berlin, Md. Mrs. Shreve will go to Ocean City this week to visit Mrs. Edward Daniels, of Dayton, Ohio.

Mrs. Johnson has just returned from a visit in Dayton with her sister, Mrs. Robert Patterson, Jr.

Colonel and Mrs. Edgar T. [illegible] and their daughter and son, Miss Christine Q. Fell and Mr. [illegible] T. Fell, have moved from [illegible] to Chevy Chase.

Mr. and Mrs. John A. B. Fisher, of [illegible] avenue, have returned from a cruise on their boat to [illegible] Island.

[illegible] John Kearns, of South [illegible] N.J., is spending the week end at the home of Mr. and Mrs. M. Laurence Millspaugh, of Edgevale road. Having [illegible] returned from Italy, where she served with the American Red Cross, Mrs. Kearns is [illegible] with the State Department [illegible] Washington and will return to [illegible] in a few months.

[illegible] and Mrs. Harold Braham, of [illegible] Warrington Apartments, [illegible] two young children, [illegible] went by plane to Ber[illegible] where they will be for a [illegible]

At Cape May

[illegible] and Mrs. W. T. Dixon [illegible] Oak place, are at Cape May, N.J., as are Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] A. Conklin 3d, also of [illegible] and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Matthai, of Greenway. [illegible] Mrs. Gustav A. Buch[illegible] of Upper Marlboro, will [illegible] there shortly to spend six [illegible]

[illegible] Dorothy Miller Abbott, who has been at Cape May with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. Webster Abbott, Jr., of West University parkway, will go to Fishers Island, N.Y., to visit friends.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Brice Owen, of Poplar Hill road, are at Cape May for two weeks. Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Taylor, Jr., of the Ridgemede Apartments, and Mr. and Mrs. Carroll Van Ness, Jr., of St. Georges road, were at the resort [illegible] Jacob[illegible]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

AUG 3 - 1947

THEMES AND VARIATIONS

Canny Composers of Today Find Fertile Field in Films

By Linton Martin

While it was frankly a "stunt," far afield from familiar and conventional symphonic fare, the program of "Music in the Movies" given last Tuesday at Tanglewood, Mass., as a special event out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival, served a significant purpose beyond the immediate performance itself. And that was to point up impressively how much the movies today have contributed creatively to serious music, with vitality and diversity.

This does not refer, of course, to those factitious and fanciful film fables which have been taking liberties with the lives and loves of some of the world's master melodists from classical to contemporary composers, in order to raid the treasury of their tonal gems. And it has no connection, either, with the all too often trite and tawdry output of Tin Pan Alley tunesmiths for popular June and moon musicals.

But the musical scores inspired by some notable American and foreign films, whether to set the mood and emotion by way of background, or to play an even more important and predominent part in the plot progression and tonal characterization have already earned independent place in the symphonic repertoire. That is the true test of the musical value and validity of such compositions, whether arranged as symphonic suites, tone poems, or other excerpts, as highlighted by the marshaling of "Music in the Movies" at Tanglewood.

International Aspects

Quite comprehensive and compact was the collection of screen scenes with sound served in that one-hour program which prefaced the regular concert performance by the Boston Symphony under the distinguished direction of Serge Koussevitzky. And it is just possible that some symphonic philistines in the audience may have found it more stimulating and exciting than the program provided by the veteran Dr. Koussevitzky.

Its international aspect was emphasized by the fact that four countries were represented: France, Russia, England, and America. That in itself, insured the cosmopolitan character and complexion of the occasion.

Notable names of contemporary composers represented gave artistic stature and considerable scope to this special presentation, perhaps even justifying the enthusiastic publicity men's announcement of it as "The most comprehensive program of motion pictures ever assembled to illustrate the use of the original musical scores by important contemporary composers." Certainly nobody need apologize for a lineup that includes Aaron Copland, Arthur Honegger, Prokofieff, Shostakovich, George Antheil, William Walton and Virgil Thomson.

These were represented by reels from "Our Town," "Meyerling," "Alexander Nevsky," "The Youth of Maxim," "The Plainsman," "The River," and "Henry V," though of course not necessarily in the order named. Walt Disney's cartoon, "Mickey's Grand Opera" was the curtain raiser.

Find Popular Place

Only time can tell how much of the music written originally for films will find permanent and popular place in the standard symphonic repertoire. In that respect, contemporary composers who have turned their talents to creating ambitious musical scores for the cinema sound track — including those just mentioned and others also — can find an excellent example to emulate in outstanding symphonic scores written for the ballet more than a quarter of a century ago, and which come around regularly on concert programs.

Considering the visual and dramatic kinship that can be found between both movies and the ballet it would not be so surprising if serious music makers for the films increasingly took over that function formerly filled with distinction by choreographically - minded composers in the past, particularly in the heyday of Diagkileff and his Ballet Russe, in Paris in the earlier years of the second decade of this century. For that was the production period which brought out, in rapid succession, such masterworks as Stravinsky's "The Fire-Bird" in 1910, and his "Petrouchka" the following year ("Le Sacre du Printemps" came later), and Ravel's enchanting "Daphnis and Chloe," in 1912. The symphonic suites drawn from these ballets — two have been arranged from the Ravel work — have achieved what appears to be perennial popularity on symphonic programs today.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

AUG 4 - 1947

Critics Hear Rehearsal Of Mozart Opera

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3— (AP) — About 400 students and faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center, music critics and some 300 invited guests attended a rehearsal tonight in the Theatre Opera Hall of Mozart's three-act opera "idomeneo," which will be given its first U. S. performance at Tanglewood tomorrow night and repeated Wednesday night.

The opera will be staged by the opera department of the Music Center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The cast of singers, orchestra and chorous will consist of members of the Berkshire Music Center, as was the case when Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" was performed at Tanglewood last Summer.

The title part of "Idomeneo" will be sung by Joseph Laderoute. Idamte, a part written by Mozart for a contralto, will be sung in the original range by a soprano, alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson.

Although there are only 1,10[illegible] seats in the Theatre Opera Hall hundreds are expected to witness the performance through wide doors on either side of the hall.

"Idomeneo" has had occasional performances in Europe, mostly in Germany and Austria. There were further revivals in 1931, the 150th anniversary of the first performance when there was a production at the Vienna State Opera in a version edited by Richard Strauss and L. Wellerstein. A version in English was performed in London in 1938.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

AUG 3 - 1947

MUSIC

Young Tenor Advances

Always it is pleasant to watch a new career in its early stages when the first successes are being recorded. The case of a young Philadelphia tenor named David Lloyd is an example.

It is probable that few people, even those who follow such things closely, have even heard of David Lloyd yet, but a glance at a few of the engagements lined up for him during the coming season, his first professional year, are evidence that he is on his way.

This reporter heard him sing last December in New York at a private musicale, and was immediately struck by the beauty of his tenor notes. He has a nice American grin, too, which should do him no harm on the concert platform.

Richard Suter

Lloyd first came into the picture last year by winning a contest for the "Voice of Tomorrow" sponsored by the Philadelphia Inquirer. He hasn't done a great deal professionally since then, but this summer no less a personage than Serge Koussevitzky chose him to sing with the Boston Symphony at the famous Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

In fact, radio listeners may hear the singer as one of the solo quartet with the chorus and orchestra in a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony (No. 9), broadcast from the festival shed Tuesday evening of this week at 8:30 p.m. (EDT) over the ABC network. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Then on Saturday evening Mozart's Requiem will be performed (but not broadcast) with David Lloyd again as tenor soloist. This time Robert Shaw, bright star among young choral conductors, will be in charge.

With the national publicity gained from appearances at the Berkshire Festival, David Lloyd will immediately gain prestige in his profession.

But he has also been engaged as soloist with several symphony orchestras during the coming year, among them the orchestras of Dallas, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis and Minneapolis. And it is always proof of a young musician's ability to win such engagements, for symphony conductors are well known to be extremely zealous in their selection of soloists.

During the 1947-48 season, David Lloyd also will be getting a foothold in the competitive field of opera. There is a decided possibility of his engagement for the fall season of the City Center Opera company in New York, one of the best testing grounds for young artists. And there are engagements for the tenor for isolated performances—"Carmen" in St. Paul, "La Boheme" in Philadelphia, and "Tannhauser" in San Antonio.

Concerts too are coming along through his affiliation with Community Concert Service; his Welch name and background helped get him concert dates in two Ohio towns with strong Welch elements, Niles and Miamisburg, where he had been unknown otherwise. Another year should bring even greater rewards for the talented young artist.

Wagnerian Excerpts

For many seasons Laritz Melchior had everything his own way in the very special "heldentenor" field of Wagnerian Opera at the Metropolitan. Lately, however, there have been several introductions that demonstrate other singers can do these roles too.

Among the debutantes in the post-war race for Wagnerian supremacy is the eminent Swedish tenor, Torsten Ralf, who is currently making his Columbia record debut with an album (MM-634) of excerpts from four of his Wagnerian roles.

The project has not been stinted for top-notch orchestral support, either, for behind the tenor's ringing tones is heard the Metropolitan Opera orchestra conducted by Fritz Busch, who is of course one of the very best opera conductors in the business.

Torsten Ralf has a powerful voice of pleason quality. Perhaps one of his greatest assets is his ability to sing Wagnerian music with bel canto style, eliminating the explosive sounds that sometimes make Wagnerian singing a trial to hear.

The artist has sought the most melodic passages of Wagner's tenor roles for the excerpts chosen for this album. Two record-sides are taken up with the dramatic "Rome Narrative" from the last act of "Tannhauser," in which the hero relates the harrowing experiences of his pilgrimage to the Holy City.

"Parsifal" is represented by the dramatic solo passage which concludes that masterful music drama, while from the last act of "Lohengrin" are chosen the beautiful music of the hero's narrative of the Grail and his farewell to the swan.

Three record-sides are given to "Die Meistersinger," the composer's springlike comic opera—first his tale of his boyhood, known as "Im stillen Herd," then his trial song in the early contest for the hand of Eva, and finally the lovely "Prize Song," with which he wins the lady.

Sumptuous recording marks this first issue of a series Columbia plans with the cooperation of the Metropolitan.

Waltz by Liszt

Another current Columbia album (MX-281) involves the New York Philharmonic - Symphony orchestra in a recording that was obviously made before Artur Rodzinski severed relations with that organization. There may be a further backlog of records with Rodzinski conducting the group.

This two-pocket set contains the lively and sardonic "Mephisto Waltz" by Franz Liszt, filled out on the fourth side with Wolf-Ferrari's sparkling overture to "The Secret of Suzanne."

The waltz is part of Liszt's musical setting of the familiar "Faust" legend, a subject that has attracted more composers than any other, unless "Romeo and Juliet" could make a greater claim.

The uninvited appearance of Faust and Mefisto at a village wedding, with Satan cynically sawing a fiddle, is the occasion for this waltz. It is brilliant orchestrally, although it is also surprisingly effective in a version for piano solo.

The Wolf-Ferrari overture is a merry commentary on the delightful one-act opera (1909) dealing with the dreadful secret of a Countess: she was concealing her cigaret smoking from her husband.

Rodzinski and the New York orchestra have a wonderful time with both the waltz and the overture, and the sounds they make are well recorded.

Schubert by Jones

In the pianistic field, probably the most glittering new personality is the Polish refugee, Maryla Jonas. Her story is twice-told now—how as a former pupil of Paderew[illegible] she was thrown into a concentration camp for refusing to play for the Nazis, how she suffered the tortures of losing almost her entire family at the hands of the conquerors, how she escaped to a sister in South America and finally recovered from a severe nervous breakdown, resuming her career at the insistence of Artur Rubinstein. The tale of her sensational Carnegie Hall debut little more than a year ago is familiar now, too.

Madame Jonas' special talent lies in her masterly handling of small pieces, with incredible control of finely shaded tonal colors, tasteful phrasing and restrained feeling in every bar. Admirers of fine piano playing in the Parkersburg area will have opportunities to hear this artist in recital both in Charleston and Athens during the coming season.

Already Jonas recordings of several Chopin works have been published in an album. Now Columbia Records is putting out a single 12-inch disk (No. 72047-D) carrying some exquisite Schubert music, for which the artist seems to have a particular affection. Her performance of a Schubert sonata was a high spot of her most recent Carnegie Hall recital last December, which this reporter was fortunate enough to hear. The new record carries the tender "Impromptu in G Major," with its harp-like arpeggios, and a group of waltzes which make one forget Johann Strauss and other "kings" of the idiom. The resonant tone of the Steinway is perfectly registered.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
AUG 3 1947

Critic's Notebook:

Honegger's Strings Muted In Open Air

By Virgil Thomson.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave under the shed in Tanglewood its first subscription concert of the season's Berkshire festival. The program was a pleasant one and the execution, so far as could be judged in the semi-outdoor circumstances, impeccable.

The audience was large, the applause massive. The whole occasion, indeed, was impressive, if not entirely satisfactory acoustically.

This general acoustic imprecision was particularly disadvantageous to Arthur Honegger's Symphony for Strings. If your reviewer had not heard the work previously (he reviewed from Paris last summer), he would be at some difficulty to estimate its qualities fairly. It is a better piece, assuredly, than it sounded last night.

Its simple thematic structure was clear, but its fluid contrapuntal texture gave rather an effect of confusion than of richness. Everybody seemed relieved when, at the end of the work, a trumpet was heard playing above the general hubbub a tune in simple hymn style.

Whether it is fair play on Mr. Honegger's part to have recourse to the trumpet in a symphony entitled "for strings" I leave to the public to judge. Certainly the brass instrument livens up the sound of his piece at that point, relieves the mounting monotony of string sounds and gives the whole a simple and straightforward "punch."

Without it, it is doubtful whether the work would make anything like the effect it does, though the tune the trumpet plays is present in the first violins. It is to be hoped that Mr. Koussevitzky (or possibly Mr. Muench, who conducts this piece most effectively) will give New York a chance next season (Boston already has heard it) to make its acquaintance. I know from previous hearings that it is a serious and agreeable work.

The concert included also Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Second Symphony. The first had moments of passionate conviction, but it was the second that, being by nature less refined orchestrally, suffered least among the three works played from that disorganization of balances that is inevitable to the outdoor performance of orchestral music.

LONG BEACH, CALIF.
PRESS-TELEGRAM
AUG 3 1947

"Idomeneo," often described as one of the greatest operas by Mozart, but hitherto unheard in this country, will be produced next month at Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts. The opera is being prepared by the Berkshire Music Center, the school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this, the Orchestra's summer home at Lenox where the Berkshire Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will still be in progress. Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department at the Music Center, will direct and conduct the performance.

Mozart wrote his "Idomeneo, King of Crete" in 1780, for the Court Opera in Munich, in his 24th year. It is, in the opinion of Mozart authorities, his greatest "Opera Seria" or classical grand opera, and this opinion is borne out by Mozart's devotion to his task and his pride in the result as explained in his letters to his father at that time.

Idomeneo, the King of Crete, returning from the Trojan Wars, according to Greek legend, narrowly escapes shipwreck, and in gratitude to the god Neptune promises to sacrifice the first person whom he shall meet on the shore of Crete. That person proves to be his son, Idamante. In dismay the king tries to send Idamante away from the island to safety, but the gods proclaim that Idomeneo shall abdicate, and Idamante and his bride Ilia shall reign in his stead. The opera will be given in the original Italian with the part of Idamante sung by a soprano.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS
AUG 3 - 1947

Rubinstein Gives Chopin Dazzling Performance

BY BETTY A. DIETZ

Daily News Music Editor

THE nation's top recording companies, going full tilt to meet the tremendous demands of a snowballing market, continue to rush new albums as fast as they can set up the microphones. Certainly they leave the reviewer little time to spare.

A new Chopin set appears to be RCA-Victor's latest triumph. It consists of Arthur Rubinstein's performance of the second concerto, in F minor. The work of the NBC symphony under the baton of William Steinberg is superbly fused with the solo instrument but it is Rubinstein's spine-tingling, blazing bravura which makes the recording. The concerto with it's magical larghetto is a true test of the virtuoso pianist and Rubinstein pulls no punches.

Though the Columbia package of Handel's 12 Concerti Grossi may not appeal particularly to the general buying public—it's expensive, too, since three volumes are involved—its recording was an ambitious undertaking. The concerti, magnificent creation of the early 18th century genius, are given treatment that is scholarly without reeking of library dust. Adolf Busch conducts his chamber music players in a performance that is truly beautiful. Edward Winternitz wrote the program notes.

Columbia seems to have cornered the market on Handel momentarily since a Water Music suite, Eugene Ormandy's arrangement this time, makes up another album. The recording by Ormandy and the Philadelphia orchestra is good but I can think of so many other works which might be added to the catalogue.

Bach's orchestral suites, No. 2 and 3, probably his happiest works and certainly the best known in this vein, are accounted for in a new Victor album. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston symphony set forth the suites with expected clarity of detail and brilliance of tone. The flute of Georges Laurent sings the silvery solo line in the earlier work.

Polished is the word for Zino Francescatti's way with Wieniawski and Debussy. The Columbia album, aptly labelled a violin recital by the French artist, also holds the violinist's own transcription of Tartini's Variations of a Theme by Corelli, the tongue-in-cheek Age of Gold polka by Shostakovich and Heifetz' transcription of the Prophet Bird by Schumann. Two Debussy pieces, Minstrels and The Maid with the Flaxen Hair, are superbly played. Max Lanner is at the piano.

* * *

ALTHOUGH the first copy of H. W. Heinsheimer's book, Menagerie in F Sharp, must have dropped in to visit with friends and decided to stay awhile, the second addressed to me was worth waiting for. Not that there could possibly be any difference.

At any rate, the book jacket is not exaggerating a bit when it proclaims "the wise and witty memoirs of a music hunting man." In addition it says that Heinsheimer writes like an angel—that, however, is stretching it a trifle. Heinsheimer, whose book is published by Doubleday and Co., is editor of Boosey and Hawkes, top-drawer music publishing house in New York. Before that he put in 15 years—fascinating years, according to the book—as head of the opera department of Universal Edition, in Europe.

I like the way the gentleman takes the gilt wrappers off such things as, for instance, how to become an opera star or how to sell the musical story of an exceedingly dull life. He strips the Horatio Alger tales, by now whipped to a Hollywood froth, of all the stuff and nonsense. It's far more whom you know, he reveals, than what you've written if you want to write music for the movies. However, Heinsheimer in one simple, easy chapter, does give the outsider something of an idea of what goes on behind the sound track of a movie.

In comfortable, entertaining style he traces, too, the development of opera in Europe from the show-off court of Frederick the Great—he gave Berlin its first opera house—to the present day. The German curtain went down in 1928, you will find, for it was Hitler then who called the tune. Of immeasurable value is the record of 60 new operas presented since 1900.

If music is your business or you would like it to be, get a copy of the Heinsheimer book. It is excellent entertainment but it is also most informative.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 3 - 1947

Music

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

A COMPLETELY sold-out music shed is indicated for this afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at "Tanglewood" in the Berkshires. Tickets admitting holders to the spacious grounds may be purchased at the festival ticket offices two hours before the program, scheduled for 3:30 o'clock. Early arrivals may procure unreserved seats just outside the shed, but allowing a full view of all that is transpiring on the stage.

The program for this afternoon will include an all-Beethoven selection; the "Pastorale" and "Seventh" symphonies, and the piano concerto, No. 4 with Joseph Battista as soloist. A special performance of the Beethoven "Ninth" or "Choral" symphony is prepared for Tuesday night with the Berkshire mixed chorus being heard with the orchestra in the final movement of Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
AUG 3 1947

Stravinsky Work Liked

Even lacking the freshness and the enthusiasm of "Petrouchka" or "Rites," the Stravinsky symphony still has enough vitality and experienced craftsmanship to make it seem about the best work of the three, and still a notable work to have showed up within the last three years. The music is very well set upon records by the composer and the New York Philharmonic as a Columbia album.

The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky and the New York Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz present rival versions of the last of the Shoztakovitch trilogy which commenced with the Leningrad symphony. This last, which was completed within about six weeks of VE day, is presumably a paean to victory. Except for the slow fourth movement, this brief work in five movements abounds in lyricism and free-flowing humor. The entire symphony requires only 25 minutes' playing time.

BIG SPRING, TEXAS
HERALD
AUG 3 1947

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard Tuesday over KBST in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 7:30 and concluding at 8:45 p. m.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT
AUG 3 1947

Catching The Beat In Music World Today

BY

INA WICKHAM

> "I shall know but one country—America.
> "To it I owe my utter loyalty
> "The ends I aim at shall be for my Country,
> "My God and Truth."
> —National Federation of Music Clubs Creed.

THE Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., given by the Boston symphony orchestra, is drawing to a close and the final broadcast from the festival will be on Tuesday evening at 6:30 over the American network. The work to be presented is the Beethoven Ninth symphony and the time of broadcast has been extended to 7:45 p. m. so that the entire symphony may be heard by the radio audiences. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "choral" symphony has been broadcast.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . will direct the concert from Tanglewood and will have as his soloists, a quartet of artists who have been heard previously with the Boston Symphony orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano, who will be heard as soloist with the Tri-City Symphony orchestra during the coming season, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The festival chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music center courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

. . . orchestra will not give a concert in Milwaukee, Wis., next season as had been originally planned, because there is no available place of suitable size for the orchestra to play. The Auditorium, where the orchestra has played for the last two seasons to sold houses has been engaged for Dec. 6 and 7, the dates selected, by the International Institute. The Boston orchestra makes its tour in December and had planned to include Milwaukee in its itinerary as in the past. The orchestra has appeared under the auspices of the Arion club and its appearance has been one of the leading events in the music season in Milwaukee.

THERE WILL BE AN

. . . innovation at the Salzburg Music Festival now in progress in the Austrian city and tradition will be broken by the presentation of the world premiere of the new opera "Danton's Death" written by Gotfried Von Einem, Austrian composer. In the past the festival has been devoted to the classical works of the old masters and the new opera which is a story of the French Revolution is entirely modern. The composer conceived the idea for the opera, his first one, while serving a prison sentence imposed on him and his father by the Nazis in 1938. Otto Klemperer will direct the opera and the Vienna State opera orchestra will furnish the accompaniment.

THE SALZBURG

. . . festival will continue until Aug. 31. In addition to the new opera, there will be performances of Strauss' "Arabella;" Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tuti" and "The Marriage of Figaro." There will be eight concerts by the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra, including a French night, a Czech night and an all Mahler program. There will also be plays, chamber music concerts, church concerts and orchestral concerts. It is sai' that there are only a few Americans in attendance including a group of 120 from Harvard university.

EIGHTEEN WORKS

. . . by contemporary American composers, eight of them symphonic works, have been recommended by the National Federation of Music clubs for performance by orchestras in the United States next season. The list of recommendations, the third annual, has just been released. It is longer than in previous years and some of the works were written and premiered during the past season while others are of earlier vintage. Conductors are urged to include at least one of these works in their programs for the coming season.

AMONG THE WORKS

. . . are [illegible] Douglas Moore, Roy [illegible] Scott and Henry [illegible] Copland, Henry Br[illegible] Creston. Other work[illegible] nature are by Marion Bauer, William Bergama, Lukas Foss, Norman Dello Joio, Arthur Krentz, William Grant Still; Richard Donovan, Ross Lee Finney, Anis Fuleihan a[illegible] Phillips. The American [illegible] National [illegible] clubs which made [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 3 - 1947

RECORDS: FOLK

Melodies From Overseas In New Arrangements

By CARTER HARMAN

MELODIES from overseas are the material for three of this week's releases. The most appealing of these is a pair of Vox albums, Palestine Dances and Songs and Jewish Holiday Dances and Songs, three ten-inch disks each. The tunes are arranged by serious composers living in this country, who have preserved the original melodies and added their own harmonies and orchestrations. The result is fresh and unpretentious. The arrangers are Darius Milhaud, David Diamond, Leonard Bernstein, Ernst Toch, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Hans Eisler, Trude Rittman and Reuven Kosakoff. Max Goberman gets fine results from the singers and orchestra.

Aaron Copland's Danzón Cubano (Concert Hall, twelve-inch plastic single) is performed by Leo Smit and the composer on two pianos. The music consists of south-of-the-border tunes and patterns carefully integrated in light, pleasant Copland style. The piano recording is wavery.

Hugo Kauder, although he has pet theories, writes fairly conventionally. His Sonata for English Horn and Piano and Improvisation for English Horn alone (Night Music, two ten-inch disks) played by Louis Speyer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Erwin Bodky, pianist, have a florid, oriental sound. This is partly because of the nature of the English horn, partly because of the use of his own special modes. Mr. Speyer turns in a fine performance on his rarely heard instrument.

Personalities

Victor has issued an album of selections from Henry V, spoken by Laurence Olivier, with incidental music by William Walton (four twelve-inch disks). Sir Laurence reads some of the most moving passages from the play, including some not used in the film. He makes effective use of every orational device known to actors, according to a producer who listened to the recordings. The music needs the visual image to support it, but the performance by the Philharmonia Orchestra conducted by the composer is excellent, and the recording is good.

Vox Records has done the public a favor by re-pressing the Polydor masters of Marlene Dietrich singing Johnny, Peter, and Mein Blondes Baby. The famous performances, which are in German with the accompaniment of Peter Kreuder, have been out of print in this country for years. If you have ever liked Dietrich or had an interest in the demimonde life of Post War I Europe you should find these songs fascinating. Other sultry items in the album are Allein . . . in einer grossen, Stadt, Wo ist der Mann? and Ja, so bin ich.

at In day

y. ollect.
Luening, opera
bia university.

N. Y.
1947

ORDS:
LK

From Overseas
Arrangements

TER HARMAN

IES from overseas
he material for three his week's releases.
most appealing of pair of Vox albums,
nces and Songs and
ay Dances and Songs, ch disks each. The anged by serious comin this country, who ed the original melo-ded their own harmohestrations. The result d unpretentious. The are Darius Milhaud,
mond, Leonard Bern-
st Toch, Castelnuovo-
ans Eisler, Trude Ritt-
Reuven Kosakoff. Max
gets fine results from and orchestra.

opland's Danzón Cubano
Hall, twelve-inch plastic performed by Leo Smi omposer on two pianos consists of south-of-the nes and patterns care grated in light, pleasan tyle. The piano recordin

Kauder, although he h
les, writes fairly conve
His Sonata for Engli
Piano and Improvisati ish Horn alone (Nig wo ten-inch disks) play Speyer of the Bost
y Orchestra and Erv pianist, have a flo sound. This is partly the nature of the Engl rtly because of the use special modes. Mr. Spe a fine performance on heard instrument.

alities

r has issued an album ns from Henry V, spo urence Olivier, with music by William Wa welve-inch disks). Sir eads some of the most ssages from the play
some not used in the kes effective use of al device known to ac ing to a producer
d to the recordings.
needs the visual imag
rt it, but the performan hilharmonia Orchestra d by the composer is and the recording is goo Records has done the or by re-pressing the P rs of Marlene Dietrich
Johnny, Peter, and les Baby. The famous ances, which are in G
the accompaniment of der, have been out of p country for years. If yo liked Dietrich or had an in the demimonde
War I Europe you shou
songs fascinating.
ry items in the albu in . . . in einer grosse ist der Mann? and Jo

MUSICIANS TAKE OVER ESTATE MADE FAMOUS BY HAWTHORNE

(Continued From Page 1C.)

build a summer home on a location [illegible] the Bullards' "Highwood." [illegible] to call it "Tangle-wood" [illegible] the plans could [illegible] parcels of [illegible] and the [illegible] Dixeys to stay [illegible] deeds were [illegible] then had to go to Boston and while they were [illegible] the Dixey children contracted scarlet fever, and the family was obliged to remain in the house longer than they expected.

In a cottage near by, on the adjacent "Tanglewood" estate, lived a young writer, Hawthorne. The Dixeys engaged him to tutor the children. As part of his work he told strange and glamorous tales before the blazing fire in the Bullard living room.

A Gift to the Boston Orchestra.

Eventually, the Dixey home at Tanglewood was completed, and the family moved away from the Bullard home, but the Hawthorne literary work which had taken shape before the Bullard fireplace was called "Tanglewood Tales."

A second blessing resulting from the Dixeys' settling in Tanglewood has been the great gathering of musical forces now known as the Berkshire Music Festival and the Berkshire Music center. The home for both is the Tanglewood estate, recently given to the Boston Symphony orchestra by a granddaughter of the Dixeys, Mrs. Andrew H. Hepburn, and her aunt, Mrs. Mary Aspinwall Tappan.

It is an estate of some 200 acres on a height overlooking Lake Mahkeenac. There is an enormous "shed" for the big orchestral concerts, a smaller shed for operatic performances, a still smaller one for chamber music, an outdoor shell for orchestral rehearsals and performances, and a number of shacks where students can practice in forest isolation. In the center of the grounds is the old Dixey house, now given over to studios and the administrative offices.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the hub around which all activities revolve, and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is the general director and inspirer. The Berkshire Music Festival is an annual summer series of concerts by the Boston Symphony (from July 13 to August 10 this year), and the center is a school—or gathering place—where talented students obtain guidance and experience in performance. The two enterprises have attracted wide attention. The music center has 425 students—the limit that can be enrolled—and they come from all over the world.

FIREPLACE WITH THE ORIGINAL MANTEL BEFORE WHICH HAWTHORNE WROTE HIS "TANGLEWOOD TALES," IS NOW ONE OF THE HISTORIC RELICS OF THE MUSIC CENTER.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
AUG 3 1947

Our Musical World

By ETHELYN SEXTON

State Journal Music Editor

Among the most delightful aspects of summer music in America are its adroit fashions in background adaption. Rich in regional color, each summer points up a new way in which a music festival subtly reminds listener of origins. Of course programs cannot well be rigidly adapted — there isn't enough written of regional content to fit into all the areas where tradition and legend make exceptional Americana. That will have to come gradually. And many believe that if the latest of the modernists take over for dressing up programs reminiscent of American history — the background had better be left to suggestions in theater structure like the Gold Rush atmosphere in the auditorium in Central City, la., and the restored 18th century theater in Williamsburg, Va.

Many of these up-and-coming composers apparently shrink with distaste from a musical feature known as "melody." Just a hint may creep in now and then, but after a minute allusion to what old-fashioned folk would term a tune, the composer veers away with "sounding brass" or tonal effects that point up his creative power, but for many people it means little entertainment value. So, perhaps after all it is better to let the Gold Rush at Central City be suggested by the picturesque theater structure.

However, a tried and true opera like "The Girl of the Golden West" done let us hope, in English, and Ferde Grofe's "Grand Canyon Suite" and a new Eric Delamarter folk-tune piece, should be pleasing fare at this western music center. Mention of "The Girl of the Golden West" in English—it was originally written in Italian, recalls the forthright comment of Donald Dixon, when he was interviewed in Lansing several years ago, as soloist for the Lansing symphony orchestra. Now a featured singer with the Metropolitan his views still hold. He said:

* * *

Here lies a field for composers—the production of opera, plays, orchestral selections strictly pertaining to a locality. It does not lure the writer who has for his goal his name on the scroll of Koussevitzy's Tanglewood programs, or on the glittering pages of Columbia concerts selection. The composer must be a neighborhood man or woman who is proud of the place and wants to entertain and instruct his neighbors and their visitors, and incidentally hundreds of tourists who might like something refreshing in a provincial way.

What rich material lies in the California history of Indians, the Padres, the various conquering hosts of the state for the music festival at Carmel. The life of Robert Louis Stevenson also marks this spot.

* * *

The midwest, with its history of settlers from the east comprising all nationalities, and its swift agricultural and industrial development, offers inspiring material for musical and dramatic production. Michigan, unique in lakes and lumber backgrounds, offers a special challenge—not only as a state but in distinctive communities.

Solo Winner

TOMMY PERFITT

Pupils of the Norman English guitar studios here took six awards at the International Guitar league festival recently held at St. Louis, Mo., with honors distributed among the 17 who were enrolled. The local studios were tops in the ratio of wins to entries among the 17 states represented, with Tommy Perfitt, Grand Ledge, aged 13 years, a solo winner. He took first prize in the Junior Spanish guitar contests and second prize in the Junior Hawaiian competition. Last year his place in the national contest was exactly the reverse.

The Melody Notes of Lansing, composed of Theresa Batterbee, Nedra, Hansen, Donna Wright, Betty Reed, Jean Hartman and Faye Vermilyia were first prize winners from 20 entries. The Harmony Three of Lansing, composed of Tommy, Lloyd Whittemore and Miss Vermilyia won second in more than 40 entries. Miss Batterbee took an honorable mention in the senior Hawaiian guitar soloist event.

The Lansing musicians found inspiration and entertainment in talks by Charles E. King of American-Hawaiian ancestry, one of the contest judges, a music publisher who through his music activities as a boy in the Hawaiian islands gave impetus to the vogue for Island music. Composer of "Song of the Islands," among other numbers, he is former conductor of the Royal Hawaiian band and founder of the University of Hawaii. T. A. Kaphahn, music director of Boys Town, Neb., another judge, hopes, says Mr. English, to set up a guitar league at the famous school.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET
1947

Music in the Hills

George E Sokolsky

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

—Sound Like Press

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazis or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

—Unkind to Ears

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about, and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitsky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 3 - 1947

Koussevitzky Given Party on Birthday

By Claudia Cassidy

New plays? Sorry, there aren't any. But Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin came to town to check on "Born Y[illegible]"; John C. Wilson [illegible] "Private Lives"; [illegible] the Theater Guild's "[illegible]" flew in to keep [illegible] and to talk "[illegible]" and London's [illegible] solicitous Pump [illegible] cheon tables for [illegible] she likes to [illegible] she has just fin- [illegible] nother, completely [illegible] breeze, if she [illegible]: Francis Rob- [illegible] Tanglewood on [illegible] day party; Edith [illegible] her Italian villa [illegible] zo; and Peter [illegible] Mister" grew [illegible] his days as one [illegible] Days of "Life [illegible] of all that, we [illegible]

[illegible] predicament [illegible] most engag- [illegible] evitzky's. The [illegible] author of "B[illegible] terday" is also [illegible] tively small mo- [illegible] ny, and tho he [illegible] better than to [illegible] the bidding is [illegible] dollar mark and [illegible] ovie rights. But [illegible] can and does [illegible] ture. When [illegible] nd Massey in Donald Ogden Stewart's "How Wonder" they are presenting it in association with William Fields press representative, and Victor Samrock, business manager of the Playwrights' company, to whom they have given half the show. But if they expect the Fields name to appear in the publicity they will have to get another press agent. That tall Texan, one of the experts in show business, has a personal reticence almost unique in his field. His friends have to brag about him.

CHILLICOTHE, MO.
CONSTITUTION-TRIBUNE
AUG 4 1947

Stoner Listed As Music Center Grad

He Attended Famous School at Tanglewood Estate in Massachusetts.

A feature story in Sunday's Kansas City Star concerning the famous Berkshire Music Festival and the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood estate in Massachusetts, made famous by Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales," lists Paul Hugo Stoner of Ottawa, Kans., as one of the center's graduates.

Stoner graduated with the class of 1936 of the Chillicothe High School and was an outstanding violinist. He continued his study of music in college and is now an instructor in music at Ottawa University. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Art Stoner.

According to the article, the Tanglewood estate was recently given to the Boston symphony orchestra and it is around this orchestra that all activities revolve. The Berkshire Music Festival is an annual summer series of concerts by the Boston symphony and the center is a school where talented students, from all over the world, obtain guidance and experience.

MUSICIANS TAKE OVER ESTATE MADE FAMOUS BY HAWTHORNE

(Continued From Page 1C.)

build a summer home on a location next to the Bullards' "Highwood." They were going to call it "Tanglewood," but before the plans could be completed some fifty parcels of land had to be cleared, and the Bullards invited the Dixeys to stay [illegible] the deeds were [illegible] Bullards then had to go to Boston, and while they were gone the Dixey children contracted scarlet fever, and the family was obliged to remain in the house longer than they expected.

In a cottage near by, on the adjacent "Tanglewood" estate, lived a young writer, Hawthorne. The Dixeys engaged him to tutor the children. As part of his work he told strange and glamorous tales before the blazing fire in the Bullard living room.

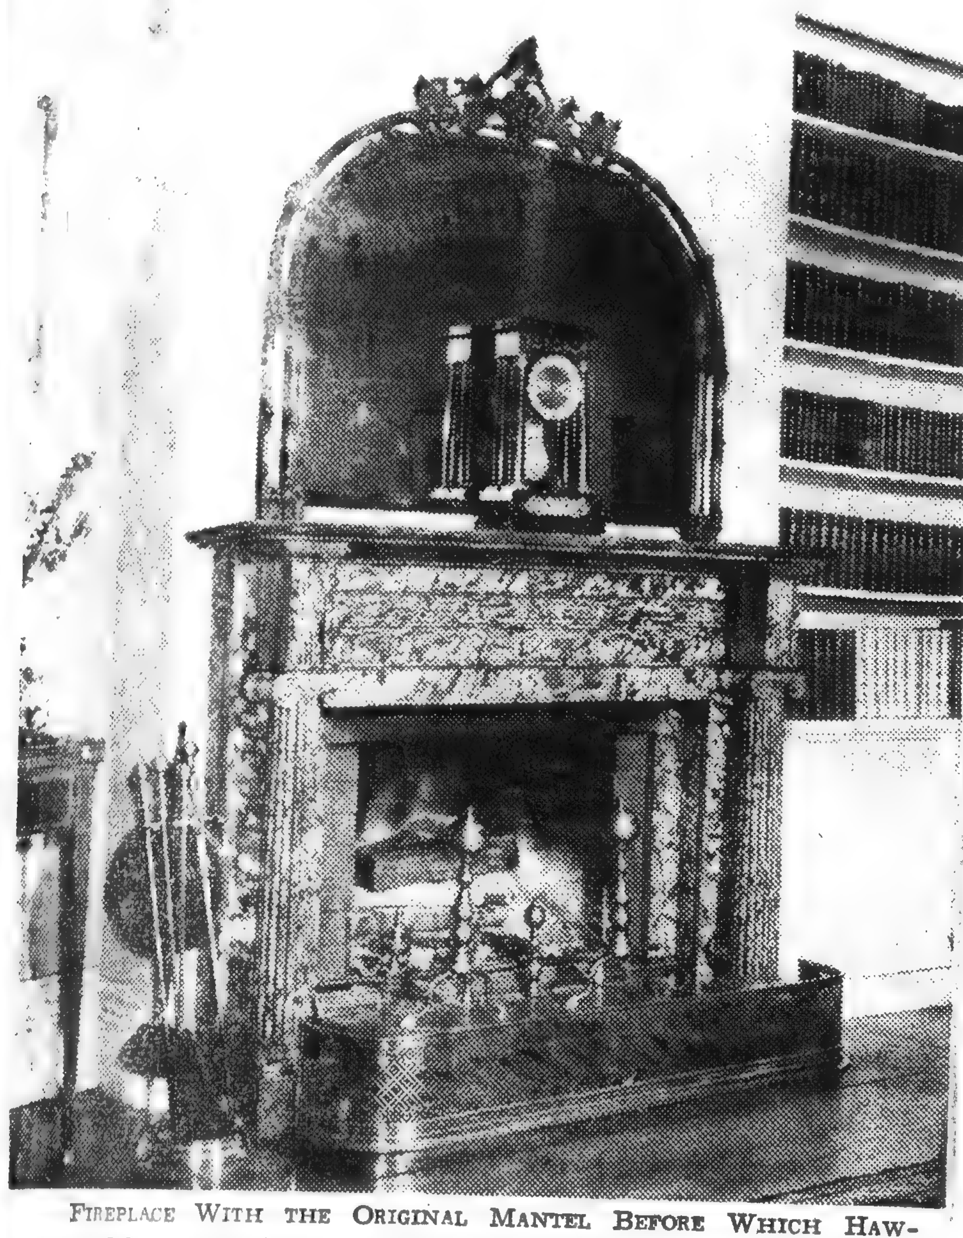
A Gift to the Boston Orchestra.

Eventually, the Dixey home at Tanglewood was completed, and the family moved away from the Bullard home, but the Hawthorne literary work which had taken shape before the Bullard fireplace was called "Tanglewood Tales."

A second blessing resulting from the Dixeys' settling in Tanglewood has been the great gathering of musical forces now known as the Berkshire Music Festival and the Berkshire Music center. The home for both is the Tanglewood estate, recently given to the Boston Symphony orchestra by a granddaughter of the Dixeys, Mrs. Andrew H. Hepburn, and her aunt, Mrs. Mary Aspinwall Tappan.

It is an estate of some 200 acres on a height overlooking Lake Mahkeenac. There is an enormous "shed" for the big orchestral concerts, a smaller shed for operatic performances, a still smaller one for chamber music, an outdoor shell for orchestral rehearsals and performances, and a number of shacks where students can practice in forest isolation. In the center of the grounds is the old Dixey house, now given over to studios and the administrative offices.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the hub around which all activities revolve, and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is the general director and inspirer. The Berkshire Music Festival is an annual summer series of concerts by the Boston Symphony (from July 13 to August 10 this year), and the center is a school—or gathering place—where talented students obtain guidance and experience in performance. The two enterprises have attracted wide attention. The music center has 425 students—the limit that can be enrolled—and they come from all over the world.



FIREPLACE WITH THE ORIGINAL MANTEL BEFORE WHICH HAWTHORNE WROTE HIS "TANGLEWOOD TALES," IS NOW ONE OF THE HISTORIC RELICS AT THE MUSIC CENTER.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
AUG 3 1947

Our Musical World

By ETHELYN SEXTON
State Journal Music Editor

Among the most delightful aspects of summer music in America are its adroit fashions in background adaption. Rich in regional color, each summer points up a new way in which a music festival subtly reminds listener of origins. Of course programs cannot well be rigidly adapted — there isn't enough written of regional content to fit into all the areas where tradition and legend make exceptional Americana. That will have to come gradually. And many believe that if the latest of the modernists take over for dressing up programs reminiscent of American history — the background had better be left to suggestions in theater structure like the Gold Rush atmosphere in the auditorium in Central City, Ia., and the restored 18th century theater in Williamsburg, Va.

Many of these up-and-coming composers apparently shrink with distaste from a musical feature known as "melody." Just a hint may creep in now and then, but after a minute allusion to what old-fashioned folk would term a tune, the composer veers away with "sounding brass" or tonal effects that point up his creative power, but for many people it means little entertainment value. So, perhaps after all it is better to let the Gold Rush at Central City be suggested in the picturesque theater structure.

However, a tried and true opera like "The Girl of the Golden West"—one let us hope, in English, and Ferde Grofe's "Grand Canyon Suite" and a new Eric Delamarter folk-tune piece, should be pleasing fare at this western music center. Mention of "The Girl of the Golden West" in English—it was originally written in Italian, recalls the forthright comment of Donald Dixon, when he was interviewed in Lansing several years ago, as soloist for the Lansing symphony orchestra. Now a featured singer with the Metropolitan his views still hold. He said:

* * *

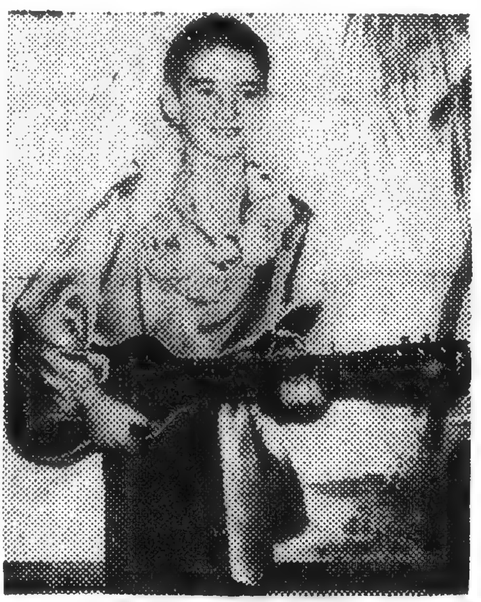
Here lies a field for composers—the production of opera, plays, orchestral selections strictly pertaining to a locality. It does not lure the writer who has for his goal his name on the scroll of Koussevitzy's Tanglewood programs, or on the glittering pages of Columbia concerts selection. The composer must be a neighborhood man or woman who is proud of the place and wants to entertain and instruct his neighbors and their visitors, and incidentally hundreds of tourists who might like something refreshing in a provincial way.

What rich material lies in the California history of Indians, the Padres, the various conquering hosts of the state for the music festival at Carmel. The life of Robert Louis Stevenson also marks this spot.

* * *

The midwest, with its history of settlers from the east comprising all nationalities, and its swift agricultural and industrial development, offers inspiring material for musical and dramatic production. Michigan, unique in lakes and lumber backgrounds, offers a special challenge—not only as a state but in distinctive communities.

Solo Winner



TOMMY PERFITT

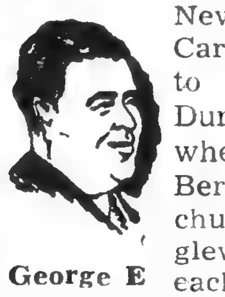
Pupils of the Norman English guitar studios here took six awards at the International Guitar league festival recently held at St. Louis, Mo., with honors distributed among the 17 who were enrolled. The local studios were tops in the ratio of wins to entries among the 17 states represented, with Tommy Perfitt, Grand Ledge, aged 13 years, a solo winner. He took first prize in the Junior Spanish guitar contests and second prize in the Junior Hawaiian competition. Last year his place in the national contest was exactly the reverse.

The Melody Notes of Lansing, composed of Theresa Batterbee, Nedra, Hansen, Donna Wright, Betty Reed, Jean Hartman and Faye Vermilyia were first prize winners from 20 entries. The Harmony Three of Lansing, composed of Tommy, Lloyd Whittemore and Miss Vermilyia won second in more than 40 entries. Miss Batterbee took an honorable mention in the senior Hawaiian guitar soloist event.

The Lansing musicians found inspiration and entertainment in talks by Charles E. King of American-Hawaiian ancestry, one of the contest judges, a music publisher who through his music activities as a boy in the Hawaiian islands gave impetus to the vogue for Island music. Composer of "Song of the Islands," among other numbers, he is former conductor of the Royal Hawaiian band and founder of the University of Hawaii. T. A. Kaaphahn, music director of Boys Town, Neb., another judge, hopes, says Mr. English, to set up a guitar league at the famous school.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET
1947

Music in the Hills



George E Sokolsky

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the Winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the Summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

—Sound Like Press

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazis or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

—Unkind to Ears

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about, and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitsky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 3 - 1947

Koussevitzky Given Party on Birthday

By Claudia Cassidy

New plays? Sorry, there aren't any. But Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin came to town to check on "Born Yesterday"; John C. Wilson looked in on "Private Lives"; Jerome Whyte, the Theater Guild's production manager, flew in to keep "Carousel" whirling and to talk about "Allegro" and London's "Oklahoma!"; the solicitous Pump room held two luncheon tables for Helen Traubel, saying she likes to sit in one place if she has just finished singing, another, completely out of any vagrant breeze, if she is just about to sing; Francis Robinson reported from Tanglewood on Koussevitzky's birthday party; Edith Mason wrote from her Italian villa at Cortina d'Ampezzo; and Peter Turgeon of "Call Me Mister" grew reminiscent about his days as one of the redheaded Days of "Life With Father." [illegible] of all that, we ought to get a column.

The most [illegible] predicament was Mr. Kanin's, the most engaging episode Mr. Koussevitzky's. The author of "Born Yesterday" is also the head of a relatively small motion picture company, and tho he would like nothing better than to film his own play, the bidding is nearing the million dollar mark and he can't afford the movie rights. But with Miss Gordon he can and does afford a generous gesture. When they present Raymond Massey in Donald Ogden Stewart's "How I Wonder" they are presenting it in association with William Fields, press representative, and Victor Samrock, business manager of the Playwrights' company, to whom they have given half the show. But if they expect the Fields name to appear in the publicity they will have to get another press agent. That tall Texan, one of the experts in show business, has a personal reticence almost unique in his field. His friends have to brag about him.

CHILLICOTHE, MO.
CONSTITUTION-TRIBUNE
AUG 4 1947

Stoner Listed As Music Center Grad

He Attended Famous School at Tanglewood Estate in Massachusetts.

A feature story in Sunday's Kansas City Star concerning the famous Berkshire Music Festival and the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood estate in Massachusetts, made famous by Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales," lists Paul Hugo Stoner of Ottawa, Kans., as one of the center's graduates.

Stoner graduated with the class of 1936 of the Chillicothe High School and was an outstanding violinist. He continued his study of music in college and is now an instructor in music at Ottawa University. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Art Stoner.

According to the article, the Tanglewood estate was recently given to the Boston symphony orchestra and it is around this orchestra that all activities revolve. The Berkshire Music Festival is an annual summer series of concerts by the Boston symphony and the center is a school where talented students, from all over the world, obtain guidance and experience.

---

eat In oday

try,
Collect. to Luening, ope mbia university.

N. Y.
TIMES 1947

CORDS: OLK

From Overseas
Arrangements

RTER HARMAN

DIES from overseas the material for three this week's releases.
most appealing of
pair of Vox albums,
ances and Songs and day Dances and Songs, nch disks each. The rranged by serious com-g in this country, who rved the original meldded their own harmo-rchestrations. The result nd unpretentious. The
are Darius Milhaud,
mond, Leonard Bern-
st Toch, Castelnuovo-
ans Eisler, Trude Ritt-
Reuven Kosakoff. Max
gets fine results from s and orchestra.

opland's Danzón Cubano
Hall, twelve-inch plastic performed by Leo Smit
omposer on two pianos consists of south-of-the nes and patterns can grated in light, pleas-style. The piano recordi

Kaufer, although he h writes fairly conv
His Sonata for Engl
Piano and Improvisat Horn alone (Ni two ten-inch disks) pla
Speyer of the Bo y Orchestra and Er pianist, have a fl sound. This is partly the nature of the Eng artly because of the us special modes. Mr. Sp fine performance o
heard instrument.

lities

has issued an albu from Henry V, sp ence Olivier, with music by William W
welve-inch disks). Sir ds some of the most sages from the pla
some not used in the kes effective use of device known to a g to a producer to the recordings.
eeds the visual ima
it, but the performa ilharmonia Orchestr
by the composer is d the recording is go
Records has done the by re-pressing the of Marlene Dietric
Johnny, Peter, and Baby. The famou ces, which are in he accompaniment o
er, have been out of ountry for years. If y ked Dietrich or had a
the demimonde
War I Europe you sho
songs fascinating.
items in the alb
. . . in einer grosse
t der Mann? and Je

ments Jacob Pillow

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1947

MUSICIANS TAKE OVER ESTATE MADE FAMOUS BY HAWTHORNE

While Employed by the Dixey Family at a Temporary Home Near By, the Young Author Began His "Tanglewood Tales"—Massachusetts Property Is Now Site of the Berkshire Music Festival, in Which Missouri Students Are Enrolled.

BY JOSEPH KAYE.

LENOX, MASS., Aug. 2.—The writer had been cautioned not to visit the Bullard home without an invitation. Nevertheless, there was a mission to be performed. In that house was a living room containing a fireplace that had played a part in literary history. Before it, Nathaniel Hawthorne had told the stories that were to become the "Tanglewood Tales."

I ignored the warnings and entered the long driveway leading to the Bullard estate, about a mile from Lenox. What appeared a short walk turned into an expedition. The gravel drive was left behind, and the sun, and most of the daylight, blotted out by a very good counterpart of the primeval forest. There was silence and gloom and gigantic trees and misshapen stumps.

Once a Great Dane emerged from the shadows and the forebodings seemed to take on an ominous reality. But an old man in black materialized and silently led the dog away.

I walked on and on through the endless path, with huge branches reaching out and an occasional creature making an eerie noise And then, quite in tradition of romance, the gloomy labyrinth ended, and there, around the usual bend, was a sun-lit lawn surrounding an old and lovely house. The big trees were here too, but they were now pleasant and cheerful. In the distance were purple hills and a gleaming lake. This was as enchanting an environment for a summer home as ever solid substance and imagination created.

A maid took our message, and shortly an elderly lady appeared, wearing a straw bonnet-hat and carrying an unfinished watercolor. She was gracious and kindly. (Nothing at all like the warnings; and the mysterious individual with the ferocious dog later turned out to be an amiable gentleman out hunting raspberries.) The lady was not Mrs. Bullard, who was indisposed, but her sister, Mrs. Burke. She led the way through a cool long hall, past charming antique rooms, and into a large living room, furnished with the simple elegance that apparently only old homes can achieve. Sunlight and flowers were everywhere, and peace and restfulness was over all.

The Fireplace That Young Hawthorne Knew.

On the left wall was a greenish-gray marble fireplace, laden with logs. Next to it was a bookcase. On a ledge lay a volume of "Tanglewood Tales," with a marker in it. The marker indicated the introduction to the story of "The Three Golden Apples," which had this paragraph:

". . . Accordingly, the student snatched hold of the first theme that presented itself. It was a plate of golden apples that he happened to spy on the mantelpiece."

The "student" was Hawthorne, and the mantelpiece the same as in this living room.

The story of this room runs as follows:

About a hundred years ago the Dixey family, of Boston, wanted to

(Continued on Page 4C.)

THE MAIN CONCERT SHED AT TANGLEWOOD IS A LARGE PAVILION ON THE ESTATE WHERE HAWTHORNE WROTE HIS "TALES"—NOW THE HOME OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
AUG 3 - 1947

Laderoute in Title Role Of Mozart's 'Idomeneo'; August Programs

By E. V. W.

Aug. 3 in Music: In 1778, La Scala, Milan's great opera house was opened; in 1795, the Paris Conservatory, founded by the National Convention, was established; in 1829, Rossini's opera "William Tell" had its world premiere in the Paris Opera; in 1922, the first radio sound effect was heard in WGY, Schenectady (slamming of a door). On Aug. 2, 1921, Enrico Caruso, world famed tenor, died in Naples, Italy.

JOSEPH LADEROUTE, baritone, who sang here a few years ago with the University Chorus under Dr. Howard Lyman, will have the title role in Mozart's opera "Idomeneo" in Tanglewood, tomorrow and Wednesday nights in th eTheater-Concert Hall, with admission by invitation of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Boris Goldovsky will conduct. This will mark the first performance of the opera in America. Today, following the Sunday afternoon Festival concert in the Tanglewood Music Shed, there will be a dress rehearsal for the Mozart opera, with admission by invitation. Today's afternoon concert, part of the Series B in the Berkshire Festival, is in the Beethoven Series, with Joseph Battista as soloist in the Fourth Piano Concerto. The Sixth (Pastorale) and the Seventh Symphonies are programmed.

Cast Includes Those Who Sang In 'Peter Grimes' Last Season

FOR "IDOMENEO," scenery has been designed by Richard Rychtarik. Mr. Goldovsky will be assisted by Frederic Cohen, Felix Wolfes, Elsa Kahl and Frederic Waldman of the opera department. The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus will comprise members of the Berkshire Music Center, as was the case when "Peter Grimes" was performed in Tanglewood last summer. Idamante, a part written by Mozart for a castrato, will be sung in the original range by a soprano—alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson. The Princess Ilia of Troy will be sung by Nancy Trickey; Elettra, daughter of Agamemnon, by Paula Lenchner, and the High Priest of Neptune by Frank Guarrera.

GRAND FORKS, N. D.
EVENING HERALD
AUG 4 1947

• George E. Sokolsky

I AM NOT A MUSICIAN NOR EVEN a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics, something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

* * *

THIS YEAR I SHALL HEAR ALL nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the nazi or communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

* * *

THEN I COME THE NEXT DAY and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room?

Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

* * *

MAYBE I OUGHT NOT TO STEP into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists an such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionist, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
AUG [illegible] - 1947

Honeymoon, [illegible]

Idomeneo To Open At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 4. (AP)—Mozart's three-act opera Idomeneo will be given its first United States performance by members of the Berkshire Music Center tonight in the theater opera hall at Tanglewood.

Under direction of Boris Goldovsky, the opera also will be staged Wednesday night.

The title part of Idomeneo will be sung by Joseph Laderoute. Idamte, a part written by Mozart for a contralto, will be sung in the original range by a soprano, alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1947

MUSICIANS TAKE OVER ESTATE MADE FAMOUS BY HAWTHORNE

While Employed by the Dixey Family at a Temporary Home Near By, the Young Author Began His "Tanglewood Tales"—Massachusetts Property Is Now Site of the Berkshire Music Festival, in Which Missouri Students Are Enrolled.

BY JOSEPH KAYE.

LENOX, MASS., Aug. 2.—The writer had been cautioned not to visit the Bullard home without an invitation. Nevertheless, there was a mission to be performed. In that house was a living room containing a fireplace that had played a part in literary history. Before it, Nathaniel Hawthorne had told the stories that were to become the "Tanglewood Tales."

I ignored the warnings and entered the long driveway leading to the Bullard estate, about a mile from Lenox. What appeared a short walk turned into an expedition. The gravel drive was left behind, and the sun, and most of the daylight, blotted out by a very good counterpart of the primeval forest. There was silence and gloom and gigantic trees and misshapen stumps.

Once a Great Dane emerged from the shadows and the forebodings seemed to take on an ominous reality. But an old man in black materialized and silently led the dog away.

I walked on and on through the endless path, with huge branches reaching out and an occasional creature making an eerie noise. And then, quite in tradition of romance, the gloomy labyrinth ended, and there, around the usual bend, was a sun-lit lawn surrounding an old and lovely house. The big trees were here too, but they were now pleasant and cheerful. In the distance were purple hills and a gleaming lake. This was as enchanting an environment for a summer home as ever solid substance and imagination created.

A maid took our message, and shortly an elderly lady appeared, wearing a straw bonnet-hat and carrying an unfinished watercolor. She was gracious and kindly. (Nothing at all like the warnings; and the mysterious individual with the ferocious dog later turned out to be an amiable gentleman out hunting raspberries.) The lady was not Mrs. Bullard, who was indisposed, but her sister, Mrs. Burke. She led the way through a cool long hall, past charming antique rooms, and into a large living room, furnished with the simple elegance that apparently only old homes can achieve. Sunlight and flowers were everywhere, and peace and restfulness was over all.

The Fireplace That Young Hawthorne Knew.

On the left wall was a greenish-gray marble fireplace, laden with logs. Next to it was a bookcase. On a ledge lay a volume of "Tanglewood Tales," with a marker in it. The marker indicated the introduction to the story of "The Three Golden Apples," which had this paragraph:

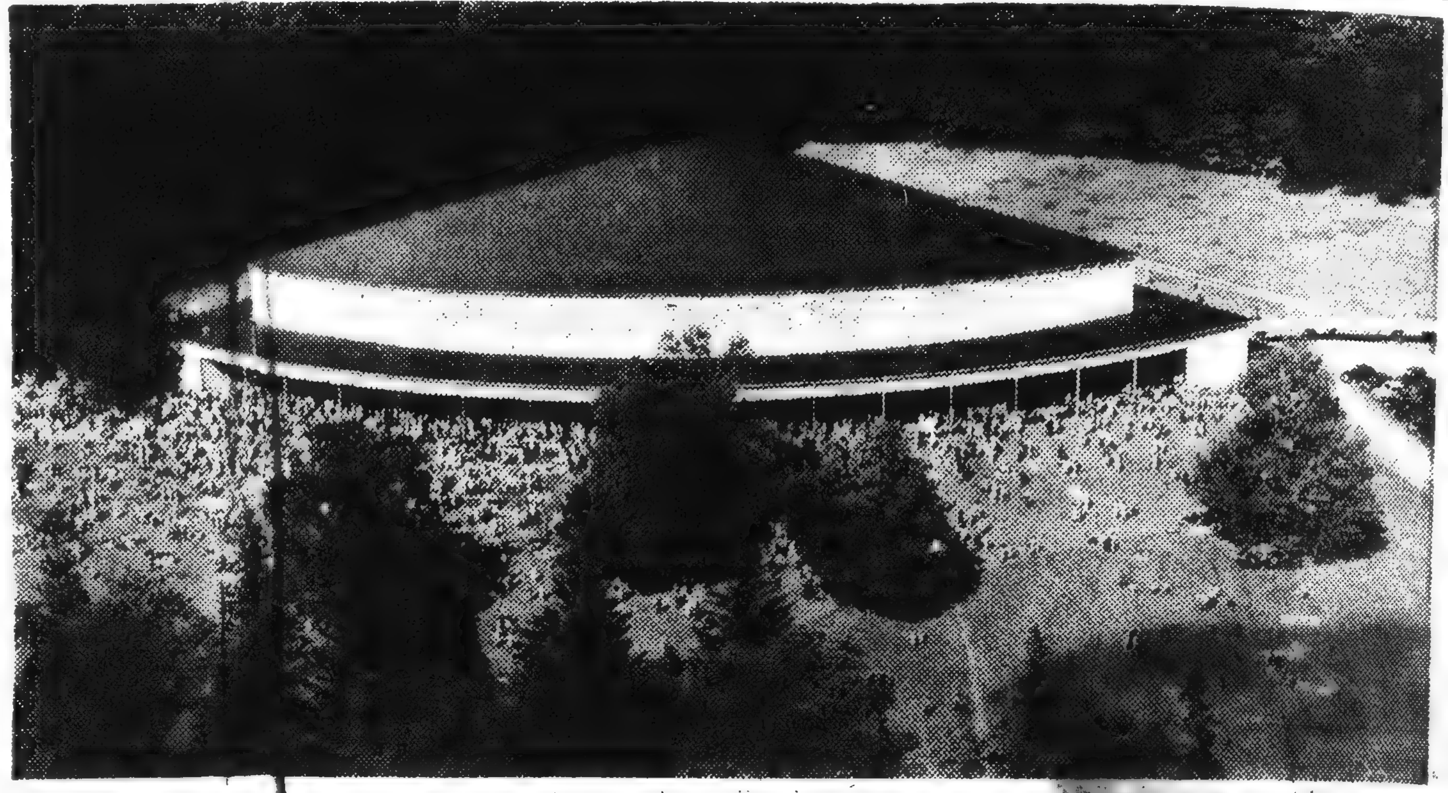
". . . Accordingly, the student snatched hold of the first theme that presented itself. It was a plate of golden apples that he happened to spy on the mantelpiece."

The "student" was Hawthorne, and the mantelpiece the same as in this living room.

The story of this room runs as follows:

About a hundred years ago the Dixey family, of Boston, wanted to

(Continued on Page 4C.)



THE MAIN CONCERT SHED AT TANGLEWOOD IS A LARGE PAVILION ON THE ESTATE WHERE HAWTHORNE WROTE HIS "TALES"—NOW THE HOME OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
AUG 3 - 1947

Laderoute in Title Role Of Mozart's 'Idomeneo'; August Programs

By E. V. W.

Aug. 3 in Music: In 1778, La Scala, Milan's great opera house was opened; in 1795, the Paris Conservatory, founded by the National Convention, was established; in 1829, Rossini's opera "William Tell" had its world premiere in the Paris Opera; in 1922, the first radio sound effect was heard in WGY, Schenectady (slamming of a door). On Aug. 2, 1921, Enrico Caruso, world famed tenor, died in Naples, Italy.

JOSEPH LADEROUTE, baritone, who sang here a few years ago with the University Chorus under Dr. Howard Lyman, will have the title role in Mozart's opera "Idomeneo" in Tanglewood, tomorrow and Wednesday nights in th eTheater-Concert Hall, with admission by invitation of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Boris Goldovsky will conduct. This will mark the first performance of the opera in America. Today, following the Sunday afternoon Festival concert in the Tanglewood Music Shed, there will be a dress rehearsal for the Mozart opera, with admission by invitation. Today's afternoon concert, part of the Series B in the Berkshire Festival, is in the Beethoven Series, with Joseph Battista as soloist in the Fourth Piano Concerto. The Sixth (Pastorale) and the Seventh Symphonies are programmed.

Cast Includes Those Who Sang In 'Peter Grimes' Last Season

FOR "IDOMENEO," scenery has been designed by Richard Rychtarik. Mr. Goldovsky will be assisted by Frederic Cohen, Felix Wolfes, Elsa Kahl and Frederic Waldman of the opera department. The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus will comprise members of the Berkshire Music Center, as was the case when "Peter Grimes" was performed in Tanglewood last summer. Idamante, a part written by Mozart for a castrato, will be sung in the original range by a soprano—alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson. The Princess Ilia of Troy will be sung by Nancy Trickey; Elettra, daughter of Agamemnon, by Paula Lenchner, and the High Priest of Neptune by Frank Guarrera.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
AUG 4 - 1947

Idomeneo To Open At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 4. (AP)—Mozart's three-act opera Idomeneo will be given its first United States performance by members of the Berkshire Music Center tonight in the theater opera hall at Tanglewood.

Under direction of Boris Goldovsky, the opera also will be staged Wednesday night.

The title part of Idomeneo will be sung by Joseph Laderoute. Idamte, a part written by Mozart for a contralto, will be sung in the original range by a soprano, alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson.

GRAND FORKS, N. D.
EVENING HERALD
AUG 4 1947

• George E. Sokolsky

I AM NOT A MUSICIAN NOR EVEN a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics, something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

* * *

THIS YEAR I SHALL HEAR ALL nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are [illegible] same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the nazi or communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

* * *

THEN I COME THE NEXT DAY and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room?

Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

* * *

MAYBE I OUGHT NOT TO STEP into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists an such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionist, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

COURANT

AUG 4 - 1947

DANCE FESTIVAL

The Shows Are on at Jacob's Pillow Dance Theater

To the Editor of The Courant:

We are fortunate to have available so many artistic and cultural diversions for our amusement during the summer. In the field of pictures there is the Avery Museum, and air-conditioned movies. Connecticut painters are exhibiting in Essex, Lyme, and Mystic. Connecticut actors furnish entertainment in Canton, Ivoryton, and Clinton. Connecticut musicians play in concert at Norfolk, Falls Village, Silvermine, and the Yale Bowl. In the Berkshires, a short drive from Hartford, are such popular festival centers as Tanglewood, at Stockbridge and Jacob's Pillow at Lee. The former is the shrine of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the latter is American's University of the Dance.

At Jacob's Pillow during the summer months in a spacious barn-like theater, great dance artists present their latest offerings to an audience of critical students and the general public. The University of the Dance was established by Ted Shawn and Ruth St. Denis for the instruction of qualified students by the greatest dancers and dance educators. The sixth season of the Dance Festival opened auspiciously with the Ballet Repertory's presentation of Arthur Mahoney's modern work entitled: "Cross-Roads." This was followed by Charles Weidman's "Fables Of Our Time" for which he was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship. Reginald and Glayds Laubin demonstrated tribal dances of the Western Indians. Devi Dja from Java danced the mystical rites of the South-Seas.

Performances at Jacob's Pillow start at 4 and 8:30 p. m. on Saturdays, and 4 p. m. on Fridays. Cars and buses park near the theater. A canteen serves refreshments during intermission. The audience is invited to remain after the Saturday night show for social dancing in the studio where there may be an impromtu floor show by tap and acrobatic dancers.

This year Arthur Mahoney and Thalia Mara, who have a Carnegie Hall stduio, are directing the festival in the absence of Ted Shawn on a trip abroad. A competent staff provides instruction for some 100 boys and girls who study related subjects ranging from dance to choregraphy. Margaret Crache of London, England, has a ballet class of sixty-five. Yolan R. Szabo of Torrington, Connecticut, directs the social dancing. Dr. Elizabeth Burchenal teaches folk dancing. Iris Mabry has classes in the modern dance; Joseph Pilates is physical trainer.

Some 300 people contributed to the building of the theater. Joseph Franz, architect of Tanglewood Music Shed planned the theater particularly for dance recitals and operatic productions. He delights in telling how the huge beams above the audience were hewn by hand from trees that grew a hundred feet tall on Lebanon Mountain. A venerable Negro craftsman performed this labor of love. The general public has an opportunity to share in the completion of the building. Those who forward five-dollars or more to the box office will be known as "Friends of Jacob's Pillow" and receive special courtesies.

A non-profit institution, chartered under the laws of Massachusetts, Jacob's Pillow aims to be the finest dance school in this country. Such instruction is expensive, but the Directors consider only the finest facilities are worthy of great artists. A budget of $55,770 has recently been set-up for improvements, etc. It seems reasonable for the public to help finance this work and care for such items as dormitories, a recreation and dining hall, cabins for faculty and guest artists, a new deep well, pumps and plumbing, and the reshingling of old buildings. Checks may be made payable to Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Inc. Box 147, Lee, Mass.

Guest artists for the month of August through Labor Day include Paul Draper, the Ballet Theater, Mata and Hari, Devi Dja, Angna Enters, Florence Greenland, poplar dance instructor of West Hartford has joined the staff for August.

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival is readily accessible from Hartford via Route 20 from Westfield or Route 8 from Winsted. The theater is twelve miles from the village of Lee and five miles from Otis. Take the mile-long woodland drive which leads off to the right about two miles west of the tower at the summit of Jacob's Ladder trail, from Chester.

It is decidedly worth the effort and a privilege to witness in production so much creativity in dance routines and ballets that are destined to enrich Broadway musicales and thrill thousands throughout the country. It will be a rich experience to see Ballet Repertory on tour. Arthur Mahoney and Thalia Mara deserve much credit for their accomplishments [illegible] Jacob's Pillow.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 4 - 1947

Beethoven's Symphonies At Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Koussevitzky's Beethoven cycle was continued in the Saturday and Sunday concerts at Tanglewood. He saw us through the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh symphonies and the piano concertos in E flat (the "Emperor") and the G. major.

The leader of the Boston orchestra has never set himself up as a Beethovenist particularly. He has favored the Eroica, of which we heard such a model performance on Thusday and he has found the Fifth a very useful program item.

It has been his splendid objectivity, his definitive recreation of these classic scores that has made the Beethoven cycle the feature of the 1947 Berkshire Festival. His familiar dealing with the Fifth has always been the antithesis of what this reviewer praised him for on Thursday — objectivity and avoidance of the personal interpretation. Koussevitzky's Fifth is a very individual reading. It is volcanic and quite fierce. It usually brings down the house and it was used on Saturday night to cap the climax of what turned out to be the biggest audience so far to gather on the Tanglewood grounds —something over 14,000 souls.

This reviewer prefers to dilate upon the Fourth symphony which opened the Saturday concert, and the felicitous "Pastoral" and Seventh which brightened the Sunday proceedings.

* * *

BUT FIRST the concertos. Jacob Lateiner gave a suave account of the E flat. His pianism was virile and well-proportioned but the outstanding characteristic was technical polish. Scales and passage work were executed with a purling quality that grew as much as out of tonal warmth as from mere precision.

His performance was a calculated one but it had artistic distinction too and he made a very fine impression upon the audience.

Joseph Battista made himself a part of the orchestra rather than standing upon soloist's prerogatives in presenting the G major concerto. He sedulously watched Koussevitzky's beat, allowing the conductor to set tempos as well as mood and manner. Only in the concluding rondo did his youthful enthusiasm make him something of a pacer-setter. Over all, his performance was hardly scaled for outdoor performance and it was doubtful if the listeners on the lawns outside the pavilion got full benefit of the nicer details of both tone and phrasing.

Koussevitzky's concerto accompaniments leave something to be desired. So strong an individualist as he is does not find it easy to subordinate himself to a soloist's vagaries, even when they are justified. All his cues to the orchestra are concerned with How and not When. Consequently a collaboration such as this, especially with two such young soloists, revealed a need for better team work.

* * *

FOR SHEER magnificence the Seventh topped all else. The piled up sonorities of the opening pages, the scintillant scherzo and the flooding turbulence of the last movement were memorable in a cycle of memories.

The Pastoral Symphony has been heard often at Tanglewood. It avowed tone painting suits the scene to perfection. Its miniature storm was as near as the Festival has come to bad weather this season.

The Fourth symphony on Saturday night was something for the connoisseur. No effects here for their own sake; simply a continent shaping of phrase and harmony toward expressive ends. The design and idiom of Beethoven were implicit under the ministrations master musicians, expertly cted.

e Beethoven cycle will finish esday night with the Eighth th symphonies.

MUNCIE, IND.
MORNING STAR

1947

George E. Sokolsky Says:

Everything Modern Tough on the Ear and the Soul

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

* * *

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day anc they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tir washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has tc do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. I that is a Russian springtime, ther those people have never walkec down a lane with a pretty girl n the newness of the year. If tha is the music they used to dance tc it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolut music, but I am a simple fellov who likes Beethoven, Brahams Schubert and even Jerome Ker and Gershwin. But do I have t like noise, too? Do I have to g to Tanglewood to hear the Bosto Symphony produce the sounds of newspaper press room? Maybe th critics like the arithmetic of music as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensit of feeling. I leave the physics o the celestial orbs to the atomi scientists. Their music is, boom That's really what Copland anc Stravinsky sound like to me—jus a lot of boom.

* * *

Maybe I ought not to step intc the domain of the music critics They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics anc musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussewitky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple floks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

AUG 4 - 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

MUSIC IN THE HILLS

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wal. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copeland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busybodies. It is a factory ,a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copeland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
AUG 4 - 1947

Accent On Youth Features Lewisohn Stadium Concerts

By Helen Havener

New York City, Aug. 4.—It has been "accent on youth" at stadium concerts within the past fortnight, at least in so far as conductors are concerned. Paul Lavalle of radio fame; Richard Korn, married to ex-Governor Herbert Lehman's charming daughter, Peggy; Bernard Herrmann of the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra and Hans Schweiger, young batonist of the Fort Wayne Symphony, have all occupied the podium during that period. All of them showed up pretty well.

Of them all, the most curiosity centered about Mr. Schweiger, for the others are well known to New York audiences, and he was a newcomer, but with fine things said about his career in the Middle West. Also the story of his wartime hardships and sufferings is a saga which might well furnish the theme for a novel. But more of that anon.

Mr. Schweiger was entrusted with some very important programs, including the all-Wagner one which featured Helen Traubel as soloist. Each of his appearances at the stadium indicated that his was a talent worth watching. He conducts with authority, the Philharmonic musicians were responsive to his baton, his readings were clear cut, his interpretations sound. After he had led his musicians through the Tannhauser Overture and Bacchanale, the Preludes to Acts I and III of Lohengrin, the Tristan Prelude, the Siegfried Idyll and Siegfried's Funeral March, conviction as to the magnitude of his gifts was strengthened.

Just what has prompted stadium concerts in its conductorial youth talent hunt has not been made clear, but in your columnist's opinion, at least, it is a far-seeing move. An amazing number of America's foremost conductors are today in their 60's or 70's. Stokowski passed the 60 mark some time ago. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has just celebrated his 73rd birthday. Walter and Monteux have left their youth behind by several decades, although they are vigorous and able and among America's favorite conductors. But the question might very logically arise—who is to succeed these Titans in the future? Certainly there are not conductors enough of first rank to take over the posts of these men and fill the podiums of all the other major orchestras. In its 30 years the stadium has given much young performing talent, now Nationally and internationally famous, its first opportunity. Before another decade passes, perhaps this will be true of conductorial talent as well.

Apropos of youth and its gifts and opportunities, Leonard Bernstein, 29-year-old protege of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was given an unusual honor this past week. For the first time since the Berkshire Music Festivals were started, Dr. Koussevitzky yielded the baton for one of the major concerts, and it was the young Lawrence, Massachusetts-born conductor who picked it up. Eighty-five hundred people, of whom one was the beaming Dr. Koussevitzky, greeted the youthful batonist with cheers as he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the Overture to Mozart's Magic Flute, Schubert's Symphony in C Major No. 7, and Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps.

New York was all agog this week to welcome one of the most distinguished musical groups in the world. It was the Roman Singers of Sacred Music, a vocal ensemble of 54, which embraces the membership of four Vatican and Roman choirs. Scheduled for an extensive tour of the United States, they were officially received on Wednesday at City Hall by Mayor William O'Dwyer and Francis Cardinal Spellman, Archbishop of the Diocese of New York. Their first selection on American soil was an aria composed by Rt. Rev. Licinio Refice, director of the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music, which comprised a greeting to the American people. This and two other songs were sung for an invited audience of 500 in the City Council Chamber where notable visitors to New York are received. Later the repertoire was repeated on the steps of the municipal building before an audience of several thousand.

We said a few paragraphs back that the career of Hans Schweiger read like a story book. Here it is in a nutshell. A rising young conductor when Hitler came to power in Germany in 1933, he soon forfeited official favor because it was discovered that his blonde Dutch wife was of Jewish extraction. Engagements fell off. The family became impoverished. Mr. Schweiger waked one morning to find that his wife had packed and returned to her native Holland to secure a divorce so that she would not be a handicap to his career. A return to prosperity followed, but all Mr. Schweiger now wanted money for was to go to the United States so that he could be reunited with his wife. A proffered concert tour to Japan gave him his opportunity. Once safe on American shores, he cabled for Mrs. Schweiger to rejoin him. They were married again, and journeyed happily to South Carolina where he formed the State Symphony. But he was German and he had come to the United States via Japan, so suspicion fell upon him with the attack at Pearl Harbor. Four hundred days in an internment camp followed before the authorities had satisfied themselves that he was not an "enemy alien." Released, he achieved his citizenship papers only to have his wife, who had stood by him through all his hardships, collapse and die. "I thought it was the end of everything" Schweiger told a New York reporter a few days ago "But in the Fall I was offered the job of organizing the Fort Wayne Philharmonic." Since then there has been an upturn, and now Hans Schweiger is a young man to be reckoned with. Listeners throughout his engagement at Lewisohn Stadium thought there was unusual depth and maturity to his conducting. Perhaps the explanation lies in the lessons he has learned through turning the pages of experience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
AUG 4 - 1947

Largest Weekend Audience In History of Tanglewood

Record Throng Hears Splendid Beethoven Cycle Interpreted by Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 3—The largest weekend audience in the history of Tanglewood came out to hear the Beethoven cycle interpreted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A total of 35,000 persons attended the three concerts. The largest audience was on hand Saturday night when 14,000 persons turned out to hear the fourth and fifth symphonies and the "Emperor" concerto. Thirteen thousand turned out today to hear the sixth and seventh symphonies and the "concerto No. 4 in G major."

It has been a memorable experience to hear the seven symphonies thus far played. One could only listen in awe to their unfolding and marvel at the mental and technical resources, the inventiveness, and inner power which makes each so significant. This afternoon one heard two sharply contrasted symphonies, the lovely "Pastorale" and the monumental seventh. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men provided a delectable reading of the pastorale, joying in its lightness, its placidity and the surpassing beauties of its melodic content.

One heard this afternoon a superb performance of the seventh symphony. It was a reading in the grand style, a reading of vast proportions. The drive of a single rhythmic figure through each movement was overpowering. Not one instant of the variety of movement which keeps the interest at high pitch was lost.

Joseph Battista, who has played in Springfield, was the soloist in the piano concerto. So beautiful is the music of this concerto that it must inspire those who play it. Mr. Battista is fleet of fingers, and while he was at times inclined to be percussive or cloyingly sweet as to tone, he gave a careful, well-integrated reading of the work with splendid collaboration of the orchestra.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS COURIER
AUG 4 - 1947

Music in the Hills

By George E. Sokolsky

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the inifinte.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific, that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year, If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty or melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me, just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, [illegible] on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small [illegible] Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
AUG 4 - 1947

13,000 Hear Eighth Tanglewood Corcert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Monday—An audience of thirteen thousand, exceeded only three times at Tanglewod, attended the eighth concert yesterday afternoon. This wa the third of a cycle of four all-Beethoven programs, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Joseph Battista was soloist in the "Concerto in G Major for Piano and Orchestra."

The balance of the program was "Symphony No. 6, in F Major (pastoral), Opus 68," and "Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Opus 92."

Interpretation

The young pianist from Philadelphia gave an imaginative and musicianly interpretation of the exacting concerto. It is exacting for a number of reasons, not the least of which are exposed content for piano, and the unusual precision that must be maintained between solo instrument and orchestra.

Comparisons between pianists do not arrive at important conclusions, however. The elements of maturity and the intellectual approach of Battista and Jacob Lateiner (who played the Emperor Concerto Saturday night) were striking.

Whereas Lateiner viewed his score from an intellectual, almost academically concentrated point of view, there was an enthusiasm and freedom in Battista's approach that vitalized the work and imbued it with greater spontaneity.

Real Test

Battista's playing is marked by a good measure of technical solvency, energy resulting in balanced sonority, and in the andante movement a deep feeling for poetry.

The eight reflective solo measures, filigreed passages of the first movement and its finely chiseled cadenza were executed with refinement and technical security.

For this reviewer, at least, the real test lies in the slow movement. The dialogue between piano and orchestra was sensitively narrated. Koussevitzky imparted a sternness to the orchestral statements that were answered with a gentle and expressive tone.

Although the opening piano sequences of the rondo movement were somewhat vigorous and there was not always rhythmically precise entene with the soloist, the movement was played sprightly and arrived at a sparkling conclusion.

Two Extremes

The two orchestral works represented two extreme aspects of the composer's style. The orchestra and conductor were not always entirely in accord during the pastoral. Although the delicately graceful lines of the opening movement were neatly molded, there was slight rhythmic insecurity between transitional sections.

During the storm sequences of the third movement there was a tendency toward shrillness in the brasses, and the horns were not always tonally reliable.

By comparison, the Seventh Symphony rose to unprecedented stature in this cycle. The massiveness of its structure and bold releases of emotion created an atmosphere of grandeur. But as was the case in the Fifth Symphony Saturday night, there was a tendency toward overemphasis of the brasses, particularly in the final movement.

The Eighth and Ninth Symphonies will be played Tuesday night.

Soloists for the latter will be Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

At 'Idomeneo' Rehearsal

LENOX, Monday (AP) — About 400 students and faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center, music critics and some 300 invited guests attended a rehearsal last night in the theater opera hall of Mozart's three-act opera "Idomeneo," which will be given its first U. S. performance at Tanglewood tonight and repeated Wednesday night.

The opera will be staged by the opera department of the music center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus will consist of members of the Berkshire Music Center, as was the case when Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" was performed at Tanglewood last Summer.

The title part will be sung by Joseph Laderoute. Idamte, a part written by Mozart for a contralto, will be sung in the original range by a soprano, alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson.

Although there are only 1100 seats in the opera hall, hundreds are expected to witness the performance through wide doors on either side of the hall.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
AUG 4 - 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival this year, the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard at 8:30 P. M. over ABC in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast. Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center courses this Summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank G of Rahway road have as a guest their niece, Miss Lois Gaines of Ventnor City, N. J. They plan to leave on a short trip to Tanglewood, Mass., where they will attend the Berkshire Music Festival.

Judy Baetzner, daughter of Mr

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 4 - 1947

Accent On Youth Features Lewisohn Stadium Concerts

By Helen Havener

New York City, Aug. 4.—It has been "accent on youth" at stadium concerts within the past fortnight, at least in so far as conductors are concerned. Paul Lavalle of radio fame; Richard Korn, married to ex-Governor Herbert Lehman's charming daughter, Peggy; Bernard Herrmann of the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra and Hans Schweiger, young batonist of the Fort Wayne Symphony, have all occupied the podium during that period. All of them showed up pretty well.

Of them all, the most curiosity centered about Mr. Schweiger, for the others are well known to New York audiences, and he was a newcomer, but with fine things said about his career in the Middle West. Also the story of his wartime hardships and sufferings is a saga which might well furnish the theme for a novel. But more of that anon.

Mr. Schweiger was entrusted with some very important programs, including the all-Wagner one which featured Helen Traubel as soloist. Each of his appearances at the stadium indicated that his was a talent worth watching. He conducts with authority, the Philharmonic musicians were responsive to his baton, his readings were clear cut, his interpretations sound. After he had led his musicians through the Tannhauser Overture and Bacchanale, the Preludes to Acts I and III of Lohengrin, the Tristan Prelude, the Siegfried Idyll and Siegfried's Funeral March, conviction as to the magnitude of his gifts was strengthened.

Just what has prompted stadium concerts in its conductorial youth talent hunt has not been made clear, but in your columnist's opinion, at least, it is a far-seeing move. An amazing number of America's foremost conductors are today in their 60's or 70's. Stokowski passed the 60 mark some time ago. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has just celebrated his 73rd birthday. Walter and Monteux have left their youth behind by several decades, although they are vigorous and able and among America's favorite conductors. But the question might very logically arise—who is to succeed these Titans in the future? Certainly there are not conductors enough of first rank to take over the posts of these men and fill the podiums of all the other major orchestras. In its 30 years the stadium has given much young performing talent, now Nationally and internationally famous, its first opportunity. Before another decade passes, perhaps this will be true of conductorial talent as well.

Apropos of youth and its gifts and opportunities, Leonard Bernstein, 29-year-old protege of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was given an unusual honor this past week. For the first time since the Berkshire Music Festivals were started, Dr. Koussevitzky yielded the baton for one of the major concerts, and it was the young Lawrence, Massachusetts-born conductor who picked it up. Eighty-five hundred people, of whom one was the beaming Dr. Koussevitzky, greeted the youthful batonist with cheers as he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the Overture to Mozart's Magic Flute, Schubert's Symphony in C Major No. 7, and Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps.

New York was all agog this week to welcome one of the most distinguished musical groups in the world. It was the Roman Singers of Sacred Music, a vocal ensemble of 54, which embraces the membership of four Vatican and Roman choirs. Scheduled for an extensive tour of the United States, they were officially received on Wednesday at City Hall by Mayor William O'Dwyer and Francis Cardinal Spellman, Archbishop of the Diocese of New York. Their first selection on American soil was an aria composed by Rt. Rev. Licinio Refice, director of the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music, which comprised a greeting to the American people. This and two other songs were sung for an invited audience of 500 in the City Council Chamber where notable visitors to New York are received. Later the repertoire was repeated on the steps of the municipal building before an audience of several thousand.

We said a few paragraphs back that the career of Hans Schweiger read like a story book. Here it is in a nutshell. A rising young conductor when Hitler came to power in Germany in 1933, he soon forfeited official favor because it was discovered that his blonde Dutch wife was of Jewish extraction. Engagements fell off. The family became impoverished. Mr. Schweiger waked one morning to find that his wife had packed and returned to her native Holland to secure a divorce so that she would not be a handicap to his career. A return to prosperity followed, but all Mr. Schweiger now wanted money for was to go to the United States so that he could be reunited with his wife. A proffered concert tour to Japan gave him his opportunity. Once safe on American shores, he cabled for Mrs. Schweiger to rejoin him. They were married again, and journeyed happily to South Carolina where he formed the State Symphony. But he was German and he had come to the United States via Japan, so suspicion fell upon him with the attack at Pearl Harbor. Four hundred days in an internment camp followed before the authorities had satisfied themselves that he was not an "enemy alien." Released, he achieved his citizenship papers only to have his wife, who had stood by him through all his hardships, collapse and die. "I thought it was the end of everything" Schweiger told a New York reporter a few days ago "But in the Fall I was offered the job of organizing the Fort Wayne Philharmonic." Since then there has been an upturn, and now Hans Schweiger is a young man to be reckoned with Listeners throughout his engagement at Lewisohn Stadium thought there was unusual depth and maturity to his conducting. Perhaps the explanation lies in the lessons he has learned through turning the pages of experience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 4 - 1947

Largest Weekend Audience In History of Tanglewood

Record Throng Hears Splendid Beethoven Cycle Interpreted by Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 3—The largest weekend audience in the history of Tanglewood came out to hear the Beethoven cycle interpreted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A total of 35,000 persons attended the three concerts. The largest audience was on hand Saturday night when 14,000 persons turned out to hear the fourth and fifth symphonies and the "Emperor" concerto. Thirteen thousand turned out today to hear the sixth and seventh symphonies and the "concerto No. 4 in G major."

It has been a memorable experience to hear the seven symphonies thus far played. One could only listen in awe to their unfolding and marvel at the mental and technical resources, the inventiveness, and inner power which makes each so significant. This afternoon one heard two sharply contrasted symphonies, the lovely "Pastorale" and the monumental seventh. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men provided a delectable reading of the pastorale, joying in its lightness, its placidity and the surpassing beauties of its melodic content.

One heard this afternoon a superb performance of the seventh symphony. It was a reading in the grand style, a reading of vast proportions. The drive of a single rhythmic figure through each movement was overpowering. Not one instant of the variety of movement which keeps the interest at high pitch was lost.

Joseph Battista, who has played in Springfield, was the soloist in the piano concerto. So beautiful is the music of this concerto that it must inspire those who play it. Mr. Battista is fleet of fingers, and while he was at times inclined to be percussive or cloyingly sweet as to tone, he gave a careful, well-integrated reading of the work with splendid collaboration of the orchestra.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS COURIER

AUG 4 - 1947

Music in the Hills

By George E. Sokolsky

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? Not And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the inifinte.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific, that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty or melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me, just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1947

13,000 Hear Eighth Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Monday—An audience of thirteen thousand, exceeded only three times at Tanglewod, attended the eighth concert yesterday afternoon. This wa the third of a cycle of four all-Beethoven programs, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Joseph Battista was soloist in the "Concerto in G Major for Piano and Orchestra."

The balance of the program was "Symphony No. 6, in F Major (pastoral), Opus 68," and "Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Opus 92."

Interpretation

The young pianist from Philadelphia gave an imaginative and musicianly interpretation of the exacting concerto. It is exacting for a number of reasons, not the least of which are exposed content for piano, and the unusual precision that must be maintained between solo instrument and orchestra.

Comparisons between pianists do not arrive at important conclusions, however. The elements of maturity and the intellectual approach of Battista and Jacob Lateiner (who played the Emperor Concerto Saturday night) were striking.

Whereas Lateiner viewed his score from an intellectual, almost academically concentrated point of view, there was an enthusiasm and freedom in Battista's approach that vitalized the work and imbued it with greater spontaneity.

Real Test

Battista's playing is marked by a good measure of technical solvency, energy resulting in balanced sonority, and in the andante movement a deep feeling for poetry.

The eight reflective solo measures, filigreed passages of the first movement and its finely chiseled cadenza were executed with refinement and technical security.

For this reviewer, at least, the real test lies in the slow movement. The dialogue between piano and orchestra was sensitively narrated. Koussevitzky imparted a sternness to the orchestral statements that were answered with a gentle and expressive tone.

Although the opening piano sequences of the rondo movement were somewhat vigorous and there was not always rhythmically precise entene with the soloist, the movement was played sprightly and arrived at a sparkling conclusion.

Two Extremes

The two orchestral works represented two extreme aspects of the composer's style. The orchestra and conductor were not always entirely in accord during the pastoral. Although the delicately graceful lines of the opening movement were neatly molded, there was slight rhythmic insecurity between transitional sections.

During the storm sequences of the third movement there was a tendency toward shrillness in the brasses, and the horns were not always tonally reliable.

By comparison, the Seventh Symphony rose to unprecedented stature in this cycle. The massiveness of its structure and bold releases of emotion created an atmosphere of grandeur. But as was the case in the Fifth Symphony Saturday night, there was a tendency toward overemphasis of the brasses, particularly in the final movement.

The Eighth and Ninth Symphonies will be played Tuesday night.

Soloists for the latter will be Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

At 'Idomeneo' Rehearsal

LENOX, Monday (AP) — About 400 students and faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center, music critics and some 300 invited guests attended a rehearsal last night in the theater opera hall of Mozart's three-act opera "Idomeneo," which will be given its first U. S. performance at Tanglewood tonight and repeated Wednesday night.

The opera will be staged by the opera department of the music center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus will consist of members of the Berkshire Music Center, as was the case when Benjamin Britten's 'Peter Grimes' was performed at Tanglewood last Summer.

The title part will be sung by Joseph Laderoute. Idamte, a part written by Mozart for a contralto, will be sung in the original range by a soprano, alternately in the two performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson.

Although there are only 1100 seats in the opera hall, hundreds are expected to witness the performance through wide doors on either side of the hall.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

AUG 4 - 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard at 8:30 P. M. over ABC in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast. Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center courses this Summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gilbert of Rahway road have as a guest their niece, Miss Lois Gaines of Ventnor City, N. J. They plan to leave on a short trip to Tanglewood, Mass., where they will attend the Berkshire Music Festival.

Judy Baetzner, daughter of Mr

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 4 - 1947

Huge Crowds At Festival Concerts

(Special to The Gazette)

LENOX, Aug. 4—The Berkshire Music Festival has meant much to the advancement of musical culture in this country. The two concerts of Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon in the Beethoven cycle saw two record-breaking crowds fill the music shed and blanket the surrounding lawns.

The concerts at Tanglewood have become as much a center of musical interests as the European mecca of Salzburg. The prestige of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, of course, enhanced the attraction of Tanglewood.

People from varied states and backgrounds somehow unite as one under the influence of music, the common demoninator. Lorgnettes, ham on rye, broad "A's," and Brooklynese all find their way to the festival.

The eighth program yesterday, consisting of three works in the Beethoven series, saw the appearance of a young artist who will play in Worcester next Spring.

Joseph Battista, 28, of Philadelphia, who performed the Concerto for Piano No. 4 in G Major yesterday, will appear in the Becker concert series on April 11. The pianist thrilled the audience with his inspired interpretation of the most difficult of the Beethoven concertos.

Students of the Berkshire Music Center will present the first American production of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo" tonight and Wednesday night in the Tanglewood concert hall. Attending the Music Center School are Wayne R. Barrington of 31 Perkins street, Worcester, and Roland A. Hoeston, Jr., of Framingham.

Many Worcester residents have subscribed to the series of nine festival concerts. Among those attending are Mrs. Joseph Leavitt of 126 Newton avenue, Mrs. Mac Levine of 38 Amherst street, J. B. Ribakoff of 1395 Pleasant street, Dr. F. J. Rooney of 117 Vernon street, Harry S. Saidel of 55 South Lenox street, Hyman J. Small of 8 Morningside road, R. W. Swenson of 74 Florence street, Miss Edith M. Ward of 52 Cedar street, Dona W. Woodbridge of Worcester Polytechnic Institute and Mrs. Jacob Young of 66 South Lenox street.

Others attending concerts of the festival are Ernest A. Abeles of 21 Havelock road, Lewis Blumenthal of 39 Creswell road, Rufus Dunbar of 52 Elm street, Milton L. Fitch of 50 Portland street, Saul Freedman of 60 Sagamore road, Mrs. John Getter of 3 Montvale road, Mrs. Samuel Glick of 6 Chamberlain parkway, Mrs. Solomon Hurowitz af 124 Newton avenue, Magnus Jankelson of 52 Belmont street and Mrs. A. Albert Klein of 422 Lovell street.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
AUG 4 - 1947

Commentator George Sokolsky Tries Hand At Criticism Of Modern Music

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times eacho— week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music in the rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of the Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

Relaxation

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethover wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to be if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists are other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with Caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, to. Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Critics' Domain

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 4 - 1947

Reading of Beethoven 7th Highlight at Tanglewood

Boston Symphony Accorded Ovation; Program Included 'Pastorale,' and Fourth Piano Concerto, With Joseph Battista Pleasing Large Audience

By W. HARLEY RUDKIN

Yesterday's audience at Tanglewood was treated to three brilliant aspects of a tremendous musical spirit, with the presentation of Beethoven's sixth symphonies, and his Piano Concerto No. 4, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the youthful Joseph Battista as soloist.

The program opened with the sixth, or "Pastorale," which moviegoers have come inevitably to associate with Walt Disney's flying horses and Jovian thunderbolts.

But even without the visual medium, the association of the sixth with the countryside cold hardly have been escaped, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave it a clear and sweetly nostalgic reading.

At an earlier concert this season, a New York music authority noted that there was a diffuseness about music played out of doors that detracted from its intrinsic quality. But if there was ever music designed to blend with a sylvan setting, then the "Pastorale" symphony is that music.

Just in case there might be anyone in the audience who might miss the significance of the dramatic sequences of the sixth, the four movements have been annotated on the program. As, per se: Allegro ma non troppo ("Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country"). I know its only a quibble, but it does strike me as bending over backward for emphasis.

Nice Balance

The playing of the sixth and seventh together provides a nice balance, for where the sixth is almost purely pictorial, the seventh is nothing of the sort.

It is the outpouring of pure music, into which the listener may interpret anything that strikes his fancy. The brightly-colored prism of the imagination turns this way and that, infused with brilliance and light.

If you like, there is a touch of the country dance, vaguely reminiscent of the Schottische in the opening movement. In fact this has been set to choreography, with what success someone other than this reviewer may decide.

It is a symphony of delicate nuances and tremendous climaxes; of music that has burst the bounds of conventionality; of genius completely unfettered, and its crashing close brought a capacity audience up standing in a long ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Separating the two great symphonies was the fourth piano concerto, in which the 29-year-old Joseph Battista demonstrated a technical facility and musical understanding that belies his years. His performance yesterday provided one of those rare occasions where a soloist seemed to consider himself part of the music as a whole, rather than a separate entity.

The concerto, provides the pianist with only one long solo passage, and Mr. Battista made the most of it.

Tomorrow evening, starting at 7.30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Beethoven's eighth and ninth symphonies, with the final chorus on Schiller's "Ode To Joy." The soloists will be Frances Yeend, Eunice Albertsm David Lloyd and James Pease, with the festival chorus under the direction of Robert Shaw.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL

George E. Sokolsky

Music in The Hills

I am not a musician nor even a [illegible] critic. But I like to go to [illegible]. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall [illegible] Philharmonic.

[illegible] summer, when I am [illegible] in Massa[illegible] Tanglewood three [illegible] to listen to the [illegible] during the Festival.

[illegible] understand music [illegible] statistics or the [illegible] Wallace. There [illegible] musicologists [illegible] to under[illegible] With them, it is [illegible] something with [illegible]

[illegible] I like Tangle[illegible] because I can see [illegible] hills and the sky [illegible] I even like it when [illegible] it is good to [illegible] and rain. It is [illegible]

Records Not Same

[illegible] shall hear all nine of [illegible] symphonies, one [illegible] the other in order. That [illegible] experience for me, [illegible] I have tried it with records. Still records are not the same as [illegible] in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen.

I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazis or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G.I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards.

Rubbing Fearsome

The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year.

If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin.

But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling.

I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Fare Too Heady

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics.

They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music.

But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul?

Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS
AUG 4 1947

Music in the Hills

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do you know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G. I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it have have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper pressroom? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

[Copyright, 1947, King Features]

[196]

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 4 - 1947

Huge Crowds At Festival Concerts

(Special to The Gazette)

LENOX, Aug. 4—The Berkshire Music Festival has meant much to the advancement of musical culture in this country. The two concerts of Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon in the Beethoven cycle saw two record-breaking crowds fill the music shed and blanket the surrounding lawns.

The concerts at Tanglewood have become as much a center of musical interests as the European mecca of Salzburg. The prestige of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, of course, enhanced the attraction of Tanglewood.

People from varied states and backgrounds somehow unite as one under the influence of music, the common demoninator. Lorgnettes, ham on rye, broad "A's," and Brooklynese all find their way to the festival.

The eighth program yesterday, consisting of three works in the Beethoven series, saw the appearance of a young artist who will play in Worcester next Spring.

Joseph Battista, 28, of Philadelphia, who performed the Concerto for Piano No. 4 in G Major yesterday, will appear in the Becker concert series on April 11. The pianist thrilled the audience with his inspired interpretation of the most difficult of the Beethoven concertos.

Students of tne Berkshire Music Center will present the first American production of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo" tonight and Wednesday night in the Tanglewood concert hall. Attending the Music Center School are Wayne R. Barrington of 31 Perkins street, Worcester, and Roland A. Hoeston, Jr., of Framingham.

Many Worcester residents have subscribed to the series of nine festival concerts. Among those attending are Mrs. Joseph Leavitt of 126 Newton avenue, Mrs. Mac Levine of 38 Amherst street, J. B. Ribakoff of 1395 Pleasant street, Dr. F. J. Rooney of 117 Vernon street, Harry S. Saidel of 55 South Lenox street, Hyman J. Small of 8 Morningside road, R. W. Swenson of 74 Florence street, Miss Edith M. Ward of 52 Cedar street, Dona W. Woodbridge of Worcester Polytechnic Institute and Mrs. Jacob Young of 66 South Lenox street.

Others attending concerts of the festival are Ernest A. Abeles of 21 Havelock road, Lewis Blumenthal of 39 Creswell road, Rufus Dunbar of 52 Elm street, Milton L. Fitch of 50 Portland street, Saul Freedman of 60 Sagamore road, Mrs. John Getter of 3 Montvale road, Mrs. Samuel Glick of 6 Chamberlain parkway, Mrs. Solomon Hurowitz af 124 Newton avenue, Magnus Jankelson of 52 Belmont street and Mrs. A. Albert Klein of 422 Lovell street.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
AUG 4 - 1947

Commentator George Sokolsky Tries Hand At Criticism Of Modern Music

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music in the rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of the Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

Relaxation

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethover wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to be if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists are other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with Caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Critics' Domain

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 4 - 1947

Reading of Beethoven 7th Highlight at Tanglewood

Boston Symphony Accorded Ovation; Program Included 'Pastorale,' and Fourth Piano Concerto, With Joseph Battista Pleasing Large Audience

By W. HARLEY RUDKIN

Yesterday's audience at Tanglewood was treated to three brilliant aspects of a tremendous musical spirit, with the presentation of Beethoven's sixth symphonies, and his Piano Concerto No. 4, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the [illegible] Joseph Battista as soloist.

The program opened with the sixth, or "Pastorale," which moviegoers have come inevitably to associate with Walt Disney's flying horses and Jovian thunderbolts.

But even without the visual medium, the association of the sixth with the countryside cold hardly have been escaped, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave it a clear and sweetly nostalgic reading.

At an earlier concert this season, a New York music authority noted that there was a diffuseness about music played out-of-doors that detracted from its intrinsic quality. But if there was ever music designed to blend with a sylvan setting, then the "Pastorale" symphony is that music.

Just in case there might be anyone in the audience who might miss the significance of the dramatic sequences of the sixth, the four movements have been annotated on the program. As, per se: Allegro ma non troppo ("Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country"). I know its only a quibble, but it does strike me as bending over backward for emphasis.

Nice Balance

The playing of the sixth and seventh together provides a nice balance, for where the sixth is almost purely pictorial, the seventh is nothing of the sort.

It is the outpouring of pure music, into which the listener may interpret anything that strikes his fancy. The brightly-colored prism of the imagination turns this way and that, infused with brilliance and light.

If you like, there is a touch of the country dance, vaguely reminiscent of the Schottische in the opening movement. In fact this has been set to choreography, with what success someone other than this reviewer may decide.

It is a symphony of delicate nuances and tremendous climaxes; of music that has burst the bounds of conventionality; of genius completely unfettered, and its crashing close brought a capacity audience up standing in a long ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Separating the two great symphonies was the fourth piano concerto, in which the 29-year-old Joseph Battista demonstrated a technical facility and musical understanding that belies his years. His performance yesterday provided one of those rare occasions where a soloist seemed to consider himself part of the music as a whole, rather than a separate entity.

The concerto, provides the pianist with only one long solo passage, and Mr. Battista made the most of it.

Tomorrow evening, starting at 7.30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Beethoven's eighth and ninth symphonies, with the final chorus on Schiller's "Ode To Joy." The soloists will be Frances Yeend, Eunice Albertsm David Lloyd and James Pease, with the festival chorus under the direction of Robert Shaw.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL

AUG 4 - 1947

George E. Sokolsky

Music in The Hills

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic.

During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week, to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

Records Not Same

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen.

I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man or the Nazis or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G.I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards.

Rubbing Fearsome

The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year.

If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin.

But do I have to like noise, too?

Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling.

I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Fare Too Heady

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics.

They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music.

But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul?

Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS
AUG 4 1947

Music in the Hills

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do you know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million G. I.s rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it have have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper pressroom? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

[Copyright, 1947, King Features]

Aug 3/47

By FREDERICK J. KOONTZ

THE news release from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is quoted in part in these lines, is no longer very newsworthy in the light of coming events, since by the time these words are printed the contents of the realease will have become history.

The subject is a concert named "Music for All" which was presented as a part of the Berkshire Festival on July 29.

"Music for All," as the announcement prophesied, "—is creating wide interest and is expected to attract many visitors from distant points. In addition to a full concert by the orchestra—there will be demonstrations of the latest and finest instruments of science for musical reproduction, including radio, phonograph, motion pictures, and television.

"The evening's program begins with "Music in the Movies." Scenes from "Our Town," "Mayerling," "Alexander Nevsky," "The Plainsman," "The Youth of Maxim," and "Henry V" will be shown in the most comprehensive program ever assembled to show the contribution of important contemporary composers to the motion pictures.

* * *

IN a different vein the film program will have as a curtain raiser the now historic Disney cartoon, "Mickey's Grand Opera."

"Illustrating how great symphonic music is carried to the nation by radio, the evening concert will be broadcast as one of the regular Tuesday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the coast to coast network of the American Broadcasting Company. Engineers, director, and announcers will be operating in full view of the audience.

"The final part of the program is entitled "The March of Musical Fidelity." There will be examples of records by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, several of them landmarks in phonographic art, over the past third of a century. The climax will come with the introduction of the "Berkshire," RCA Victor's first custom made phonograph, which will be played alongside the Orchestra itself. So far as is known this is the first time such a comparison has been made before the public.

"RCA Victor has earmarked the first 200 sets of "The Berkshire," named in honor of the Tanglewood festivals, for sale on an exclusively subscription basis to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund."

* * *

IF the last paragraph had been omitted from the news release not so many people would be tempted to conclude that even the sacrosanct old Boston Orchestra had finally risen to the juicy bait of commercialism. It does seem fair enough to assume that, when RCA does any earmarking, somebody is being sold a bill of goods that eventually will enlarge the figures on the black side of RCA's ledger. But in the long view that is pretty much beside the present point.

The whole effort demonstrates the possibility of a working together to the ultimate profit of musical execution generally of organizations which play music and of the manufacturers who construct the equipment to reproduce what is played.

Moreover the average member of the audience should be able to determine pretty exactly with what fidelity the canned variety, whether it be radio, phonograph, or movies, is able to reproduce music "in the flesh." All of us who think about the matter at all are satisfied that reproduction still has a long way to go before it begins to approximate first hand listening. But usually the time between our hearing a concert and listening to some manner of reproduction of the same type of music is too long to allow our senses to maintain a critical state in which all the advantages and disadvantages connected with our comparative listening experiences remain perfectly clear. This Boston Orchestra project has taken care of that problem by setting forth all sides of the picture at one time.

* * *

FINALLY this rather inventive effort should serve as an explicit pointer toward the greatest lack in the whole musical reproduction business as it is presently constituted. In every recording, in every musical broadcast, in most music in the movies the gap between performers and engineers is far too wide. The performer supposedly knows music. The engineer is expert at all phases of sound reproduction. But neither one usually very well acquainted with what the other is doing. There is a distinct need for a middleman who is conversant with both sides of the reproducing job and can bring the two main executants to a closer understanding of their common problems. It might be possible to achieve a measure of equality between the performance and the reproduction of it.

The whole undertaking seems to partake a little of the nature of a three-ring circus with a faint commercial tinge. But, if it accomplishes even a fraction of its possibilities, it should be worth repeating regularly.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 4 - 1947

Frances Yeend Sings This Week At Tanglewood

Frances Yeend, young American soprano, will be guest artist at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood Tuesday, when she will sing Mozart's Requiem, conducted by Robert Shaw.

Miss Yeend appeared at Tanglewood last year in the final concert of the festival when she created the leading soprano role in the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes."

ANNISTON, ALA.
STAR
AUG 5 - 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard on Tuesday over ABC in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" — the broadcast being on extended time, starting at 7:30 p. m. and concluding at 8:45 p. m., so that the entire work may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast.

Love put Louis Roberts, 23-year-old printer, on a liquid diet. His sweetheart, Lavon Standlee, 23, worked in a soft drink stand and Louis felt it his romantic duty to drink ten glasses of orange juice a day.

They'll be drinking orange juice together following their marriage between appearances on the Wednesday, broadcast of Bride and Groom over ABC and WHMA at 1:30. After the ceremonies, a Western Air Lines "Honeymoon Special" plane will fly the couple to Westcliffe, Colo., for a week's honeymoon at SpreadnEagle Ranch.

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 5 - 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard tonight over WMSA and the American network at 8:30, in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

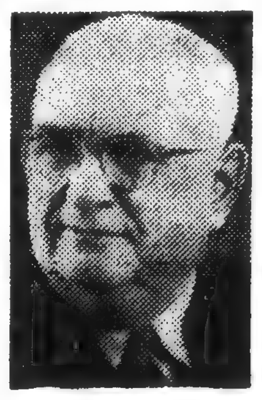
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
AUG 5 - 1947

• • •

Wall-Eyes, Summer-Hots, Mark Vacation End

BY ELMORE BACON

The bleating of the kid excites the tiger, we are informed by none less expert than R. Kipling. From a rather sketchy vacation listening stance there's plenty of kilocycle bleating and we are due to be duly excited.



ELMORE BACON

Almost as excited as when Herb Weidenthal netted that husky wall-eyed pike we caught last week up at Stan Breaugh's Windermere Lodge at Houghton Lake, Mich. Or when Kent, of the Bacon tribe, hooked those other two wall-eyes, drat 'em, that passed up our baited hook for his.

With Albina Molek doing such a swell job of pinch hitting on this Remington and the weather finally deciding to beam on us, the vacation was a huge success.

We are glad to say that we have found much improvement in a feature that irked us last year. More people are smiling these days. Our contacts through a varied range of vacation travel convinced us that people are more human, less mechanical in their personal contacts. Some of these radio programs—especially these summer dramas—should be told that people really are human beings and can stand only just so much mental stress and strain. We'll have more to say about that later on.

While the summer-hots are crácking wise and discing up the radio fields we look forward to the fall when fare of a less gelatinous nature perks on the air lanes. In the meantime it seems to be a rough time for ye radio eds. Here we are just out of a vacation and Stan Anderson's just out of the hospital. There should be a pop song about all that.

Which doesn't remind us that the Tom Breneman orchid today was to go to the owner and employes of the O. A. Dean dairy, Paul S. Finch, manager, accepting the orchid, WJW at 11, and Bert Dean telling about it, WJW at 12:30.

MUSIC TONIGHT — Maestro Koussevitzky and the Bostons close the Berkshire radio festivities tonight with the complete Ninth Symphony by Beethoven, with Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease as soloists, WXYZ, Detroit, 1270 kc., at 8:30. Frankie Carle tickles the ivories with "Hundustan," "Big Three" and "Carle Boogie," on the Supper Club, WTAM at 10. Comes another child prodigy, Doris Webster, 7, to offer us Chopin on We, the People, WGAR at 8. Charming Pierette Alarie, who sang with the Met here, offers Mozart and other lilts with the Montreal Symphony, Desire Defauw directing, CJBC, Toronto, on 1010 kc., at 7:30. The Fred Warings turn to Porter, Cohan and Kern for inspiration, WTAM at 8:30. Anne Jamison, soprano, and Reinhold Schmidt, baritone, help Maestro Romberg in a "Children of Dreams" medley, WTAM at 9:30. Sylvan Shulman over at WJMO whirls the platters on Just Music at 6:30 presenting Irra Petina and Robert Weede, other Met stars known to Cleveland, in "Song of Norway" music. Hank Cahout and Johnny Rose, WHK at 6:30, do "Tallahassee," "You've Got Me Crying Again," "When It's Sleepy Time Down South" and "Somebody Stole My Gal."

OTHERS TONIGHT—"Mad Vortex," a "School of the Air" play, gets the CBS and WGAR air at 11:30, a revelation of brain power. The weekly corpse on "Call the Police," WTAM at 8, is a woman who had plotted her own husband's death, but he got her first, heh, heh. The Falcon steps in and clews around in "Death Never Fiddles," all about a violinist who tries too quickly to collect insurance on his violin, WHK at 7:30. Studio One offers a dramatic version of "Carmen," the Bizet music being rejected for Spanish tunes by Lan Adomian, WGAR at 8:30. Councilman Pucel talks about daylight saving time, WJW at 8:15, politely. The Knights of Columbus-Grotto ball game gets the WJW air at 8:30.

BRENEMAN COMES—The Tom Breneman Breakfast in Hollywood Show heard over ABC and WJW here comes to Public Hall, October 23 and 24, to entertain for the Community Chest. There'll be reserved seats at popular prices.

PEORIA
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
AUG 5 - 19

FINAL BROADCAST OF the season for Boston Symphony orchestra will be given (WENR) at 7:30 tonight when Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a performance of Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphony. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire Choral Symphony has been broadcast. Soloists will be Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Peas, bass. The festival chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire music center courses this summer, will be heard in the final movement.

• • •

THE ATOMIC-BOMBING OF Hiroshima will be subject of a program by Bradley World Security Workshop (WMBD) at 8 tonight. Dramatic parts will be taken by Bradley students with Herb Johnson as narrator. Testimonial comments will be made by Evabeth Miller, Peoria Star reporter, Reid Milner, scientist at Northern Regional farm laboratory, Tom F. O'Connor, vice president of Peoria Trades and Labor Assembly, Art Szold, commander of Peoria Air Reserve, Jewel Hinton, singer, W. T. Utley, political science professor at Bradley, and Edward Gates, former navy chaplain and now associated with Rev. William Atkinson Young.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
AUG 5 1947

Program Notes

Jane Powell subs on Date With Judy today (Tues.) for Louise Erickson, who is ill . . . CBS Studio One at 9 P. M. presents the original Merimee story of "Carmen." None of Bizet's musical score will be used. Lan Adomian, Armenian-American composer, is writing an original adaptation.

Final broadcast from Berkshire Music Festival via ABC at 9. Time will be extended 15 minutes to permit airing Beethoven's ninth symphony in full.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
AUG 5 - 1947

Saturday evening Robert Shaw will conduct the Mozart "Requiem," the Poulenc "Chorus" and the Stravinsky "Symphony of Psalms."

The Sunday afternoon program, which will mark the close of the festival, will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. It will open with the Martinu "Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra with two pianos." This will be followed by the "Pavane" and "Bolero" of Ravel and the concert will end with the Tchaikovsky "Symphony number 4 in F major."

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
1947

Radio Highlights

Pease On ABC Show Tonight

JAMES PEASE of Indianapolis will be one of the soloists when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, presents Beethoven's Ninth or "Choral" Symphony in its entirety tonight at the Berkshire Music Festival in the final session of the year (7:30 p.m., WISH-ABC).

Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Roberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and Pease, bass, make up the solo quartet for the symphony. The Festival Chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, will be heard in the final movement of the rarely broadcast work.

FRANKIE CARLE'S orchestra with Singers Marjorie Hughes, Gregg Lawrence and the Starlighters, guest star on the Supper Club tonight (6 p.m., WIRE-NBC).

JANE POWELL, young screen actress and vocalist, substitutes in the title role of "A Date With Judy" while the regular Judy, Louise Erickson, is off the air because of illness (7:30 p.m., WIRE-NBC).

AN ADAPTATION of Prosper Merimee's "Carmen," the novel which gave birth to the world-famous opera, is the presentation on CBS' "Studio One" this evening (9:30 p.m., WFBM).

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST
AUG 5 - 1947

LEFT TWO DAYS AGO

Mrs. Julian H. Marshall left two days ago to visit Mr. and Mrs. James Russell Manning, at their home in Great Barrington, Mass.

She and Mr. and Mrs. Manning will drive to Tanglewood for an evening or two of music. Miss Alice Wainwright has also gone north to attend the festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays at this Berkshire Festival, is directed by Serge Koussevitzky. Tonight and August 9th a chorus, prepared by Robert Shaw, will assist in the concerts.

CROWDED TO CAPACITY

Tanglewood is between Lenox, and Stockbridge, Mass., so these towns have been crowded to capacity during this popular music series. The hosts and hostesses in the communities have been giving many entertainments in honor of their guests.

These afternoon and evening musicals began on July 24 and will continue until August 10th.

The Music Shed at Tanglewood with a seating capacity for 6,000 persons has remarkable acoustic properties, so many can listen from the surrounding lawns.

Canadian
In First U

New York, August
Laderoute, tenor born in Sault Ste. is of French and will sing the lea week at the an event of major lovers.

The occasion is ican performance o
Idomeneo, on Aug.
Lenox, Mass. The Centre's operatic dertake this premi of the little-known regarded creative Mozart's coming-of theatre. The perfo repeated on Aug.

Selection of La leading role is a distinction for the studied at the Toro of Music and who performance for Queen during the Canada in 1939. La sung for a living Choristers in New he was a boy sop leading tenor wi phia Opera Co chosen little more by Arturo quino in

SAN FRA
CH
AU

BOB FRANK Rad
New August 5, 19

For the first time
years, Beethoven's Symphony ("Choral") broadcast tonight from on KGO. Dr. Serge and the Boston Symph grammed the work for Berkshire Music Festiv

All of which remind you about the novel p plan ABC is cooking
Tuesday nights.

Starting next mont nights on ABC will be cultural and thought-pro grams. Sounds stuffy
it's a darn good idea.
Tuesday night line-up pleted at this moment
"America's Town Meet ing from Thursdays;
"Labor USA" and
"Voice of Business" pro aired Saturday afternoo
Boston Symphony concer

Regarding the Boston
ABC's up-and-at-'em ne director Charles "Bud" during his recent San visit that ABC will con full-hour concerts, whe they are sponsored. Wh we are likely to contin only network giving liv hours of live symphony week. Musical Digest M cently re-contracted for day Evening Hour
p.m., with the Detroit

Certainly ABC's up will help gram selection in the mood to discussions or symp you'll tune in

DALLAS
NEW
AUG 5

Dial Suggesti

Koussevi
To Play
Of Beet

For the first years, Beethoven's better known as phony, will be he its entirety by t phony Orchestra
570, at 7:30 p.m.
Musical Festival.

In this final season, Serge conduct. His Frances Yeend
Alberts, contra tenor, and James

Discussion: to determine wh

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
AUG 5 - 1947

Canadian Tenor Gets Lead Role In First U.S. Playing of 'Idomeneo'

By PAT USSHER

New York August 4.—(CP)—Joseph [illegible]deroute, tenor singer who was [illegible] Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., and [illegible] French and Indian descent, [illegible] the leading role this [illegible] at the Berkshire Festival in [illegible] major interest to music [illegible] is the first Amer[illegible] of Mozart's opera, [illegible] Aug. 4 at Tanglewood, [illegible] The Berkshire Music [illegible] singers will un[illegible]miere performance [illegible] work, which is [illegible] as marking [illegible]age in the lyric [illegible]formance will be [illegible] 6.

[illegible] Laderoute for the [illegible] another mark of [illegible] young tenor who [illegible] Toronto Conservatory [illegible] gave a command [illegible] for the King and [illegible] during the Royal Tour of [illegible] in 1939. Laderoute, who has [illegible] for a living with the Paulist [illegible]risters in New York City since he was a boy soprano, has been a leading tenor with the Philadelphia Opera Company and was chosen little more than a year ago by Arturo Toscanini to sing Jacquino in Beethoven's Fidelio when the distinguished conductor performed the Beethoven work with the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Theatrically speaking, Broadway is beginning to come to life again as the summer wanes. The next anticipated opening is The Magic Touch, now in preparation for a premiere on Aug. 19 at the International Theatre . . . We Love A Lassie, the comedy by Marcel Wallenstein and Mary Kennedy which the Shuberts are producing, is expected to arrive here during the week of Aug. 25. Now I Wonder, the Donald Ogden Stewart vehicle starring Toronto-born Raymond Massey, has been booked for an Oct. 8 opening at the Hudson Theatre . . . Monte Proser's new musical, High Button Shoes, is to open an out-of-town run Sept. 8 . . . The only play, written by James Joyce, author of Ulysses and Finnegan's Wake, who died in Switzerland during the war, is to be brought to Broadway in November. Called Exiles, it is a love story with a Dublin setting.

Footlight Footnotes

Laura, the stage version of the Vera Caspary-George Sklar melodrama which proved rather tepid in comparison with the movie and the novel, is scheduled to wind up with its 45th performance tomorrow at the Cort Theatre. K. T. Stevens and Otto Kruger handle the principal roles . . . Hot weather hasn't affected the popularity of the musical, Annie Get Your Gun, with Ethel Merman. It is still playing to capacity audiences . . . John C. Wilson is to produce on Broadway Noel Coward's new play, a hit in London, called Peace In Our Time. Coward arrived in New York this week from London to work out details of the production.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE
AUG 5 1947

BOB FRANKLIN'S Radio News

August 5, 1947

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's entire Ninth Symphony ("Choral") will be broadcast tonight from 9 to 10 p.m. on KGO. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have programmed the work for their final Berkshire Music Festival concert.

All of which reminds me to tell you about the novel programming plan ABC is cooking up for future Tuesday nights.

Starting next month, Tuesday nights on ABC will be devoted to cultural and thought-provoking programs. Sounds stuffy at first but it's a darn good idea. Part of the Tuesday night line-up, not completed at this moment, will be: "America's Town Meeting," moving from Thursdays; the CIO-AFL "Labor USA" and management's "Voice of Business" programs, now aired Saturday afternoons and the Boston Symphony concerts.

Regarding the Boston Symphony, ABC's up-and-at-'em new program director Charles "Bud" Barry said during his recent San Francisco visit that ABC will continue these full-hour concerts, whether or not they are sponsored. Which means we are likely to continue to be the only network giving listeners two hours of live symphony music each week. Musical Digest Magazine recently re-contracted for the "Sunday Evening Hour" spot, 5 to 6 p.m., with the Detroit Symphony.

Certainly ABC's new program setup will help dialers in their program selection. If Tuesday finds you in the mood to hear current affairs, discussions or symphonic music, you'll tune 810.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 5 1947

Two Former Pilots To Sing at Tanglewood

Two ex-pilots will be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Ninth Symphony that will bring to a close the Beethoven cycle of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, this evening.

James Pease, bass, who was for three years in the Army Air Force, and David Lloyd, tenor, a Naval Air Force pilot, will sing with Miss Frances Yeend and Miss Eunice Alberts to form the quartet for "Schiller's Ode to Joy".

The concert, which will start with the Eighth Symphony, will start at 7:30 instead of 8:15. The entire Ninth Symphony will be broadcast over the nation-wide network of the American Broadcasting Company, who will extend the time over the usual hour. so that the radio audience may hear the complete work.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
AUG 5 1947

Dial Suggestions:

Koussevitzky To Play Work Of Beethoven

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, better known as his Choral Symphony, will be heard on the air in its entirety by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (WFAA-WBAP-570, at 7:30 p.m.) at the Berkshire Musical Festival.

In this final broadcast of the season, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. His solo quartet includes Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Discussion: A survey conducted to determine which habits of husbands most annoy their wives will be outlined by Galen Drake (WFAA-WBAP-570, at 10:30 a.m.). He is of the opinion most husbands violate their wives' feelings by the wrong kind of humor.

Guests: R. A. Hui[illegible]hines, former professor of electronics at Southern Methodist University, will relate how he became blind by atomic tests when he appears on the Healys At Home program (WFAA-WBAP-570, at 5:50 p.m.).

Drama: Jane Powell, screen star, will step into the role of Judy Foster on A Date With Judy (WFAA-WBAP-820, at 10:15 p.m.). She substitutes for Louise Erickson who is ill.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 5 - 1947

Opera "Idomeneo" Draws Full House

Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood Filled— Last Beethoven Cycle Program Tonight.

An audience which filled the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood Lenox, last evening witnessed the first performance in America of Mozart's early opera "Idomeneo," given by students of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, head of its opera department.

The production was the most pretentious of any of the activities attempted by the students at the Tanglewood school this season and the only one for which the gates of the famous music center were opened to the public.

"Idomeneo," which Mozart himself favored most among his operatic works, retells the classic story of the Grecian king, who, in gratitude for rescue from shipwreck pledges Neptune as a sacrifice the life of the first person he meets ashore but endeavors to escape the vow when that person is his own son.

While the performers, both in the principal and chorus parts and in the excellent supporting orchestra are in fact as they were described students in the Music Center, they are all professionals whose study at Tanglewood is in the advanced field, and consequently the performance bore professional hall marks.

Other performances by students of the orchestra, choral, chamber music and opera departments of the school will continue through this week, but with attendance limited to other students and to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The Center courses will end on Sunday afternoon, simultaneously with the concluding program of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival programs for this year. There are four Festival programs remaining—an extra one this evening which will conclude the Beethoven cycle of four, and regular ones on Thursday and Saturday evenings as well as Sunday afternoon.

MIAMI FLA.
HERALD
AUG 5 - 1947

Radio Programs

By MARION AITCHISON

BRILLIANT FINALE to ABC-WQAM broadcasts of Boston Symphony orchestra presentations has been arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the concert over this network at 8:30 tonight.

This will be one of the rare occasions—and the first in several years—in which the Beethovan Ninth Symphony, the "Choral," will be presented over the air in its entirety. For his vocal quartet, Koussevitzky has selected artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony, Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd tenor, and James Pease, bass. The Festival chorus, formed of students in the Berkshire Music center courses this summer, trained by Robert Shaw, will take part in the final movement of the symphony. The broadcast period will be extended 15 minutes for tonight's concert. The Light Opera Festival is scheduled to move into the 8:30 to 9:30 spot via ABC-WQAM next week.

Koussevitzky

* * *

The advertising space for the programs below is paid for by the stations listed. Similar listings are available to all radio stations in the Greater Miami area at a nominal fee.

MOBILE, ALA.
PRESS
AUG 5 - 1947

BEHIND THE RADIO DIAL

By Ann Azalea

CLASSICAL MUSIC—In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The broadcast will be on an extended time. starting at 7:30 p.m. and concluding at 8:45 p.m. so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast. Program will be aired Tuesday over WMOB-ABC.

MUSICAL— Composer-Conductor Sigmund Romberg will open An Evening With Romberg with the "French National Defile March." "The Emperor Waltz" and "Trees" also will be featured by the orchestra.

The program will be aired at 8:30 p.m. over WALA-NBC.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
AUG 5 - 1947

Music in the Hills

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I AM not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

* * *

I KNOW that I [illegible] my legs, relax, [illegible] a cigar, and listen [illegible] why Beethoven wrote [illegible] No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me [illegible] name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungerees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome.

I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance.

If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year.

If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

* * *

THE critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin.

But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling.

I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copeland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it.

Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music.

But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul?

Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie?

Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque?

Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Synd., Inc.)

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
AUG 5 - 1947

"Return Engagement" To Offer "Mr. Cortex"

Under the descriptive title of "Return Engagement," night time listeners will be able to hear some of the outstanding productions originally presented on the late afternoon program, "School of the Air." The initial program of the series will be heard tonight at 9:30 over WKBN.

The series is designed as a showcase to demonstrate how educational programs may take effective dramatic form. "School of the Air," the originator of the educational and entertaining program, will mark its 18th year when it returns to the air waves next October.

"Mr. Cortex," a drama depicting the power of the human brain will be the first presentation. Original music by Curtis Biever will be featured as the background for the play.

Anne Burr

AN ADAPTATION of Prosper Merimee's short story, "Carmen," written 100 years ago, is the offering of "Studio One" tonight at 8:30 over WKBN. The story is better known as the opera "Carmen," although none of Bizet's musical score will be used in the "Studio One" version. Lan Adomian, young Armenian-American composer, has been commissioned to write an original Spanish score for the adaptation which is believed to be the first in radio.

Anne Burr, star of stage and radio will be heard in the title role of the tempestuous Carmen, with Markle himself playing the role of the romantic and tragic figure of Don Jose, and Everett Sloane as the bandit leader, Garcia.

IN THE FINAL broadcast of the season and the last to come from the "Berkshire Music Festival" this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard tonight over WFMJ in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 so that the entire symphony can be heard. This will be the first time in several years when the entire Choral Symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartette artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenors, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center course this summer and trained by Robert shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

A VENTRILOQUIST who parlayed a dime into a career, a seven-year-old girl piano prodigy, and a hospital orderly who clowns for his patients, will be among the guests on "We, the People," tonight at 8 over WKBN. Milo Boulton will make his last appearance as master of ceremonies on tonight's program.

Other Programs Tonight

8:15—WFMJ—The "Camera Club" will hold the second in its series of discussion on "The Care of the Camera on Vacation." Clarence Wilson will be among the guests and "Sam, the Camera Club Man," will be on hand to answer questions and tell more about the "Camera Club."

8:30—WTAM—Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians will present "An Album Program" with numbers by Cole Porter, George M. Cohan and Jerome Kern, as well as devotional and holiday songs.

8:30 — WRRN — The subject, "Where Are We Headed Economically?" will be discussed by Robert R. Nathan, economist; Leo Cherne, executive secretary of the Research Institute of America; Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, economist, author and finance editor of the International News Service, and Henry Hazlitt, economist and author on the "American Forum of the Air." Theodore Grank will be moderator.

9:30—WTAM—Sigmund Romberg will present a medley from his "Children of Dreams" on the "Evening with Romberg." Other selections will be the "French National Defile March," "Trees," "Emperor Waltz," and a medley of Tschaikowsky songs.

11:30—Edwin Fischer will play Mozart's Piano Concert No. 24 in C Minor on "Orchestra Hall."

News from WFMJ

Tuesday night—4:30, 6:30, 7*, 9:59½, 11 p. m., midnight and 12:55. Wednesday day—6, 6:30, 7, 7:45, 8*, 8:55 a. m., noon, 1*, 2*, and 4:30 p. m.

Bulletins and special broadcasts will be given whenever events warrant.

*American Network newscasts.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
AUG 5 - 1947

Cooper, Schaefer Vaca

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
Radio, Drama, Music Editor

Two Birmingham musicians who are making names for themselves on the networks from Hollywood arrive in Birmingham this week for vacations.

HARRISON COOPER

Harrison Cooper, composer of that hit number you're hearing so much on the air now since it was recorded by Benny Goodman — "Have You Been Told?" that is — will reach here Tuesday for a visit to his mother.

And the following day Bill Schaefer, musician with the Ray Noble Orchestra, will reach Birmingham to pay his mother a visit. Bill is heard on the Edgar Bergen program, Hit Parade, with Dick Haymes, and other radio shows. He is bringing his wife home with him for her first trip to the Southeast. She's a West Coast girl to whom he was married during the war.

WSGN TELLO-TEST FANS:
The answer is LITTLE BUTTERCUP

Harrison Cooper's popular "Have You Been Told" was written by Cooper for Benny Goodman, and has soared to best-seller spot since recorded by Goodman and his band.

BILL SCHAEFER

BOSTON SYMPHONY — The final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., will be aired tonight over ABC at 7:30, with Koussevitsky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The broadcast will be on an extended time, continuing until 8:45 p.m. so that the entire symphony can be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast. Koussevitzky has chosen for this quartet artists previously heard with the Boston Symphony. Of special interest to Birmingham music lovers will be the appearance of lovely Frances Yeend, soprano. Miss Yeend sang here with the Columbia Opera Company's production of "Carmen" two years ago under the music club sponsorship. She had the Micaela role, scoring the hit of the evening with her fine lyric voice. Others in the group to be heard tonight include Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass.

KOUSSEVITSKY

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center courses this Summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony. Because of the baseball broadcasts Station WSGN will not carry the program, but it may be heard over other ABC stations.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
AUG 5 - 1947

CHORUS COACH FOR FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Robert L. Shaw Prepared Group for Beethoven Ninth Symphony Tomorrow

Robert Lawson Shaw, who prepared the Festival chorus to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony tonight, and who will be the second guest conductor at Tanglewood Saturday evening, was born 31 years ago in Red Bluff, Cal. His father was a clergyman. His mother, Nelle Lawson Shaw, has been a well-known singer in California churches, and his sister, Hollace Shaw, a coloratura soprano, has sung over the radio for several years.

A graduate of Pomona College, Claremont, Cal., he came to New York City in 1938 to form a radio glee club for Fred Waring, who had seen him conduct the college glee club. Until he entered the Navy in 1945 he trained choruses for the Aquacade at the New York and San Francisco expositions, "Carmen Jones," "Laughing Room Only" and "Seven Lively Arts," while continuing radio work.

In 1943 he received an award as the year's most important American-born conductor by the National Association for American Composers and Conductors, and a Guggenheim fellowship. In 1946 he was appointed choral director for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and director of choral activities for the Juilliard School of Music. Guest conductor of the CBS Symphony since 1941, in 1946 he was guest conductor of the ABC and NBC Symphonies.

In 1941 he founded and has since directed the Collegiate Chorale, which has sung in concerts at leading halls in New York City and with leading orchestras, performing major choral works and giving initial performances of compositions by Samuel Barber, Benjamin Britten, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss and other contemporary composers. They performed this spring at the Harvard Symposium of Contemporary Music new works by Copland, Hindemith and [illegible].

Saturday evening he will conduct Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil," Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's Requiem, in which Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, will be soloists.

ROBERT LAWSON SHAW

Prepared the Festival chorus to sing with Boston Symphony tonight at Tanglewood. He will also be second guest conductor Saturday evening.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
AUG 5 1947

Berkshire Festival Is Something to Remember

The 10th annual Berkshire Festival is something special under astute direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Tonight is the Beethoven Ninth with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy" by the Festival Chorus prepared by Robert Shaw. Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease bass, are soloists. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by Dr. Koussevitzky. Opening number on tonight's program is the Beethoven Eighth. The public will be admitted to Saturday morning's rehearsal of the Boston Symphony in preparation for Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts. Admission fee to rehearsals goes to the pension fund for orchestra members. The Festival closes Sunday afternoon.

* * *

[illegible], N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 5 - 1947

9 Symphonies At Berkshire Well Received

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

All was quiet, musically, over in the Berkshires, during the past week, with the Nirvana of Beethoven proving a grateful respite between programs which more or less, featured music in the modern idiom.

While not sparking the capacity audiences with the same unbridled enthusiasm which Dr. Koussevitzky is able to evolve with his dynamic readings of Tchaikowsky—that will be reserved for the "Fourth" by this Russian composer, next Sunday aftercycle, ending with the "ninth" tonight gave the conservative members of the audience a sense of gratitude through hearing all ninne symphonies within the space of a week.

THE BEETHOVEN cycle was noteworthy, both from the standpoint of Dr. Koussevitzky's authorative reading and the supurb response from the members of his virtuoso orchestra, and the two exciting young pianists, Jacob Lateiner and Joseph Battista, playing the "Emperor" and "No. 4" concertos, respectively, Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

It was the consensus regarding the work of Mr. Latimer that it was some of the most exciting piano playing ever heard at Tanglewood; piano playing in the grand manner. Mr. Battista's playing on Sunday afternoon was a model of impeccable technic, allied to a sensitive appreciation of the composer's lyrical message.

BOTH YOUNG men were applauded, cheered, and in one or noon—his complete Beethoveb two instances, the recipients of youthful whistling. Dr. Koussevitsky is to be commended for featuring young artists this year; two young men and a young women, not household musical names at the time of their Tanglewood debuts, but giving unmistakable evidence that this priceless opportunity to be heard before one of the most discriminating audiences in the world was but the corridor to the musical Hall of Fame.

IT WAS ALSO a gesture to the large audiences of young people which attends every concert. They were all in heartiest accord with the Boston conductor's "Accent on Youth."

MUSKEGON, MICH.
CHRONICLE
AUG 5 1947

Play Symphony By Beethoven

The Boston Symphony orchestra will end its Berkshire Music festival series over WENR at 7:30 p. m., featuring the playing of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." Soloists will be Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, tenor.

The Grand Marquee over NBC at 10:30 p. m. will star Jim Ameche in "The First and the Last" by John Galsworthy.

Under the direction of Henry Weber, the Chicago Philharmonic will offer Haydn's "London Symphony" and Daniels' "Deep Forest" over WGN at 8:30 p. m. Harry Sturm, first cellist, will be soloist in Bloch's "Schelomo."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
AUG 5 - 1947

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Laufer of Hewlett Bay Park will leave Thursday for Stockbridge, Mass., where they will join their daughter, Miss Lee Laufer, who has been attending the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. They will stay a week. Miss Laufer was graduated this Spring from Smith College and is now associated with Elmo Roper.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 5 1947

Tips on Tuning

Milton Berle digs in with little Junior, WBEN at 8.

Beethoven for Berkshire Festival Concert, WKBW at 8:30.

Girl piano prodigy on We, the People, WGR at 9.

* * *

[illegible]GETON, N. J.
NEWS
AUG 5 - 1947

Young Tenor Featured With Boston Symphony

David Lloyd, young American tenor who is one of the attractions of the coming Community Concerts series, will be heard tonight on a coast-to-coast broadcast over ABC singing with the [illegible] Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. This will be the only concert from the Berkshire Festival to be heard on the air.

Last year Mr. Lloyd was the winner of the "Voice of Tomorrow" contest sponsored by the Philadelphia Inquirer in connection with the annual music festival.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
COMMERCIAL NEWS
AUG 5 1947

BOB FRANKLIN'S Radio News

August 5, 1947

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's entire Ninth Symphony ("Choral") will be broadcast tonight from 9 to 10 p.m. on KGO. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have programmed the work for their final Berkshire Music Festival concert.

All of which reminds me to tell you about the novel programming plan ABC is cooking up for future Tuesday nights.

Starting next month, Tuesday nights on ABC will be devoted to cultural and thought-provoking programs. Sounds stuffy at first but it's a darn good idea. Part of the Tuesday night line-up, not completed at this moment, will be: "America's Town Meeting," moving from Thursdays; the CIO-AFL "Labor USA" and management's "Voice of Business" programs, now aired Saturday afternoons and the Boston Symphony concerts.

Regarding the Boston Symphony, ABC's up-and-at-'em new program director Charles "Bud" Barry said during his recent San Francisco visit that ABC will continue these full-hour concerts, whether or not they are sponsored. Which means we are likely to continue to be the only network giving listeners two hours of live symphony music each week. Musical Digest Magazine recently re-contracted for the "Sunday Evening Hour" spot, 5 to 6 p.m., with the Detroit Symphony.

Certainly ABC's new program set-up will help dialers in their program selection. If Tuesday finds you in the mood to hear current affairs, discussions or symphonic music, you'll tune 810.

If you want comedy, you can turn to another station and see if I care. Of course you could restrain your chuckling urge until Wednesday, which will be KGO's night for smiles . . . Bing Crosby will be back at 9 and Henry Morgan at 9:30, plus Lionel Barrymore in "Mayor of the Town" and at least two other top laugh shows I hope we'll be ready to talk about a little later.

But to get back to Tuesday night: From the standpoint of competitive radio, the idea of putting all cultural shows on one night is basically sound. Putting comedy shows on Tuesday night, long established as comedy night on another network, would be like building a drug store on a corner that already has three of them. You'd get some customers, sure—but not nearly as many as you would if you set up shop in a neighborhood which had no other drug store.

CH
IVAL EWOOD

Prepared ven Ninth orrow who prepared sing with the hestra, Serge

g, in Beetho-tonight, and d guest con-
Saturday evers gao in Red was a clergy-
Lawson Shaw,
wn singer in nd his sister,
atura soprano,
dio for several omona College, me to New York

radio glee club had seen him lee club. Until 1945 he trained quacade at the Francisco expo-nes," "Laughing en Lively Arts,"
o work.
an award as the American-born ional Association posers and Con-
nheim fellowship.
ointed choral di-
ire Music Center director of choral illiard School of ctor of the CBS
4, in 1946 he was he ABC and NBC

ed and has since te Chorale, which s at leading halls and with leading ing major choral itial performances
Samuel Barber,
Aaron Copland, Lu-contemporary comormed this spring versity Symposium usic new works by and Malipiero.
g he will conduct
, 50, "Nun ist das
's "Symphony of art's "Requiem," in end, soprano; Eu-
alto; David Lloyd,
Pease, bass, will be

LAWSON SHAW
Festival chorus to Boston Symphony tonglewood. He will guest conductor
day evening.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG [illegible] 1947

"Idomeneo" at Tanglewood Makes Musical History

First American Performance Is Given by Opera Department of Berkshire Center

By Willard M. Clark

[illegible] Musical his- [illegible] tonight when [illegible] "Idomeneo," [illegible] American perform- [illegible] Department of the [illegible] Music Center, under the [illegible] of Boris Goldovsky. Mozart [illegible] that "Idomeneo" was his [illegible] opera with "Don Giovanni" [illegible] second. The reason was not [illegible] And for there is infinite [illegible] score vitality and sus- [illegible] est in the libretto devised [illegible] Giambattista Varesco from [illegible] French libretto by Danchet [illegible] "Idomeneo," by Campra.

In Ancient Greece

[illegible] set in ancient Greece, [illegible] of the biblical Jep- [illegible] the predicament of [illegible] Greece, "Idomeneo," who [illegible] escaping shipwreck, [illegible] to sacrifice the first [illegible] meets upon his own [illegible] is his own son, Idamante. [illegible] greets him, Idomeneo seeks [illegible] son by sending him to [illegible] Electra, the princess of [illegible] country, but the Gods intervene [illegible] decree that Idamante replace Idomeneo on the throne of Crete, together with his true love, Ilia, prisoner of war from Troy.

Singers, orchestra and chorus were members of the Berkshire Music Center. We were able to hear the full dress rehearsal Sunday night, a truly memorable experience. In his inimitable manner, Mr. Goldovsky talked informally to the audience of critics, students and invited guests noting that the opera had not been given in this country for two reasons—first it is too long, a performance following the score exactly would take four and one half hours, and second, the story is too complicated and confusing. Mozart made cuts himself, so did Mr. Goldovsky, eliminating many extraneous arias and situations and providing a coherent story and the best of the music. There is monumental strength and passion in the story but it ends happily.

Singing Superb

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG 5 - 1947

Mozart Opera In Premiere

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—Opera news again was created at Tanglewood last night. Mozart's "Idomeneo" had its American premiere 166 years after it was first heard in Munich.

Staged by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, the production was chiefly a student project under direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Musically absorbing and pictorially effective, it made a distinctive contribution to furthering interest in opera in this country.

For Mozarteans, this opera should become a kind of seventh heaven. Mozart himself considered it one of his two greatest works ("Don Giovanni" was the other).

* * *

For others, the work may appear to be a parade of arias with hardly any action. The static quality arises from a Greek subject and a traditional style of composition.

Fortunately, Mr. Goldovsky has edited the opera to give it dramatic continuity, doing away with the confusion of an involved libretto.

The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus was recruited from the students of the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Laderoute sang the title role of the King called upon to sacrifice his son.

A soprano, Ann Bollinger, portrayed the role of the son, originally written for a castrato.

* * *

There was a uniform excellence in the vocal work of these students, less successful was the playing of the student orchestra conducted by Mr. Goldovsky.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN

AUG 5 1947

One has come to expect works of pathos, full of drama and compelling meditation from this eminent Russian composer, who has spoken so forcibly for his people in times of peace and war. Now he is largely in a parodistic mood, except for the lyric poignancy of slow sections. These sound just as genuine as his blithe and ironic liveliness sounds somewhat deliberate and, after a while, even a little tedious. Koussevitzky endows these pulsating allegros with saving vividness. More than any one else, he makes them convincing. In the gay movement Shostakovitch seems to borrow some of the grotesqueries of Prokofieff. In romantic moments he is himself.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
AUG [illegible] 1947

BOB FRANKLIN'S

Radio News

August 5, 1947

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's entire Ninth Symphony ("Choral") will be broadcast tonight from 9 to 10 p.m. on KGO. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have programmed the work for their final Berkshire Music Festival concert.

All of which reminds me to tell you about the novel programming plan ABC is cooking up for future Tuesday nights.

Starting next month, Tuesday nights on ABC will be devoted to cultural and thought-provoking programs. Sounds stuffy at first but it's a darn good idea. Part of the Tuesday night line-up, not completed at this moment, will be: "America's Town Meeting," moving from Thursdays; the CIO-AFL "Labor USA" and management's "Voice of Business" programs, now aired Saturday afternoons and the Boston Symphony concerts.

Regarding the Boston Symphony, ABC's up-and-at-'em new program director Charles "Bud" Barry said during his recent San Francisco visit that ABC will continue these full-hour concerts, whether or not they are sponsored. Which means we are likely to continue to be the only network giving listeners two hours of live symphony music each week. Musical Digest Magazine recently re-contracted for the "Sunday Evening Hour" spot, 5 to 6 p.m., with the Detroit Symphony.

Certainly ABC's new program set-up will help dialers in their program selection. If Tuesday finds you in the mood to hear current affairs, discussions or symphonic music, you'll tune 810.

If you want comedy, you can turn to another station and see if I care. Of course you could restrain your chuckling urge until Wednesday, which will be KGO's night for smiles . . . Bing Crosby will be back at 9 and Henry Morgan at 9:30, plus Lionel Barrymore in "Mayor of the Town" and at least two other top laugh shows I hope we'll be ready to talk about a little later.

But to get back to Tuesday night: From the standpoint of competitive radio, the idea of putting all cultural shows on one night is basically sound. Putting comedy shows on Tuesday night, long established as comedy night on another network, would be like building a drug store on a corner that already has three of them. You'd get some customers, sure—but not nearly as many as you would if you set up shop in a neighborhood which had no other drug store.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 5 - 1947

Beethoven Music Featured At Tanglewood

First American Performance of 'Idomeneo' Seen During Rehearsal

By D. E. RITZ

Tanglewood in the Berkshires was a busy place over the week end. There were two all-Beethoven concerts with Jacob Lateiner and Joseph Battista, pianists, as the featured soloists and on Sunday evening the dress rehearsal of Mozart's "Idomeneo."

The Saturday and Sunday concerts continued the Beethoven cycle which opened Thursday night with the first three symphonies. The fourth and fifth were played Saturday and the sixth and seventh on Sunday. All were played superbly.

Serge Koussevitzky has introduced a new note in the festival concerts of this year by presenting lesser known artists as soloists. Both Lateiner and Battista are young, the first only 19 and Battista 29 (although in appearance from the stage he would have been taken as the younger). Lateiner performed the fifth concerto in E flat major and Battista the fourth in G major. Both young men played superbly and justified the confidence of the conductor in them.

The cycle will conclude tonight with the performance of eighth and ninth symphonies. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and the performance will start at 7:30 o'clock. The festival chorus, which has been prepared by Robert Shaw, will assist with the ninth with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, as the soloists.

"Idomeneo" in dress rehearsal was fascinating. Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, served in the triple capacity of conductor, stage director and commentator, and the Sunday evening rehearsal marked the first time that the opera was given in this country.

Although the theater-concert hall was filled with students at the center, newspaper critics and general Tanglewood personnel, Mr. Goldovsky, treated the cast quite as though the audience were non-existent. As even at Tanglewood things will go wrong, there were times when the director stopped the show and made principals or orchestra go over parts until they were more to his liking.

The cast was headed by Joseph Laderoute in the title role; Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson alternating in the part of Idamante; Nancy Trickey and Paula Lenchner as the Princesses Ilia and Elletra; Frank Guarrera as Arbace, the high priest, and Robert Holland as his assistant; Adele Addison and Mildred Mueller as two Cretan maidens; Robert Holland and Edward Ansara as two Trojan prisoners, and Edward Ansara as the voice of the oracle. The orchestra and chorus personnel were made up of center students. Richard Rychtarik served as scenic director, Leo Van Witsen was the costume designer and Felix Wolfes is assistant conductor.

The opera is sung in Italian, but has been cut and some of the episodes rearranged by the conductor to make it more suitable for modern production. As an uncut version would give the audience "about four and a half hours of music," according to Mr. Goldovsky, the wisdom of cutting cannot be denied. The music is exquisite and the opera has a dramatic quality that places it among the truly great. If it has any fault it is in the length of some of the arias. As presented in rehearsal the outstanding singing and acting was by Laderoute as the king and Paula Lenchner as the jealous Elletra. Two performances of the opera have been scheduled; one took place last night and the other will be held tomorrow night. The theater is open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center by invitation.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 5 1947

CHORUS COACH FOR FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Robert L. Shaw Prepared Group for Beethoven Ninth Symphony Tomorrow

Robert Lawson Shaw, who prepared the Festival chorus to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony tonight, and who will be the second guest conductor at Tanglewood Saturday evening, was born 31 years gao in Red Bluff, Cal. His father was a clergyman. His mother, Nelle Lawson Shaw, has been a well-known singer in California churches, and his sister, Hollace Shaw, a coloratura soprano, has sung over the radio for several years.

A graduate of Pomona College, Claremont, Cal., he came to New York City in 1938 to form a radio glee club for Fred Waring, who had seen him conduct the college glee club. Until he entered the Navy in 1945 he trained choruses for the Aquacade at the New York and San Francisco expositions, "Carmen Jones," "Laughing Room Only" and "Seven Lively Arts," while continuing radio work.

In 1943 he received an award as the year's most important American-born conductor by the National Association for American Composers and Conductors, and a Guggenheim fellowship. In 1946 he was appointed choral director for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and director of choral activities for the Juilliard School of Music. Guest conductor of the CBS Symphony since 1944, in 1946 he was guest conductor of the ABC and NBC Symphonies.

In 1941 he founded and has since directed the Collegiate Chorale, which has sung in concerts at leading halls in New York City and with leading orchestras, performing major choral works and giving initial performances of compositions by Samuel Barber, Benjamin Britten, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss and other contemporary composers. They performed this spring at the Harvard University Symposium of Contemporary Music new works by Copland, Hindemith and Malipiero.

Saturday evening he will conduct Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil"; Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem," in which France Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, will be soloists.

ROBERT LAWSON SHAW

Prepared the Festival chorus to sing with Boston Symphony tonight at Tanglewood. He will also be second guest conductor Saturday evening.

INDIANAPOLIS, IN
NEWS

AUG - 5 1947

The final broadcast of the season from the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood will find the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, being heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will extend its time and be heard from 7:30 o'clock to 8:45 tonight on WISH-ABC so that the entire symphony may be heard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 5 - 1947

Music

'Idomeneo' Staged at Tanglewood

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—Of the operas written by Mozart two were his very special favorites—"Don Giovanni," as anybody might have guessed is one of them, and "Idomeneo," rather surprisingly, is the other. Now that we have heard "Idomeneo" here at Tanglewood it is not hard to see why Mozart should have had such a fondness for it.

The opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, after weeks of preparation, presented this work last night in the Theater-Concert Hall before an invited audience. According to most authorities "Idomeneo" has never been done in this country, or at least, there seems to be no record of its performance. In Europe it has been given hearings, mostly in Germany and Austria.

The libretto of this work is by the Abbe G. B. Varesco, court chaplain at Salzburg, and it was based, in turn, on a libretto provided by the French Danchet for a five-act opera by one Campra, which had been produced some 68 years before at Paris.

Revisions in Libretto.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department at Tanglewood, delivered a brief talk during one of the intermissions last evening, in which he advanced the idea that the work has not made the regular repertories because of its extreme length and confusing plot. For the present production he has made necessary revisions of the libretto for the sake of logic and he has shortened recitatives wherever required, without injury, however, to dramatic continuity.

The plot is a simple one. It concerns Idomeneo, king of Crete and his vow, after being shipwrecked, to sacrifice to Neptune the first human he sees on land. That person happens to be his son Idamante, who, by the way, falls in love with the Princess Ilia, daughter of the Trojan king Priam, whom Idomeneo has vanquished. Matters are settled through the intervention of the god Neptune, who is interpreted, of course, by the oracle. Idamante is made ruler of the land of Crete with "Ilia by his side."

The score teems with Mozartean melodies of the purest character, duets, a quartet of magnificent effect in the second act, choral sequences that flow dramatically with spirit and musical beauty, all of these and more.

Impression of Movement.

And, despite stylized acting, called for in a classical subject there is always the impression of scenic movement.

In the cast Joseph Laderoute sang the difficult role of the King in excellent style. Ann Bollinger, as Idamante, and Nancy Trickey, as Ilia, were also persuasive, both vocally and musically. In the role of Elettra—here as ever, a harridan of the first water—Paula Lenchner acquitted herself creditably. Frank Guarrera, Robert Holland, Adele Addison, Mildred Mueller and Edward Ansara filled the other parts nicely.

One noticed particularly that none of the singers ever so much as gave a glance to the conductor. That is how well they knew their lines. And, possibly, that is what they had been trained to do.

Regrettably the orchestra was not up to the playing standard of last year's "Peter Grimes." The high strings were somewhat strident, the lower ones rather flat. Try as he might, Mr. Goldovsky, who conducted, could get little fluency from his musicians.

Credits go to Richard Rychtarik responsible for the clever and very serviceable sets, and Leo Van Witzn, for the costumes. Assisting, at rehearsals and such was Felix Wolfes, aid to Mr. Goldovsky. Frederic Cohen, [illegible] Kahl and Fritz Waldman, of the production staff, also ha[illegible]d in the presentation.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 5 1947

"Idomeneo" at Tanglewood Makes Musical History

First American Performance Is Given by Opera Department of Berkshire Center

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 4.—Musical history was made here tonight when Mozart's early opera, "Idomeneo," was given its first American performance by the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Mozart confessed that "Idomeneo" was his favorite opera with "Don Giovanni" a close second. The reason was not difficult to find for there is infinite beauty in the score, vitality and sustaining interest in the libretto devised by Abbate Giambattista Varesco from an earlier French libretto by Danchet for an opera, "Idomeneo," by Campra.

In Ancient Greece

The legend, set in ancient Greece, is similar to that of the biblical Jephtha, and involves the predicament of the King of Greece, "Idomeneo," who in gratitude for escaping shipwreck, vows to Neptune to sacrifice the first one whom he meets upon his own shores. It is his own son, Idamante, who first greets him. Idomeneo seeks to save his son by sending him to Argos with Electra, the princess of that country, but the Gods intervyne and decree that Idamante replace Idomeneo on the throne of Crete, together with his true love, Illia, prisoner of war from Troy.

Singers, orchestra and chorus were members of the Berkshire Music Center. We were able to hear the full dress rehearsal Sunday night, a truly memorable experience. In his inimitable manner, Mr. Goldovsky talked informally to the audience of critics, students and invited guests noting that the opera had not been given in this country for two reasons—first it is too long, a performance following the score exactly would take four and one half hours, and second, the story is too complicated and confusing. Mozart made cuts himself, so did Mr. Goldovsky, eliminating many extraneous arias and situations and providing a coherent story and the best of the music. There is monumental strength and passion in the story but it ends happily.

Staging Superb

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG 5 - 1947

Mozart Opera In Premiere

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—Opera news again was created at Tanglewood last night. Mozart's "Idomeneo" had its American premiere 166 years after it was first heard in Munich.

Staged by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, the production was chiefly a student project under direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Musically absorbing and pictorially effective, it made a distinctive contribution to furthering interest in opera in this country.

For Mozarteans, this opera should become a kind of seventh heaven. Mozart himself considered it one of his two greatest works ("Don Giovanni" was the other).

* * *

For others, the work may appear to be a parade of arias with hardly any action. The static quality arises from a Greek subject and a traditional style of composition.

Fortunately, Mr. Goldovsky has edited the opera to give it dramatic continuity, doing away with the confusion of an involved libretto.

The cast of singers, orchestra and chorus was recruited from the students of the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Laderoute sang the title role of the King called upon to sacrifice his son. A soprano, Ann Bollinger, portrayed the role of the son, originally written for a castrato.

* * *

There was a uniform excellence in the vocal work of these students, less successful was the playing of the student orchestra conducted by Mr. Goldovsky.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN
AUG 5 1947

One has come to expect works of pathos, full of drama and compelling meditation from this eminent Russian composer, who has spoken so forcibly for his people in times of peace and war. Now he is largely in a parodistic mood, except for the lyric poignancy of slow sections. These sound just as genuine as his blithe and ironic liveliness sounds somewhat deliberate and, after a while, even a little tedious. Koussevitzky endows these pulsating allegros with saving vividness. More than any one else, he makes them convincing. In the gay movements Shostakovitch seems to borrow some of the grotesqueries of Prokofieff. In romantic moments [illegible] him-

---

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
AUG 5 1947

BOB FRANKLIN'S Radio News

August 5, 1947

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's entire Ninth Symphony ("Choral") will be broadcast tonight from 9 to 10 p.m. on KGO. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have programmed the work for their final Berkshire Music Festival concert.

All of which reminds me to tell you about the novel programming plan ABC is cooking up for future Tuesday nights.

Starting next month, Tuesday nights on ABC will be devoted to cultural and thought-provoking programs. Sounds stuffy at first but it's a darn good idea. Part of the Tuesday night line-up, not completed at this moment, will be: "America's Town Meeting," moving from Thursdays; the CIO-AFL "Labor USA" and management's "Voice of Business" programs, now aired Saturday afternoons and the Boston Symphony concerts.

Regarding the Boston Symphony, ABC's up-and-at-'em new program director Charles "Bud" Barry said during his recent San Francisco visit that ABC will continue these full-hour concerts, whether or not they are sponsored. Which means we are likely to continue to be the only network giving listeners two hours of live symphony music each week. Musical Digest Magazine recently re-contracted for the "Sunday Evening Hour" spot, 5 to 6 p.m., with the Detroit Symphony.

Certainly ABC's new program set-up will help dialers in their program selection. If Tuesday finds you in the mood to hear current affairs, discussions or symphonic music, you'll tune 810.

If you want comedy, you can turn to another station and see if I care. Of course you could restrain your chuckling urge until Wednesday, which will be KGO's night for smiles... Bing Crosby will be back at 9 and Henry Morgan at 9:30, plus Lionel Barrymore in "Mayor of the Town" and at least two other top laugh shows I hope we'll be ready to talk about a little later.

But to get back to Tuesday night: From the standpoint of competitive radio, the idea of putting all cultural shows on one night is basically sound. Putting comedy shows on Tuesday night, long established as comedy night on another network, would be like building a drug store on a corner that already has three of them. You'd get some customers, sure—but not nearly as many as you would if you set up shop in a neighborhood which had no other drug store.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
AUG 5 1947

Beethoven Music Featured At Tanglewood

First American Performance of 'Idomeneo' Seen During Rehearsal

By D. E. RITZ

Tanglewood in the Berkshires was a busy place over the week end. There were two all-Beethoven concerts with Jacob Lateiner and Joseph Battista, pianists, as the featured soloists and on Sunday evening the dress rehearsal of Mozart's "Idomeneo."

The Saturday and Sunday concerts continued the Beethoven cycle which opened Thursday night with the first three symphonies. The fourth and fifth were played Saturday and the sixth and seventh on Sunday. All were played superbly.

Serge Koussevitzky has introduced a new note in the festival concerts of this year by presenting lesser known artists as soloists. Both Lateiner and Battista are young, the first only 19 and Battista 29 (although in appearance from the stage he would have been taken as the younger). Lateiner performed the fifth concerto in E flat major and Battista the fourth in G major. Both young men played superbly and justified the confidence of the conductor in them.

The cycle will conclude tonight with the performance of eighth and ninth symphonies. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and the performance will start at 7:30 o'clock. The festival chorus, which has been prepared by Robert Shaw, will assist with the ninth with Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, as the soloists.

"Idomeneo" in dress rehearsal was fascinating. Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, served in the triple capacity of conductor, stage director and commentator, and the Sunday evening rehearsal marked the first time that the opera was given in this country.

Although the theater-concert hall was filled with students at the center, newspaper critics and general Tanglewood personnel, Mr. Goldovsky, treated the cast quite as though the audience were nonexistent. As even at Tanglewood things will go wrong, there were times when the director stopped the show and made principals or orchestra go over parts until they were more to his liking.

The cast was headed by Joseph Laderoute in the title role; Ann Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson alternating in the part of Idamante; Nancy Trickey and Paula Lenchner as the Princesses Ilia and Elletra; Frank Guarrera as Arbace, the high priest, and Robert Holland as his assistant; Adele Addison and Mildred Mueller as two Cretan maidens; Robert Holland and Edward Ansara as two Trojan prisoners, and Edward Ansara as the voice of the oracle. The orchestra and chorus personnel were made up of center students. Richard Rychtarik served as scenic director, Leo Van Witsen was the costume designer and Felix Wolfes is assistant conductor.

The opera is sung in Italian, but has been cut and some of the episodes rearranged by the conductor to make it more suitable for modern production. As an uncut version would give the audience "about four and a half hours of music," according to Mr. Goldovsky, the wisdom of cutting cannot be denied. The music is exquisite and the opera has a dramatic quality that places it among the truly great. If it has any fault it is in the length of some of the arias. As presented in rehearsal the outstanding singing and acting was by Laderoute as the king and Paula Lenchner as the jealous Elletra. Two performances of the opera have been scheduled; one took place last night and the other will be held tomorrow night. The theater is open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center by invitation.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
AUG 5 1947

CHORUS COACH FOR FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Robert L. Shaw Prepared Group for Beethoven Ninth Symphony Tomorrow

Robert Lawson Shaw, who prepared the Festival chorus to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony tonight, and who will be the second guest conductor at Tanglewood Saturday evening, was born 31 years gao in Red Bluff, Cal. His father was a clergyman. His mother, Nelle Lawson Shaw, has been a well-known singer in California churches, and his sister, Hollace Shaw, a coloratura soprano, has sung over the radio for several years.

A graduate of Pomona College, Claremont, Cal., he came to New York City in 1938 to form a radio glee club for Fred Waring, who had seen him conduct the college glee club. Until he entered the Navy in 1945 he trained choruses for the Aquacade at the New York and San Francisco expositions, "Carmen Jones," "Laughing Room Only" and "Seven Lively Arts," while continuing radio work.

In 1943 he received an award as the year's most important American-born conductor by the National Association for American Composers and Conductors, and a Guggenheim fellowship. In 1946 he was appointed choral director for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and director of choral activities for the Juilliard School of Music. Guest conductor of the CBS Symphony since 1944, in 1946 he was guest conductor of the ABC and NBC Symphonies.

In 1941 he founded and has since directed the Collegiate Chorale, which has sung in concerts at leading halls in New York City and with leading orchestras, performing major choral works and giving initial performances of compositions by Samuel Barber, Benjamin Britten, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss and other contemporary composers. They performed this spring at the Harvard University Symposium of Contemporary Music new works by Copland, Hindemith and Malipiero.

Saturday evening he will conduct Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil"; Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem," in which France Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, will be soloists.

ROBERT LAWSON SHAW

Prepared the Festival chorus to sing with Boston Symphony tonight at Tanglewood. He will also be second guest conductor Saturday evening.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
AUG 5 1947

The final broadcast of the season from the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood will find the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, being heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will extend its time and be heard from 7:30 o'clock to 8:45 tonight on WISH-ABC so that the entire symphony may be heard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
AUG 5 - 1947

Music

'Idomeneo' Staged at Tanglewood

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—Of the operas written by Mozart two were his very special favorites—"Don Giovanni," as anybody might have guessed is one of them, and "Idomeneo," rather surprisingly, is the other. Now that we have heard "Idomeneo" here at Tanglewood it is not hard to see why Mozart should have had such a fondness for it.

The opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, after weeks of preparation, presented this work last night in the Theater-Concert Hall before an invited audience. According to most authorities "Idomeneo" has never been done in this country, or at least, there seems to be no record of its performance. In Europe it has been given hearings, mostly in Germany and Austria.

The libretto of this work is by the Abbe G. B. Varesco, court chaplain at Salzburg, and it was based, in turn, on a libretto provided by the French Danchet for a five-act opera by one Campra, which had been produced some 68 years before at Paris.

Revisions in Libretto.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department at Tanglewood, delivered a brief talk during one of the intermissions last evening, in which he advanced the idea that the work has not made the regular repertories because of its extreme length and confusing plot. For the present production he has made necessary revisions of the libretto for the sake of logic and he has shortened recitatives wherever required, without injury, however, to dramatic continuity.

The plot is a simple one. It concerns Idomeneo, king of Crete and his vow, after being shipwrecked, to sacrifice to Neptune the first human he sees on land. That person happens to be his son Idamante, who, by the way, falls in love with the Princess Ilia, daughter of the Trojan king Priam, whom Idomeneo has vanquished. Matters are settled through the intervention of the god Neptune, who is interpreted, of course, by the oracle. Idamante is made ruler of the land of Crete with "Ilia by his side."

The score teems with Mozartean melodies of the purest character, duets, a quartet of magnificent effect in the second act, choral sequences that flow dramatically with spirit and musical beauty, all of these and more.

Impression of Movement.

And, despite stylized acting, called for in a classical subject there is always the impression of scenic movement.

In the cast Joseph Laderoute sang the difficult role of the King in excellent style. Ann Bollinger, as Idamante, and Nancy Trickey, as Ilia, were also persuasive, both vocally and musically. In the role of Elettra—here as ever, a harridan of the first water—Paula Lenchner acquitted herself creditably. Frank Guarrera, Robert Holland, Adele Addison, Mildred Mueller and Edward Ansara filled the other parts nicely.

One noticed particularly that none of the singers ever so much as gave a glance to the conductor. That is how well they knew their lines. And, possibly, that is what they had been trained to do.

Regrettably the orchestra was not up to the playing standard of last year's "Peter Grimes." The high strings were somewhat strident, the lower ones rather flat. Try as he might, Mr. Goldovsky, who conducted, could get little fluency from his musicians.

Credits go to Richard Rychtarik responsible for the clever and very serviceable sets, and Leo Van Witzn, for the costumes. Assisting, at rehearsals and such was Felix Wolfes, aid to Mr. Goldovsky. Frederic Cohen, [illegible] Kahl and Fritz Waldman, of the production staff, also had a hand in the presentation.

[200]

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

AUG 5 1947

These Days . . . . .

By
George E. Sokolsky

I am not a musician, nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Kossevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombasitc, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright. 1947 King Fea. Syn.. Inc.)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 5 - 1947

"Idomeneo" at Tanglewood Makes Musical History

First American Performance Is Given by Opera Department of Berkshire Center

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 4—Musical history was made here tonight when Mozart's early opera, "Idomeneo," was given its first American performance by the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Mozart confessed that "Idomeneo" was his favorite opera with "Don Giovanni" a close second. The reason was not difficult to find for there is infinite beauty in the score, vitality and sustaning interest in the libretto devised by Abbate Giambattista Varesco from an earlier French libretto by Danchet for an opera, "Idomeneo," by Campra.

In Ancient Greece

The legend, set in ancient Greece, is similar to that of the biblical Jeptha, and involves the predicament of the King of Greece, "Idomeneo," who in gratitude for escaping shipwreck, vows to Neptune to sacrifice the first one whom he meets upon his own shores. It is his own son, Idamante, who first greets him. Idomeneo seeks to save his son by sending him to Argos with Electra, the princess of that country, but the Gods intervyne and decree that Idamante replace Idomeneo on the [illegible] together with [illegible] prisoner of war from Troy.

Singers, orchestra and [illegible] members of the Berkshire Music Center. We were able to hear the full dress rehearsal Sunday night [illegible] memorable experience. In an admirable manner, Mr. Goldovsky talked informally [illegible] students [illegible] that the [illegible] this con[illegible] is too lon[illegible] the score [illegible] one half hours, and second the story is too complicated and confusing. Mozart made cuts himself, so did Mr. Goldovsky, eliminating [illegible] extraneous arias and situations and providing a coherent story and the best of the music. There is monumental strength and passion in the story but it ends happily.

Staging Superb

The staging was superb in its color, imagination and simplicity. The lighting was excellent, particularly during the storm scene, when black clouds rolled menacingly [illegible] sky.

The student orchestra, under Mr. Goldovsky's direction, [illegible] The score is outstanding for [illegible] liance of its instrumental [illegible] tuosi requirements but the students at the Center [illegible] took it in their stride.

There was some [illegible] Paula [illegible] cess Electra [illegible] is," dominated [illegible] she appeared. [illegible] trayal of a [illegible] final aria [illegible] thrilling. [illegible] in range and [illegible] performer.

An excellent [illegible] Ilia, [illegible] Tuckey. [illegible] on stage [illegible] constantly [illegible] fresh throughout [illegible] dent con[illegible] did [illegible] a [illegible] of Ela[illegible] pos[illegible] formances, [illegible] by [illegible] historic [illegible] son, vocal [illegible]

Difficult Role

The trying [illegible] sung by Joseph [illegible] the [illegible] tion of "P[illegible]

[illegible]

Opera Hou[illegible]

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 5 - 1947

Tanglewood Concerts in Final Week

The final week of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four concerts while students of the Berkshire Music Center will give sever performances.

Heavy accent in the festival program will come tonight, when the orchestra will play Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major and Symphony No. 9 with final chorus prepared by Robert Shaw. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The program begins at 7:30.

Thursday at 8:15 p. m. Leonard Bernstein will conduct for Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B Flat, Hindemith's Violin Concerto and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major with Ruth Posselt as soloist. Saturday night, with Robert Shaw conducting. Bach's Cantata No. 50, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem" will be heard. Sunday afternoon will close the festival with Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra and Two Pianos, Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor.

The Music Center schedule is highlighted this week by the opera department with the production last night and again tomorrow night of Mozart's three-act opera, "Idomeneo," for the first time in this country. Boris Goldovsky is conducting. This is open to friends of the Music Center.

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
HERALD

AUG 5 - 1947

Radio Highlight

(For daylight add one hour except for ABC, which fits both).

By JEAN MEEGAN

New York, August 4—For the first time in several years, Beethoven's Symphony Number 9, known as the Choral Symphony, will be broadcast in its entirety over ABC from the Berksire Music Festival on Tuesday evening at 8:30. It's the final Berkshire broadcast of the season.

So that grown-ups will know about CBS' "School of the Air," nine of the best programs of recent seasons will be repeated on Tuesday nights beginning this week at 9:30.

CBS Science Director John Pfeiffer will substitute for Quincy Howe, who is vacationing, for three weeks. The program is aired at 5:15 on Tuesdays.

NBC's "Honeymoon In New York" will be broadcast from Trinidad at 8 Tuesday morning with guests on the spot.

Fletcher Markle's adaptation of Prosper Markle's "Carmen," will be offered on CBS' "Studio One" at 8:30. Instead of Bizet's familiar musical score, an original Spanish score by Lan Adomian, Armenian-American composer, was commissioned for this presentation.

Talks slated for Tuesday include: A discussion on dental health at noon on NBC; a debate on "Where Are We Headed Economically?" by Robert Nathan, economist; Leo Cherne, executive secretary, Research Institute of America; Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, economic writer; Henry Haz-

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 5 - 1947

FESTIVAL MUSIC:

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the [illegible]hestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard over WOKO beginning at 8:30 tonight. The program will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 p. m., so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Centre courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

STUDENTS AT TANGLEWOOD MAKE OPERA HISTORY—Closing seeen of first act of first American performance of Mozart's "Idomeneo" by students of Berkshire Music Center yesterday.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

AUG 5 1947

These Days . . . .

By
George E. Sokolsky

I am not a musician, nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GIs rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Kossevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombasitc, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

(Copyright, 1947, King Fea. Syn. Inc.)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 5 - 1947

"Idomeneo" at Tanglewood Makes Musical History

First American Performance Is Given by Opera Department of Berkshire Center

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 4—Musical history was made here tonight when Mozart's early opera, "Idomeneo," was given its first American performance by the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Mozart confessed that "Idomeneo" was his favorite opera with "Don Giovanni" a close second. The reason was not difficult to find for there is infinite beauty in the score, vitality and sustaning interest in the libretto devised by Abbate Giambattista Varesco from an earlier French libretto by Danchet for an opera, "Idomeneo," by Campra.

In Ancient Greece

The legend, set in ancient Greece, is similar to that of the biblical Jeptha, and involves the predicament of the King of Greece, "Idomeneo," who in gratitude for escaping shipwreck, vows to Neptune to sacrifice the first one whom he meets upon his own shores. It is his own son, Idamante, who first greets him. Idomeneo seeks to save his son by sending him to Argos with Electra, the princess of that country, but the Gods intervne and decree that Idamante replace Idomeneo on the throne of Crete, together with his true love, Ilia, prisoner of war from Troy.

Singers, orchestra and chorus were members of the Berkshire Music Center. We were able to hear the full dress rehearsal Sunday night a truly memorable experience. In his inimitable manner, Mr. Goldovsky talked informally to the audience of critics, students [illegible] invited guests noting that the [illegible] had not been given in this coun[illegible] for two reasons—first it is too lon[illegible] a performance following the score exactly would take four and one half hours, and second, the story is too complicated and confusing. Mozart made cuts himself, so did Mr. Goldovsky, eliminating many extraneous arias and situations and providing a coherent story and the best of the music. There is monumental srength and passion in the story but it ends happily.

Staging Superb

The staging was superb in its color, imagination and simplicity. The lighting was excellent, particularly during the storm scene, when black clouds rolled menacingly across the sky.

The student orchestra, under Mr. Goldovsky's direction, [illegible]. The score is outstanding for the brilliance of its instrumentation and virtuosi requirments, but the students at the Center are no amateurs and took it in their stride.

There was some [illegible] singing. Paula Lenchner, as the [illegible] Princess Electra, a sort of Verdi "Amneris," dominated proceedings whenever she appeared. She gave a strong portrayal of a most [illegible]. Her final aria and [illegible] thrilling. The [illegible] in range and she [illegible] temperament.

An excellent [illegible] Ilia, beautiful[illegible] Trickey. An [illegible] on stage most [illegible] constantly [illegible] fresh throughout. If this student continues [illegible] as she did tonight, [illegible] a distinguished [illegible] roster of Mo[illegible] of Idamante [illegible] nos who [illegible] formances, Ann B[illegible] thy Dawson [illegible] histrionic honors going to Miss Dawson, vocal honors to Miss B[illegible].

Difficult Role

The trying role of Idome[illegible] sung by Joseph L[illegible] the title role in [illegible] tion of "Peter Grimes," [illegible]

[illegible]

Mozart [illegible] chorus [illegible] The staging [illegible] ing of [illegible] Those [illegible] Adele Add[illegible] to see her [illegible] ens and [illegible] a duet [illegible]

There [illegible] could be [illegible] instrument[illegible] are profe[illegible] lous expe[illegible] ter.

One co[illegible] formance [illegible] to a great [illegible] story, its [illegible] sumptuous [illegible] has all the [illegible] popular vehicle and [illegible] great spaces of the Metropolitan Opera House.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 5 - 1947

Tanglewood Concerts in Final Week

The final week of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four concerts while students of the Berkshire Music Center will give sever performances.

Heavy accent in the festival program will come tonight, when the orchestra will play Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major and Symphony No. 9 with final chorus prepared by Robert Shaw. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The program begins at 7:30.

Thursday at 8:15 p. m. Leonard Bernstein will conduct for Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B Flat, Hindemith's Violin Concerto and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major with Ruth Posselt as soloist. Saturday night, with Robert Shaw conducting, Bach's Cantata No. 50, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem" will be heard. Sunday afternoon will close the festival with Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra and Two Pianos, Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor.

The Music Center schedule is highlighted this week by the opera department with the production last night and again tomorrow night of Mozart's three-act opera, "Idomeneo," for the first time in this country. Boris Goldovsky is conducting. This is open to friends of the Music Center.

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
HERALD

AUG 5 - 1947

Radio Highlight

(For daylight add one hour except for ABC, which fits both).

By JEAN MEEGAN

New York, August 4—For the first time in several years, Beethoven's Symphony Number 9, known as the Choral Symphony, will be broadcast in its entirety over ABC from the Berksire Music Festival on Tuesday evening at 8:30. It's the final Berkshire broadcast of the season.

So that grown-ups will know about CBS' "School of the Air," nine of the best programs of recent seasons will be repeated on Tuesday nights beginning this week at 9:30.

CBS Science Director John Pfeiffer will substitute for Quincy Howe, who is vacationing, for three weeks. The program is aired at 5:15 on Tuesdays.

NBC's "Honeymoon In New York" will be broadcast from Trinidad at 8 Tuesday morning with guests on the spot.

Fletcher Markle's adaptation of Prosper Markle's "Carmen," will be offered on CBS' "Studio One" at 8:30. Instead of Bizet's familiar musical score, an original Spanish score by Lan Adomian, Armenian-American composer, was commissioned for this presentation.

Talks slated for Tuesday include: A discussion on dental health at noon on NBC; a debate on "Where Are We Headed Economically?" by Robert Nathan, economist; [illegible] Uterne, executive secretary, Research Institute of America; Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, economic writer; Henry Haz-

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 5 -

FESTIVAL MUSIC

In the final broadcast of the season and the last to come from the Berkshire Music Festival here this year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard over WOKO beginning at 8:30 tonight. The program will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 and concluding at 9:45 p. m., so that the entire symphony may be heard.

This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" symphony has been broadcast.

Koussevitzky has chosen as his solo quartet artists heard previously with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Centre courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony.

STUDENTS AT TANGLEWOOD MAKE OPERA HISTORY—Closing secen of first act of first American performance of Mozart's "Idomeneo" by students of Berkshire Music Center yesterday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 5 - 1947

Mozart 'Idomeneo'

Opera Heard First Time in U. S. at Tanglewood

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 4.—Mozart's three-act opera "Idomeneo," first heard in Munich in 1781, was produced for the first time in America tonight by the Berkshire Music Center's opera department in the opera hall at Tanglewood for an invited audience.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, doubled as conductor and stage director. Joseph Laderoute sang the title role of the Cretan king who is faced with the prospect of sacrificing his son, Idamante, to the god Neptune. Ann Bollinger, a young soprano from New York, sang Idamante. Ilia, a Trojan princess, was sung by Nancy Trickey, with Paula Lenchner as her unsuccessful rival, Elettra. Frank Guarrera, as the high priest Arbace, and Adele Addison, Mildred Mueller, Robert Holland and Edward Ansara completed the cast.

The soloists, choristers and members of the orchestra are students at the center. In last night's dress rehearsal the cast was the same except that Miss Bollinger and Dorothy Dawson, who will sing the role in the repeat performance of "Idomeneo" Wednesday night, alternated as Idamante.

Mr. Goldovsky has pointed out that the principal difficulties in staging "Idomeneo" are caused both by its length and its dramatic structure. Mozart's librettist, the Abbe G. B. Varesco, of Salzburg, had to provide a sufficient quota of arias for each principal, and this militated against dramatic clarity and continuity. Besides condensing the score to a practicable length of two hours and a half, he has made certain transpositions of scenes in the second and third acts to clarify the development of the story.

This he thinks is particularly modern, since it presents problems which face us now such as man's struggle with vast natural forces and the necessity of carrying out one's obligation. Apart from cuts, he has not changed the music itself. Idamante's music, originally assigned to a castrato is sung in its original range by a soprano in this production.

Mr. Goldovsky has succeeded in giving a sense of dramatic coherence and continuity, and the musical sequence in yesterday's dress rehearsal seemed logical and coherent, except for one over-apparent seam in the last act. One can be very grateful to him and to the Berkshire Music Center for bringing to light this remarkable example of late eighteenth century opera.

The music throughout is unmistakable and characteristic Mozart, and of a mature Mozart; the score is often prophetic of the better-known operas written between six and eleven years later. This sometimes makes it difficult, at a first hearing, to get a clear idea of the individuality of "Idomeneo" as distinguished from the later operas. There were remarkable anticipations of "Don Giovanni" or "The Marriage of Figaro." Elettra's last aria before her suicide has a pungence and fury which reappears in the queen's second aria in "The Magic Flute." There is music, particularly when tragedy is imminent, of vivid emotional persuasiveness, music of a characteristically Mozartian lyric appeal.

Impressions gathered at a dress rehearsal are naturally subject to amendment, but this left the reviewer wondering how much an occasional impression of unevenness of inspiration in the score was due to the music itself and how much to a production which, while devoted and conscientious, seemed more routine than imaginative.

The music was presented in a straightforward manner, but with inflexibility of tempo and insufficient revelation of mood, atmosphere and emotion. Dramatically, also, the performance gave a sense of conscientiousness rather than of conviction, leaving it to a further hearing to reveal how much dramatic persuasiveness exists in the roles themselves.

Richard Rychtarik's settings seemed too ambitious for the theater's relatively small stage, giving a sense of too much detail and missing atmospheric fidelity. Nor did the costumes designed by Leo Van Witsen engage the imagination. From a student production of such an exacting work too much should not be expected, but last summer's Tanglewood production of "Peter Grimes" showed what could be successfully accomplished on this stage.

Nevertheless, this production is an important event in American operatic history, and it will be interesting to see whether "Idomeneo" will be added to the Mozart repertoire of our professional opera companies during the next few years.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
AUG 5 - 1947

Former Pilots Will Sing at Berkshire Festival

Two ex-pilots will be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which closes the Beethoven cycle at Tanglewood this evening with the Ninth Symphony. James Pease (left) was with the Army Air Forces for three years, and David Lloyd (right) was a naval pilot. Pease is the bass, and Lloyd the tenor. Between them is Eunice Alberts, the contralto.

Mozart's 'Idomeneo' Has First Performance in This Country

Opera Department of Berkshire Music Center Gives U. S. Premiere at Tanglewood; to Be Repeated Tomorrow Evening

In the concert hall-theater of the Berkshire Music Festival last evening, the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center gave the first American performance of Mozart's opera 'Idomeneo," an allegory of ancient Crete.

One of the reasons that this opus has not been heard in this country previously is its great length, and Boris Goldovsky has brought it within range of a conventional time element.

This reviewer, in company with other members of the press, and Berkshire Center students, heard the initial performance at a dress rehearsal, the first time, as Mr. Goldovsky put it, that "all the pieces have been assembled."

The story is complicated, telling of a Cretan king, who has been saved from shipwreck and has vowed to Neptune to sacrifice the first human being he meets on land. The person he meets is his son, Adamante, a situation which forms the crux of the rather rambling libretto.

While the music is unmistakably Mozart, who is alleged to have expressed a preference for "Idomeneo," along with "Don Giovanni" as his two favorite compositions, the opera has two elements which are apt to bar it from complete popular favor, such as it would require for, say, inclusion in the standard repertoire of the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The first of these is an extended succession of aria-recitatives, particularly in the first act, which is composed almost entirely of this musical form; and a lack of dramatic coherence. The overall effect is that the opera is unwieldy, and this despite the fact that Mr. Goldovsky has staged his production with astute comprehension of his basic problem.

On the basis of a dress rehearsal, it would hardly be fair to judge the performance as a finished product, but there is sufficient evidence of the style of the opera to form certain conclusions.

Unquestionably, Mozart has brought to "Idomeneo" the lyric persuasiveness that characterizes both "Don Giovanni" and "The Magic Flute," and the soloists and chorus, all students at the Center, tackled an ambitious program with competent energy.

The role of Idamante is being altered by Ann Bollinger, a New York soprano, and Dorothy Dawson. Miss Bollinger, who we heard in the part, was entirely up to the job. Her voice is sweet and sympathetic, and she understands more than the elements of acting.

Nancy Trickey carries the long and difficult role of Princess Ilia, daughter of King Priam of Troy, with stamina and assurance, while the really big voice of the evening belonged to Paula Lenchner, as the scheming Princess Elletra. Adele Addison of this city was heard in melodic duets with Mildred Mueller, and the remainder of the cast comprised Joseph Laderoute, Frank Guarrera, Robert Holland, and Edward Ansara.

"Idomeneo" has been staged dramatically by Mr. Goldovsky, and the sets of Richard Rychtarik are bold and imaginative. The opera will be repeated tomorrow evening at 8.15.

LONG BEACH, CALIF.
PRESS-TELEGRAM
AUG 5 1947

Concert Given at Tanglewood

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a special concert in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., last week. Coming in the middle of the Berkshire Festival weeks, but apart from the festival itself, the concert included Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto, with the youthful Ella Goldstein as the soloist; an orchestral concerto with organ in D minor by Vivaldi, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Introduction to Act Three of "Lohengrin," Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" second suite, and Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges."

The event was called "Music for All" and was of unprecedented character in that it was designed to show the three developments of science by which symphonic music has found a greatly widened public—the phonograph, the radio and motion pictures. Tanglewood was equipped to demonstrate the orchestra's contribution in the first two of these developments by means of a nation-wide broadcast, and a comparison of phonographic recordings made by the organization at various times with the direct playing of the same music by the orchestra itself.

The motion picture cameras photographed the audience in shots for a forthcoming film, "The Story of Tanglewood." Before the concert there was a special showing from outstanding films to which contemporary composers have contributed the musical scores. They were shown at the Theater-Concert Hall, the auditorium of the opera department in the Berkshire Music Center, this orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood.

The first portion of the program by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky was broadcast on a coast-to-coast network. He conducted Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," while the motion pictures were made of the listening audience. The remainder of the program was called "The March of Fidelity," and was devoted to a comparison of Victor phonograph records and the orchestra in actual performance.

Each disc was played on a phonograph of its own period. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in the Introduction to Act III from "Lohengrin." The same music was then heard in

The orchestra's first orthophonic electrical recordings of 20 years ago and the increased volume and fidelity of 1935 were demonstrated in the next numbers. The most recent recording yet to be released and capturing the orchestral range and dynamics to a greater degree than ever before, is Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." It was played on the newly designed custom-made R. C. A.-Victor radio-phonograph called "The Berkshire," which was introduced to the public for the first time at this concert and was compared with the sound of the orchestra itself.

The program of films included music by Honegger, Prokofieff, Walton, Copland and Virgil Thompson.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 6 - 1947

Varied Programs At Music Mountain

Music Mountain this week offers a wide variety to suit every possible musical taste, both in program material, and in assisting artists. Friday afternoon at 3 will see Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony and the members of the Gordon String Quartet in the lovely Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist in the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major. Mr. Demarest, a graduate of the Yale School of Music and the Curtis Institute, has studied extensively abroad. Since 1934 he has devoted himself to teaching piano at Hotchkiss School and concertizing.

On Sunday afternoon, at 4 o'clock the Gordon String Quartet will have as its guest artists, John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist, and director of the Hartford School of Music, at its concert at Music Mountain, Falls Village.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
AUG 6 1947

NINTH CONCERT AT TANGLEWOOD IS BROADCAST

Eighth, Ninth Symphonies Wind Up Beethoven Series

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 5—An audience of untold thousands heard the ninth program in the current Tanglewood Festival Concerts tonight for it was broadcast in whole on the regular Tuesday night broadcast by the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra.~~ It was a perfect program for broadcasting purposes as it included the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven, thus concluding the cycle of Beethoven concerts which have drawn fully 500 persons to Tanglewood.

Full of Humor

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony uses the modest orchestra of the Seventh. Neither trumpets nor drums are called for in the second movement. Beethoven in his first theme sets the character of the work in its graceful melodic simplicity. In place of the usual slow movement there is a de- ghtful allegretto scherzando. It is short and full of humor. Beethoven lets loose his somewhat boisterous temperament, his capricious humor, in the finale. The inventions and fertility in this movement are never end~~ing, yet~~ its thematic material is slight. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a charming performance, wonderfully graceful and cognizant of the varying moods.

Beethoven's Ninth and final symphony, has become a tradition on Tanglewood concerts. The final chorale movement was sung by a student chorus, trained by Robert Shaw and the following soloists: Frances Yeend, soprano, who sang in "Peter Grimes" last year; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bas..

Schiller's "Ode to Joy" has seldom been more brilliantly sung than by this fine chorus and capable soloists. Mr. Shaw had trained his group to the Nth degree. The cruelly high tessitura was sung with amazing freedom from strain and the choirs were well balanced. Attacks were clean and one could even understand some of the words. The soloists were excellent, with Mr. Lloyd and Miss Yeend singing extremely well, and Miss Alberts and Mr. Pease making the most of their opportunities.

Variety of Tonal Color

It is seldom that one hears the chorale of the Ninth Symphony sung with so great a variety of tonal color. Pianissimi were really soft, while the crescendi were truly triple forte. The German text used seemed to give the singers greater vocal freedom, with the result that there was no feeling of throatiness or rigidity.

The orchestral movements were superbly played. Particularly eloquent was the reading of the adagio and the chorale theme given to the double basses was a piece of virtuoso playing which could not be equalled anywhere.

The concert Thursday night will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and the program will include the Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102" and the Schuman "Symphony No. 2 in C Major." Ruth Posselt, violinist, will play the Hindemith "Concert for Violin and orchestra."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 6 - 1947

Mitchell

BEETHOVEN SOLOISTS: A tremendous ovation was accorded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the chorus and soloists at the conclusion ~~of the Ninth Symphony~~ of Beethoven last night at Tanglewood. Called back repeatedly by the audience were the soloists, left to right, Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. The Ninth concluded the Beethoven series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 6 - 1947

2 Soloists to Play With Gordon Quartet

Two guest soloists will appear with the Gordon String Quartet on Friday afternoon at 3 at Music Mountain, Falls Village. They are Louis Speyer, oboist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ~~Charles Demarest,~~ [illegible] ~~Lakeville~~, Conn., pianist.

The program: Mozart, Oboe Quartet in F Major; Dvorak, Piano Quartet in E flat major; and "Three Pieces," Stravinsky.

The audience is cordially invited to the tea after the concert. Mrs. George P. Milmine will be hostess assisted by Mrs. Loudon Charlton and Miss Marjorie Schoudel.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
AUG 6 1947

Oboeist To Perform At Music Mountain Concert On Friday

Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony, and the members of ~~the Gordon~~ String Quartet will present the Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major as the feature of the performance at Music Mountain, Falls Village, Friday at 3.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist, presenting the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major.

Friday's program will be concluded by Stravinsky's "Three Pieces," repeated this year by popular request.

The Gordon String Quartet will have as guest artists on Sunday at 4 John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist and director of the Hartford School of Music.

The quartet alone will open the program with the Shubert Quartet in E flat major. The two guest artists will play together in John Verrall's Sonata for Horn and Piano.

After the intermission the performance of Brahms Horn Trio in E flat major, Opus 40, will be presented by Davenny, Barrows, and Urico Rossi, first violinist of the Quartet.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
AUG 6 1947

Dial Twists

For the first time in several year Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, better known as his "Choral Symphony," will be heard on the air in i entirety when it is broadcast ov WJZ-ABC from the Berkshire M sic Festival at 8.30 tonight. Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ will conduct. The solo parts will include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, basso. The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony. The broadcast will consum fifteen minutes more than the customary one-hour Boston Symphon programs.

Hambletonian On Radio

Tomorrow's racing of the Hambletonian Stakes at Goshen, N. Y is scheduled for broadcasting WCBS and affiliated Columb Broadcasting System stations. R Barber and Roy Shudt will jo forces for the occasion with Shu calling the actual race. The broadcast is scheduled for 4 to 4.25 p. during which time the result of first heat, slated for 3 p. m., will given along with a description the second heat. If a third hea necessary for a decision, it will broadcast between 5 and 5.15 p. Shudt plans to interview the w ning driver during Barber's reg broadcast on WCBS at 6.30 p. m

---

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 6 1947

Music Mountain Offers Variety

Music Mountain this week offers a wide variety to suit every possible musical taste, both in program material, and in assisting artists. Friday afternoon at 3 will see Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony and the members of the Gordon String Quartet in the lovely Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist in the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major.

On Sunday afternoon, at 4 o'clock the Gordon String Quartet will have as its guest artists, John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist, and director of the Hartford School of Music, at the Music Shed in Falls Village.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 6 - 1947

Beethoven Cycle Ends

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5 (AP)—Acclaimed by an audience of 8,000 Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded the Beethoven cycle at the Berkshire festival tonight with a performance of the eighth and ninth symphonies and the festival chorus of 185 voices singing Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL
AUG 6 - 1947

Brevard Music Festival Opens On August 15

Brevard. — The second annual Brevard Music Festival will begin Aug. 15 at the Summer Theatre Auditorium of the Transylvania Music School-Camp here.

The festival will be staged during two successive week-ends—Aug. 15-17 and Aug. 22-24—and will feature four well-known vocal and instrumental soloists and the Brevard Festival Symphony.

The entire festival will be under the direction of James Christian Pfohl, Winston-Salem native, who is director of music at Davidson College, founder of the Mint Museum Chamber Orchestra series in Charlotte and director of the Transylvania Music School-Camp.

All-Beethoven Program

The first program will be at 8 p.m. Friday, Aug. 15. The opening event will be an all-Beethoven program, featuring the festival orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pfohl, and Eugene Istomin, piano soloist. Mr. Istomin has been guest soloist twice with the Philadelphia Philharmonic-Symphony.

The second program of the first week-end will be presented at 8 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 16, when Adelaide Van Wey, contralto, will appear with the orchestra. The soloist is a native of Brevard and a former Salem College student.

The third program of the first series will feature Frances Yeend, soprano, with the orchestra. That event will be at 4 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 17. Miss Yeend was Koussevitzky's soloist in the 1946 performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the ~~Berkshire Festi~~val. She was also creator of the ~~leading~~ role in the new opera, "Peter Grimes."

Second Week-End Series

The second week-end series will begin at 8 p.m. Friday, Aug. 22, when Patricia Travers, young violinist, appears with the orchestra. Miss Travers has just returned from a concert tour of Europe.

At 8 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 23, the orchestra will be featured alone in a concert. The series will close at 4 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 24, when Julius Huehn, baritone, and Edna Phillips, soprano, appear with the orchestra in an all-operatic program. Miss Huehn is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company and Miss Phillips has been soloist with Toscanani in his NBC broadcasts.

The Brevard Music Festival is sponsored by the Brevard Music Festival Association of which Mrs. Menry N. Carrier is president

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
AUG 6 - 1947

NINTH CONCERT AT TANGLEWOOD IS BROADCAS

Eighth, Ninth Symphoni Wind Up Beethoven Series

By Willard M. Clark

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 6 - 1947

Varied Programs At Music Mountain

Music Mountain this week offers a wide variety to suit every possible musical taste, both in program material, and in assisting artists. Friday afternoon at 3 will see Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony and the members of the Gordon String Quartet in the lovely Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist in the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major. Mr. Demarest, a graduate of the Yale School of Music and the Curtis Institute, has studied extensively abroad. Since 1934 he has devoted himself to teaching piano at Hotchkiss School and concertizing.

On Sunday afternoon, at 4 o'clock the Gordon String Quartet will have as its guest artists, John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist, and director of the Hartford School of Music, at its concert at Music Mountain, Falls Village.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 6 1947

NINTH CONCERT AT TANGLEWOOD IS BROADCAST

ighth, Ninth Symphonies Wind Up Beethoven Series

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 5—An audience of untold thousands heard the ninth program in the current Tanglewood Festival Concerts tonight for it was broadcast in whole on the regular Tuesday night broadcast by the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra~~. It was a perfect program for broadcasting purposes as it included the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven, thus concluding the cycle of Beethoven concerts which have drawn fully 500 persons to Tanglewood.

Full of Humor

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony uses the modest orchestra of the Seventh. Neither trumpets nor drums are called for in the second movement. Beethoven in his first theme sets the character of the work in its graceful melodic simplicity. In place of the usual slow movement there is a delightful allegretto scherzando. It is short and full of humor. Beethoven lets loose his somewhat boisterous temperament, his capricious humor, in the finale. The inventions and fertility in this movement are never ending, yet its thematic material is slight. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a charming performance, wonderfully graceful and cognizant of the varying moods.

Beethoven's Ninth and final symphony, has become a tradition on Tanglewood concerts. The final chorale movement was sung by a student chorus, trained by Robert Shaw and the following soloists: Frances Yeend, soprano, who sang in "Peter Grimes" last year; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bas..

Schiller's "Ode to Joy" has seldom been more brilliantly sung than by this fine chorus and capable soloists. Mr. Shaw had trained his group to the Nth degree. The cruelly high tessitura was sung with amazing freedom from strain and the choirs were well balanced. Attacks were clean and one could even understand some of the words. The soloists were excellent, with Mr. Lloyd and Miss Yeend singing extremely well, and Miss Alberts and Mr. Pease making the most of their opportunities.

Variety of Tonal Color

It is seldom that one hears the chorale of the Ninth Symphony sung with so great a variety of tonal color. Pianissimi were really soft, while the crescendi were truly triple forte. The German text used seemed to give the singers greater vocal freedom, with the result that there was no feeling of throatiness or rigidity.

The orchestral movements were superbly played. Particularly eloquent was the reading of the adagio and the chorale theme given to the double basses was a piece of virtuoso playing which could not be equalled anywhere.

The concert Thursday night will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and the program will include the Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102" and the Schuman "Symphony No. 2 in C Major." Ruth Posselt, violinist, will play the Hindemith "Concert for Violin and orchestra."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 6 - 1947

Mitchell

BEETHOVEN SOLOISTS: A tremendous ovation was accorded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the chorus and soloists at the conclusion ~~of the Ninth Symphony~~ of Beethoven last night at Tanglewood. Called back repeatedly by the audience were the soloists, left to right, Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. The Ninth concluded the Beethoven series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1947

2 Soloists to Play With Gordon Quartet

Two guest soloists will appear with the Gordon String Quartet on Friday afternoon at 3 at Music Mountain, Falls Village. They are Louis Speyer, oboist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ~~Charles Demarest, Lakeville~~, Conn., pianist.

The program: Mozart, Oboe Quartet in F Major; Dvorak, Piano Quartet in E flat major; and "Three Pieces," Stravinsky.

The audience is cordially invited to the tea after the concert. Mrs. George P. Milmine will be hostess assisted by Mrs. Loudon Charlton and Miss Marjorie Schoudel.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG

Oboeist To Perform At Music Mountain Concert On Friday

Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony, and the members of the Gordon String Quartet will present the Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major as the feature of the performance at Music Mountain, Falls Village, Friday at 3.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist, presenting the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major.

Friday's program will be concluded by Stravinsky's "Three Pieces," repeated this year by popular request.

The Gordon String Quartet will have as guest artists on Sunday at 4 John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist and director of the Hartford School of Music.

The quartet alone will open the program with the Shubert Quartet in E flat major. The two guest artists will play together in John Verrall's Sonata for Horn and Piano.

After the intermission the performance of Brahms Horn Trio in E flat major, Opus 40, will be presented by Davenny, Barrows, and Urico Rossi, first violinist of the Quartet.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

AUG 6 1947

Dial Twists

For the first time in several years, Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, better known as his "Choral Symphony," will be heard on the air in its entirety when it is broadcast over WJZ-ABC from the Berkshire Music Festival at 8.30 tonight. Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ will conduct. The solo parts will include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, basso. The Festival Chorus, organized from students attending the Berkshire Music Center courses this summer and trained by Robert Shaw, also will be heard in the final movement of the symphony. The broadcast will consume fifteen minutes more than the customary one-hour Boston Symphony programs.

Hambletonian On Radio

Tomorrow's racing of the Hambletonian Stakes at Goshen, N. Y., is scheduled for broadcasting on WCBS and affiliated Columbia Broadcasting System stations. Red Barber and Roy Shudt will join forces for the occasion with Shudt calling the actual race. The broadcast is scheduled for 4 to 4.25 p. m., during which time the result of the first heat, slated for 3 p. m., will be given along with a description of the second heat. If a third heat is necessary for a decision, it will be broadcast between 5 and 5.15 p. m. Shudt plans to interview the winning driver during Barber's regular broadcast on WCBS at 6.30 p. m.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 6 1947

Music Mountain Offers Variety

Music Mountain this week offers a wide variety to suit every possible musical taste, both in program material, and in assisting artists. Friday afternoon at 3 will see Louis Speyer, oboeist with the Boston Symphony and the members of the Gordon String Quartet in the lovely Mozart Oboe Quartet in F major.

Charles Demarest of Lakeville will be the second guest artist in the Dvorak Piano Quartet in E flat major.

On Sunday afternoon, at 4 o'clock the Gordon String Quartet will have as its guest artists, John Barrows, French horn player with the Minneapolis Symphony, and Ward Davenny, pianist, and director of the Hartford School of Music, at the Music Shed in Falls Village.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1947

Beethoven Cycle Ends

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5 (AP)—Acclaimed by an audience of 8,000 ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded the Beethoven cycle at the Berkshire festival tonight with a performance of the eighth and ninth symphonies and the festival chorus of 185 voices singing Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

AUG 6 - 1947

Brevard Music Festival Opens On August 15

Brevard. — The second annual Brevard Music Festival will begin ug. 15 at the Summer Theatre uditorium of the Transylvania usic School-Camp here.

The festival will be staged durng two successive week-ends—ug. 15-17 and Aug. 22-24—and ill feature four well-known ocal and instrumental soloists d the Brevard Festival Symony.

The entire festival will be under e direction of James Christian ohl, Winston-Salem native, who director of music at Davidson llege, founder of the Mint Mum Chamber Orchestra series in arlotte and director of the Tranvania Music School-Camp.

All-Beethoven Program

he first program will be at 8 . Friday, Aug. 15. The opening nt will be an all-Beethoven gram, featuring the festival orstra, under the direction of Mr. l, and Eugene Istomin, piano soloist. Mr. Istomin has been guest soloist twice with the Philadelphia Philharmonic-Symphony.

The second program of the first week-end will be presented at 8 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 16, when Adelaide Van Wey, contralto, will appear with the orchestra. The soloist is a native of Brevard and a former Salem College student.

The third program of the first series will feature Frances Yeend, soprano, with the orchestra. That event will be at 4 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 17. Miss Yeend was Koussevitzky's soloist in the 1946 performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the ~~Berkshire Festival~~. She was also creator of the leading role in the new opera, "Peter Grimes."

Second Week-End Series

The second week-end series will begin at 8 p.m. Friday, Aug. 22, when Patricia Travers, young violinist, appears with the orchestra. Miss Travers has just returned from a concert tour of Europe.

At 8 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 23, the orchestra will be featured alone in a concert. The series will close a 4 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 24, whe Julius Huehn, baritone, and Edn Phillips, soprano, appear with th orchestra in an all-operatic pro gram. Miss Huehn is a membe of the Metropolitan Opera Com pany and Miss Phillips has bee soloist with Toscanani in his NB broadcasts.

The Brevard Music Festival sponsored by the Brevard Mus Festival Association of which Mr Menry N. Carrier is

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 6 - 1947

NINTH CONCERT AT TANGLEWOOD IS BROADCAST

Eighth, Ninth Symphonies Wind Up Beethoven Series

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 5—An audience of untold thousands heard the ninth program in the current Tanglewood Festival Concerts tonight for it was broadcast in whole on the regular Tuesday night broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a perfect program for broadcasting purposes as it included the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven, thus concluding the cycle of Beethoven concerts which have drawn fully 8500 persons to Tanglewood.

Full of Humor

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony uses the modest orchestra of the Seventh. Neither trumpets nor drums are called for in the second movement. Beethoven in his first theme sets the character of the work in its graceful melodic simplicity. In place of the usual slow movement there is a delightful allegretto scherzando. It is short and full of humor. Beethoven lets loose his somewhat boisterous temperament, his capricious humor, in the finale. The inventions and fertility in this movement are never ending, yet its thematic material is slight. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a charming performance, wonderfully graceful and cognizant of the varying moods.

Beethoven's Ninth and final symphony, has become a tradition on Tanglewood concerts. The final chorale movement was sung by a student chorus, trained by Robert Shaw and the following soloists: Frances Yeend, soprano, who sang in "Peter Grimes" last year; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bas.

Schiller's "Ode to Joy" has seldom been more brilliantly sung than by this fine chorus and capable soloists. Mr. Shaw had trained his group to the Nth degree. The cruelly high tessitura was sung with amazing freedom from strain and the choirs were well balanced. Attacks were clean and one could even understand some of the words. The soloists were excellent, with Mr. Lloyd and Miss Yeend singing extremely well, and Miss Alberts and Mr. Pease making the most of their opportunities.

Variety of Tonal Color

It is seldom that one hears the chorale of the Ninth Symphony sung with so great a variety of tonal color. Pianissimi were really soft, while the crescendi were truly triple forte. The German text used seemed to give the singers greater vocal freedom, with the result that there was no feeling of throatiness or rigidity.

The orchestral movements were superbly played. Particularly eloquent was the reading of the adagio and the chorale theme given to the double basses was a piece of virtuoso playing which could not be equalled anywhere.

The concert Thursday night will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and the program will include the Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102" and the Schuman "Symphony No. 2 in C Major." Ruth Posselt, violinist, will play the Hindemith "Concert for Violin and orchestra."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 5 - 1947

Local PEPPER
Box

THE KNOW-HOW

For every person who is ready to do [illegible] the eye, there is usually another who is willing to render advice, assistance, or generally offer you cheer and consolation in the face of trouble. That is what maintains the human balance. The gentleman who [illegible] as the latter at the Berkshire Music Festival this weekend was among the latter.

* * *

We never saw him before, and may not again, but he was a genial sort who helped make an already bright day even brighter. Although you sit cheek by jowl with other music lovers in the great shed at Tanglewood, the chances that you will become acquainted with your very near neighbors are remote. The people who go up to Lenox are there for the music, not stray conversation.

* * *

Just before intermission on Sunday, we reached in a trouser pocket for a handkerchief, and suddenly it registered on our subconscious that the automobile keys which should have been there were not. As unostentatiously as possible, we tried the other pockets. No key. The Beethoven sixth was coming to its final bars, and we postponed further search.

* * *

While the applause was still ringing, we poked about on the floor for the missing keys, with no success. Pausing in his enthusiastic reception of the music, the aforesaid gentleman came down to our level.

"Lose your glasses?" he asked in a kindly manner. We told him our troubles, and that was about all there was time for, because Joseph Battista, the young pianist, had come onto the stage for the Piano Concerto. For the moment, we forgot our keys.

* * *

At the intermission, we raced off for the car, hoping against hope that we had left the keys in the door and not in the switch, a habit we fall into about twice a year, and were relieved to find them in the door. We went back to our seat, where the gentleman seemed equally happy over our good fortune. He was so pleased that he told us a story. If you ever leave your keys in the switch, and lock them in your car, we offer his solution. It's not particularly practical for the average man, but it is one way of getting out of a difficulty.

* * *

"A few months ago," the gentleman began, after the fashion of an Arabian Nights narrator, "I had occasion to visit the state prison." (We didn't press him concerning his business. After all, he didn't ask us ours.)

"And I found myself in the predicament you were afraid of," he went on. "So I went back in to see the warden, and told him my trouble. Then, more or less jokingly, I asked him if he had anyone who could open a closed car.

* * *

"He said he probably had a couple of thousand men, and that he would pick two experts. It was their very facility in that field that had made them the unwilling guests of the institution. Both were specialists, and each had a different method. One worked from above, while the other had a system for getting in from the underneath. They made it a kind of contest, and the man who worked from the bottom up was the winner. He opened the car in six minutes, and I still don't know how he did it."

So-o-, if you ever lock yourself out of your car, and there is a state prison handy, your troubles are over.

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 6 - 1947

Best-Loved Music

News from the Tanglewood music festival, given each summer by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra at Lenox, Mass., is so different from other current news that it is worthy of attention just for contrast.

Polls are popular, and attendance at this summer's festival helps with an indication of the decided preferences of lovers of fine music in the East, who get to Tanglewood if they can possibly manage it.

Who is the composer of the best-loved music, and what are the most favored compositions? Attendance at concerts with varying programs may provide a fairly accurate answer.

Dr. Koussevitsky arranged for this summer a series of general programs, including symphonic works of classic and modern composers, and a cycle of four concerts devoted to the nine symphonies of Beethoven, with the fourth and fifth piano concertos included.

The general concerts were successful, with attendances averaging about 10,000 to 12,000 music lovers willing to endure the choking dust of parking lots and gravelled approach roads and the delays in getting away afterward. The first Beethoven concert, offering the first, second and third symphonies, drew fully as large an audience.

Then on the following Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon all records of the past were broken by attendances of 14,000 to 15,000 that almost overwhelmed the facilities of the parking lots. These were the high spots in Tanglewood history. What had the people come to hear?

To waste no words in telling, the great choice was Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a time-honored favorite that has lost none of its spell. At the conclusion Dr. Koussevitsky was given an ovation so fervent it seemed it wouldn't end. The Fifth or Emperor piano concerto was a close second in favor, and the Fourth concerto was next.

Experts in music may and probably will not agree that these three compositions are the greatest of all time. The point of the story is that Tanglewood audiences think they are; at least they like them best.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 6 - 1947

Beethoven 8th, 9th

8,000 Hear Last Concert of Cycle at Tanglewood

By Raymond Morin

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—The Beethoven cycle opened during the last week at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky concluded last night before an audience of 8,000 with performances of the eighth and ninth symphonies.

Apart from the inherently different characteristics of the even-and-odd-numbered works performed in this series, Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of their divergent styles last night remained consistent.

Notably in the opening movement of the eighth and the adagio of the ninth, there was a remarkable lucidity of thematic materials. Sensitive balances were achieved as well as individual intonation. There have been instances in preceding performances when orchestral color received preference over interpretative exactitudes, particularly with reference to rhythm. However, last night, even in the exposed horn solo of the minuet in the eighth, there was an impression of unfettered integration.

The finale of the eighth and rapid second movement of the ninth were marked by excellent approximations of tempo. In the first, the brief and abrupt statements were made with utter precision, and the structural complexities and rich instrumentation of the latter were pliantly molded.

The finale, in many respects, was the most impressive portion of the performance. It had amplitude, vigor and a large measure of expressive quality. Particularly worthy of notice was the beautiful pianissimo achieved by the strings in the first announcement by the orchestra in the "Hymn to Joy." In general, this fidelity to the mood and structure of the score was maintained until the close of the symphony. One had occasion to wish, however, that Dr. Koussevitzky had not retarded excessively certain passages for the solo quartet, giving his singers difficulty in spinning out their breath and the vocal line; and, on the other hand, accelerating the final difficult measures for chorus so that salient details were sometimes lost.

Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, basso, were the soloists; and all of them contributed good work, with Mr. Pease winning special honors for his firm, well-placed and widely ranged tones. The festival chorus was admirably prepared by Robert Shaw.

JAMAICA, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND PRESS

AUG 6 - 1947

Forest Hills Pianist Wins Canadian Honors

A Forest Hills youth, 19-year-old Burt Bacharach of 150 Burns street, has achieved the highest grade in a piano competition conducted throughout Canada, it was announced today by McGill University in Montreal.

Bacharach is a student at the conservatory there, but the contest was open to all musicians.

A graduate of Forest Hills High School, young Bacharach has been studying the piano "seriously" for only five years, his mother said today.

"Before that," she admitted, "he was more interested in sports."

In the summer of 1945, Bacharach toured Army camps and hospitals with a USO musical unit, the youngest solo pianist on the USO rolls.

Playing both classical and "swing," he conducted a dance band last summer in the Catskills, but this year he is enrolled at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Mass.

He will resume his studies at McGill in the fall.

Bacharach has been heard over WOV, and has several published songs to his credit.

The elder Bacharach is in public relations work and also conducts a WOV radio program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

AUG 6 - 1947

Music

Beethoven's 9th Climax Of Festival

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6.—The Beethoven cycle came to a dramatic and exciting end last evening here at Tanglewood, with the performance of the titanic Choral Symphony. Some 300 participants, including four solo singers, the Festival Chorus of about 200 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave everything they had to the human exhortings of Schiller and Beethoven.

The whole symphony, barring one or two places in the third movement where the pattern sagged in the middle somewhat, was performed with affecting warmth and a vigor of thought and emotion that had all 8000 listeners huddled in a tense excitement.

There had been a flowing beauty of the music in the first movement, a particular tenderness, as the idea of the whole work took shape and gradually developed. If this section of the piece is not its most attractive one musically then it is certainly on a par with any other. Its perfect balances and juxtapositions, the miracle of tone and contrasts, the ever fresh and moving themes and their growth to whole entities of humane thought, all these are difficult to find in any other work of Beethoven's in such perfect combination or, at the same time, so potently communicative.

Fugue Done Clearly.

The five voice fugue which opens the second movement was done clearly and elastically, without an iota's loss of either line or tempo. And the third movement, a deceivingly simple section, came through the orchestral web in a straightforward manner, if it did lose something, for a moment or two in continuity, owing principally to the seating of the orchestra.

Accomodating the huge forces on the stage required some shifting of the instrumental personnel. Dr. Koussevitzky had placed his basses and brasses to the right, his battery to the left, and, of course, his violins, violas and cellos down front and spreading inward and around. It was this arrangement, I believe, that caused some of the inner parts in the symphony to be lost in the shuffle, although this was not a common fault.

Trained to Perfection.

But the delivery of the last movement was simply superb. The soloists, Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, all sang the taxing lines expressively and in excellent voices. Mr. Pease, as a particular, intoned the powerful first line with a dramatic fervor that had the audience whispering audibly.

Robert Shaw had trained the Festival Chorus to perfection, the attacks, secure and accurately in tune, the interweaving lines sharply defined. In the whole joining of the parts the sound was enormously full and yet equally pure and effective.

Before the Ninth Dr. Koussevitzky had conducted the charming Eighth Symphony, which obtained a first rate rendering. All in all, quite a performance by the Bostonians, et al. And it may be repeated again and again that Dr. Koussevitzky, before the music of Beethoven, is a completely humble interpreter. Whatever one finds to disagree with takes nothing away from the fact that all is done with honesty, with dignity and in the spirit of service.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 6 - 1947

Beethoven Cycle Ends at Festival

Approximately 44,000 Listeners Attracted by Four Programs—Three Concerts Remain.

An estimated 8,500 persons at Tanglewood Lenox last night heard the Boston Symphony orchestra complete the "festival within a festival" which ran through the repertoire of Beethoven's symphonic works.

The graceful Eighth and the mighty Ninth symphonies comprised the program for this extra concert, the fourth in the Beethoven cycle which attracted an aggregate of approximately 44,000 listeners. There were 7,500 at the first Beethoven concert last Thursday evening, 14,000 at the second last Saturday night when all attendance records were broken at Tanglewood and 13,000 on Sunday afternoon, besides the 8,500 last night.

The ovation given Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra last evening, particularly at the conclusion of the stirring Ninth symphony, was almost as overwhelming as that of Saturday night even though the audience was only two-thirds as arge. The fact is that the measurable part of the demonstration t these concerts is the part that akes place within the shed, and for very concert this season the shed ith its seating capacity of about ,500 has been filled almost to the ast chair. The applause and shouts f those who listen from the lawns ends to disperse and so the conuctor and the musicians and their udience within the shed seem to ear as loud an ovation whether here have been 7,500 or 14,000 admissions registered at the gates.

In any case all who were on the rounds last night joined in what ould hardly have been a more pontaneous demonstration when he great climax of the magnificent Ninth Symphony had been concluded. It was a moving performance hat demonstrated, as have all the Beethoven concerts, the vast scope of the Boston orchestra's versatility and power.

Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd tenor, and James Pease, bass, were he soloists and Berkshire Music Center choral school students uner the direction of Robert Shaw performed the choral parts with the orchestra in the final movement of he Ninth Symphony into which Beethoven wrote music for the human voice, based on Schiller's "Ode to Joy." Mr. Shaw was called to he platform by Dr. Koussevitzky to share in the tribute of the audience.

As has been said before, the huge music shed, for all its excellent accoustics, is not kind to the solo voice, but the solo passages in the Beethoven Ninth are not extended, and the choral singing was effective.

Three more concerts now remain in the 1947 festival—those of Series "C" which will take place on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has completed plans to sail for Europe at the end of next week, will yield the baton for the first two of them, turning over the directorship on Thursday evening to Leonard Bernstein, who also conducted one of the concerts in Series "A," and on Saturday evening to Mr. Shaw, whose chorus will have a prominent part in the program. It will perform Mozart's "Requiem" and Poulenc's Chorus, while the orchestra will do Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." The Thursday evening program includes Haydn's B flat symphony, Hindemith's Violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and Schumann's Second, concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist and Schumann's Second symphony. On Sunday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky will return to the podium for the season's final concert at which the orchestra will perform Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra with two pianos, Ravel's "Pavane" and [illegible] and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F major.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

AUG 6 - 1947

Ninth Symphony Is Great Climax To Tanglewood Beethoven Cycle

The Beethoven cycle which has been a major part of this year's Berkshire Music Festival came to a great climax last night at a special concert, added to the regular series, in which Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Berkshire Festival chorus in Beethoven's tremendous Ninth Symphony.

The program, which also included the Eighth Symphony, started an hour earlier than usual so that the Ninth could be broadcast. A large crowd turned out to fill the big Tanglewood music shed and spill out on the wide lawns for what was called the first warm evening of the festival. A few raindrops threatened trouble during the intermission, but the shower moved to other parts and left a starlit sky for the concert-goers.

The particular advantage in a "cycle" of the works of one composer is that one hears compositions not often presented on the radio or on concert tours, which is where most of us are likely to hear them. The Festival this year offered all the Beethoven symphonies, in sequence, a marvelous opportunity for the music-lover to follow the development of the master composer. It was a special pleasure therefore to hear last night the Eighth Symphony, with its delicate second movement, and the gentle horns of the minuet. One becomes sharply aware of Beethoven's mastery of all moods and avenues of expression. The 8th is a "lovely" symphony and provides a refreshing view of the composer in full development and reaching the height of his individuality.

The Ninth Symphony, though much more well known, is still not heard often enough, because it is such a big undertaking, requiring a chorus and a quartet of soloists who must be of first rank to merit partnership with this greatest of all symphonies. This is the second time, to our knowledge, that it has been given at Tanglewood, the first being during the opening season of the big music shed.

At that time a chorus was imported from Boston. Last night Dr. Koussevitsky had his own Berkshire chorus, made up of students at his summer music school at Tanglewood and exquisitely trained by Robert Shaw. When one recalls that the festival is only ten years old, the progress from those first open-air concerts to the manifold musical institution now established at Lenox is really amazing. The presence of the festival chorus in Beethoven's Ninth last nigth seemed a sort of milestone of which Dr. Koussevitzky must be most proud.

We can imagine no greater symphonic accomplishment than this Ninth symphony of Beethovens. Inanely one wonders what, if he had lived, he could have put into a 10th, after pouring out such a heartful of feeling and such fabulous wealth of melody and textural inventiveness.

From the first, one is hypnotized by the opening pianissimo notes and then the echoing calls of the first movement, rising to the rumbling of drums and a clarion climax, then establishing itself in a rich fabric in which volume, tempo, instrumental emphasis vary in a fascinating pattern. The second movement, certainly some of the most exciting music Beethoven ever composed, challenges even today's "moderns" to equal his originality. Here is complicated rhythm defying the foot-tapper, sudden breathless halts, dazzling melodies, that have yet to be matched by the later romanticists or "color" artists.

Then one glides into the andante, the strings setting the pace for the horns to follow. Here is elegance and serenity, in sharp relief to the restlessness of the second movement and the stirring music to come, yet in its dignity of a piece with the whole majestic work.

The fourth and final movement is the musical and emotional triumph in which orchestra and voice pour out Schiller's Ode to Joy. One cannot say enough about the splendid precision and depth of the festival chorus, in which Kenneth Josephson of Holyoke was a member. The soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, baritone. It takes a powerful baritone to project fully that famous melody through the big music shed, after the orchestra has built it up gradually from whispering horns to the full ensemble, without anti-climax, and Mr. Pease has enough voice to do it. Miss Yeend was a special pleasure to hear, and the quartet and chorus worked beautifully together.

It was a magnificent climax in every way.

It was a magnificent climax in every way.

The Festival is nearing the end of its tenth season. There are only three concerts left, Thursday night, Saturday night, and Sunday afternoon. All attendance records have been broken this year with a figure of more than 100,000 for the 15 concerts, and as many as 14,000 at one performance. The music school drew 425 students from 40 states and 15 other countries. There were, beside the major concerts, dozens of concerts by the student orchestra and chamber music groups, and the presentation of an opera. On Sunday, plans for the eleventh season will be announced. As the festival prepares for its second decade it holds a position second to none in the world. By A. B. M.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 6 - 1947

Great Performance by Chorus Features Conclusion of Beethoven Symphony Series

7000 Attend Concert in Tanglewood Shed

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

FESTIVAL GUEST: Miss Katharine Cornell, noted actress, was among the 7000 at last night's extra Festival concert. She is seated with her agent, Francis Robinson, who has been on loan to the Festival for more than a month.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed the performance of all nine Beethoven symphonies within six days by the rendition of the last two last night in the Shed at Tanglewood. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra, the chorus, and Robert Shaw, who had prepared them, and the soloists were accorded a tremendous ovation at the final note of the great choral work by the 7000 attending.

Starting last Thursday evening and continuing through the reguar two week-end concerts, the first seven were performed, and this extra evening last night was utilized to include the final two. The eighth was played with the customary thorough understanding which characterizes the fundamental conception and the execution of all the favorites of the orchestra's repertory. A wealth of color and variety coupled with a completely satisfying sense of line and proportion placed the symphony in the category of one of Koussevitzky's best accomplishments.

Chorus at Very Best

But the evening reached its climax, as, indeed, did the whole Beethoven series, in the famous ninth, and narrowing it down still further, in the final choral movement. Never at Tanglewood has a chorus performed with more incisive and clean attacks and releases, with more vivid and youthfully powerful tone, with greater security in their inflections and in every detail which marks the training under an expert. The recognition accorded Robert Shaw, along with the others who contributed to the triumphal performance, evidently was tempered by a great personal regard and affection, for the members of the chorus were as vociferous in their participation in that feature of the evening as was the huge and demonstrative audience.

From the early cello recitatif which the Boston cello section did with such full tone and unlimited liberation, through the nostalgic references to the earlier movements, right up to the principal theme, Koussevitzky constructed the movement with a cumulative effect in mind. He exaggerated the tone value on the diminishing side of this opening theme. He allowed his cellos a bare three fingers of bow, and scarcely any more to the basses. From there on one could see the movement grom as it approached the entrance of the voices. James Pease, the bass of the quartet of soloists, was majestically impressive in his initial declamation and David Lloyd, tenor, was splendidly dramatic and vocally rich in his later solo. The soprano, Frances Yeend and the contralto, Eunice Alberts, dominated their most rewarding opportunity in the concerted episode just before the coda.

Koussevitzky Dons Tail Coat

Dr. Koussevitzky replaced the white Tuxedo jacket he wore for the eighth symphony with a black tail coat and white tie for the Ninth which came after the intermission. Lacking an explanation it seemed like a gesture of reverence he patently holds for this last of the Beethoven symphonies. Certain it is that he gave it all the spacious glory its lofty pages permit and raised the performance to a plane to which only music, of all the arts, can aspire.

This concert marked a milestone in Tanglewood history, as it would have done on any schedule. All the Beethoven symphonies consecutively and within the space of less than a week is a formidable task. Its achievement in such glory is a memorable event, and a mark of the orchestra's conductor. Much as he blueprinted the performance of the great final choral movement of the ninth symphony in which Schiller's "Ode to Joy," is used as the text, Koussevitzky has planned much of his career. Just as he had an eye for the later goal and climax when he kept the cellos and basses so contained in their early theme, so has he had an eye for the future in so much of what he has attempted. Whether it was the Boston orchestra, Tanglewood, or the Berkshire Music Center, he has been a builder. As this festival goes into its final trio of concerts on Thursday evening, it becomes increasingly apparent what his personality, vision and drive have done for all the ventures into which he has entered.

Thursday evening's program will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Robert Shaw will do the Saturday evening concert and Dr. Koussevitzky will resume his baton for the closing concert on Sunday afternoon.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 6 - 1947

Concludes Beethoven Cycle at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Wednesday—Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony concluded the Beethoven cycle at Tanglewood with performances last night of the Eighth and Ninth symphonies.

An audience of eight thousand heard the following soloists i the choral movement of th ninth: Frances Yeend, soprano Eunice Alberts, contralto; Davi Lloyd, tenor; James Pease bass.

Divergent Style

The differing characteristic of the even and odd-numbered works heard in this cycle not only have been apparent from a structural point of view but also from Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of their divergent styles.

It is true that in preceding performances, there have been instances when orchestral color received preference over interpretive exactitudes and the resources of the Boston Symphony would seem to explain this approach but not condone it.

Notably in the opening movement of the Eighth and the Adagio of the Ninth, there was an unusually lucid presentation of thematic materials. Sensitive balances were achieved as well as individual intonation. Even in the exposed horn solo, an important fragment of the Eighth's minuet, there was an impression of unfettered integration.

Precision

The finale of the Eighth and the rapid second movement of the Ninth were marked by excellent approximations of tempi. In the first the brief and abruptly stated phrases were molded with utter precision, and the structural complexities of the Ninth were pliantly knit.

The finale, in many respects, was the most impressive portion of the performance. It has amplitude, vigor and a large measure of expressive quality. Particularly worthy of notice was the beautiful pianissimo achieved by the strings in the first announcement by the Hymn of Joy. In general, this fidelity to the mood and structure of the score was maintained until the close of the symphony. One had occasion to wish, however, that Dr. Koussevitzky had not retarded excessively certain passages for solo quartet, giving his singers difficulty in spinning out their breath and the vocal line; and, on the other hand, accelerating the final difficult measures for chorus so that salient details were sometimes lost.

The soloists all contributed good w[illegible] Mr. Pease winning s[illegible] honors for firm, well pl[illegible] and widely ranged tones. T[illegible] chorus was admirab[illegible] prepared by Robert Shaw.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE

AUG 6 - 1947

* * *

R.C.A. Victor has released recordings of the most important portions of Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet;" this album contains four discs, comprising the first, second, fourth and seventh movements from the second of two suites arranged by the composer when he found the original form of the ballet too lengthy.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony give this brilliant music a superb recording.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1947

TANGLEWOOD OPERA IS WELL RECEIVED

Boris Goldovsky, Director, Wins Special Praise in U. S. Bow of Mozart's 'Idomeneo'

By NOEL STRAUS

Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5—Mozart's opera seria, "Idomeneo," in three acts and six scenes, received its American premiére last night in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood, where it was presented by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The magnificent work made a profound impression, and was performed in a highly praiseworthy manner, redounding greatly to the credit of all of the participants.

For the privilege of hearing the masterpiece the musical public owes a debt of gratitude primarily to Serge Koussevitzky, who made the presentation possible, and to Mr. Goldovsky, leading spirit in the courageous and eminently successful venture.

"Idomeneo," which ranks as Mozart's greatest achievement in the field of opera seria, was the result of a commission given to him by the elector, Karl Theodor, in 1780, to compose a work in that category for the carnival season of 1781 in Munich. The writing of the libretto was entrusted to Giambattista Varesco, court-chaplain of Salzburg, who is generally believed to have based his Italian text on a French "Tragedie Lyrique" by Danchet, which was set to music by Andre Campra and reached performance in 1712 in Paris.

Saint-Foix, the eminent Mozart authority, however, has expressed the opinion that Varesco may have drawn his material as plausibly from French dramas on the same subject, written respectively, by Crebillon in 1703 and the Lemierre in 1764.

Mozart began composing "Idomeneo" in October, 1780, in Salzburg, and finished it, ballet and all, in January, 1781, where it was first given on the twenty-ninth of that month. Though warmly received at its premiére, it was soon abandoned and ever since has had only sporadic hearings. Except for an amateur performance in 1786, for which Mozart provided an altered and shortened version, the opera was not given again until 1805. It was staged for several seasons in Dresden, starting in 1854, and in 1931 a version by Richard Strauss was produced in Vienna and another by Wolf-Ferrari in Munich, while a third version in English was given in 1938 in London.

Though it has been overshadowed by its composer's work in the realm of opera Buffa and the Singspiel, "Idomeneo" was a favorite work of Mozart himself and deserves his high estimate of it. If the influence of Gluck's "Alceste" and "Iphigenia in Aulis" is definitely evidenced in the superb overture, and in several of the greatest of the choruses and the music of the oracle, and though French opera has left its mark on many another page, "Idomeneo" is prevailingly Italianate. Even in the Gluckian parts the work is completely Mozartean in essence, everywhere displaying his unique sensitivity, subtlety of imagination, and meaningful use of colors and harmonies that fluctuate with every slightest alteration of mood.

Nowhere in all opera is more dramatic choral music to be found than that at the close of the second act of this work, or a chorus of more awesome lugubriousness than breaks forth when Idomeneo, the Cretan king, returned from the Trojan War, declares that his son, Idamante, is the victim he has vowed to sacrifice to Neptune.

For its astounding choral writing alone "Idomeneo" would be worthy of frequent hearings. No two of the choruses are alike, and they cover the widest range of emotion, from the joy and serenity of the enchantingly graceful "Placido e il Mar" to the anguish of the strikingly original "Pieta" of the shipwrecked sailors.

Never was Mozart to write a finer operatic ensemble than the great quartet in this opera, or more remarkable accompanied recitatives, while Idomeneo's "prayer," with its striking pizzicato accompaniment has a quality all of its own among the composer's creations.

Ilia's tender and appealing arias form a marvelous contrast to the vehemence and forcefulness of those alotted Elettra in the first and third acts.

The orchestration of this work is a treasure-mine of novel and fascinating combinations and effects. In no other opera of Mozart is the instrumental scoring so rich in color and so daring.

Mr. Goldovsky's revision of the opera is enthralling to a present-day audience. As he explained to the audience, he considered Idomeneo's involvement with the forces of nature and the sacrifices that had to be made to avoid destruction by them, akin to our own problem today. This being the central idea of the opera, he made all else subservient to it to maintain an unbroken dramatic line.

The performance did the opera justice, being colorful, alive and intense, and despite any vocal deficiencies on the part of the singers of the cast, all of the roles were in the hands of youthful artists, who entered fully into the spirit of the music with its formidable demands.

Joseph Laderoute in the title role gave a manly account of the music, doing especially laudable singing in the "Prayer." Nancy Trickey sang Ilia musically and expressively. Paula Lechner gave a fiery account of Elettra's great third act aria, disclosing a voice of fine quality under excellent control in her soft passage in the "Placido e il Mar" chorus, though forcing the tone to its disadvantage elsewhere, a fault also of the other principals, including Ann Bollinger as Idamante. The high priest and the second priest were in the capable hands of Frank Guarrera and Robert Holland, respectively.

The chorus sang excellently and, under Mr. Goldovsky's expert stage direction, had learned to move about in a natural way, unusual on the opera stage, and form groupings that could be commended for beauty of composition. The settings by Richard Rychtarik were effective, especially that employed in the scene of the shipwreck.

But the chief praise should be reserved for Mr. Goldovsky, by whose hard work the production was whipped into shape, and who conducted with an understanding and feeling for the score and a sure authority that made every moment of the presentation a musical delight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 6 - 1947

389 New Authorities Tell Us What's What In The Music World

By ROBERT SYLVESTER

The Billboard, a trade magazine which would rather take a poll than sell a slot machine, has been decent enough to straighten out the situation in popular music with its current issue.

This week The Billboard prints the results of its First Annual Disc Jockeys' Poll. As Dave Clark used to say, don't miss it if you can.

Admitting that it polled more than 1,800 jockeys and got 389 answers, the magazine explains that the music trade should be greatly influenced by the poll as the disc jockeys "are daily becomig more powerful disc, song and talent builders." Since the jocks can only play what record companies choose to record it's a little difficult to figure just how they build any talent, but we won't quibble about this.

Also, the magazine proudly states that even though the questionnaire was fairly complicated, almost all the replies were painstakingly completed. Where there were blanks, the blanks were explained away on the grounds of "didn't know rather than didn't care." This is indeed strange, since almost every disc jockey knows all there is to know about almost everything.

The Happy Winners.

Anyway, the disc jockeys decided that Eddy Howard's "To Each His Own" was the greatest all-around record of the year. That's what the disc jockeys think. They also think that Stan Kenton's "Artistry Jumps" was the best hot jazz of the year and that Frankie Carle's "Carle Boogie" was second best. Frankie Carle may not be the most monotonous piano player in the world, as he sounds to this writer, but he also ain't the second best boogie or hot jazz artist, either. No matter if 389 disc jockeys do say so.

In the classical field, the Boston "Pops" is the best orchestra, nosing out the Boston Symphony. Billboard explains that the Pops outfit is "composed of many musicians from the runner-up Boston Symphony Ork." Bing Crosby is the best male vocalist, Dinah Shore the best gal singer and Lauritz Melchior tops on heavy stuff, the jocks decided. Stuart Foster and June Christy are the best band vocalists and the Pied Pipers the best singing group. The jocks also picked the leaders in various other classifications, ranging from Kiddy Albums to Folk Songs.

The Newest Wonder.

There can be no doubt that at this date the disc jockeys are the last word in music. One record company makes special vinylite, never-fade copies for the jockeys and the promotional pressure at times must be pretty severe. Any time a record company comes up with a new discovery most of the local jocks go right into action.

They are in action at the moment "building the talent" of a gal named Nellie Lutcher, the latest wunderkind unearthed by Capital. To an ignoramus like the writer Miss Lutcher is a singer of the garble-it-around style who also plays a very bad righthanded piano. But the jockeys have already got her on the upbeat and Barney Josephson, another great talent scout, has booked her into one of his saloons.

Mel Torme is a disc jockey promotion and so is the up-and-coming Frankie Lane. So were most of the Sinatra imitators. There can be no doubt, as Billboard says, that the boys are a force in the music business.

It seems a shame that a few of them still confine themselves to music. There are so many things they could be an authority on, too. Most of the jocks, of course, have discovered that it is just as easy to be an authority on everything as on music. There's a youth on mornings for CBS who last year discovered Helen Hayes couldn't act, advised his listeners on what shows were worth seeing, analyzed the political news, reviewed books, and gave out valuable style hints for the gals. He was so busy being an expert on everything that he only had time for one or two records.

He did—and still does—all this heavy work early in the morning. In the afternoon, presumably, he takes his rightful place as chairman of the network's board of directors.

"Just In Passing"

Frances O'Connell Corridan

Feast Days:

July 31—St. Ignatius
August 1—St. Peter's
2—St. Alphonsus
3—10th Sunday post Pent.
4—St. Dominic
5—Lady of the Snows
6—Transfiguration

DAYS TO BE

These things shall be,—a loftier race
Than e'er the world hath known shall rise
With flame of freedom in the souls,
And light of knowledge in their eyes.

(Symonds)

Tanglewood; Then and Now

No one has counted the suns that have set and the moons that have risen, the springs that have bloomed and the snows that have fallen since Tanglewood was first given its provocative name.

There was a yet unknown Tanglewood, where a lover of the Berkshire hills made, over a century ago, his summer home. This was the Tanglewood soon to be famous, to which the owner brought his friend Nathaniel Hawthorne, who out of a brief sojourn deep in these hills was to give the world—at least the American world—the beloved Tanglewood Tales.

Years passed and from a Tanglewood dormant so long emerged Tanglewood, summer capital of music for music lovers with the classics interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Soon it outgrew its quarters and the facilities there as it commanded attention of the most critical, pleased the most captious, visioned for itself a greater mission.

Then came the Music Shed, the longer season, the increased number of concerts, the music lovers from across the world, days of the idyl, the dreaming, and the work, the pioneering, the hand-to-the-wheel days were over. Tanglewood's success is assured; it is self-assured. Tens of thousands come now each summer to hear and to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra as conducted by Dr. Kousevitsky, listening to the magnificent music under the suspect condition of the music shed, or hearing it while sitting or stretched out, singly or in congenial groups on the wide lawns under the stars.

No longer now are all the guests experienced musicians, struggling artists soon to be heard from, earnest students or the instinctive lovers of music. The bright crowds are sprinkled with poseurs, attention seekers whose chief claim to attention is eccentric dress for Tanglewood now—too well known, perhaps, is a journey, a place to be seen, a place to have been. This, however, is incidental; for when night approaches, and the stage is lit, the musicians take their places and the first notes of music break upon the air, quiet succeeds restlessness, personalities fade in the darkness. The pulse of the music throbs in the darkness. It is music then, music only, music under the stars.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL

AUG 6 - 1947

Photo by H. F. Babbitt, Jr.

TANGLEWOOD STUDENTS MAKE opera history. This shows close of first act of the first American performance of Mozart's opera "Idomeno" in the Berkshire Music Center. The final performance is tonight. Boris Goldovsky conducts. The Music Center, not Shed in Tanglewood, was scene of the pr

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 6 - 1947

START INSTRUMENT COLLECTION: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receives from Constance Keene and Abram Chasins, concert pianists, two instruments to start a Tanglewood collection for use by students whose instruments are inferior or who cannot afford to buy them. Miss Keene is holding her gift—a 150-year-old violin, while Mr. Chasins holds a century-old cello for the collection. Miss Keene, a scholarship pupil at the Berkshire Music Center in 1941, and her teacher, Mr. Chasins, a member of the first faculty of the school in 1940, made the presentations in honor of Koussevitzky's 73d birthday.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT

AUG 7 1947

WITH AN ATTENDANCE

. . . of more than 146,000 for all events including chamber music concerts and rehearsals the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., came to an end last Sunday night. This, the 10th season, showed an increase of 21,000 over last year. There was an audience of more than 12,000 present at the final concert and Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra received a demonstration unsurpassed and seldom equalled at Tanglewood.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 7 - 1947

The Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. will end Sunday. The festival has been under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who will also direct the 11th season next July and August.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 7 - 1947

Scholarships To Berkshire Music Center Provided

Four deserving music students of a potential 200 will be provided with scholarships to the Berkshire Music Center as the result of the first day's sales of the new Berkshire radio-phonograph induced at a special concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week at Tanglewood.

The new instrument, designed by RCA Victor to custom-built standards and which for the first time provides music reproduction covering the range of human hearing from 30 to 15,000 cycles, has been placed on display at the Brotherhood club, Walker street, Lenox.

Initial purchasers were: Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Center Harbor, N. H.; A. W. Dicks, Springfield, Mass.; and Joseph L. Shapiro, New York city.

A silver plaque, inscribed to the purchaser as a scholarship donor and signed by Serge Koussevitzky, will be affixed to each instrument.

RCA Victor plans to make available a limited subscription of 200 Berkshire instruments, the sales of which will make possible a similar number of scholarships. Demonstrations of the instruments will be presented at the Brotherhood club until Aug. 16.

BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
8/7/47

MUSIC MOUNTAIN TO OFFER VARIED MU

Guest Artists Include Oboeist, Pia and French Horn Player

Music Mountain at Falls Vill Conn., this week offers a variety suit many musical tastes, both in gram material, and in assisting ists. Friday afternoon at 3:00 o'c will see Louis Speyer, oboeist the Boston Symphony, and the m bers of the Gordon String Qua in the lovely Mozart Oboe Qua in F major. This is the first a woodwind has joined the string Music Mountain this season.

Charles Demarest, of Lake Conn., will be the second guest ist in the Dvorak Piano Quarte E flat major. Mr. Demarest, a g uate of the Yale School of Music the Curtis Institute, has studied tensively abroad. Since 1934 he devoted himself to teaching pian Hotchkiss School and concert w Stravinsky's sad little tale a circus performer, entitled "T Pieces," received with so much husiasm last year that it is repe by request, rounds out Friday a noon's concert.

On Sunday afternoon at o'clock, the Gordon String Qua will have as its guest artists, J Barrows, French horn player the Minneapolis Symphony, Ward Davenny, pianist and dire of the Hartford School of Music. Quartet alone will open the prog with the delightfully melodious S bert Quartet in E flat major. the two guest artists will be he together in John Verrall's Sonata horn and piano.

After the intermission the formance of Brahms Horn Trio flat major, Opus 40, will mark reunion of three friends who st at the Yale School of Music toge —Ward Davenny, John Barrows Urico Rossi, the first violinist of Gordon String Qpartet.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

AUG 7 - 1947

* * *

Prokofieff Nods

PROKOFIEFF has become such a master that his Romeo and Juliet Suite No. 2 comes as rather a shock, for in it he cavorts as clumsily as his colleague, Shostakovich. Surely this is no more than coarse fun at the expense of Mister Shakespeare.

The ballet was written in 1935, while Prokofieff was trying to adjust himself to the conditions obtaining in Russia, to which he had returned after an absence of 15 years. Perhaps that accounts for its sense of strain, its heavy-handed humor, its vulgar themes.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present four numbers from the second suite extracted from the ballet. They're played with zest and brilliant polish, and the recording is first-rate. (RCA-Victor 1129; 2 12-inch).

* * *

Miss Pons Again

TO THE considerable volume of recorded specimens of Lily Pons' artistry is now added an album entitled "Chansons." In this she snubs her coloratura self, for the most part, to sing French art songs. Most of these are delightful and they are presented delicately and gracefully.

Included are Bachelet's "Chere nuit," Faure's "Les Roses d'Ispahan" and "Apres un reve," four songs by Milhaud based on verses of Ronsard and Duparcs "L'Invitation au voyage." Accompaniments are provided by orchestras under Andre Kostelanetz and Maurice Abravanel. That Miss Pons hasn't entirely forsworn vocal athleticism is evident in Milhaud's "Tais-toi, Babillarde," a perfectly horrible little thing. (Columbia 689; 3 12-inch).

[207]

HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

7 - 1947

ROMEO AND JULIET: PROKOFIEFF

This new recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for RCA Victor is bound to be a shock to those who have always thought of Romeo and Juliet as something sweet and tender. The cacaphony of the opening movement, which represents the feud of the Capulets and Montagues, is carried through the entire composition so that there is not a single moment of music that is conventionally used to portray the gentle passion. Instead, there is a steady use of revolutionary ideas that seem to follow the Soviet plan of using the veto against everything—even pleasant musical sounds. The section titled "Romeo and Juliet's Grave" is more a portrayal of lost souls in Hades than of the peace that the lovers are supposed to have found united at last in death. Perhaps there is a place for the work as pure musical composition, but the title is a travesty on the accepted versions of this best-loved of all the tragedies. There is nothing here to challenge the position held by the Tchaikowsky composition of the same name with which it should never, never be confused.

NEEDLE CHATTER

Question: What is the difference between a dischord and a dissonance?

Answer: A dischord is a single unharmonious chord; a dissonance is a dischord that dissolves into or is directly followed by a chord or pattern that is harmonious.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 7 - 1947

Series C Concerts Will Open Tonight

Third and Final Series of 1947 Berkshire Festival Season to Open with Guest Conductor.

[illegible] the third [illegible] 1947 Berk- [illegible] will be given [illegible] this evening [illegible] Serge Kousse- [illegible] Boston Symphony orchestra [illegible] surrendering the [illegible] conductor for the second time in Tanglewood history.

His protege, Leonard Bernstein, who conducted one of the concerts [illegible] first series, will occupy the podium again tonight to lead the orchestra in its performance of Haydn's B flat symphony and Schumann's Second symphony in C major, and with Ruth Posselt [illegible] Hindemith's violin concerto.

Seats [illegible] available, it was announced at Tanglewood today, for both [illegible] evening's concert and that of Saturday evening but the huge [illegible] shed is sold out for the [illegible] of the 1947 season [illegible] on Sunday afternoon [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. At the Saturday evening program, Robert Shaw, director of the choral department of the Berkshire Music Center will conduct. The program will include Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Hiel;" Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem" with the Music Center chorus taking part [illegible] four soloists who were [illegible] Beethoven's Ninth symphony Tuesday evening, Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, also taking part. The Sunday afternoon program will include Martinu's Concerto grosso for chamber orchestra with two pianos, Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero" and, as the final number of the season, Tschaikovsky's great Fourth symphony in F minor. The piano soloists who will perform the Martinu work with the orchestra are Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 8 - 1947

Berkshire Students List Three Concerts

Three concerts will be given this weekend by students of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood: Tonight at 8:15 a symphony program in the Festival shed; on Saturday afternoon at 2:30 opera scenes will be played; and on Sunday morning at 10:30 the last student program of the season, prepared by William Primrose, will be held in the chamber music hall.

Music Center, not as scene of the pren

BARRINGTON,

IER
47

MOUNTAIN TO ER VARIED MUS

ts Include Oboeist, Pia
French Horn Player

ountain at Falls Vill week offers a variety musical tastes, both in erial, and in assisting y afternoon at 3:00 o'cl ouis Speyer, oboeist Symphony, and the m e Gordon String Qua
ely Mozart Oboe Qua or. This is the first d has joined the string
untain this season.
Demarest, of Lakev be the second guest
Dvorak Piano Quarte or. Mr. Demarest, a g e Yale School of Music Institute, has studied abroad. Since 1934 he mself to teaching pian
School and concert w ky's sad little tale a performer, entitled "T eceived with so much ast year that it is rep
, rounds out Friday
cert.
nday afternoon at
he Gordon String Qu
as its guest artists,
French horn player neapolis Symp venny, pianist a rtford School of lone will open t delightfully melo rtet in E flat n
guest artists w in John Verrall's
piano.
the intermission of Brahms Hor
r, Opus 40, wi three friends
e School of Mu avenny, John F
, the first viol tring Quartet.

d Juliet rts as e than ying to he had for its present

They're st-rate.

ns'
he ngs.
and pa-of are rais

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 7 - 1947

Bernstein To Conduct Tonight At Opening of Final Series

The opening concert of the third and last series of the Berkshire Festival season will be played tonight at 8.15 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Leonard Bernstein, first guest conductor at Tanglewood, taking the baton for the second time.

The program will include Haydn's symphony in B flat, Hindemith's violin concerto and Schumann's symphony Number 2 in C major. Ruth Posselt will be the soloist.

Miss Posselt, who has appeared with the orchestra at Tanglewood before, was born in Medford of musical parents. Beginning the study of violin at the age of three, she made her first public appearance in Jordan Hall, Boston, in her sixth year and her debut in Carnegie Hall, New York, at the age of nine.

After winning the Schubert Memorial Prize in 1929, she went to Europe for the first of six tours, including appearances with major orchestras in Amsterdam, Holland, Paris, Le[illegible], Moscow and Stockholm. [illegible] season of 1935-36 she ret[illegible] America for a transcontin[illegible]ur, appearing as soloist with [illegible] New York, Boston Chicago, Detroit, Washington, Cincinnati and St. Louis orchestras. She has played on several occasions with the Boston Orchestra in Boston, New York, and New Haven.

Programs for the week end follow:

Saturday 8.15 PM
Robert Shaw conducting

Cantata No. 50—Nun ist das Heil	Bach
Symphony of Psalms	Stravinsky
Requiem	Mozart

Soloists—Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

Sunday, 3.30 PM
Serge Koussevitzky conducting

Concerto Gross for chamber orchestra, with 2 pianos	Martinu
Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, soloists
Pavane	Ravel
Bolero	Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F minor	Tchaikovsky

Seats are on sale at the box office for the concerts tonight and Saturday. No tickets remain for the closing program on Sunday. A large audience is expected to listen from the lawn

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
AUG 7 - 1947

Mozart's 'Idomeneo' Given at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Thursday—Students of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood gave the premiere American performances of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo," on Monday and last night. Boris Goldovsky was musical and stage director.

Unlike the average company which deplores the presence of critics at its dress rehearsal, an audience of critics and others were invited to attend the dress rehearsal Sunday night. At that time, some of the critics recorded their views. Others reviewed the Monday night performance, and still another group, including this writer, elected to reserve opinions until last night when the production presumably would be at its best.

Render Service

The Berkshire Center, and Mr. Goldovsky in particular, have rendered an important service in rescuing this important work from obscurity. It is a Mozart, unknown here and almost everywhere else. He has been heretofore been entirely associated with opera buffa and the singpiel, but in this work he invaded a serious field.

The composer was commissioned to write "Idomeneo" and accomplished the task in 1780-81. Since then it has had sporadic revivals, the last being in London in 1938. However, Mozart had no attitude of extra curriculum about this opera; in fact it was one of his favorites.

The Story

The scene is laid on the Island of Crete. The story concerns the tragic consequences surrounding King Idomeneo who is about to return from the Trojan wars after an absence of several years. Ilia, the daughter of the vanquished king, is in love with Idomeneo's son Idamante. Elletra (daughter of Agamemnon) is also in love with him. To please Ilia who interests him, Idamante frees the Trojan slaves, which enrages her rival.

A terrific storm at sea jeopardizes Idomeneo's fleet, and in order to appease the god Neptune, Idomeneo promises to sacrifice the first human being he shall meet on land. It is Idamante. To solve this situation, it is decided that Idamante is to leave with Elletra for her native Argos, and again a storm breaks, reminding Idomeneo of his promise. The story ends with Elletra's suicide, Idomeneo's destruction, and a happy ending for Idamante and Ilia.

Highly Sensitized

Whether the major opera companies will add this production to their repertory is a question. If so, it will have to be depleted as much as it was last night, which was considerable. The music is unmistable Mozart, and mature Mozart at that. It is highly sensitized, and fluctuations of mood are as apparent in the musical essence as the pictorial and dramatic impressions. Its main limitations are a stilted style of presenting its narrative, and awkward entrances of the chorus.

The best that can be said of the orchestral performance is that it was adequate. The problem was one of intonation—flimsy-sounding strings and insecure brasses.

Too Ornate

The sets were ridiculously ornate and out of step with the inherent simplicity dictated by historical requirements. As in last season's "Peter Grimes," the background of moving clouds was inevitable, and again they were conspicuous enough to be distracting. In fact, too much detail was condensed on a small stage with cumbersome effect. The costumes were ornate but hardly imaginative.

The principals and chorus performed their tasks conscientiously. Joseph Laderoute sang the title role persuasively. Nancy Trickey was a musically and dramatically ingratiating Ilia. Except for a tendency to force her tones and to overdramatize, Paula Lenchner was a fiery Elletra. Dorothy Dawson, not too secure of tone but pleasantly lyric, was an ornamental Idamante.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 7 - 1947

Replica of Hawthorne's House Will Be Dedicated Next Year

Mrs. Guy Gannett Announces Plan To Christen Building at Special Federation Day at Music Center in 1948

The replica at Tanglewood of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "little red cottage" will be dedicated in the opening week of the Berkshire Music Center in 1948, according to tentative plans announced today by Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland, Me.

In Lenox to inspect the progress of the building, Mrs. Gannett, former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, initiated early in her presidency the project of reconstructing the cottage to contain practice studios for the school.

"We will christen the building with a federation day at which we shall hope to have a large attendance from the New England States, and at least a scattered representation from all sections of the country," she said. The program, as tentatively outlined, will include a reception and tea, and formal dedication ceremonies. Winners of federation competitions who are or have been students at the Berkshire Music Center will be present.

"Four winners are in the student body this summer," Mrs. Gannett said. "They are Paula Lencher, who received our $1000 young artists vocal prize in 1945, and who sang Elettra in "Idomeneo"; Joan Brainerd, our 1947 young artist voice winner; Adele Addison, New England district winner in the Paul Lavalle scholarship auditions; and Ruthabeth Krueger, violinist, who won a federation scholarship for strings at the Berkshire Music Center in nationwide competitive examinations in 1942. Miss Addison and Miss Brainerd were members of the cast of the opera, We hope to have these young people and possibly others back for the dedication of the building."

To Restore Oval Garden

Mrs. Gannett added that the federation hopes to secure an impressive exhibit of Hawthorne memorabilia for display during the dedication week. Conferences have been held with representatives of the Berkshire Garden Center regarding the restoration of the oval garden in front of the "little red house" as it was in Hawthorne's day.

"We will invite our national president, Mrs. Royden J. Keith of Chicago, and other national officers to attend the dedication," said Mrs. Gannett, who is permanent chairman.

Originally it was the intention to complete the structure, to be an exact replica of the former Hawthorne house, so that the two practice studios which it will provide would be available for use in the current season, but unavoidable delay in securing a building permit, bad weather and labor shortages delayed construction. When finished it will contain the practice rooms seating 36 perso[illegible] each, a reception room, a pow[illegible] room and kitchenette facilities.

JAMAICA, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND PRESS

AUG 8 - 1947

Top Pianist

Only 19 years old, Burt Bacharach of 150 Burns street, Forest Hills, has earned the highest grade in a piano competition conducted throughout Canada by McGill University in Montreal. He's studying at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Mass., [illegible] summer.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 8 - 1947

Three Concerts At Tanglewood This Week End

Three concerts will be given this week-end by the students of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The symphony program this evening will begin at 8.15 in the Festival shed.

Opera scenes, not listed on the calendar of events, will be played Saturday afternoon at 2.30 and on Sunday morning at 10.30 the last student program of the season prepared under the direction of William Primrose, will be held in the chamber music hall. The three events are open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

These programs will be in addition to the three Berkshire Festival concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted in turn by Leonard Bernstein, Robert Shaw and Serge Koussevitzky. The public is invited to the rehearsal Saturday morning at 1[illegible] for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 8 - 1947

Bernstein Heard

Conducts Boston Symphony in Tanglewood Concert

By Raymond Morin

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony tonight in the first of the final series of three concerts at Tanglewood. Ruth Posselt was soloist in the Hindemith violin concerto. In spite of a rain an audience of 7,500 turned out to hear one of the most diversified programs of the festival.

As in his first appearance two weeks ago, Bernstein proved himself primarily an individualist of modern inclinations. In fact, the Haydn Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, impressed more as a vehicle for the conductor's specialized style.

Although the introductory largo was related with effective poise, the succeeding allegro vivace received over energetic treatment, and was detailed in its direction to a point not required by the Boston Symphony. While the adagio was heavy-laden dynamically, the minuet received a sturdy but not excessive beat and the trio was smoothly interwoven. The tempo of the finale, marked "presto," was somewhat driven, nevertheless causing obscurity in some of the detail, particularly in transitory passages.

Miss Posselt demonstrated exceptional violinistic talents both interpretively and technically. Her handling of the Hindemith's intricate structure was admirable, and Mr. Bernstein provided a beautifully pliant background, being constantly alert to the soloist's motives.

The violinist was at her best in the andante, extracting sensitive poetry from the instrument with tones of crystalline purity. In spite of the score's suppression of much of the bristling difficulties in the vivace, Miss Posselt projected its materials with eclat, even the hazardous cadenza being subject to few moments of imperfection.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2. in C major, adapted itself more happily to Mr. Bernstein's metier and temperament than did the Haydn. One might take issue with the retarded tempo and somewhat affected treatment of the adagio and with the accelerated tempo of the scherzo but it was nevertheless an excellent summation of its salient qualities. The program will be resumed Saturday night, with Bach's Cantata No. 50, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Mozart's Requiem Mass. Robert Shaw will conduct.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 8 - 1947

Music

Ruth Posselt Gets Ovation As Soloist at Berkshires

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—To begin the third and last part of the Symphonic Festival, last evening, Ruth Posselt, violinist, was heard as soloist in the Hindemith Concerto, a work composed in 1940, and introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony at Boston on April 19, ~~1940, when~~ Richard Burgin played the solo part.

Mr. Burgin and Miss Posselt happen to be Mr. and Mrs., a fact which made last night's concert a bit of an affair en famille, considering, too, that the conductor was Leonard Bernstein, Serge Koussevitzky's fair-haired child. The rest of the evening was devoted to the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Schumann Symphony No. 2, in G minor, Op. 61.

It is a pleasure to report that Miss Posselt delivered a brilliant performance of the Hindemith Concerto. Her bowing was perfection itself and her intonation always true. Furthermore, not in a long time had I heard her play with such vividness, although I must confess she has always, more or less, been a favorite of mine.

Unexpected Contrasts.

The whole idea she had of the piece was absorbing. And in a modern work of this kind, replete with unexpected contrasts and unusual melodic intervals, she loomed greater every moment. The cadenza in the last movement found her at ease, and quite a tricky cadenza it is, too.

I wish that Mr. Bernstein had not hurled such enormous sonorities at her on occasion. That sort of thing was all out of proportion to the tone of the violin, to start with, and it made the poor little instrument sound, when it re-entered, like little Sophie lost in the big city.

Mr. Bernstein otherwise made it evident that he was at home in this Hindemith work. His conducting fitted it rather comfortably.

Section Uneven.

No so, however, with the Shumann Second. In this composition he handled the straight tempo measures well, but, especially in the second movement, the retards that lie around as if in ambush upset him. Naturally, that threw the whole section into an uneven plane, and it was rather apparent that he could do nothing about it.

I liked the spirit and the verve of Mr. Bernstein's Haydn, although in the last movement he went much too fast for a clear expression of the music. Nevertheless, a crowd of 7500 cheered and shouted and generally went ecstatic about everything brought before it.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 8 - 1947

Letters from the People

Berkshire Festival

To the Editor of The Times:

Now that the Berkshire Music Festival is at its glorious height, it would seem appropriate to recall a few interesting facts as to its origin.

The idea of creating an American music festival was suggested by the famous Salzburg (Austria) concerts. The first group of concerts was given by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in August, 1934, on Dan Hanna's Stockbridge estate, with Dr. Henry Hadley conducting. About 2,000 people attended, and, subsequently, eagerly looked forward to the next year.

In 1935, the Berkshire Festival Society was incorporated, and two years later the permanence of its program was assured when Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Boston and Lenox, presented "Tanglewood," her family estate, for the festival's future home. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky agreed to play at six concerts. A large tent, holding 5,000 people was provided, crowds poured into Lenox and Stockbridge from every point of the compass, and the music was broadcast over a national hookup with Olin Downes as commentator.

During the 1937 concerts, a storm, climaxed by a cloudburst, dramatically interrupted an all-Wagner program. Conflict with the weather crystallized the idea of providing a music shed, as protection from sun and rain.

Within a few months, more than $80,000 was collected for this structure, itself a triumph of engineering and architectural invention. The Shed, constructed of 300 odd tons of steel, has a roof of two-inch planks, and an exterior of a sound-deadening composition. The main auditorium holds about 6,000 people and 3,000 more may sit in the colonnade.

Dr. Koussevitsky has visualized Tanglewood as widening its scope to become a significant center of the arts in America. The success of the festival suggested the next step in this direction, a musical academy to be developed simultaneously with the yearly concerts. "A center of music," wrote the conductor in a communication to the trustees of the orchestra, "would be a boon for those who want to study the fine arts in their relationship to culture; who are anxious to refresh their minds and personalities through contact with the best in art and the most distinguished in culture, and, for those who long for a creative rest in the summer." The proximity of the great ensemble, its conductor and members is of great advantage to the students. Here is an opportunity for students of instruments to devote a reasonably brief, concentrated term to the study of actual orchestral works in performance, under the guidance of practical and experienced orchestral musicians.

Such an institution is, no doubt, unique and far greater than any similar institution existing. Only a few great visionaries have dared to dream of it. Today this dream has come true.

There is every indication that the immediate future for music is in the United States, and the resources and enthusiasm that America can bring to the cultivation of great art.

YOLA C. DE PIETRO.
East Hartford.

No More Destruction

To the Editor of The Times:

The devils of the world have been destruction and poor distribution. What sense will there be in more production if we are going to allow it to be wasted in military affairs and destroyed. The only reason why the United States was, a few years ago, a nation with no debt but with a good surplus in her treasury, was that the U. S. was established as a country free from the wars and persecutions of the old country.

But our stupid participation in two world wars has placed us in debt equal to that of all the rest of the world. Britain is just waking up to the fact that war and her stupid waste of most of her loan has brought her to the end of her financial resources.

The U. S. should not step into her abandoned mistakes. If we copy her ideology let it be her proclamation that she "has no friends or enemies in the nations, that she does and will continue to do what is for her own interest."

The U. S. does not need to try to buy world trade. She will never get any world trade unless she gives it for less than the other nations would furnish it.

The wealth of the nations is in the hands of 10 per cent of the people. The 90 per cent live in varying degrees of destitution, illiteracy, undernourishment and poverty. Ten per cent of each nation ought to be able to plan and accomplish methods for their own population that will give every individual in the world a comfortable living, a suitable amount of employment in which he can earn a fair distribution of the production.

The masses, the 90 per cent of the population of the world, are not going to be satisfied with less much longer.

COMMON SENSE.
West Hartford.

Baldwin Versus Taft

To the Editor of The Times:

In The Times of July 24 is the story of Senator Taft trying to scuttle the consumers' price inquiry proposed by Senator Baldwin. Regardless of Senator Baldwin's good intentions nothing will be done until the next Congress.

Mr. Taft said, "The nation today is enjoying unparalleled prosperity, and, while prices are high wages are higher. The thing for Congress to do in such a situation is to do nothing."

That statement to me is a reflection on the intelligence of the members of Congress. The people voted for the members to pass laws that would protect the masses from usury. Senator Taft is chairman of several very important committees. He or some one on the committee inserts clauses in resolutions that kill their effect and the people suffer.

Senator Baldwin has made an effort to help the rank and file of his constitutents but, being a new member, his measures have been stopped by seniority procedure instead of qualified ability. Our country fought dictatorship in the last war but why does our government permit one man or a small group to control Congress?

Senator Taylor said it was not necessary to investigate high prices but we should investigate Taft and Wherry. This is not logical as that issue is a past affair.

I think the country would have been better off with controlled prices. What we needed in OPA was changed personnel and a new system. The time is at hand to meet the current inflation prices.

I talked with a young veteran recently. He makes $50 a week, has a wife and small baby of two months. He told me, "The entertainment world is going to suffer in this inflation. I mean the entertainment world that caters to my class of people with small incomes. It is just a luxury to live these days. When my little family gets the necessities of life we have nothing left."

Let Mr. Taft live on the average wage today and he will change his mind about Congress "doing nothing." This is a time for forceful leadership whether it be Democratic or Republican.

NANCY PENCE PAINTER.
Rockville.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

These Days

Politics Holds Center of Stage In All Activities

By George E. Sokolsky

A VERY wise man who has seen the march of events for more years than most of us recently complained that there was too much politics in the air. This generation is obsessed by politics. In some countries, such as Italy and France, politics absorbs the energies of the people.

Art has flown into hiding; music has become a shrill cacophony; even production in industry has given way before the endless talk about government. As for morals, ethics, philosophy, they have disappeared altogether before the belligerent shout of the politician and the propagandistic lies of those who have seized power.

Even in our own country, politics holds the front page of newspapers and the staccato of the commentators. Unusual as it seems, the Broadway columnists, children of fashion, who used to be amusing with their tales of wickedness and their emphasis upon the grotesque, have gone political and vie with each other in political prophecy.

Even the vaudevillians, who are hired to amuse the public on the radio, punctuate their repetitive humor with political gags and slanted comment on the events of the day. If this trend continues, we shall have umpires at baseball games shouting, "Veto!" instead of "Strike!"

THE reason for this concentration on a single subject is obvious. It is that everywhere government has expanded and increased its power; that government has invaded the home, the church, the school, the college and university, the mill and factory, the farm. No man is free from government. Banks are owned or controlled by government.

In many countries, the food of the people is distributed on minimum rations by government officials who decide for themselves not only what one is to eat but who is to eat. Even here in the United States, high food prices are due to government buying for foreign accounts. UNRRA not only fed millions with American food, which became a gift from government to government, but their governments sold the food to their own people and in some instances, only to those who were politically on the right side.

When more than 35 cents of every earned dollar is taken from the individual by his government, the man who is deprived of the possibility of saving becomes politically conscious. He wonders why his government needs so much. When he discovers, as so many farmers did, that after the government has deprived him of his own earned money, it hands him a subsidy, he wonders what corruption is in the air.

When he sees that his government refuses to reduce his tax by one penny but plans to spend [illegible] over a four-year period in Europe and Asia and that a vast propaganda machine has been let loose upon him to confuse and deceive him into believing that the only way to save his economy is to throw good money after bad, he grows suspicious and becomes political. He wants to know what's cooking.

THAT is why we are so preoccupied with the mere business of government. And it is interesting that during the past decade nothing noteworthy has appeared in art, in music, in poetry, in the novel, in philosophy. It is all journalistic. It is all of the moment. It is like the frightening noise I listened to at the Berkshire Festival when Copeland vied with Stravinsky in the use of the instruments of music to produce the maximum of noise that the human ear can tolerate

But worse even than that [illegible] the absence of standards [illegible] of the living, of the cultivated [illegible] driven resistance [illegible] money decency out [illegible] men, such drives out good [illegible] emerge as as never before [illegible] and celebrities on ghost-[illegible] publicity-agented [illegible] politics

It is such an [illegible] absorbs the human mind and [illegible]st. Millions of women each year attend political lectures in thousands of clubs and forums who could, if they only would, devote themselves to the improvement of the mind and character of the next generation. It is a way of life—but not a good way of life.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate Inc.)

AUG 8

TANGLEWO CONCERT BY BE

Assistant Condu His Mastery shire Fes

By Willard M.

Tanglewood, Aug. Bernstein, assistant c the current series of Festival, appeared for final time in conducto night and again reve pretive genius and te n a program which Hayden "Symphony in No. 102," the Schuma No. 2 in C Major" a Concerto for Violin n which he had the assistance of Ruth P Richard Burgin, the hony concert master.

Born Condu

As we have noted ernstein is a born c had to learn his ne so under the g rge Koussevitzky, bu an technique to b ctor of the caliber an. These other thi e inside, from the h e had watched him nsky's "Rites of Spr red what he might do mphony. What he ntly satisfactory.

While Haydn seldo nation, Bernstein b ter to its inherent g hes earthy humor. s the unfolding of t delicacy and infinite l and there was a r minuet. It sparkle e finale was as bri ying as the Boston during the festival. Fire, imagination, ginality, those are Schumann's "Symph ." Here is music b ous, music coming d suffered and conqu

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 8 - 1947

Bernstein Heard

Conducts Boston Symphony in Tanglewood Concert

By Raymond Morin

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony tonight in the first of the final series of three concerts at Tanglewood. Ruth Posselt was soloist in the Hindemith violin concerto. In spite of a rain an audience of 7,500 turned out to hear one of the most diversified programs of the festival.

As in his first appearance two weeks ago, Bernstein proved himself primarily an individualist of modern inclinations. In fact, the Haydn Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, impressed more as a vehicle for the conductor's specialized style.

Although the introductory largo was related with effective poise, the succeeding allegro vivace received over energetic treatment, and was detailed in its direction to a point not required by the Boston Symphony. While the adagio was heavy-laden dynamically, the minuet received a sturdy but not excessive beat and the trio was smoothly interwoven. The tempo of the finale, marked "presto," was somewhat driven, nevertheless causing obscurity in some of the detail, particularly in transitory passages.

Miss Posselt demonstrated exceptional violinistic talents both interpretively and technically. Her handling of the Hindemith's intricate structure was admirable, and Mr. Bernstein provided a beautifully pliant background, being constantly alert to the soloist's motives.

The violinist was at her best in the andante, extracting sensitive poetry from the instrument with tones of crystalline purity. In spite of the score's suppression of much of the bristling difficulties in the vivace, Miss Posselt projected its materials with eclat, even the hazardous cadenza being subject to few moments of imperfection.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2. in C major, adapted itself more happily to Mr. Bernstein's metier and temperament than did the Haydn. One might take issue with the retarded tempo and somewhat affected treatment of the adagio and with the accelerated tempo of the scherzo but it was nevertheless an excellent summation of its salient qualities. The program will be resumed Saturday night, with Bach's Cantata No. 50, Strawinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Mozart's Requiem Mass. Robert Shaw will conduct.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 8 - 1947

Music

Ruth Posselt Gets Ovation As Soloist at Berkshires

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—To begin the third and last part of the Symphonic Festival, last evening, Ruth Posselt, violinist, was heard as soloist in the Hindemith Concerto, a work composed in 1940, and introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony at Boston on April 19, 1940, when Richard Burgin played the solo part.

Mr. Burgin and Miss Posselt happen to be Mr. and Mrs., a fact which made last night's concert a bit of an affair en famille, considering, too, that the conductor was Leonard Bernstein, Serge Koussevitzky's fair-haired child. The rest of the evening was devoted to the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Schumann Symphony No. 2, in G minor, Op. 61.

It is a pleasure to report that Miss Posselt delivered a brilliant performance of the Hindemith Concerto. Her bowing was perfection itself and her intonation always true. Furthermore, not in a long time had I heard her play with such vividness, although I must confess she has always, more or less, been a favorite of mine.

Unexpected Contrasts.

The whole idea she had of the piece was absorbing. And in a modern work of this kind, replete with unexpected contrasts and unusual melodic intervals, she loomed greater every moment. The cadenza in the last movement found her at ease, and quite a tricky cadenza it is, too.

I wish that Mr. Bernstein had not hurled such enormous sonorities at her on occasion. That sort of thing was all out of proportion to the tone of the violin, to start with, and it made the poor little instrument sound, when it re-entered, like little Sophie lost in the big city.

Mr. Bernstein otherwise made it evident that he was at home in this Hindemith work. His conducting fitted it rather comfortably.

Section Uneven.

No so, however, with the Shumann Second. In this composition he handled the straight tempo measures well, but, especially in the second movement, the retards that lie around as if in ambush upset him. Naturally, that threw the whole section into an uneven plane, and it was rather apparent that he could do nothing about it.

I liked the spirit and the verve of Mr. Bernstein's Haydn, although in the last movement he went much too fast for a clear expression of the music. Nevertheless, a crowd of 7500 cheered and shouted and generally went ecstatic about everything brought before it.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 8 - 1947

Letters from the People

Berkshire Festival

To the Editor of The Times:

Now that the Berkshire Music Festival is at its glorious height, it would seem appropriate to recall a few interesting facts as to its origin.

The idea of creating an American music festival was suggested by the famous Salzburg (Austria) concerts. The first group of concerts was given by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in August, 1934, on Dan Hanna's Stockbridge estate, with Dr. Henry Hadley conducting. About 2,000 people attended, and, subsequently, eagerly looked forward to the next year.

In 1935, the Berkshire Festival Society was incorporated, and two years later the permanence of its program was assured when Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Boston and Lenox, presented "Tanglewood," her family estate, for the festival's future home. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky agreed to play at six concerts. A large tent, holding 5,000 people was provided, crowds poured into Lenox and Stockbridge from every point of the compass, and the music was broadcast over a national hookup with Olin Downes as commentator.

During the 1937 concerts, a storm, climaxed by a cloudburst, dramatically interrupted an all-Wagner program. Conflict with the weather crystallized the idea of providing a music shed, as protection from sun and rain.

Within a few months, more than $80,000 was collected for this structure, itself a triumph of engineering and architectural invention. The Shed, constructed of 300 odd tons of steel, has a roof of two-inch planks, and an exterior of a sound-deadening composition. The main auditorium holds about 6,000 people and 3,000 more may sit in the colonnade.

Dr. Koussevitsky has visualized Tanglewood as widening its scope to become a significant center of the arts in America. The success of the festival suggested the next step in this direction, a musical academy to be developed simultaneously with the yearly concerts. "A center of music," wrote the conductor in a communication to the trustees of the orchestra, "would be a boon for those who want to study the fine arts in their relationship to culture; who are anxious to refresh their minds and personalities through contact with the best in art and the most distinguished in culture, and, for those who long for a creative rest in the summer." The proximity of the great ensemble, its conductor and members is of great advantage to the students. Here is an opportunity for students of instruments to devote a reasonably brief, concentrated term to the study of actual orchestral works in performance, under the guidance of practical and experienced orchestral musicians.

Such an institution is, no doubt, unique and far greater than any similar institution existing. Only a few great visionaries have dared to dream of it. Today this dream has come true.

There is every indication that the immediate future for music is in the United States, and the resources and enthusiasm that America can bring to the cultivation of great art.

YOLA C. DE PIETRO.
East Hartford.

No More Destruction

To the Editor of The Times:

The devils of the world have been destruction and poor distribution. What sense will there be in more production if we are going to allow it to be wasted in military affairs and destroyed. The only reason why the United States was, a few years ago, a nation with no debt but with a good surplus in her treasury, was that the U. S. was established as a country free from the wars and persecutions of the old country.

But our stupid participation in two world wars has placed us in debt equal to that of all the rest of the world. Britain is just waking up to the fact that war and her stupid waste of most of her loan has brought her to the end of her financial resources.

The U. S. should not step into her abandoned mistakes. If we copy her ideology let it be her proclamation that she "has no friends or enemies in the nations, that she does and will continue to do what is for her own interest."

The U. S. does not need to try to buy world trade. She will never get any world trade unless she gives it for less than the other nations would furnish it.

The wealth of the nations is in the hands of 10 per cent of the people. The 90 per cent live in varying degrees of destitution, illiteracy, undernourishment and poverty. Ten per cent of each nation ought to be able to plan and accomplish methods for their own population that will give every individual in the world a comfortable living, a suitable amount of employment in which he can earn a fair distribution of the production.

The masses, the 90 per cent of the population of the world, are not going to be satisfied with less much longer.

COMMON SENSE.
West Hartford.

Baldwin Versus Taft

To the Editor of The Times:

In The Times of July 24 is the story of Senator Taft trying to scuttle the consumers' price inquiry proposed by Senator Baldwin. Regardless of Senator Baldwin's good intentions nothing will be done until the next Congress.

Mr. Taft said, "The nation today is enjoying unparalleled prosperity, and, while prices are high wages are higher. The thing for Congress to do in such a situation is to do nothing."

That statement to me is a reflection on the intelligence, of the members of Congress. The people voted for the members to pass laws that would protect the masses from usury. Senator Taft is chairman of several very important committees. He or some one on the committee inserts clauses in resolutions that kill their effect and the people suffer.

Senator Baldwin has made an effort to help the rank and file of his constitutents but, being a new member, his measures have been stopped by seniority procedure instead of qualified ability. Our country fought dictatorship in the last war but why does our government permit one man or a small group to control Congress?

Senator Taylor said it was not necessary to investigate high prices but we should investigate Taft and Wherry. This is not logical as that issue is a past affair.

I think the country would have been better off with controlled prices. What we needed in OPA was changed personnel and a new system. The time is at hand to meet the current inflation prices.

I talked with a young veteran recently. He makes $50 a week, has a wife and small baby of two months. He told me, "The entertainment world is going to suffer in this inflation. I mean the entertainment world that caters to my class of people with small incomes. It is just a luxury to live these days. When my little family gets the necessities of life we have nothing left."

Let Mr. Taft live on the average wage today and he will change his mind about Congress "doing nothing." This is a time for forceful leadership whether it be Democratic or Republican.

NANCY PENCE PAINTER.
Rockville.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
AUG 8 - 1947

These Days

Politics Holds Center of Stage In All Activities

By George E. Sokolsky

A VERY wise man who has seen the march of events for more years than most of us recently complained that there was too much politics in the air. This generation is obsessed by politics. In some countries, such as Italy and France, politics absorbs the energies of the people.

Art has flown into hiding; music has become a shrill cacophony; even production in industry has given way before the endless talk about government. As for morals, ethics, philosophy, they have disappeared altogether before the belligerent shout of the politician and the propagandistic lies of those who have seized power.

Even in our own country, politics holds the front page of newspapers and the staccato of the commentators. Unusual as it seems, the Broadway columnists, children of fashion, who used to be amusing with their tales of wickedness and their emphasis upon the grotesque, have gone political and vie with each other in political prophecy.

Even the vaudevillians, who are hired to amuse the public on the radio, punctuate their repetitive humor with political gags and slanted comment on the events of the day. If this trend continues, we shall have umpires at baseball games shouting, "Veto!" instead of "Strike!"

THE reason for this concentration on a single subject is obvious. It is that everywhere government has expanded and increased its power; that government has invaded the home, the church, the school, the college and university, the mill and factory, the farm. No man is free from government. Banks are owned or controlled by government.

In many countries, the food of the people is distributed on minimum rations by government officials who decide for themselves not only what one is to eat but who is to eat. Even here in the United States, high food prices are due to government buying for foreign accounts. UNRRA not only fed millions with American food, which became a gift from government to government, but their governments sold the food to their own people and in some instances, only to those who were politically on the right side.

When more than 35 cents of every earned dollar is taken from the individual by his government, the man who is deprived of the possibility of saving becomes politically conscious. He wonders why his government needs so much. When he discovers, as so many farmers did, that after the government has deprived him of his own earned money, it hands him a subsidy, he wonders what corruption is in the air.

When he sees that his government refuses to reduce his tax by one penny but plans to spend $20,000,000,000 over a four-year period in Europe and Asia and that a vast propaganda machine has been let loose upon him to confuse and deceive him into believing that the only way to save his economy is to throw good money after bad, he grows suspicious and becomes political. He wants to know what's cooking.

THAT is why we are so preoccupied with the mere business of government. And it is interesting that during the past decade nothing noteworthy has appeared in art, in music, in poetry, in the novel, in philosophy. It is all journalistic. It is all of the moment. It is like the frightening noise I listened to at the Berkshire Festival when Copeland vied with Stravinsky in the use of the instruments of music to produce the maximum of noise that the human ear can tolerate.

But worse even than that is the absence of standards, of the urbanities of living, of the cultivation of truth, of the resistance to the lie. Politics has driven decency out of our lives as bad money drives out good money. Picayune men, such as never before led a people, emerge as celebrities on ghost-written speeches and publicity-agented fame.

It is such an era and therefore politics absorbs the human mind and interest. Millions of women each year attend political lectures in thousands of clubs and forums who could, if they only would, devote themselves to the improvement of the mind and character of the next generation. It is a way of life—but not a good way of life.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 8 - 1947

TANGLEWOOD CONCERT LED BY BERNSTEIN

Assistant Conductor Reveals His Mastery at Berkshire Festival

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 7 — Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor during the current series of the Berkshire Festival, appeared for the second and final time in conductorial capacity tonight and again revealed his interpretive genius and technical mastery in a program which included the Hayden "Symphony in B-Flat Minor, No. 102," the Schumann "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," in which he had the distinguished assistance of Ruth Posselt, wife of Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony concert master.

Born Conductor

As we have noted before, Leonard Bernstein is a born conductor. True, he had to learn his craft and has done so under the guidance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, but it takes more than technique to become a conductor of the caliber of this young man. These other things come from the inside, from the heart and brain. We had watched him conduct Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" and wondered what he might do with a Haydn symphony. What he did was eminently satisfactory.

While Haydn seldom needs rejuvenation, Bernstein brought a new luster to its inherent grace and sometimes earthy humor. Particularly fine was the unfolding of the adagio with its delicacy and infinite variety of detail and there was a real flourish in the minuet. It sparkled with humor. The finale was as brilliant a bit of playing as the Bosten men have given us during the festival.

Fire, imagination, freshness and originality, those are the ingredients of Schumann's "Symphony in C Major." Here is music both grave and joyous, music coming from one who had suffered and conquered. The total impression of the work is majestic and powerful. Perhaps its greatest beauty lies in the adagio, so compact, so lyric and perfect in form.

Mr. Bernstein revealed all the beauties of the work without resorting to undue sentimentality. There was a fine rhythmic flow throughout the work. Mr. Bernstein was content to let the music speak for itself. It needed nothing more.

One may or may not like the music of Paul Hindemith—yet those who hear it must admit that he is a master of his craft. To many his music is rough, dissonat and rhythmically mystifying. Others find a stimulus in his expert knowledge of form and obstinate individuality. His violin concerto played by Ruth Posselt and the orchestra is not a work to be judged on a single hearing.

There is real charm in it. Dramatic moments are many and the violin has many passages of poignant beauty. Yet it is safe to assume none of its melodies will be whistled. The violin remains the dominant voice throughout the work and the final lengthy cadenza is worthy of any violinist's mettle. Miss Posselt is one of the best violinists. Her tone is large, her sense of rhythm is absolute and her temperament equal to any demands. Seldom does a violinist have such perfect orchestral accompaniment as was given by the Boston players.

Tonight we had our first rain of the series but it didn't seem to appreciably lessen the size of the audience, which was estimated at 7500, and it certainly didn't dampen their enthusiasm.

Saturday night's concert will be devoted to choral works under the direction of Robert Shaw.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 8 - 1947

First Night Rain Falls at Festival

Audience of 7,500 Turns Out for Opening of Final Series of Season Despite Weather.

In spite of rain, the first that has fallen at Tanglewood on a concert night this season, another crowd of 7,500 turned out last evening for the opening program of the final series of the 1947 season, the ninth concert to take place in the big music shed at Lenox this year.

The 5,500 or more inside the shed and the general-admission audience of some 2,000 whose members clustered under the porticos, heard the Boston Symphony orchestra, in a nicely balanced program, respond as readily to the direction of a guest conductor, Leonard Bernstein as it does traditionally to the exactions of its music director, Serge Koussevitzky. For good measure, it heard also an outstanding performance of Paul Hindemith's violin concerto by Ruth Posselt and the orchestra.

Mr. Bernstein occupied the podium for the second time this season, thus putting a double hold on his title of the first guest conductor ever to handle the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky surrendered the baton to him for the first time in one of the concerts in the first series this season.

Besides the Hindemith concerto a contemporary piece lacking in appeal to many, the orchestra last evening performed Haydn's B flat minor symphony, No. 102, and Schumann's Second symphony, in C major, classic works that nicely balanced the dissonances and strange rhythms of the Hindemith work. In the latter Miss Posselt, one child prodigy who has fulfilled early promise, gave a scintillating performance that won her an ovation joined even by those who could make little sense of the piece she had been given to play.

On Saturday evening, Robert Shaw will conduct the concert devoted to choral works while on Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will return to the podium to close the 1947 season with a solid program of orchestral works, ending with Tschaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 8 - 1947

Bernstein Leads Orchestra As Final Festival Series Opens

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Boston Symphony orchestra played the 10th program in the 10th Berkshire Festival last night at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein occupying the podium as guest conductor for the second ime this season. This was the first f the three concerts which comprise the final week end of what vill probably be the Festival's ecord year.

An unsettled sky and various ght showers in the early evening nade the outlook rather indefinite, ut by opening time clear weather seemed quite certain. The air was fairly heavy and humid for strings. The program consisted of two of the older classic symphonies placed around the Hindemith violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist. Miss Posselt played superbly. A relaxed confidence in her technique and her broad sweeping bow served her in the intricacies of her assignment. He tone was full and warm and her conception of the concerto completely within her grasp. Hindemith, however, has posed a most difficult task: his orchestration is copious to ponderous, and when he pits the solo violin against the French horn section, as occurs in the final movement, it behooves the listener to try to understand the music as a whole and not to try to tune in the soloist above the background. On that basis the music has a much greater appeal, at least in comparable instances. The slow movement allowed Miss Posselt's tone to be conveyed in its most distinctive and eloquent richness, as it had also been heard in the principal theme of the first movement.

Bernstein Knows the Score

Bernstein's offerings were the Haydn B flat symphony, No. 102, and the Schumann C major, No. 2. His control over the orchestra was absolute, and was based on a thorough knowledge of the scores and a well-planned system of communication with the orchestra. A conductor has two requisites: He must know how he would like the music at hand to sound, and he must be able to fashion the tone production of the orchestra to his mold. Bernstein is not the kind of conductor who beats time and then when he hears what comes out says: "That's what I want." He works the other way around. He says: "This is what I want," and proceeds to get it. We support this type of approach. It places the responsibility unequivocally on the shoulders of the conductor. He deserves complete praise, or blame, as the case may be, for the results.

Bernstein's Haydn (he conducted the Rochester orchestra in this same symphony in the Pittsfield High School auditorium last winter) leaves very little to chance. Practically every possibility is foreseen. He implanted a brilliance in the spirited movements and a vital intensity in the slow movements. He has still a bit of the path to traverse to convince his audience that he is playing from the heart. The same gesture reappears too obviously at given idioms. He worked over and polished the minuet to the point of dullness.

The Schumann reached incandescent salience in the heavenly adagio. The introduction to the first movement had not completely conveyed the same penetration. Bernstein's youthful zest in the scherzo demanded more than the Boston Symphony Orchestra first violin section could supply. The terrific pace caused the theme in the violins to become swallowed when they descended below the A string, and to become doubly obscured by too much tone in the cellos et al. We fear that lithe speed, accented rhythm and the impact of forceful, precise chords sometimes evokes indiscriminate enthusiasm, which, in turn, may influence artists to believe their efforts are worthy of maintainence and development. Bernstein's undebatable musical affluence includes some of the finest attributes possessed by any of the candidates of his age, but a convincing cognizance of the potentialities of the strings in particular and of the tonal results of the orchestra in general, rather than the visible means of producing them would assist in the progress he makes on every reappearance.

The last two concerts of the Festival will be conducted by Robert Shaw tomorrow evening and by Dr. Koussevitzky on Sunday afternoon.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR

AUG 8 - 1947

The Vermont State Symphony Orchestra is the oldest of our stat symphonies. Toward its support th state appropriates $1,200. Ala Carter, conductor, leads all rehear sals and conducts all concerts durin the season. Concerts are played a over the state. Rehearsals are hel each week by groups, at Rutland an at Burlington; then the full force join at Middlebury.

The personnel is composed c mechanics, school teachers, farmer postmen, barbers, wives of stat legislators and stonecutters. The are in the orchestra solely for th pleasure of playing fine music. Th hardship which they undergo i traveling by bus over icy and snow blocked roads during the winter time shows that their love for ar is genuine.

Last Tuesday evening Serge Koussevitzky conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the large shed at Tanglewood. With this was coupled the same composer's Eighth Symphony, a work in sharp contrast to the Ninth.

The Eighth Symphony generates a mood of good spirits throughout, it having no slow movement. The second movement, an Allegretto Scherzando, gayly mocks Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. In this, a light and catchy melody is set against a background of clicking metronomic beats. Of course it was beautifully played.

But, the crowning glory of the evening was the performance of the Ninth Symphony, called the "Choral." To give this work requires the full resources of both a symphony orchestra and a large chorus, also four fine soloists. For this reason it is not commonly heard.

However, last Tuesday Dr. Koussevitzky had at his command the full membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also the large Festival chorus. Soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

No words can describe the beauty of the composition, Beethoven's highest flight of fancy in the symphonic form. It contains four movements, in the last of which Shiller's Ode to Joy is set to music. Beethoven had aspired, as early as 1793, to write music to these words, but did not finally settle upon its form until 1817. The work was completed in 1823. The first performance was conducted by the composer himself, who by that time was so deaf that he could not hear a sound.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave a stirring interpretation of the work. He has the ability to secure marvelous effects from his men. The climax came in the last movement, the theme being announced for the celli, so softly that it was barely audible. It was taken up in the violins, then sung to Schiller's words by David Lloyd, tenor. The mixed quartet, the chorus and the orchestra alternated in developing the theme, it finally ending in a tremendous climax with the entire resources of orchestra, chorus and soloists combined.

At the conclusion of the great performance, music-lovers, who jammed the large shed and filled the lawns, recalled Dr. Koussevitzky many times, with rounds of thunderous applause and loud huzzahs. This he shared with Robert Shaw, who had prepared the chorus; also with the soloists and the orchestra.

Only two concerts remain in the Festival series. Tomorrow evening Robert Shaw will conduct a Bach Cantata, the Mozart Requiem and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra and two pianos; Ravel's Pavane and Bolero; and Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
AUG 8 - 1947

NEW PHONOGRAPH BEATS SYMPHONY

Startled Critics and Music Lovers Hear Orchestra Outplayed in Contest

North American Newspaper Alliance.

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Aug. 7 —A new radiophonograph "took on" a full symphony orchestra here tonight and in a David-and-Goliath exhibition which amazed 40-odd critics and hundreds of musical personalities assembled at Nathaniel Hawthorne's old home, won the contest hands down. The phonograph was tonally more pure and showed higher fidelity than the orchestra.

The stunt may have been press agentry at its best but there was no doubt as to which "instrument" had the more substantial values in the first such comparison ever attempted.

In its meteoric 30-year American career, musical reproduction on records reached such a peak of fidelity that Leonard Bernstein recently had to conduct a recording orchestra in stockinged feet because his squeaky shoes were spoiling record after record.

Phonographs, however, have rarely matched the present-day qualities of the discs played on hem—despite multiple speakers nd other costly efforts to achieve onal value.

This is despite the fact that 200 ecording companies in the United tates are now producing some 00,000,000 records a year. About 5,000,000 of these are classical recordings which demand great fidelity. And the public is asking for more classics, with the estimated output for the coming year set at 100,000,000.

What's more, Gustav Mahler's scholarly Fourth Symphony sold more than 15,000 copies last year, and Bach's esoteric Goldberg Variations for Harpsichord, which sold maybe 50 copies in the United States in 1933, sold more than 29,000 albums when recorded again recently by the same performer, Wanda Landowska.

This trend toward better music called for a new superlative phonograph wh[illegible]uld equal the fidelity of [illegible] pick up w[illegible] whole range [illegible] audible [illegible] the human [illegible] 30 and 1[illegible],000 cycles, [illegible] phonograph can rep[illegible] correctly only those notes be[illegible] 80 and 4,000 cycles: all the [illegible]wer register [illegible] for exam[illegible], is lost, and more [illegible] two-thirds of the entire range [illegible] a piccolo are lost.

Six months of intensive work by RCA-Victor technicians e[illegible]ed, the results of which were [illegible]miered here in the "Berkshire" series of custom-built radiophonographs selling from $1,800 to $4,000 —that's right—each. The instrument does not seem eight times better than $500 models now on the market—for the average listener. But for anyone with that much money to spend, this really is something.

Orchestra Was Worse

In the test here, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, alternated with a phonograph playing Beethoven's Egmont Overture and it was possible to distinguish between them only because the orchestra sounded worse. This may be because the recording was made under ideal conditions, which is rarely the case in a concert hall.

An RCA engineer reported that the day was not far off when mass production may bring the cost of these instruments down as low as $200.

The value of any opinion is exemplified by the story of a recent concert for which four Stradivarius violins had been assembled. Critics on the following day were unanimous in their praise of the unique tone quality of such a combination. They hailed the "true

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

AUG 8 - 1947

7,500 Hear Bernstein

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—Leonard Bernstein conducted his second Tanglewood concert last night. His program consisted of the Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102, the Hindemith Violin Concerto and the Schumann Second Symphony. Ruth Posselt was soloist.

Scattered showers did not prevent 7,500 people from attending.

As in his first concert, Bernstein excelled in conducting the modern work. In this kind of music he is quite at home. He succeeds in getting it across to an audience.

If he did some tight-rope gesturing and went through some swimming strokes in the bargain, that's his style of conducting—take it or leave it.

The honors of the evening went to Miss Posselt for a superb performance of the concerto. If the music sounded more persuasive than ever before, it is likely that she has grown further into her part. She has always had a way of making modern music convincing. She carried her audience along triumphantly last night.

A disturbing factor throughout the evening was Bernstein's handling or rather mishandling tonal balances. While this was noticeable even in the concerto, it was most obvious in the Schumann and to a degree in the Haydn.

The performances of both symphonies defined the paradoxical position in which Bernstein finds himself. He has yet to let the music express itself. At the moment he uses it as a vehicle for performance.

The Haydn was too fresh, too alert, too rigid, the Schumann was too well-executed. Once again it is evident that Bernstein has tremendous talent. Its direction is still in doubt.

This concert opened the third and final weekend series of the Berkshire Festival. Robert Shaw will conduct tonight. Serge Koussevitzky will end the Festival Sunday afternoon.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 8 - 1947

TANGLEWOOD CONCERT LED BY BERNSTEIN

Assistant Conductor Reveals His Mastery at Berkshire Festival

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 7 — Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor during the current series of the Berkshire Festival, appeared for the second and final time in conductorial capacity tonight and again revealed his interpretive genius and technical mastery in a program which included the Hayden "Symphony in B-Flat Minor, No. 102," the Schumann "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," in which he had the distinguished assistance of Ruth Posselt, wife of Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony concert master.

Born Conductor

As we have noted before, Leonard Bernstein is a born conductor. True, he had to learn his craft and has done so under the guidance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, but it takes more than technique to become a conductor of the caliber of this young man. These other things come from the inside, from the heart and brain. We had watched him conduct Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" and wondered what he might do with a Haydn symphony. What he did was eminently satisfactory.

While Haydn seldom needs rejuvenation, Bernstein brought a new luster to its inherent grace and sometimes earthy humor. Particularly fine was the unfolding of the adagio with its delicacy and infinite variety of detail and there was a real flourish in the minuet. It sparkled with humor. The finale was as brilliant a bit of playing as the Bosten men have given us during the festival.

Fire, imagination, freshness and originality, those are the ingredients of Schumann's "Symphony in C Major." Here is music both grave and joyous, music coming from one who had suffered and conquered. The total impression of the work is majestic and powerful. Perhaps its greatest beauty lies in the adagio, so compact, so lyric and perfect in form.

Mr. Bernstein revealed all the beauties of the work without resorting to undue sentimentality. There was a fine rhythmic flow throughout the work. Mr. Bernstein was content to let the music speak for itself. It needed nothing more.

One may or may not like the music of Paul Hindemith—yet those who hear it must admit that he is a master of his craft. To many his music is rough, dissonat and rhythmically mystifying. Others find a stimulus in his expert knowledge of form and obstinate individuality. His violin concerto played by Ruth Posselt and the orchestra is not a work to be judged on a single hearing.

There is real charm in it. Dramatic moments are many and the violin has many passages of poignant beauty. Yet it is safe to assume none of its melodies will be whistled. The violin remains the dominant voice throughout the work and the final lengthy cadenza is worthy of any violinist's mettle. Miss Posselt is one of the best violinists. Her tone is large, her sense of rhythm is absolute and her temperament equal to any demands. Seldom does a violinist have such perfect orchestral accompaniment as was given by the Boston players.

Tonight we had our first rain of th series but it didn't seem to apprec ably lessen the size of the audienc which was estimated at 7500, and certainly didn't dampen their enth siasm.

Saturday night's concert will be d voted to choral works under the d rection of Robert Shaw.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 8 - 1947

First Night Rain Falls at Festival

Audience of 7,500 Turns Out for Opening of Final Series of Season Despite Weather.

In spite of rain, the first that has fallen at Tanglewood on a concert night this season, another crowd of 7,500 turned out last evening for the opening program of the final series of the 1947 season, the ninth concert to take place in the big music shed at Lenox this year.

The 5,500 or more inside the shed and the general-admission audience of some 2,000 whose members clustered under the porticos, heard the Boston Symphony orchestra, in a nicely balanced program, respond as readily to the direction of a guest conductor, Leonard Bernstein, as it does traditionally to the exactions of its music director, Serge Koussevitzky. For good measure, it heard also an outstanding performance of Paul Hindemith's violin concerto by Ruth Posselt and the orchestra.

Mr. Bernstein occupied the podium for the second time this season, thus putting a double hold on his title of the first guest conductor ever to handle the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky surrendered the baton to him for the first time in one of the concerts in the first series this season.

Besides the Hindemith concerto, a contemporary piece lacking in appeal to many, the orchestra last evening performed Haydn's B flat minor symphony, No. 102, and Schumann's Second symphony, in C major, classic works that nicely balanced the dissonances and strange rhythms of the Hindemith work. In the latter Miss Posselt, one child prodigy who has fulfilled early promise, gave a scintillating performance that won her an ovation joined even by those who could make little sense of the piece she had been given to play.

On Saturday evening, Robert Shaw will conduct the concert devoted to choral works while on Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will return to the podium to close the 1947 season with a solid program of orchestral works, ending with Tschaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 8 - 1947

Bernstein Leads Orchestra As Final Festival Series Opens

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Boston Symphony orchestra played the 10th program in the 10th Berkshire Festival last night at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein occupying the podium as guest conductor for the second time this season. This was the first of the three concerts which comprise the final week end of what will probably be the Festival's record year.

An unsettled sky and various light showers in the early evening made the outlook rather indefinite, but by opening time clear weather seemed quite certain. The air was fairly heavy and humid for strings. The program consisted of two of the older classic symphonies placed around the Hindemith violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist. Miss Posselt played superbly. A relaxed confidence in her technique and her broad sweeping bow served her in the intricacies of her assignment. He tone was full and warm and her conception of the concerto completely within her grasp. Hindemith, however, has posed a most difficult task: his orchestration is copious to ponderous, and when he pits the solo violin against the French horn section, as occurs in the final movement, it behooves the listener to try to understand the music as a whole and not to try to tune in the soloist above the background. On that basis the music has a much greater appeal, at least in comparable instances. The slow movement allowed Miss Posselt's tone to be conveyed in its most distinctive and eloquent richness, as it had also been heard in the principal theme of the first movement.

Bernstein Knows the Score

Bernstein's offerings were the Haydn B flat symphony, No. 102, and the Schumann C major, No. 2. His control over the orchestra was absolute, and was based on a thorough knowledge of the scores and a well-planned system of communication with the orchestra. A conductor has two requisites: He must know how he would like the music at hand to sound, and he must be able to fashion the tone production of the orchestra to his mold. Bernstein is not the kind of conductor who beats time and then when he hears what comes out says: "That's what I want." He works the other way around. He says: "This is what I want," and proceeds to get it. We support this type of approach. It places the responsibility unequivocally on the shoulders of the conductor. He deserves complete praise, or blame, as the case may be, for the results.

Bernstein's Haydn (he conducted the Rochester orchestra in this same symphony in the Pittsfield High School auditorium last winter) leaves very little to chance. Practically every possibility is foreseen. He implanted a brilliance in the spirited movements and a vital intensity in the slow movements. He has still a bit of the path to traverse to convince his audience that he is playing from the heart. The same gesture reappears too obviously at given idioms. He worked over and polished the minuet to the point of dullness.

The Schumann reached incandescent salience in the heavenly adagio. The introduction to the first movement had not completely conveyed the same penetration. Bernstein's youthful zest in the scherzo demanded more than the Boston Symphony Orchestra first violin section could supply. The terrific pace caused the theme in the violins to become swallowed when they descended below the A string, and to become doubly obscured by too much tone in the cellos et al. We fear that lithe speed, accented rhythm and the impact of forceful, precise chords sometimes evokes indiscriminate enthusiasm, which, in turn, may influence artists to believe their efforts are worthy of maintainence and development. Bernstein's undebatable musical affluence includes some of the finest attributes possessed by any of the candidates of his age, but a convincing cognizance of the potentialities of the strings in particular and of the tonal results of the orchestra in general, rather than the visible means of producing them would assist in the progress he makes on every reappearance.

The last two concerts of the Festival will be conducted by Robert Shaw tomorrow evening and by Dr. Koussevitzky on Sunday afternoon.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR

AUG 8 - 1947

The Vermont State Symphony Orchestra is the oldest of our state symphonies. Toward its support the state appropriates $1,200. Alan Carter, conductor, leads all rehearsals and conducts all concerts during the season. Concerts are played all over the state. Rehearsals are held each week by groups, at Rutland and at Burlington; then the full forces join at Middlebury.

The personnel is composed of mechanics, school teachers, farmers, postmen, barbers, wives of state legislators and stonecutters. They are in the orchestra solely for the pleasure of playing fine music. The hardship which they undergo in traveling by bus over icy and snow blocked roads during the winter time shows that their love for art is genuine.

Last Tuesday evening Serge Koussevitzky conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the large shed at Tanglewood. With this was coupled the same composer's Eighth Symphony, a work in sharp contrast to the Ninth.

The Eighth Symphony generates a mood of good spirits throughout, it having no slow movement. The second movement, an Allegretto Scherzando, gayly mocks Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. In this, a light and catchy melody is set against a background of clicking metronomic beats. Of course it was beautifully played.

But, the crowning glory of the evening was the performance of the Ninth Symphony, called the "Choral." To give this work requires the full resources of both a symphony orchestra and a large chorus, also four fine soloists. For this reason it is not commonly heard.

However, last Tuesday Dr. Koussevitzky had at his command the full membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also the large Festival chorus. Soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

No words can describe the beauty of the composition, Beethoven's highest flight of fancy in the symphonic form. It contains four movements, in the last of which Shiller's Ode to Joy is set to music. Beethoven had aspired, as early as 1793, to write music to these words, but did not finally settle upon its form until 1817. The work was completed in 1823. The first performance was conducted by the composer himself, who by that time was so deaf that he could not hear a sound.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave a stirring interpretation of the work. He has the ability to secure marvelous effects from his men. The climax came in the last movement, the theme being announced for the celli, so softly that it was barely audible. It was taken up in the violins, then sung to Schiller's words by David Lloyd, tenor. The mixed quartet, the chorus and the orchestra alternated in developing the theme, it finally ending in a tremendous climax with the entire resources of orchestra, chorus and soloists combined.

At the conclusion of the great performance, music-lovers, who jammed the large shed and filled the lawns, recalled Dr. Koussevitzky many times, with rounds of thunderous applause and loud huzzahs. This he shared with Robert Shaw, who had prepared the chorus; also with the soloists and the orchestra.

Only two concerts remain in the Festival series. Tomorrow evening Robert Shaw will conduct a Bach Cantata, the Mozart Requiem and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber orchestra and two pianos; Ravel's Pavane and Bolero; and Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG 8 - 1947

7,500 Hear Bernstein

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—Leonard Bernstein conducted his second Tanglewood concert last night. His program consisted of the Haydn B Flat Symphony No. 102, the Hindemith Violin Concerto and the Schumann Second Symphony. Ruth Posselt was soloist.

Scattered showers did not prevent 7,500 people from attending.

As in his first concert, Bernstein excelled in conducting the modern work. In this kind of music he is quite at home. He succeeds in getting it across to an audience.

If he did some tight-rope gesturing and went through some swimming strokes in the bargain, that's his style of conducting—take it or leave it.

The honors of the evening went to Miss Posselt for a superb performance of the concerto. If the music sounded more persuasive than ever before, it is likely that she has grown further into her part. She has always had a way of making modern music convincing. She carried her audience along triumphantly last night.

A disturbing factor throughout the evening was Bernstein's handling or rather mishandling tonal balances. While this was noticeable even in the concerto, it was most obvious in the Schumann and to a degree in the Haydn.

The performances of both symphonies defined the paradoxical position in which Bernstein finds himself. He has yet to let the music express itself. At the moment he uses it as a vehicle for performance.

The Haydn was too fresh, too alert, too rigid, the Schumann was too well-executed. Once again it is evident that Bernstein has tremendous talent. Its direction is still in doubt.

This concert opened the third and final weekend series of the Berkshire Festival. Robert Shaw will conduct tonight. Serge Koussevitzky will end the festival Sunday afternoon.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
AUG 8 - 1947

NEW PHONOGRAPH BEATS SYMPHONY

Startled Critics and Music Lovers Hear Orchestra Outplayed in Contest

North American Newspaper Alliance.

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Aug. 7—A new radiophonograph "took on" a full symphony orchestra here tonight and in a David-and-Goliath exhibition which amazed 40-odd critics and hundreds of musical personalities assembled at Nathaniel Hawthorne's old home, won the contest hands down. The phonograph was tonally more pure and showed higher fidelity than the orchestra.

The stunt may have been press agentry at its best but there was no doubt as to which "instrument" had the more substantial values in the first such comparison ever attempted.

In its meteoric 30-year American career, musical reproduction on records reached such a peak of fidelity that Leonard Bernstein recently had to conduct a recording orchestra in stockinged feet because his squeaky shoes were spoiling record after record.

Phonographs, however, have rarely matched the present-day qualities of the discs played on them—despite multiple speakers and other costly efforts to achieve tonal value.

This is despite the fact that 200 recording companies in the United States are now producing some 300,000,000 records a year. About 75,000,000 of these are classical recordings which demand great fidelity. And the public is asking for more classics, with the estimated output for the coming year set at 100,000,000.

What's more, Gustav Mahler's scholarly Fourth Symphony sold more than 15,000 copies last year, and Bach's esoteric Goldberg Variations for Harpsichord, which sold maybe 50 copies in the United States in 1933, sold more than 29,000 albums when recorded again recently by the same performer, Wanda Landowska.

This trend toward better music called for a new superlative phonograph which would equal the fidelity of [illegible] pick up w[illegible] the whole range [illegible] audible [illegible] the human [illegible] 30 and 15,000 cycles, [illegible] phonograph can reproduce correctly only those notes between 80 and 4,000 cycles, all the lower register of a piano, for example, is lost, and more than two-thirds of the entire range of a piccolo are lost.

Six months of intensive work by RCA-Victor technicians [illegible], the results of which were [illegible]miered here in the "Berkshire series of custom-built radiophonographs selling from $1,800 to $4,000—that's right—each. The instrument does not seem eight times better than $500 models now on the market—for the average listener. But for anyone with that much money to spend, this really is something.

Orchestra Was Worse

In the test here, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, alternated with a phonograph playing Beethoven's Egmont Overture and it was possible to distinguish between them only because the orchestra sounded worse. This may be because the recording was made under ideal conditions, which is rarely the case in a concert hall.

An RCA engineer reported that the day was not far off when mass production may bring the cost of these instruments down as low as $200.

The value of any opinion is exemplified by the story of a recent concert for which four Stradivarius violins had been assembled. Critics on the following day were unanimous in their praise of the unique tone quality of such a combination. They hailed the "true

[210]

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 8 - 1947

Choral Symphony Good Musical Show

By C. R. ROSEBERRY

The ideal stage for the Choral Symphony would be a mountain summit where it could flaunt itself to the stars. Lacking that, and with due allowance for practicalities, there is no more perfect setting for this supernal moment in music than Tanglewood of Lenox.

Again it was recreated there Tuesday night. Koussevitzky does not merely repeat—he reanimates, when he is sufficiently transported. Such is the exaltation with which one comes away from each fresh audition of the Hymn of Joy that there is always the temptation to say: "This, then, was the best."

I HAVE HEARD the Beethoven Ninth at Tanglewood three times, now. As memory serves, I would judge it has been orchestrally better done there before, but chorally never. The eagerness of the student voices in the Festival Chorus may actually be preferable to the polished perfectionism of a mature choir. At least, there is much to support the view that youthful exuberance may express more adequately the uninhibited outpouring of joyousness intended by the composer who was never to hear it except in his mind's ear.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians completed their Beethoven cycle Tuesday night with the last two symphonies. There was the usual overflow audience upon the blanket-strewn lawn. The program began early—at 7:30—and was over before 10, making it an unusual Tanglewood evening in more ways than one.

THE BRIEF Eighth Symphony is always a pleasant diversion. It is Beethoven at his most capricious, and the orchestra relinquished something of its dignity to enter into the playful mood. I always wonder how Beethoven happened to write so nervous, un-Beethoven-like a score. Koussevitzky did not attempt to stand on tiptoe for something that was wholly within reach.

No greater contrast is to be found in all the Beethoven literature than between these two symphonies—and so the program was nicely balanced for a humid August eventide.

The Choral Symphony is a good musical show, in the best sense of the word, and the white-frocked figures of the chorus massed behind the orchestra in the music shell always add visual impact to auditory splendor.

KOUSSEVITZKY WAS somewhat less than inspired in the first two movements of the symphony. They were artistically beyond cavil, but they did not incandesce. Conductorial genius began to make itself felt, however, in the third-movement cantabile. From the muted, scarcely tangible initial statement of the theme, through its successive variations, it was a thing of celestial beauty. One remembers especially the harmonic discourse for horns, perhaps because it is not always done so angelically.

Then all the dynamic power and spiritual nobility of Beethoven flared up in the final movement negating any suspicion that Koussevitzky is not temperamentally suited to the full realization of that Teutonic composer. The declamation by basses and cellos at the outset was majestically sonorous, beyond Tanglewood precedent.

THE DIAPHONOUS manner with which Koussevitzky ushered in the first dolce statement of the "Ode to Joy" theme whispered to the innermost psyche.

The rapport between chorus and orchestra was as fine as you will hear. The soloists were good, if not exceptional: Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The solo quartet passage, "Freude, Tochter aus Elysium," soared into the higher realms of vocal expression.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 9 - 1947

Bernstein Heard

Conducts Boston Symphony in Tanglewood Concert

By Raymond Morin

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Thursday night in the first of the final series of three concerts at Tanglewood. Ruth Posselt was soloist in the Hindemith violin concerto. In spite of a rain an audience of 7,500 turned out to hear one of the most diversified programs of the festival.

As in his first appearance two weeks ago, Bernstein proved himself primarily an individualist of modern inclinations. In fact, the Haydn Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, impressed more as a vehicle for the conductor's specialized style.

Although the introductory largo was related with effective poise, the succeeding allegro vivace received over-energetic treatment, and was detailed in its direction to a point not required by the Boston Symphony. While the adagio was heavy-laden dynamically, the minuet received a sturdy but not excessive beat and the trio was smoothly interwoven. The tempo of the finale, marked "presto," was somewhat driven, nevertheless causing obscurity in some of the detail, particularly in transitory passages.

Miss Posselt demonstrated exceptional violinistic talents both interpretively and technically. Her handling of the Hindemith's intricate structure was admirable, and Mr. Bernstein provided a beautifully pliant background, being constantly alert to the soloist's motives.

The violinist was at her best in the andante, extracting sensitive poetry from the instrument with tones of crystalline purity. In spite of the score's suppression of much of the bristling difficulties in the vivace, Miss Posselt projected its materials with eclat, even the hazardous cadenza being subject to few moments of imperfection.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2, in C major, adapted itself more happily to Mr. Bernstein's metier and temperament than did the Haydn. One might take issue with the retarded tempo and somewhat affected treatment of the adagio and with the accelerated tempo of the scherzo but it was nevertheless an excellent summation of its salient qualities. The program will be resumed Saturday night, with Bach's Cantata No. 50, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Mozart's Requiem Mass. Robert Shaw will conduct.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

AUG 9 - 1947

Centenary Methodist Church is losing a tenor soloist as Louis C. Purdey leaves his post here as industrial manager of the Chamber of Commerce to become general manager of the Brunswick, Ga., Chamber of Commerce. . . . Frances Yeend, who was one of the soloists Tuesday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Berkshire Festival, will be soloist Sunday afternoon, Aug. 17, at the Brevard Festival. . . . David Witherspoon, the Greensboro tenor who sang the leading role in "Tales of Hoffman" here at the Piedmont Festival, is busy with choir work at Grace Methodist Church in his hometown and is working up a concert program which he will present in various cities in this area in the Fall.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 9 1947

THESE DAYS

by GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York — an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man —73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never —or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contribution to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

AUG - 9 1947

These Days

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

TANGLEWOOD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntairly, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N.B.C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 11 1947

Music Festival Record Smashed

LENOX, Aug. 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the tenth annual three-week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of twelve thousand attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to one hundred and one thousand, eighteen thousand more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as one hundred and forty-six thousand as compared with one hundred and twenty-five thousand in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 9 - 1947

'Idomeneo' Is Candidate for Opera Stage

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9.—After the able performance given Mozart's "Idomenso" by the student forces of the Berkshire Music Center, the opera, to my thinking, looms as a strong possibility for professional performance. Boris Goldovsky and his assistants worked many weeks; first of all to put the libretto, a meandering and confused thing in the latter parts, into a shape that was acceptable.

In doing so he was forced to make several cuts, combine scenes, make two characters into one, the priest and Arbace and, consequently, excise parts of the music itself. A number of musical parts were of necessity omitted, a matter, which to listeners not acquainted with the score, did not seem of extreme importance.

Put Action Into Chorus.

"Idomeneo" was presented in three acts, with subdivisions. It is an opera in the stylized, classic spirit, and thus not one calling for acting in the sense of lyric drama, but rather for the quiet statuesque movements of an "orfeo" or an "alceste."

Yet in these movements, as Mr. Goldovsky handled the situation, there was the feeling of motion and selectivity. For instance, the chorus was not just thrown onto stage in bunches, a pack here, another there, all looking fixedly at something and singing when they had to. Instead he had his choral mass, giving some semblance of taking part in the action. The chorus people walked and made gestures without stealing interest from the main part of the proceedings at any moment. When the chorus was featured in the music and the plot itself, of course, it could not help being the center of attention.

Only Elettra, so tellingly impersonated by Paula Lenchner, showed any kinetic activity at all. And, as we know the lady from her Orestean experiences, this would appear to have been imperative. Otherwise, the principals behaved in the very special manner we associated with the Grecian drama.

Enchanting Music.

The music of "Idomeneo" is so fine and so enchanting that it is a pity we did not get performances of the work before this. The Mozart of this period is again a Mozart who gives intimations of other musical styles to come. It is not difficult, for instance to recognize suggestions of present day dissonances, of the melodic turn of phrase of Brahms, of Verdi and other composers after his time.

Actually, there is not one instant that is not absorbing in the whole score, or as much of it as we were permitted to hear because of the revisions in the libretto. The second act, where Mozart's invention is at the peak, is remarkable in its dramatic, melodic and harmonic qualities. The quartet for the chief voices is, I believe, one of his supreme achievements. And the writing for the chorus is especially vigorous and communicative.

"Idomeneo" was good enough to be one of Mozart's two favorites among his operas, the other being "Don Giovanni." It is surely good enough, as has so convincingly been shown by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center for yours truly.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

AUG 9 - 1947

Richard Bales conducted 9 of the 18 Watergate concerts. There he made his conductorial debut in 1935 at the age of 19 upon the invitation of Dr. Hans Kindler, the eminent conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, who is always alert to discover and encourage young talent. He has been guest conductor for most of the major orchestras of the United States. Following the success of his first appearance as guest conductor of the Naumburg Concerts in Central Park, he has been invited back three times. Serge Koussevitzky chose him for private instruction in 1940 as one of a group of five outstanding and coming young American conductors. Since 1943 Mr. Bales has been in charge of the musical presentations at the National Gallery of Art.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS

A Nation Matures

—BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY—

IT WAS NOT a fight between Joe Louis and some contender. It was not the Army-Notre Dame game. It was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the first to the ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city.

No Accident

This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive — in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in mid-Summer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before.

Resounding Cheers

When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist.

As I milled in the crowd, during intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place.

They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured.

On Upgrade

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government subsidies, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1947

Busy At ABC . . . With Wednesday already set as its comedy night of the radio schedule for next Fall the boys at ABC are lining up Tuesday as the No. 1 evening for serious listening. Effective Sept. 2, America's Town Meeting of the Air will be switched from Thursday to Tuesdays at 8:30 P. M., immediately preceding the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will give fans two solid hours of forum and concert music. Thursday is also being slated as a comedy night. The network is shooting for the new cigaret show featuring Don Ameche, Frank Morgan and Frances Langford. If it lands this plum, the entertainment will be spotted on Wednesdays to supplement Henry Morgan, Bing Crosby and Lionel Barrymore. In that event, the Abbott and Costello series, now tentatively scheduled for Wednesdays, would be aired on Thursdays. And around them, on this night, ABC would build a number of laugh shows. These would be selected from 16 new comedy programs now under consideration.

Springfield, Mass
AUG 9 - 1947

OFF Stage
By W. Harley Rudkin
THEATRE

Columbia (M-MM-688) Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 9; Philharmonic Symphony of New York, Efrem Kurtz conducting. Composer's jubilant outpourings of victory over Nazis. Last of trilogy which started with Seventh, dedicated to heroes of Leningrad. Music light-hearted and sprightly; fidelity and interpretation excellent...Songs from "Northwest Outpost," sung by Nelson Eddy; orchestra and chorus under direction of Robert Armbruster (Columbia, M-MM-690). Disappointing projection of Friml's score for picture. Mr. Eddy sings "Love Is The Time," "Nearer and Dearer," "Tell Me With Your Eyes," "One More Mile," and "Raindrops On a Drum," the latter the best of a not particularly clear recording.

Adele Addison, young Springfield soprano who won a scholarship at Tanglewood this season, is making fine progress. This week she appeared in the American premiere of Mozart's "Idomeneo," and prior to that she had sung roles in other operatic concerts.

At the close of one of these, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was so impressed with her performance that he went backstage to congratulate her. But no one could find Adele.

Next day, they told her of the circumstance, and asked her where she had gone. It isn't everyday that "Koussie" goes backstage with personal commendation. Completely unaware that her performance had been anything out of the ordinary Adele said, "I went home and went to bed."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1947

DISC Discussions

By VINCENT E. CLARK

For several months the two major record manufacturing companies have been announcing their intentions to produce complete scores of the operas during the forthcoming winter season. Columbia, for example, plans to do its recording directly from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, using the effective asoustics of the playhouse while RCA Victor proposes to make its recording inside its studios.

The first of the postwar recordings of a full opera, La Traviata, however, was made by neither of these methods. It was recorded in Rome by Columbia, at the opera house there, under the direction of Vincenzo Bellezza, and it is an excellent recording job. The cast is superb and the recording engineering, sans surface noises, is almost perfect. Verdi's La Traviata, of course, is a melodious work and when it is presented as it is in this two volume, 15-record offering, it is worth owning.

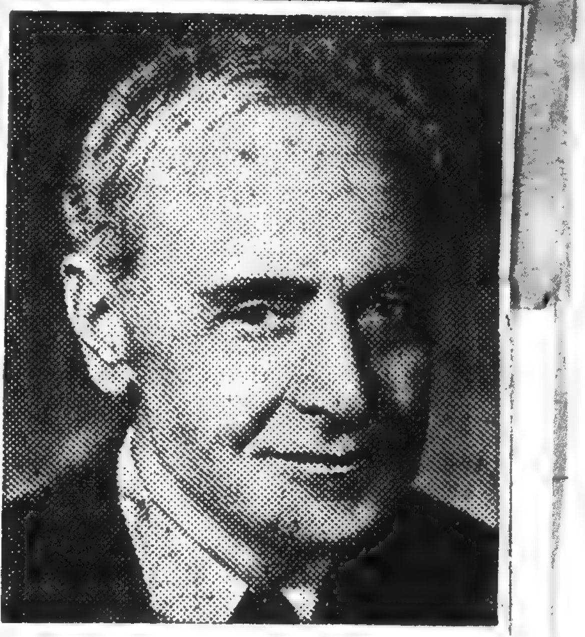
RCA Victor, previously, issued a repressing of its recording of Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, waxed before the war. While it also is a fine job, a comparison of the two will disclose the remarkable advance in recording engineering during the past several years.

La Traviata is the third major offering of Columbia this season. The first was a two-volume recording of Nahel's Messiah and the second was a three-volume set of Handel's Grosso Concerti, both made with meticulous care as to musical perfection and sound fidelity. There were several slight cuts in the score of the Messiah, but on the whole it was an excellent piece of work.

The one major offering of RCA Victor this week is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's recording of exceprts from Prokofiev's ballet suite, Romeo and Juliet. It is a melodic work, remarkably well done under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, tracing the somber story of the Shakespearian lovers, the total effects ranging from estatic joy to profound tragedy.

In the popular field, the offerings are not too heavy this week, the major Columbia album being a series of nostalgic waltzes played by Abe Lyman's orchestra. These recordings are excellent and, for many, will take them back in memory to their college and high school dance days. They include such numbers as Charmaine, Down By the Old Mill Stream, Missouri Waltz. Meet Me Tonight In Dreamland, Jeannine and others.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL
AUG 9 - 1947



Sergei Koussevitzky

RECORDED MUSIC

Prokofieff Music Found Strong, Able

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

Shortly after Sergei Prokofieff had completed his magnificent "Concerto No. 2, in G Minor, for Violin and Orchestra," he began work on a ballet entitled "Romeo and Juliet." The famous composer-pianist had returned to the USSR in 1932 and had made his peace with the Soviet authorities. Now his music would be on trial. If it should fail to be in agreement with the tenets and, shall one say, the whims of the dictators of art and taste in Sovietland, Prokofieff would be branded as a composer unworthy of being heard by his countrymen; if it should meet the requirements of the all-powerful arbiters, there would be applause, encouragement and support.

Prokofieff passed the test long before he wrote his "Violin Concerto No. 2" and "Romeo and Juliet." The Soviet Union became proud of him. What is more, it had every reason to boast of Prokofieff's achievements. It is true that in recent years the USSR has bestowed more praise upon Shostakovich than it has seen fit to give to Prokofieff; but this does not mean, and cannot mean, that Shostakovich is a greater composer than Prokofieff. My own judgment, whatever it is worth, tells me that the man who wrote the "Violin Concerto in G. Minor" will, as time goes on, be hailed as an abler writer of music than the man who created the long-winded and blatantly advertised "Leningrad Symphony."

Excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," as played with sumptuous orchestral tone by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (RCA Victor Album 1129), enable one, I believe, to arrive at an accurate judgment concerning the composer's skill. The music is intensely and graphically programmatic, but it never degenerates into that meretricious and tawdry type of descriptive writing which soon becomes painful to one's ears. Prokofieff puts strength into his work. It is a strength characteristic of him and of him alone. Furthermore, his music is individualistic to a striking degree. Prokofieff has been an industrious student of many styles of writing; but, by reason of the alchemy of his remarkable skill, he has been able to avoid copying. His command of the resources of the orchestra is as comprehensive as it is extraordinary.

The readings of Dr. Koussevitzky do not always elicit unequivocal praise from those whose business it is to hand down verdicts; but no one can deny with even the slightest semblance of justice that Boston's famous conductor is a past master of the art of producing ravishingly beautiful orchestral tone and of giving thrilling emphasis to tone color. Koussevitzky's performance of the excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ("Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Dance" and "Romeo at Juliet's Grave") is stirring. The recording is exceptionally fine.

Leopold Stokowski has made an excellent arrangement of the beautiful waltzes contained in Johann Strauss' "Die Fledermaus" ("The Bat"), and under his dynamic direction the Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra gives a tonally resplendent performance of the transcription (RCA Victor 10-1310).

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS

by GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

COPYRIGHT BY KING FEATURES

Tanglewood

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitsky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

* * *

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in mid-summer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contribution to American culture.

* * *

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 9 - 1947

Some Modernism Not So Difficult to Take

By C. E. L.

Two contemporary compositions have just emerged from the recording studios which represent modernism's best foot forward. It would flatter Richard Strauss to be placed in that category; there are even those who begrudge Prokofieff the distinction, if it is one.

But they are both living and both have had a wider acceptability than ever so many other modernists. Strauss's "The Bourgeois Gentilhomme" is so lucid and objective that this composition almost deserves to be placed in the same category with those of younger composers who are leaving dissonance behind in favor of melody. Here Strauss manifests his wit, which was always keen, unencumbered by bombast. He comes very close to the Strauss of "Rosenkavalier." As a matter of fact, it comes very close to Prokofieff's sardonic moments. The Russian's recording is his "Romeo and Juliet," Suite No. 2. The Strauss number is a Columbia product, performed by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner and Prokofeiff's ballet music is done by Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra under the Victor label. Both are excellently recorded, the Bostonian album particularly so.

The Prokofieff suite starts with the most sonorous side ever recorded. The volume is almost too great for the dissonances used. This time it is not dissonance for its own sake for the clashing tones are highly descriptive of the collision between the two august houses of Verona whose tragic differences have been the subject of several composers previously—Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikovsky. In about that order they have been singularly successful in setting this immortal story to music but I think that Prokofieff, if anything, is superior to his predecessors.

The music represents a condensation of quite a long ballet which was some time getting into production. Only the high lights of the story are here touched upon but there is enough to give the atmosphere and the continuity. Prokofieff at first contrived a happy ending for the work but was prevailed upon to stick to the original and the finish is suitably somber, although it ends upon a major chord.

* * *

THREE RECENT Columbia albums are strictly commercial items and will be seized upon by the many devotees of the maestros concerned: Xavier Cugat, a collection of tangos; Abe Lyman, a set of four records, all in waltz time; and Andre Kostelanetz favorites, which has Jalousie, Fire Dance, Monastery Garden and others.

Popular Records

COLUMBIA: Frankie Carle, "The Glow-Worm" and "Penguine at the Waldorf."

Doris Day, "I'm Still Sitting Under the Apple Tree" and "When Johnny Is Just a Memory."

The Modernaires, "Something in the Wind" and "The Turntable Song."

Chu Berry, "Chuberry Jam" and "Maelstrom."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

Tanglewood.

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every State to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in mid-summer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that thousands were G. I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years, but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least thirty-five symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

What is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people, who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL

AUG 9 - 1947

Music and Drama

Canadians Prominent At Tanglewood Festival

By COLIN SABISTON

LENOX THEATRE (Tanglewood, Mass., Aug. 8 (Staff).—These Massachusets hills are full of Canadians. Last week I joined the group from Canada which captured Pittsfield, Lenox, Stockbridge and other adjacent centres—and captors never had a better time.

The other night I went to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert and got all tangled up in the search for my seats among a group of people I see all the year around in Toronto auditoriums. Next night I went to the opera and heard a Canadian sing the title role in Mozart's Idomeneo. And on Tuesday evening I went across the road to the Rollins Theatre (Lenox Theatre to you), and ran bang into Floyd and Mrs. Chalmers; saw their daughter Joan on the stage; saw Michael Ney, with other actors and actresses, performing Laurence Houseman's St. Francis; and met a New York composer who has collaborated with Toronto's Herman Voaden in the writing of an opera.

That is a partial list. At every stop light there is near me a Canadian car with someone leaning out of the window to cry a cheery "Hi, Sab!" It is a kind of preview of the Canadian National Exhibition—except that there is nothing here but music and scenery.

Scenery Competes

AT THE moment, I must confess, I am more interested in the scene—human and mountainous—than in art. Last night, for instance, I had to drive off the highway into a private lane while the most tremendous thunderstorm in my experience made fireworks on the top of my car. Every blast of thunder not only shook my windows, but the very earth on which I stood jumped like a nervous cat. Strange to say, I was not afraid. I thought quietly to myself, well, my boy, if this is yours, here it is; and if it is not yours, you are at least not getting wet. In the end I did get wet—but I did not get hit; and I also got my supper and returned to Tanglewood to see Serge Koussevitzky conduct his Boston Symphony Orchestra in some of the later Beethoven symphonies.

There may be better orchestras in the world, and better conductors, too. But there is no better orchestra and no better conductor to give Beethoven's last movement of the Pastoral Symphony a better performance in a better setting. The ordinary cliche for an experience like this is to say one's hair stood on end. But that night my shoes came off—and I liked it.

If anyone tells me that Tanglewood is the most efficient summer music centre in the world I will not dispute him. The shed—a great steel supported roof with no walls—has almost perfect acoustics; if one prefers the sky, then stay outside and the music sounds just as well; if you want to talk with your chance neighbor during a dull passage (even Koussevitzky cannot make all the music in the world always all-absorbing, then you just speak up—and a nice time is had by all.

Toronto Players

I FOUND Torontonians playing fiddles, painting scenery, spouting Moliere and just relaxing, under almost every tree. Actors and musicians at the Rollins Drama School included Andrew MacMillan, Andrew Zubak, Pegi Brown, Michael Ney, Audrey Mitchell, Diana Thompson, Toronto pianist George Crum, Shirley Smith, Louise Roy of Winnipeg and the Toronto Conservatory of Music, Marguerite Tanner, and Joan Chalmers, who is the only student of stagecraft from Canada at this institution.

If you ask me what were they doing, the answer is everything. Crum is making musical arrangements; others are singing and acting (combining two courses), and the others are just working to give marvellously good performances of Shaw's Fanny's First Play (last week) and Houseman's St. Francis (this week). They also have done Moliere's Imaginary Invalid—and brooding over them all is Boss Rollins, Dr. John Reich as drama director and Nicholas Goldschmidt of the Toronto Conservatory of Music, in charge of all musical matters pertaining to this theatre.

Take all that; add umpteen thousand Americans from every state in the Union; add, also, some of New England's finest scenery; overall, lend an ear to the symphonies and chamber music events under Koussevitzky, and you have the Tanglewood Music Festival picture. There are no competitions; no yelpings for priorities—but there are traffic cops for every turn in the road—and, believe me, they are needed.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER

AUG 9 - 1947

These Days

By GEORGE SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight btween Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army- Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

AUG 9 - 1947

Zino Francescatti, violinist, will make his debut on the Telephone Hour at 8 p.m. Monday, Aug. 25. When he played recently at Lewisohn Stadium, his mother was in the audience. She had been a violinist herself but had given it up when she was married. She resumed her career in France 43 years later, however . . .

Centenary Methodist Church is losing a tenor soloist as Louis C. Purdey leaves his post here as industrial manager of the Chamber of Commerce to become general manager of the Brunswick, Ga., Chamber of Commerce. . . . Frances Yeend, who was one of the soloists Tuesday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Berkshire Festival, will be soloist Sunday afternoon, Aug. 17, at the Brevard Festival. . . David Witherspoon, the Greensboro tenor who sang the leading role in "Tales of Hoffman" here at the Piedmont Festival, is busy with choir work at Grace Methodist Church in his hometown and is working up a concert program which he will present in various cities in this area in the Fall.

ROCHESTER, MINN.
POST BULLETIN
AUG 9 1947

George E. Sokolsky—

Good Music Captures Imagination of Youth

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was Serge Koussevitsky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzwy's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 9 - 1947

Tanglewood Manners

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The other night I heard something that disproves in part your editorial of Aug. 4 saying that Tanglewood audiences are inconsiderate. I went to the end of the queue extending from the ticket window where tickets can be procured for concerts of the Berkshire Music Center. Tickets for general admission were very limited. The last [illegible] in line asked me if I had been there before. He said he asked because he was letting those who had not, stand in front of him.

TREVOR TEELE.
Windsor Mountain School,
Lenox.

AUSTIN, MINN.
HERALD
AUG 9 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY: More of Tanglewood

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzy directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialities in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the boads. The Berkshires remain primitive — in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listen — and drove back to New York — an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

Audience of 12,000

The Ninth was done on a Thursday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorales had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man — 73 this year — stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never — or could ever — read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfield a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the U. S., is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listen to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone. — (Copyright, 1927, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)
*?aOg-

SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS By George E. Sokolsky

TANGLEWOOD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—seventy-three this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's Ode To Joy in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least thirty-five symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the National Broadcasting Corporation and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
AUG 9 - 1947

Records Broken As Tanglewood Festival Closes

More Than 100,000 Persons Have Attended; Final Concert Tomorrow

Tomorrow, the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, comes to an end. This year's Festival, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, broke all attendance records, with as many as 14,000 at single concerts, and more than 100,000 at the 15 concerts.

The 1947 Festival included Bach and Mozart programs by a chamber orchestra, and nine Festival concerts in the Music Shed. These included a Beethoven cycle, culminating with the Ninth Symphony at an extra concert. A special "Music for All" concert on July 29 demonstrated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's part in the dissemination of symphonic music by phonograph and radio.

Robert Shaw will conduct this evening's concert, which will include the Mozart "Requiem," with the same soloists as for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; the Bach Cantata No. 50 "Nun is das Heil;" and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

Final Concert Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the closing concert of the season Sunday afternoon, with Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, with two Pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

AUG 9 - 1947

America Has Matured

George E. Sokolsky

George Sokolsky

IT WAS NOT A FIGHT BETWEEN JOE LOUIS and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city.

This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE NINTH WAS DONE ON A TUESDAY night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before.

When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn as a missed note by a pianist.

Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

BUT ALL OF THEM, VOLUNTARILY, BY A conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney island or Brighton beach or some such place.

They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich the nation with their contributions to American culture.

I SPEAK HERE ONLY OF MUSIC, FOR AT THE moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itsef into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidies controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

TORONTO, CANADA
STAR

AUG 9 - 1947

Stewart Brings Orchestra

Reginald Stewart, founder of the "Proms" in Toronto, is to bring his Baltimore Symphony Orchestra to Massey Hall for a concert on Nov. 20. He is spending vacation time at Cape Cod and partly on a visit to his parents in Toronto . . . Irwin Dillon, young tenor of Toronto, sang recently with the Chatauqua Symphony Orchestra at Chatauqua. He has already had engagements with three opera companies, and is a New York church soloist . . . Joseph Laderoute, Canadian tenor, sang the title role of Mozart's "Idomeneo" at the Tanglewood festival in the Berkshires.

CONNEAUT, OHIO
NEWS-HERALD

AUG 9 - 1947

Sunday afternoon at 5:15 "Symphony Hall" features the Brahms Concerto in D Major. Jascha Heifetz is soloist, with Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Students At Berkshire School Of Music

ADELE ADDISON, soprano, of Springfield, Mass., is in the Opera Class and has been awarded the Hancock prize, a scholarship at Westminster Choir College, from which she graduated last year and sang the role of Zernina in "Don Giovanni," produced at Tanglewood in July.

KEMPER HERRELD, head of the Music Department at Atlanta-Spelman Morehouse Colleges in Atlanta, is an Auditor at the Berkshire School of Music and a member of the Festival Chorus under Robert Shaw. He has been head of music at the Atlanta Colleges for more than twenty years.

PENELOPE JOHNSON, well-known violinist, second-year student at the Berkshire School of Music in the Advanced Orchestra Class. Miss Johnson has appeared in many concerts and is one of the few violin artists on the concert stage.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMSTERDAM STAR NEWS

AUG 9 - 1947

MUSIC

By Nora Holt

Eight Scholarship Students At Berkshire Music School

Requirements for scholarships and paid study at the Berkshire Music School in Lenox, Mass., under the direction of Serge Koussevitzsky, are high and signifies that the applicant has already shown exceptional talent by previous matriculation, experience and performance in various musical fields, and has arrived at a serious aim and purpose. Of the 425 students this season at the school, eight are Negroes which shows a gain of five over last year's entrants. Dr. Koussevitzsky's address at the opening of the fifth season stressed the obligation of the artist to his society and era which should be the fundamental aim of every musician. "It is the mission", said the maestro, "of the artist not only to reflect his time, environment and life of his people, but also to shape the consciousness of the masses, to seek inspiration in the pathos of their constructive effort. He must awaken the people from the passive acceptance of the values of art to an active interest in the work of art."

These and other related observations might seem to students, he remarked, "as extending beyond the scope and objective aims of our school". But it should be more and more apparent to musicians that with practical study and advancement goes the mission to help shape the structure of life, culture and art of a race. Nothing of serious purpose, dignity and continuous application will reflect the great heritage we possess which must be used to aid in placing our race on a higher plane before the people of the world.

A letter from Penelope Johnson, talented violinist, spending her second season at the Berkshire Music School, gives a brief detail of students working there this year. Last summer Miss Johnson, Martha Carman, 'cellist from Sandusky, Ohio, and the Lees, Everett and Sylvia Olden, formed the group granted scholarships. Mr. Lee, gifted violinist and conductor has a scholarship this summer at Juilliard, with an opportunity of conducting the student symphony on frequent occasions.

Adele Addison, soprano, of Springfield, Mass., has proven her seriousness as an artist. She is a graduate of Westminster Choir College, has given a number of sucessful concerts and is working in the Opera Dept. under Boris Goldowsky, the only colored in the class. She recently appeared in the role of Zerlina in "Don Giovanni" with favorable faculty comments.

Kermit Moore, 'cellist, is from Arkon, Ohio, student at the Cleveland Institute of Music and a member of the Cleveland Philharmonic Orchestra. He is a member of the Advance Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzsky and in July played the Saint-Saens' Cello Concerto with the orchestra.

Ernest W. Simms, oboe-ist is from Tuskegee Institute, has been studying at the Boston Conservatory under Mr. Gillet. He is a member of the Dept. V. Orchestra under Richard Buigin. Also played oboe in the Navy Band.

Kenneth M. Burke, tympanist from Boston, holds a B. S. degree from Tufts College in Engineering. Spent three years as an engineer in the Navy and conducted the band. He is a member of the Boston Civic Orchestra and was accepted in the Advanced Orchestra Class at Lenox.

Kemper Harreld, well-known violinist and head of the music department at Atlanta-Spelman-Morehouse Colleges at Atlanta, is an auditor working in the Festival Chorus while attending lectures and concerts.

Janice Johnson, composer-pianist, from Washington, D. C., received degrees from Howard and Minor Teachers College and her master's from the Chicago Musical College. She received honorable mention for a composition submitted recently in the Boston Pops contest for Negro composers. Member of the Composition class and Festival Chorus under Robert Shaw.

Penelope Johnson noted young violinist, has been heard in the East in many concerts and is highly regarded as a serious musican whose fine character and charming personality point to a rosey future.

Concerts in the music shed at Tangelwood, Lenox, Mass., by the Boston Symphony, the Festival Chorus, Chamber Music, motion pictures and lectures, have drawn a record crowd to the Berkshires. The credit goes to the great music philanthropist, Dr. Koussevitzsky and the many musicans and patrons of art who have sustained him in this noble experiment - a school of music for the youth of America where they may study, hear and participate in the best music provided by the finest musicians of our time.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 9 - 1947

The New Recordings

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING		PERFORMANCE AND CONTENT
	Recording Technique	Surface
HANDEL, 12 CONCERTI GROSSI, Opus 6. Busch Chamber Players. A. Busch, E. Drucker, vls. H. Busch, cello. M. Horszowski, harps. continuo. Columbia M 685(25) 3 vols. $28.50	Vigorous, lots of highs; sometimes bit heavily recorded. Fine balance between solos, tutti, harpsichord. Slight distortion apparent on a few sides.	A to B+	(See below) Big collection endlessly varied, short, mostly interchangeable movements—top listening. Playing is good, though sometimes coarse; ensemble uneven. Correct instrs. adds to ease of listening, liveness.
BACH, BRANDENBURG CONCERTO #2. a) Boyd Neel Orch. London Decca EDA 27 (2) $5	Broad perspective, wide range. Piano far too prominent (shouldn't be there at all).	A—	Both tonally overweight. Neel is smoother; uses original valveless clarino. BSO uses high-B♭ trumpet. Both use piano, wrongly. Unpleasantly prominent in Neel; in background in BSO.
b) Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky. With #5) Victor M 1118 (4) $5	Good, (SRL July 12) but less effective recording than above. Surfaces poor.	B+ to B
RAVEL, DAPHNIS AND CHLOE, Suites 1 & 2. Paris Conservatory Orch. Münch. London Decca EDA 29 (2) $7.50	Ultra high fidelity, cavernously live, like other ffrrs. Very brilliant effects here.	A—	Both suites together; an outstanding all-French performance. Quite unlike domestic recordings.
RUSSIAN MELODIES. Piatigorsky, cello; R. Berkowitz, pf. Columbia M 684 (3 10") $3	Another in series of this type album. Balance is off—too much cello, too close. Fine liveness.	A	Familiar trifles. Not as effective as recent Francescatti album (SRL Apr. 5) Too much Piatigorsky.

CONCERTI GROSSI

THE huge three-volume recording of all twelve of Handel's Concerti Grossi opus 6 (above) is for me one of the most welcome releases in many years—for here is a prize example of repertory versus non-repertory. These concertos are customarily found in that class of music where a "representative" example is considered sufficient for historical reference and occasional repertory performance. Arbitrarily, inexplicably, Concertos numbers 5 and 6 are the choice, and these two we hear every time (until some people, a bit naïvely, assume that perhaps these are in fact the only good ones), just as the official Haydn symphony in every music appreciation book was for so many years the everlasting "Surprise"; as Palestrina turns up on choral programs with his unimportant "Sicut Cervus"; as Lassus, the multi-prolific genius, is neatly boiled down to the eternal "Matona, Lovely Maiden," one of his duller works; as Gluck is tied to his "Orpheus" ballet music and "Divinités du Stix"—fine but hardly unique examples of his genius; as even a man like Ibert cannot escape from his early "Escales," Liadov from that endlessly "Enchanted Lake," Poulenc from his "Perpetual Motion"! We might mention in passing the thirty-two full-length oratorios of which "Messiah" is number 16 and the music in forty-seven Handel operas, ninety-nine per cent of which is never heard.

I defy any listener to explain on musical grounds why the relatively familiar Concertos numbers 5 and 6 in this set are in any way more extraordinary than the ten other works of genius here unfolded, most of which are utterly unknown in this country! I challenge anyone to find more superb music of its sort than this endlessly varied collection of the best, the most honest and straightforward, the most subtle of the Handel musical output.

For those who have enjoyed the elaborately transcribed "Water Music," "Fireworks," and other synthetic Handel suites à la Beecham—here are forty-nine sides of the same music or better, and in its original state, too, unmarred by that "modernization" that does little more than make this music sound both antique and childish.

EDWARD TATNALL CANBY.

PITTSBURGH PA.
SUN
AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS

Beethoven At Tanglewood

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

IT WAS not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listen — and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glamorous about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

(Copyright, 1947 King Features Synd. Inc.)

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 9 - 1947

THESE DAYS IN AMERICA

Tanglewood Offers Inspiring Lesson

By George E. Sokolsky

IT was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets, bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The Music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE NINTH was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, per- aps as many as 12,000. A chorus 250 young music students, be- en the ages of 18 and 22, sang Beethoven's chorals never had sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most in that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

BUT ALL of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I SPEAK here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing bu the unimpaired right to pursu their own courses without interference by the state. I listened t Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewoo with that as a constant overtone.

Copyright, 1947, King Features Synd., In

This Clipping From SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
AUG 13 1947

George Sokolsky

Tanglewood Called Example of Nation's Cultural Upsurge

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York— an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year— stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or missed a note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind- And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I liste to Beethoven's Ninth at Tang

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

AUG 4 - 1947

noise against Republican members ing swan, which is

George Sokolsky

He's Just a Simple Fellow, Who Likes Music, Not Noise

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie Hall to listen to the Philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts. I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston Symphony during the Festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics of the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax, maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Oopland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the Century of the Common Man of the Nazi or Communists of other busy-bodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

Then I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done with caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston Symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music; as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD

AUG 9 - 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Serie It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Be thoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidential response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne, and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York — an eight hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enoromus, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of the huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermission, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of the American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural developement in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpared right to pursue their owu courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

LEBANON, MO.
DAILY RECORD
AUG 9 1947

George Sokolsky Says:

Tanglewood

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitsky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Sokolsky

Twenty-four thousand American, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from the big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tnglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could never—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N.B.C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tnglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
TUCSON, ARIZ.
CITIZEN
AUG 11 1947

America On The Upgrade

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the first to the ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the first to the ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theatre will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

CROOKSTON, MINN.
TIMES
AUG 9 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Sokolsky Wants His Music Sweet

(Copyright 1947, by King Features Syndicate)

I am not a musician nor even a music critic. But I like to go to concerts. Every other Sunday, during the winter, when I am in New York, I go to Carnegie hall to listen to the philharmonic. During the summer, when I am up in the Berkshires in Massachusetts, I go to Tanglewood three times each week to listen to the Boston symphony during the festival.

I do not try to understand music as I do a table of statistics or the politics of Henry Wallace. There are scientists called musicologists who devote themselves to understanding music. With them, it is like mathematics; something with formulae.

I just go to listen. I like Tanglewood most of all because I can see the pine-covered hills and the sky while I listen. I even like it when it rains. Sometimes it is good to listen to music and rain. It is soothing.

This year I shall hear all nine of Beethoven's symphonies, one right after the other in order. That will be a new experience for me, although I have tried it with records. Still, records are not the same as sitting in the big shed in Tanglewood up in the green Berkshires. No records can be like that.

I know that I shall stretch my legs, relax , maybe chew a cigar, and listen. Do I know why Beethoven wrote No. 1 or No. 5 or No. 9? No! And I don't care. It would be the same to me if his name were Smith or Jones. All I want to do is to listen and to be transported to the infinite.

So the musicians spoil it all for me. They play something by Aaron Copland that hits me over the head. To me it is no longer music because I cannot listen. I am pushed. I am kicked around. It has something to do with the century of the common man or the Nazi or Communists or other busybodies. It is a factory, a mill, a mine. It is terrific—that is, the noise is terrific.

I come the next day and they give me a dose of Stravinsky which sounds in places like a million GI's rubbing dungarees on tin washboards. The rubbing is fearsome. I am told that it all has to do with some kind of ancient Russian springtime ritualistic dance. If that is a Russian springtime, then those people have never walked down a lane with a pretty girl in the newness of the year. If that is the music they used to dance to, it must have been done wih caterpillar tractors.

The critics say this is absolute music, but I am a simple fellow who likes Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert and even Jerome Kern and Gershwin. But do I have to like noise, too? Do I have to go to Tanglewood to hear the Boston symphony produce the sounds of a newspaper press room? Maybe the critics like the arithmetic of music: as for me, give me beauty of melody, rapture of expression, intensity of feeling. I leave the physics of the celestial orbs to the atomic scientists. Their music is, boom!! That's really what Copland and Stravinsky sound like to me—just a lot of boom.

Maybe I ought not to step into the domain of the music critics. They apparently know what it is all about and like it. Or maybe, up at Tanglewood, they ought to have special sessions for critics and musicologists and such experts who can do their calculus while they watch Maestro Koussevitzky or his protege, Leonard Bernstein, belabor their minions through the cacophony called modern music. But for simple folks who just want to listen to beauty, this fare is too heady, like vodka spiked with anisette.

And the question arises: Why must everything modern be so exhibitionistic, so bombastic, so tough on the ear and the soul? Why must it all sound like a lie—like a small boy's lie? Why must even music be so unmannerly, so gross, so grotesque? Youth tells me it is the spirit of the age—two wars with a depression in between. What a spiritless age!

MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra Won't Visit City

The Boston symphony orchestra, it was disclosed Thursday, will not come to Milwaukee this season because there is no available place of suitable size for the orchestra to play.

The Auditorium, where the Boston organization, under Serge Koussevitzky, has played for the last two years to soldout houses, has been engaged for Dec. 6 and Dec. 7 by the International institute. The Boston orchestra makes its annual tour in December and could come to Milwaukee only Dec. 6. Under auspices of the Arion Musical club, the orchestra has made its annual concert one of the leading events of the musical season.

The Auditorium management explained that the Dec. 6 date could not be made available to the Arion club because the International institute, with its annual "fair," takes over practically the entire building for two full days.

The Arion club Thursday announced its series of concerts at the Auditorium for the coming season as follows: Rise Stevens, mezzo soprano, Nov. 7; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, Jan. 29; Yolanda Petris, soprano, Feb. 21; the Arions' presentation of the Bach B Minor Mass, Apr. 4, and Artur Rubinstein, pianist, Apr. 20. In addition, the club will present Serge Jaroff's Don Cossacks choir Dec. 4, its annual "Messiah concert Dec. 16 and its junior spring concert May 22.

BUSY MAN: Vladimir Dukelsky, who went to Paris last March, has been as busy as a one-armed paper hanger. He has been composing, producing radio shows, arranging concerts of American music and preparing ballets. And the Vernon Duke side of him has written a new operetta, "En Valsant," which is scheduled to open in Paris in December. He has so much to do, in fact, that he reports he will not be returning to this country till the spring. His first job when he got to France was a series of bilingual Franco-American broadcasts for Radio Diffusion Francaise. They were called "Broadway-Champs Elyseés" and featured Anne Francine, an American, and Claude Alphand, a Frenchman. Because of his "April in Paris," Mr. Dukelsky was commissioned to write seven more Paris songs for the series. The broadcasts will be resumed in the fall. His ballet, "Le Pal des Blanchisseuses," is being given this summer at Deauville and he has since completed another one with George Balanchine, "La Robe de Mariée." His Third symphony will receive its world première in Brussels in October and he is now writing a cantata, "Paris Prelude."

This Clipping From
ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
AUG 10 1947

* * * *

LAST TUESDAY'S broadcast by the Boston Symphony of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony closed the current radio season of that orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra, soloists and chorus in as fine a performance of the great choral symphony as we have ever heard.

The evening was aided materially by fine engineering on the part of the broadcast crew, something which has been lacking all season. The orchestra is too often made to sound as though the music were coming from a warped recording.

The Ninth had not been performed all year, to the best of our knowledge.

That made Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it all the more welcome.

The Boston is our finest symphony orchestra, and a great many of us will find it difficult waiting until that 8:30 p. m. spot every Tuesday finds the orchestra back on the air.

* * * *

TWO MEN, one connected with comedy in the 1700s and the other on contemporary Broadway, will join forces this fall for a new Main Stem show.

The 18th Century half of the project is Joe Miller, to whom is attributed every hoary, bewhiskered joke ever told.

14

Aug 10-47

Saratoga Spa Series Begins In September

Eight Concerts Are Listed; Programs Will Include Many Unfamiliar Works

Programs have been announced for the eight concerts of the third Saratoga Spa Music Festival on the evenings of Sept. 6, 7, 9, 11, 13, 14, 16 and 18 in the Spa Theater at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., where F. Charles Adler will conduct thirty-seven Philharmonic-Symphony Musicians. The works scheduled are:

Saturday, Sept. 6, soloist, Carl Stern, cellist. Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," Rossini; (a) Diversion for small orchestra, Edward Burlingame Hill; (c) Sinfonia Concertata in D major, Donizetti; Concert Piece for cello and strings, Boris Koutzen; (b) Serenade, Arcady Dubensky; Cello concerto in B flat, Boccherini; Excerpts from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

Sunday, Sept. 7, soloist, Walter Hendl, pianist. (a) Prelude to "Dark of the Moon" (concert version), Hendl; (c) Eclogue, Op. 7, Rabaud; (a) Rhapsody, Alexander North; (c) Variations on "What the Stupid Rabble Thinks" for piano and orchestra, Mozart-Toch; twelve Contra-dances, Beethoven; (a) Suite Symphonique, Camargo Guarnieri; Symphony No. 88, in G, Hayden.

Tuesday, Sept. 9, soloist, Monty Woolley, recitation. Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Schubert; (a) Ballad, "Edward" (narrator and orchestra), Brahms-Gianini; (c) Sinfonia funebre per la morte del Pontefice Pio VI, Paisiello; (a) A Toccata of Galuppi, Op. 58 (narrator and orchestra), Paul Pisk; (c) Dances of the Riddles, Leonid Polowinkin; (a) Recitations with orchestra, "Richard Corey" and "Miniver Cheevey," Philip James.

Thursday, Sept. 11; soloist, John Corigliano, violinist. (c) Overture to an unfinished Comic Opera, Saint-Saens; (c) Suite for small orchestra, Rober-Ducasse; (c) Five Pieces for small orchestra, Weprik; Humoresque in E major, Humperdinck; (b) Andante for violin and orchestra, Leo Dubensky; "Jena" Symphony, attributed to Beethoven; Violin concerto, Mendelssohn.

Saturday, Sept. 13; soloists, Michel Nazzi, oboe; Alexander Williams, clarinet. (a) Sinfonietta for strings, Will Gay Bottje; (a) Rhapsody for oboe and strings, Ashley Vernon Air and Dance, Delius; (c) Oboe concerto in C minor, Marcello; Concerto, C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg; Clarinet Concerto in A major Mozart (K. 622); (c) Symphony in C major attributed to Mozart.

Sunday, Sept. 14; soloist, Mary Simmons soprano. (b) Overture to "The Elfin Tavern Louis Edgar Johns; (c) Symphony No. 9 for strings, Mendelssohn; (c) "Nelson" aria Haydn; Overture to "The Flight Into Egypt," Berlioz; (c) Hester's Prayer, from "The Scarle Letter," Vittorio Giannini; (c) Interlude and recitative and aria from "Idomeneo," Mozart-Strauss; Symphony in G minor, Mozart.

Tuesday, Sept. 16: Soloists, Lydia Hoffmann Behrendt, pianist; John Corigliano, violinist Carl Stern, cellest. (c) Music for "Oedipus a Colonus," Guy Ropartz; Triple Concerto Beethoven; (c) Overture to "The World of the Moon," Haydn; (a) Ballet from "The Barber of Seville," Jiri-Benda-Felix Guenther (c) Piano Concerto No. 1, Ernst Krenek.

Thursday, Sept. 18: Soloist, John Wummer flutist, (a) Rhythmic Overture for strings, Mark Lawner; (c) Janiana Symphony for strings, Florent Schmitt; (c) In Memoriam M. H., Op. 7, Karl Wiener; Flute Concerto, Robert Casadesus; (c) Aria in D minor for strings, Padre Rafael Angles; Flute Concerto, Boccherini; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

(a) Specially written or arranged for the festival. (b) First Performance. (c) First performance in this country.

Tickets are obtainable now from the Saratoga Spa Music Festival, Inc., Ross Ketchum Building, Saratoga, N. Y. There will also be two extra concerts in Saratoga's large Convention Hall on Sunday afternoons, Sept. 7 and 14.

Six Orchestras Play In Edinburgh Festival

The Vienna Philharmonic Or- iestra will make its first post- ar British appearances in this immer's festival at Edinburgh, cotland, between Aug. 24 and ept. 13, giving three concerts at sher Hall under Bruno Walter's irection. Mr. Walter will also company Lotte Lehmann in a ecital of Brahms's songs. Todd uncan, American Negro bary- ne, will also give a recital.

The Glyndebourne Opera will esent Mozart's "The Marriage of garo" and Verdi's "Macbeth" the King's Theater. The cast r the former work includes Italo ıjo, of the Chicago Opera, as garo, and two Metropolitan Opera singers, Eleanor Steber and John Brownlee, as the Countess and the Count. Orchestras, in addition to the Vienna Philharmonic, which will take part in the festival are the Halle Orchestra, under John Barbirolli; the Liverpool Philharmonic, under Malcolm Sargent; the Colonne Orchestra, of Paris, under Paul Paray, and the Scottish and B. B. C. Scottish Orchestras. A chamber music ensemble composed of Artur Schnabel, Joseph Szigeti, William Primrose and Pierre Fournier will make its debut.

Owing to the 150th anniversary of Schubert's birth and the fiftieth anniversary of Brahms's death, these composers will be well represented, but modern British and other music will have an appreciable share in the concert programs. Further information is obtainable from the British Information Services, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20.

NEW YORK, N.Y.

This Clipping From LEXINGTON, KY.
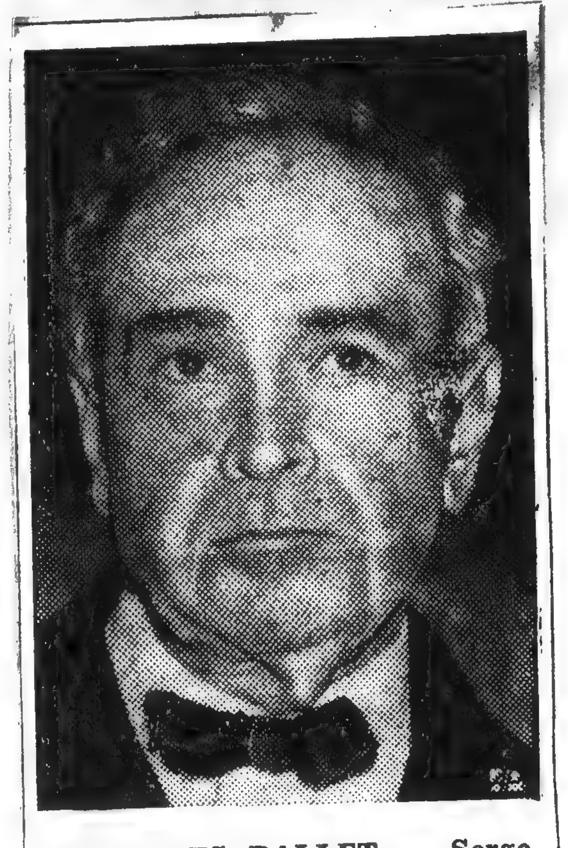
LEADER
AUG 10 1947



CONDUCTS BALLET — Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born American citizen generally ranked by music critics as one of the greatest conductors in the world, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the newest recording of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet' ballet music. (See review in "Off the Record' column today.)

This Clipping From MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL
AUG 10 1947

"THE FLYING GERARDOS," a high strung comedy about life in the circus, will be given by the Port Players Wednesday to next Sunday at the Oconomowoc high school. The emphasis is on laughs and slapstick. Jeanne Dixon will be starred as the mother and top trouper of the Gerardos. Tonight "State of the Union" will ends its engagement.

* * *

Rudy Bond of Philadelphia, currently appearing with the Peninsula Players at Fish Creek, Wis., is one of 10 actors to receive the John Golden awards for 1947. Golden, famous Broadway producer, each year gives awards to assist promising young actors. Almost 1,400 appeared in the auditions of the applicants.

* * *

The Belfry Players of Williams Bay are presenting Tennessee Williams' "You Touched Me" every night this week.

* * *

Dr. Hermann A. Nott, widely known Milwaukee musician and conductor of the Arion club's annual "Messiah" performance here, is spending several weeks studying at the noted Berkshire festival and courses at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

"I am quite thrilled at the opportunity that the younger set has to study with such masters, in addition to Koussevitzky, as Aaron Copland, Stanley Chapple, Boris Goldovsky, Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw. I am deeply impressed with the knowledge these men have of just about everything in music," Dr. Nott says.

Dr. Nott and his family are living in a tent on the festival grounds.

* * *

This Clipping From
ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
AUG 10 1947

MUSIC LOVERS attending the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last month were given a unique treat.

After the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, completed a program, listeners heard the same compositions played on the phonograph, as recorded by the orchestra through three decades.

Compositions played in the interesting program were: Introduction to the Third Act of "Lohengrin," by Wagner, recorded in 1915; the General Dance from "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, waxed in 1926; the March from Prokofiev's "The Love for Three Oranges," recorded in 1937 and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, released on recordings this year.

17

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 10 1947

Music

Festival To Close Today

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

THE final concert of the Berkshire Music festival will be given this afternoon in the large shed, beginning at 3:30 o'clock. The program will consist of the Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra and two pianos, by Martinu; Ravel's "Pavene" and Tchaikowsky, No. 4. There are no reserved tickets for sale but admission tickets to the grounds, enabling any to hear the program will be on sale at 1:30 o'clock.

* * *

THE FIRST Regiment Band of the N. Y. State Guard, directed by Lt. Peter Schmidt will give a free concert this afternoon on the band stand of the Lake House, beginning at 3 o'clock. This is one of a series of concerts sponsored by the American Federation of Musicians. The guest soloist will be Mrs. Peter Schmidt, violinist, who will play "Adoration" by Borowsky and "To a Wild Rose" by McDowell. The band's program will include works by Von Weber, Victor Herbert, Tobani, Lampe and Mayerbeer.

* * *

THE MONDAY Musical chorus will participate in the song festival on the grounds of the Otesaga hotel at Cooperstown this afternoon at 4 o'clock, assisted by the Singers' club of Poughkeepsie and the Thursday Morning Musical club of Schenectady, all under the direction of Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh. The program consists of portions of the three club's spring concert numbers. Helen Henshaw will present a 20-minute organ recital preceding the concert, and will be the accompanist for the vocal numbers. Community singing will follow the concert which is open to the public at no charge. In the event of rain, the concert will be held in the hotel auditorium.

* * *

LEO D'ALESSANDRO, Albany baritone, and a student of Boris Godolfsky of the Berkshire Festival school of opera and the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, is the soloist at the weekly Sunday morning services at St. Peter's Episcopal church, at 11 a. m., during the summer vacation of the regular choir.

* * *

THE AMERICAN Male chorus, formerly the International Male chorus, conducted by Lewis Bullock, will present two free concerts in Albany High school auditorium Thursday and Friday nights, Aug. 21 and 22. The all-Veteran group of vocalists is making a national good will tour, entertaining the wounded in Army, Navy and Veteran hospitals throughout the nation. This group was heard recently in the Westchester County Center at White Plains when it was invited to sing a special program on the occasion of the annual get-together of the Associated Male Singing clubs of America. Free tickets will be available after Aug. 17 at John G. Myers company; W. M. Whitney and Company and the Van Curler Music company.

PRO
JU
Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. RCA Victor, Set DM-1129. Four 12-inch sides.

This is a brilliant performance of brilliant and expressive music. The set contains four sections from the second of two suites which Prokofieff arranged from the ballet music he wrote in 1935 when he returned to his native Russia after an absence of 15 years.

The music is sharp and descriptive, with its moments of lyric romance and haunting beauty, climaxed by superb passages of bitter irony.

Whether it is in the playing or in the recording I am not sure, but the orchestra sounds much better than it has in many of its recent recordings. The sound is much more natural, less harsh and strident. The recording is also markedly free of noise.

[217]

MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra Won't Visit City

The Boston symphony orchestra, it was disclosed Thursday, will not come to Milwaukee this season because there is no available place of suitable size for the orchestra to play.

The Auditorium, where the Boston organization, under Serge Koussevitzky, has played for the last two years to soldout houses, has been engaged for Dec. 6 and Dec. 7 by the International institute. The Boston orchestra makes its annual tour in December and could come to Milwaukee only Dec. 6. Under auspices of the Arion Musical club, the orchestra has made its annual concert one of the leading events of the musical season.

The Auditorium management explained that the Dec. 6 date could not be made available to the Arion club because the International institute, with its annual "fair," takes over practically the entire building for two full days.

The Arion club Thursday announced its series of concerts at the Auditorium for the coming season as follows: Rise Stevens, mezzo soprano, Nov. 7; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, Jan. 29; Yolanda Petris, soprano, Feb. 21; the Arions' presentation of the Bach B Minor Mass, Apr. 4, and Artur Rubinstein, pianist, Apr. 20. In addition, the club will present Serge Jaroff's Don Cossacks choir Dec. 4, its annual "Messiah concert Dec. 16 and its junior spring concert May 22.

BUSY MAN: Vladimir Dukelsky, who went to Paris last March, has been as busy as a one-armed paper hanger. He has been composing, producing radio shows, arranging concerts of American music and preparing ballets. And the Vernon Duke side of him has written a new operetta, "En Valsant," which is scheduled to open in Paris in December. He has so much to do, in fact, that he reports he will not be returning to this country till the spring. His first job when he got to France was a series of bilingual Franco-American broadcasts for Radio Diffusion Francaise. They were called "Broadway-Champs Elyseés" and featured Anne Francine, an American, and Claude Alphand, a Frenchman. Because of his "April in Paris," Mr. Dukelsky was commissioned to write seven more Paris songs for the series. The broadcasts will be resumed in the fall. His ballet, "Le Pal des Blanchisseuses," is being given this summer at Deauville and he has since completed another one with George Balanchine, "La Robe de Mariée." His Third symphony will receive its world première in Brussels in October and he is now writing a cantata, "Paris Prelude."

This Clipping From
ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
AUG 10 1947

* * * *

LAST TUESDAY'S broadcast by the Boston Symphony of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony closed the current radio season of that orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra, soloists and chorus in as fine a performance of the great choral symphony as we have ever heard.

The evening was aided materially by fine engineering on the part of the broadcast crew, something which has been lacking all season. The orchestra is too often made to sound as though the music were coming from a warped recording.

The Ninth had not been performed all year, to the best of our knowledge.

That made Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it all the more welcome.

The Boston is our finest symphony orchestra, and a great many of us will find it difficult waiting until that 8:30 p. m. spot every Tuesday finds the orchestra back on the air.

* * * *

TWO MEN, one connected with comedy in the 1700s and the other on contemporary Broadway, will join forces this fall for a new Main Stem show.

The 18th Century half of the project is Joe Miller, to whom is attributed every hoary, bewhiskered joke ever told.

14

Aug 10-47

Saratoga Spa Series Begins In September

Eight Concerts Are Listed; Programs Will Include Many Unfamiliar Works

Programs have been announced for the eight concerts of the third Saratoga Spa Music Festival on the evenings of Sept. 6, 7, 9, 11, 13, 14, 16 and 18 in the Spa Theater at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., where F. Charles Adler will conduct thirty-seven Philharmonic-Symphony Musicians. The works scheduled are:

Saturday, Sept. 6, soloist, Carl Stern, cellist. Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," Rossini; (a) Diversion for small orchestra, Edward Burlingame Hill; (c) Sinfonia Concertata in D major, Donizetti; Concert Piece for cello and strings, Boris Koutzen; (b) Serenade, Arcady Dubensky; Cello concerto in B flat, Boccherini; Excerpts from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

Sunday, Sept. 7, soloist, Walter Hendl, pianist. (a) Prelude to "Dark of the Moon" (concert version), Hendl; (c) Eclogue, Op. 7, Rabaud; (a) Rhapsody, Alexander North; (c) Variations on "What the Stupid Rabble Thinks" for piano and orchestra, Mozart-Toch; twelve Contra-dances, Beethoven; (a) Suite Symphonique, Camargo Guarnieri; Symphony No. 88, in G, Hayden.

Tuesday, Sept. 9, soloist, Monty Woolley, recitation. Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Schubert; (a) Ballad, "Edward" (narrator and orchestra), Brahms-Gianini; (c) Sinfonia funebre per la morte del Pontefice Pio VI, Paisiello; (a) A Toccata of Galuppi, Op. 58 (narrator and orchestra), Paul Pisk; (c) Dances of the Riddles, Leonid Polowinkin; (a) Recitations with orchestra, "Richard Corey" and "Miniver Cheevey," Philip James.

Thursday, Sept. 11; soloist, John Corigliano, violinist. (c) Overture to an unfinished Comic Opera, Saint-Saens; (c) Suite for small orchestra, Rober-Ducasse; (c) Five Pieces for small orchestra, Weprik; Humoresque in E major, Humperdinck; (b) Andante for violin and orchestra, Leo Dubensky; "Jena" Symphony, attributed to Beethoven; Violin concerto, Mendelssohn.

Saturday, Sept. 13; soloists, Michel Nazzi, oboe; Alexander Williams, clarinet. (a) Sinfonietta for strings, Will Gay Bottje; (a) Rhapsody for oboe and strings, Ashley Vernon Air and Dance, Delius; (c) Oboe concerto in C minor, Marcello; Concerto, C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg; Clarinet Concerto in A major Mozart (K. 622); (c) Symphony in C major attributed to Mozart.

Sunday, Sept. 14; soloist, Mary Simmons soprano. (b) Overture to "The Elfin Tavern Louis Edgar Johns; (c) Symphony No. 9 for strings, Mendelssohn; (c) "Nelson" aria Haydn; Overture to "The Flight Into Egypt," Berlioz; (c) Hester's Prayer, from "The Scarlet Letter," Vittorio Giannini; (c) Interlude and recitative and aria from "Idomeneo," Mozart-Strauss; Symphony in G minor, Mozart.

Tuesday, Sept. 16: Soloists, Lydia Hoffmann Behrendt, pianist; John Corigliano, violinist Carl Stern, cellest. (c) Music for "Oedipus at Colonus," Guy Ropartz; Triple Concerto Beethoven; (c) Overture to "The World on the Moon," Haydn; (a) Ballet from "The Barber of Seville," Jiri-Benda-Felix Guenther (c) Piano Concerto No. 1, Ernst Krenek.

Thursday, Sept. 18: Soloist, John Wummer flutist, (a) Rhythmic Overture for strings, Mark Lawner; (c) Janiana Symphony for strings, Florent Schmitt; (c) In Memoriam M. H., Op. 7, Karl Wiener; Flute Concerto, Robert Casadesus; (c) Aria in D minor for strings, Padre Rafael Angles; Flute Concerto, Boccherini; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

(a) Specially written or arranged for the festival. (b) First Performance. (c) First performance in this country.

Tickets are obtainable now from the Saratoga Spa Music Festival, Inc., Ross Ketchum Building, Saratoga, N. Y. There will also be two extra concerts in Saratoga's large Convention Hall on Sunday afternoons, Sept. 7 and 14.

Six Orchestras Play In Edinburgh Festival

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra will make its first postwar British appearances in this summer's festival at Edinburgh, Scotland, between Aug. 24 and Sept. 13, giving three concerts at Usher Hall under Bruno Walter's direction. Mr. Walter will also accompany Lotte Lehmann in a recital of Brahms's songs. Todd Duncan, American Negro baryone, will also give a recital.

The Glyndebourne Opera will present Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and Verdi's "Macbeth" the King's Theater. The cast for the former work includes Italo Tajo, of the Chicago Opera, as Figaro, and two Metropolitan Opera singers, Eleanor Steber and John Brownlee, as the Countess and the Count. Orchestras, in addition to the Vienna Philharmonic, which will take part in the festival are the Halle Orchestra, under John Barbirolli; the Liverpool Philharmonic, under Malcolm Sargent; the Colonne Orchestra, of Paris, under Paul Paray, and the Scottish and B. B. C. Scottish Orchestras. A chamber music ensemble composed of Artur Schnabel, Joseph Szigeti, William Primrose and Pierre Fournier will make its debut.

Owing to the 150th anniversary of Schubert's birth and the fiftieth anniversary of Brahms's death, these composers will be well represented, but modern British and other music will have an appreciable share in the concert programs. Further information is obtainable from the British Information Services, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20.

This Clipping From LEXINGTON, KY.
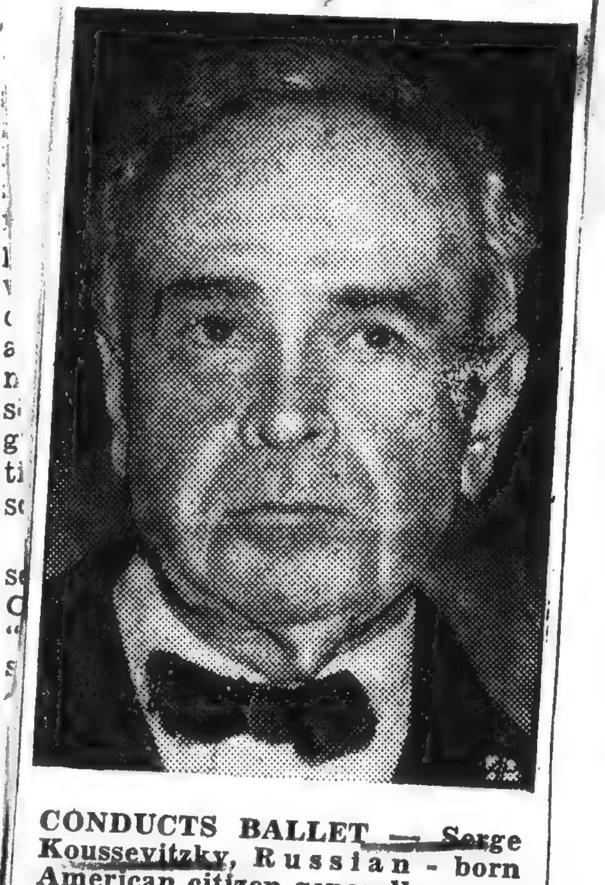
LEADER
AUG 10 1947



CONDUCTS BALLET — Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born American citizen generally ranked by music critics as one of the greatest conductors in the world, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the newest recording of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet' ballet music. (See review in "Off the Record' column today.)

This Clipping From MILWAUKEE WIS.
JOURNAL
AUG 10 1947

"THE FLYING GERARDOS," a high strung comedy about life in the circus, will be given by the Port Players Wednesday to next Sunday at the Oconomowoc high school. The emphasis is on laughs and slapstick. Jeanne Dixon will be starred as the mother and top trouper of the Gerardos. Tonight "State of the Union" will ends its engagement.

* * *

Rudy Bond of Philadelphia, currently appearing with the Peninsula Players at Fish Creek, Wis., is one of 10 actors to receive the John Golden awards for 1947. Golden, famous Broadway producer, each year gives awards to assist promising young actors. Almost 1,400 appeared in the auditions of the applicants.

* * *

The Belfry Players of Williams Bay are presenting Tennessee Williams' "You Touched Me" every night this week.

* * *

Dr. Hermann A. Nott, widely known Milwaukee musician and conductor of the Arion club's annual "Messiah" performance here, is spending several weeks studying at the noted Berkshire festival and courses at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

"I am quite thrilled at the opportunity that the younger set has to study with such masters, in addition to Koussevitzky, as Aaron Copland, Stanley Chapple, Boris Goldovsky, Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw. I am deeply impressed with the knowledge these men have of just about everything in music," Dr. Nott says.

Dr. Nott and his family are living in a tent on the festival grounds.

* * *

This Clipping From
ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
AUG 10 1947

MUSIC LOVERS attending the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last month were given a unique treat.

After the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, completed a program, listeners heard the same compositions played on the phonograph, as recorded by the orchestra through three decades.

Compositions played in the interesting program were: Introduction to the Third Act of "Lohengrin," by Wagner, recorded in 1915; the General Dance from "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, waxed in 1926; the March from Prokofiev's "The Love for Three Oranges," recorded in 1937 and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, released on recordings this year.

17

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
AUG 10 1947

PROKOFIEFF: ROMEO AND JULIET, SUITE NO. 2, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. RCA Victor, Set DM-1129. Four 12-inch sides.

This is a brilliant performance of brilliant and expressive music. The set contains four sections from the second of two suites which Prokofieff arranged from the ballet music he wrote in 1935 when he returned to his native Russia after an absence of 15 years.

The music is sharp and descriptive, with its moments of lyric romance and haunting beauty, climaxed by superb passages of bitter irony.

Whether it is in the playing or in the recording I am not sure, but the orchestra sounds much better than it has in many of its recent recordings. The sound is much more natural, less harsh and strident. The recording is also markedly free of noise.

[217]

This Clipping From LEXINGTON, KY.
LEADER

AUG 10 1947

• OFF THE RECORD •

LA TRAVIATA, by Verdi. Complete and recorded by soloists, chorus and orchestra of the Opera House, Rome, conducted by Vincenzo Bellezza. Columbia.

Columbia's first complete opera recording since the war is likely to meet a cooler reception than it might otherwise receive in view of the promised recording of Traviata by Maestro Toscanini. But to the home opera lover, particularly in this music-forsaken section of the country, the bird in the hand in this case is well worth holding.

Rome's postwar opera company and orchestra are both somewhat spotty, the former particularly in the staccato emotional scenes of the second act. But this understandable lack of polish is more than compensated for by the intense feeling which Adriana Guerrini and Luigi Infantino, in the roles of Violetta and Alfred, respectively, put into the famous arias of this hardy perennial. Particularly pleasant are the popular Drinking Songs and Un de felice from Act I and Parigi O Cara from Act III. Miss Guerrini's dazzling coloratura in Ah, fors'e liu is magnificent.

ROMEO AND JULIET. From Prokofieff's ballet, Suite No. 2, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Victor.

The Voctor technicians have marred the Boston Symphony Orchestra's masterful recording of four movements from Prokofieff's lovely music for the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet. The resonance of the somber passages and the delicate shading of the lighter movements, on three of the four sides, are slurred and distorted, obviously by bad recording. One side, containing "The Dance" and the opening strains of "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," is beautiful, however. If all four sides were as well recorded, this would be an outstanding album.

WAGNERIAN EXCERPTS. By Torsten Ralf, Metropolitan Opera tenor, accompanied by Fritz Busch and Metropolitan Opera orchestra. Columbia.

Torsten Ralf, one of the great operatic tenors, is heard to advantage in arias from "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Parisfal" and "Die Meistersinger" in this series of recordings. Fritz Busch, one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Richard Wagner, has provided a brilliant background for the solo voice. Recommended to all who treasure the rich harmonies of Wagner.

PIATIGORSKY IN RUSSIAN MELODIES. 'Cello and piano recordings. Columbia.

Recognized as the greatest living exponent of the violoncello, Gregor Piatigorsky has fashioned beautiful music from these typically Russian pieces. They include Rubinstein's "Melody in F," "Vocalise" by Rachmaninoff, "Song of India," by Rimsky-Korsakov, "Orientale" by Cui, "Chanson Triste" and "None But the Lonely Heart" by Tschaikovsky. Ralph Berkowitz plays the piano accompaniments in fine style.

THE STUDENT PRINCE. Selections by Sigmund Romberg. Columbia.

This favorite operetta, known to nearly everyone after 20 years on the road, is given fine treatment by solo voices, a chorus and orchestra under the direction of Marek Weber. It is neatly packaged and offers practically every song of student life at Old Heidelberg. Such favorites as "Deep in My Heart," "Golden Days," "The Magic of Spring," "Serenade," "Birds are Winging" and "To The Inn We're Marching" are charmingly reproduced.

KOSTELANETZ FAVORITES. Played by Andre Kostelanetz and his orchestra. Columbia.

On four 12-inch discs, Andre Kostelanetz and his orchestra have recorded eight semi-classical works which he considers among his most popular arrangements. Except that the ornate Kostelanetz style becomes wearisome after two or three 12-inch waxings, the album contains some pleasing bits of modern music.

Included are the superb Kostelanetz playing of "Jalousie," the most familiar of all tangos; Rubinstein's lovely "Romance in E-Flat Major," the quiet "In A Monastery Garden" and the always-welcome "Rosary," De Falla's "Ritual Dance of Fire," which is becoming increasingly familiar and popular; "Souvenir," by Hungary's Franz Drdla; the charming "Swan" from Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals" and "Yours Is My Heart Alone."

FIRST PIANO QUARTET. Three Etudes and Variations on a Theme by Paganini. Victor.

The First Piano Quartet whose members are Messrs. Garner, Edson, Padwa and Mittler, has already become established as a high-ranking concert attraction. These men have combined their talents to produce brilliant effects on four grand pianos. The three etudes, by Chopin, are "Butterfly," "Harp" and Thirds." The tonal effect sounds as if produced by one great instrument and the ensemble is technically near perfection. Recommended to all lovers of piano music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

10 1947

TANGLEWOOD ENDS TODAY

Sponsors Already Making Plans for 11th Festival Next Year

With the 1947 Berkshire Festival closing this afternoon at Tanglewood, the sponsors announced here yesterday that the plans are already being made for another festival next summer. Serge Koussevitzky again will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the concerts will be held in July and August.

Next season will be the eleventh for the festival, which this year broke all previous attendance records. Estimating the attendance at the final concert in advance, it was announced that more than 100,000 persons will have heard the fifteen concerts. The largest audience for a single concert was 14,000.

The Berkshire Music Center also closes today. It, too, will be opened again next year. This summer 425 students attended the six-weeks session. The student chorus participated in the festival programs and the opera department gave the first performance in America of Mozart's "Idomeneo."

This Clipping From
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

AUG 10 1947

The Enduring Record

CLASSICAL

Prokofieff: "ROMEO AND JULIET, BALLET, SUITE NO. 2," Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, RCA Victor, set DM 1129. Like his Scythian Suite, a romantic work, Romeo and Juliet get brusque treatment from its composer, apparently because it is ballet literature. Good performance, however the melodies may seem.

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

AUG 10 1947

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL notes have been sent me by several Alabama music lovers, including Birmingham's Mrs. J. W. Luke. All of them are singing the praises of the glorious music in the inspiring setting of the Massachusetts countryside with Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Guest soloists, both vocal and instrumental, have been featured with the orchestra. And some of the programs have been heard here in Birmingham over the ABC network and WSGN, The News-Age-Herald Station, on Tuesday evenings.

Most unusual event of the entire season this year, I'm told, was the day-long program covering records, television and motion pictures—the mediums that are playing an important part in development of musical appreciation in America and throughout the world. The event, "Music for All," attracted music critics from all parts of the country.

For the first time anywhere, the public was invited to compare symphonic recordings side-by-side with the modern orchestra itself, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing compositions it has disced over a 32-year-period, and giving the audiences the recorded versions of the same compositions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Koussevitzky, is featured every Tuesday night during the "season" over WSGN.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

AUG 10 1947

By Felix Borowski.

THERE is a quality in the music of France that is not to the same extent perceptible in that of other countries. It is not easy to pin down in words this peculiarity, other than to declare it to be polished refinement. While this is noticeable in French operas, and even oratorios—such as those of Gounod or Jules Massenet—it is particularly an attribute of French songs. Perhaps the latter make their best effect interpreted by French artists, and an exemplification of this may be perceived in an album discussed below.

CHANSONS, sung by Lily Pons with orchestra conducted by Andre Kostelanetz and Maurice Abravanel. Columbia Masterworks. Three 12-inch records.

There never has been any doubt about the exquisite vocal style of Lily Pons, nor is there any in the matter of her singing in this album of French songs. If there is any deficiency, it concerns the lack of passionate expression in such works at Bachelet's "Chere Nuit," Faure's "Roses d'Ispahan" or "Apres un Reve." There are four songs by Milhaud, cute and pleasant in a radical fashion.

* * *

BACH. Suite No. 2, B minor; and Suite No. 3, D major, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. RCA Victor Red Seal. Five 12-inch records.

The two Suites—or "Ouvertures," as Bach called them—are among the master's finest instrumental creations. Record collectors will be delighted with this recording of them. Koussevitzky's orchestra, so rich in color and adroit in performance, gives a beautiful reading.

* * *

HANDEL. Water Music Suite, arranged by Eugene Ormandy. Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Columbia Masterworks. Two 12-inch records.

This music, long familiar in Sir Hamilton Harty's orchestral version, is presented here in similar form by Ormandy. The latter's transcription of six movements is expertly accomplished and the recording is very good. Recommended.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 10 1947

These Days

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

IT was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the first to the ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every State to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city.

This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come.

I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 8 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung be-ore.

When Koussevitzky's baton ell on the last note, the audince was on its feet cheering, houting, applauding, waving. he old man—73 this year—tood there facing mature merica.

And that is what Tanglewood eans. It is something much ore than good music brilantly executed. Most of that ge assembly were not profesonal musicians. Most of them nnot recognize a fluff by the ench horn or a missed note a pianist.

Most of them have never—could ever—read Schiller's de to Joy" in the original. w of them can explain the owth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

BUT all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some place.

They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N.B.C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I SPEAK here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

AUG 10 1947

Opera Festival Will Be Aired Over ABC Network

NEW YORK,—A three-week Light Opera Festival to be heard Tuesday from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., EDT, will be presented over the American Broadcasting Company on August 12, 19, and 26. Josef Stopak, returning from his Summer season as conductor of the Pittsburgh Light Opera Company, will preside over the festival which will feature Polyna Stoska, soprano and Ernest McChesney, tenor. Each program will include solos and duets by artists from the light opera repertoire as well as special orchestral excerpts.

Miss Stoska recently appeared on Broadway in the Kurt Weill musical, "Street Scene." Although she has sung 26 major operatic roles in five languages in many major cities of this country, it was not until the Weill musical that she spoke her first lines on the stage. Previously in this city, Miss Stoska sang with the New York City Center Opera Company, appearing in "The Flying Dutchman," "Gipsy Baron," "Marenka" and other works. She has been soloist with the Boston Symphony, Minneapolis Symphony and several other orchestras. Born in Worcester, Mass., she also appeared with the Worcester Philharmonic Orchestra. Three years later she went to Europe to sing in opera and last month was heard in Mexico City.

McChesney, born in West Orange, N. J., is the leading tenor of the Chicago City Opera Company and he has just completed a Summer season with the Pittsburgh Light Opera Company. The young American tenor began his career as a boy soprano in his hometown church.

While still in his 'teens, he sang the male lead in one of the "Ziegfeld Follies" and later appeared as principal tenor in numerous operettas. It was while singing in "The Merry Widow" at Colorado City Opera House, that he attracted the attention of a colleague, Richard Bonelli, Metropolitan Opera baritone, who also was in the cast. Bonelli encouraged McChesney's career and his work won approval of Ernestine Schumann-Heink who made him her co-artist during her last tour.

McChesney has appeared in recitals from coast-to-coast, as soloist with the Philadelphia and other orchestras, appeared with the Boston Handel and Haydn Society and at the Toronto Music Festival.

[218]

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 10 1947

Robert Shaw Conducts Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Sunday—Robert Shaw, tremendously gifted young choral conductor, last night led the Boston Symphony and the festival chorus in the next to last concert of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, in spite of a rainy night.

CONDUCTOR

Robert Shaw who conducted orchestra at Tanglewood last night.

An audience of 8500 turned out to hear this unique program.

Program Listed

The program was Bach's "Cantata No. 50," Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and Mozart's "Requiem Mass." Soloists for the Mozart mass were the same quartet that sang last Tuesday night in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony: Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, basso.

Mr. Shaw, who had the distinction of being the second guest conductor to appear at Tanglewood (Leonard Bernstein was the first) achieved a personal as well as musical triumph last night. He is not skilled in orchestral conducting as was distinctly evident in the Bach cantata when he addressed himself primarily to the chorus.

Inspiring Conductor

However efficient the orchestra may be and responsive to direction, it does at times play better than others. Last night the orchestra obviously made a sincere effort to elevate the art of its young guest in spite of his directives which were not always explicit, but typically those of choral conducting. His Stravinsky, from an orchestral point of view, was by no means a source of bafflement, but rather one of extreme caution. The Bach and Mozart works aligned themselves more pliantly to his metier.

I doubt if there is a more inspiring and enlightened choral conductor than Shaw. As a large Worcester chorus discovered two seasons ago when he conducted at the Auditorium. The actual performance is but a small part of the effort—it is the preparation that counts. He would seem to begin where most conductors leave off.

Cantata Magnificent

He insists upon diction being not only clear but euphonious and at all times collaborative with the character of the musical phrase. In the Bach cantata, for example, the words "and I heard a loud voice saying in Heaven" were given a spiritual quality that could never be achieved with the spoken word. The entire cantata was magnificent. Rhythmic precision was exact, there was perfect control of dynamics, vocal sounds were full-throated and round, and phrases were clean cut. Again in the Stravinsky symphony the number of tonal inflections that he derived from the single word, "Alleluia," were remarkable.

This writer has never been able to reconcile the sometimes blatant, elusive, even coarse harmonic constructions of the Stravinsky music with the Latin text they accompany, but that is neither here nor there. The fact remains that it was a beautiful interpretation, and with the exception of brief fragments of the final movement, powerfully declared.

Final Concert Today

Saturday night's deadline being what it is, we were unable to hear but the first four excerpts of the Mozart Requiem. Prevented as it was from completion by the composer's death and written under great physical stress, it is a work of profound implication.

Particularly worthy of note was the brilliant execution of the complex counterpoint in the "Kyrie Eleison," and the breadth of tone in the "Dies Irae" chorus. In the solo quartet "Tuba Mirum," the four soloists did excellent work. Mr. Lloyd encountered difficulty with phrase completions but the remaining three soloists gave fine accounts of their respective tests.

This great festival comes to a reluctant close this afternoon with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting Martinus' "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," Ravels "Pavane", and "Bolero," and Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

AUG 10 1947

ON THE NEW RECORDS

LILY PONS SINGS SONGS OF OLD FRANCE IN FRENCH; BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS ROMEO AND JULIET BALLET

Despite the Summer heat, new record releases forecast the early arrival of Fall with serious music that requires more than light listening for full enjoyment.

For her latest Columbia album, Lily Pons offers a group of French art songs, sung in French, and RCA Victor is featuring excerpts from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, Romeo and Juliet, in a performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra~~.

Miss Pons presents "Chansons" by the French lyric Impressionists, Duparc and Faure, and by such contemporaries as Milhaud and Bachelet. These represent a relatively recent trend in that country's song history. Until the latter half of the Nineteenth century, French song-makers had probed no emotions deeply, but were content to pipe the joys of pastoral life. As they acquired greater stature and depth, the light-hearted "chansons" became media for more personal emotions.

One of these songs is Bachelet's best-known work, Chere Nuit. From the pen of Gabriel Faure comes the musical setting of a poem by Leconte de Lisle, Les Roses d'Ispahan. Darius haud, one of the most significant ern French composers, is repre-
d by four songs, commissioned Pons in 1941, based on the the Sixteenth century poet, Ronsard. Other lyrics in the parc's L'Invitation au n the Baudelaire poem un Reve.

aetz and Maurice chestral accompani-

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

AUG 10 1947

WNBH and ABC fill in the gap between the end of the Berkshire Music Festival last Tuesday night and the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~broadcasts in the Fall with a series~~ of special musical programs. First three broadcasts in that series will be the Light Opera Festival to be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 the next three Tuesday nights. Josef Stopak will conduct the festival and Polyna Stoska, soprano and Ernest McChesney, tenor, will be featured artists. Each program will include solos and duets by artists from the light opera repertoire as well as special orchestral excerpts.

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS & POST

AUG 10 1947

Victor is continuing its campaign to furnish good music by Bach with two more albums using Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra for the medium. Since the Boston is one of the finest musical organizations in the nation the campaign is worthy. Newest works include two more of the "Brandenburg Concertos" (2 and 5) in Album 1118 and Suites 2 and 3 in Album 1123.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 10 1947

Local Aces Skeptical About 'Third Program'

City Radiomen Think Bob Hope, Soap Operas Tough Competition

By JIM VAN DYK

Despite the sucess of the BBC's so-called Third Program, local radio men and women doubt that American audiences would accept a program offering Shakespeare, Racine, and Beethoven rather than Red Skelton, John's Other Wife, and Mary Margaret McBride.

The Third Program, recently begun as a "noble experiment," has attracted more than 2,000,000 British listeners, who hear opera, symphonies, the greatest literature of all time, and even such authors as Racine and Moliere in their original French writing.

The success of the allegedly high brow entertainment has proved to the BBC that culture is neither dull, dead, nor boring.

Paying no attention to public likes or dislikes, nor to listeners' interest, the directors of the Third Program found that their audience could and would listen to the classics, and the program has become one of the top successes of the BBC schedule.

To the BBC idea that the success of the Third Program would prompt other nations to improve their radio programs in such a fashion, the local radio people turn a deaf ear.

They think, as a whole, that it might be a fine idea, but they do not believe that Americans would listen to the classics if the competition was being provided by Bob Hope.

DARCY SKEPTICAL

Over at WNAB, Darcy Peatt says that "it just isn't radio."

The point is, according to Darcy, that "People just won't listen to anything that makes them think. They listen only for entertainment."

"The old masters should have changed their style if they wanted to hit radio in a big way," she joked, "They just have to be taken seriously, and you can't play bridge while listening to Chaucer."

Others in the know at WNAB concurred in this opinion.

The general agreement came when it was stated that "In order to be accepted, it would have to be presented as entertainment, and not as a strong dose of high-brow tongue twisting."

The success of such high-brow programs as the recent ABC presentation of the Berkshire Music festival, with the Boston Symphony orchestra ~~in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, [illegible]~~ alter the opinion of the broadcasters that essentially, the American public will not swallow the classics over the radio.

Classical music has had some success, but literature, the radio men think, is quite a different matter.

This remains in spite of the fact that BBC has made a success with such widely-varied programs as John Hersey's Hiroshima, poetry by the greatest poets from Keats and Chaucer to Frost and Lewis, Greek tragedies, stories such as Moby Dick, and Shakespeare's plays from Richard II to Hamlet.

George Barnes, of BBC, says that the program is not directed to a clique of "intellectuals," but to the educated man, be he a truck driver or a poet.

WQXR IS PROOF

It seems a shame that American broadcasting stops at a widely scattered listing of music, and does not have the courage to try an experiment at educational and evidently successful as the Third Program.

The popularity of radio station WQXR in N. Y. proves that there are listeners in the U. S. who are interested in something more than an indefinite proof that Life Can Be Beautiful.

In short, it is high time that the radio of the U. S. had the courage to cater to the best, instead of the worst, demands of the American audience.

Radio can educate and refine, as well as entertain.

Classics are not dead unless they are buried under a mountain of soap.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

AUG 10 1947

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Hague

On Discs . .

Handel in Bulk

Having given us the Messiah last Spring, Columbia again has dipped into the ample musical output of George Frederick Handel. This time it has come forth with an even bulkier offering – a three-volume set of recordings of his Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 6, as performed by the Busch Chamber Players under the direction of Adolph Busch. (Columbia Set M or MM 685, 25 12-inch discs, $29.93.)

Hague

Handel's remarkable powers of improvisation find full play in these dozen "Grand Concertos," which he wrote in 1739 in the incredibly short space of one month. Cast in the traditional Concerto Grosso form – in which a smaller group of solo instruments (concertino) and a larger one (tutti) are contrasted with each other and backed up by a continuo of double bass and harpsichord—they admirably serve to show off the many facets of the Saxon master's instrumental genius. Listening to them, one is impressed—and, in turn, entertained and moved—by the vigor and exuberance of the composer's ideas and the freedom with which they are developed, by the constant dramatic interplay of tutti and concertino, by the diversity of rhythmical patterns and the profusion of ornamentation employed.

The present performances are excellent throughout, and the recordings, as such, are first-rate. Violinists Adolf Busch and Ernest Drucker, and cellist Hermann Busch, who make up the concertino, harpsichordist Mieczyslaw Horszowski, and the other instrumentalists, all do a very fine job, playing together with precision, balance and style. Columbia is to be congratulated for so satisfactorily making available on wax so monumental a job.

• • •

Other Sets

Bach: SUITES NOS. 2 (B MINOR) AND 3 (D MAJOR), Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor M or DM 1123, $6.14). Two Koussevitzky specialties, recorded in the acoustically felicitous Concert Hall at Tanglewood. There is some surface noise on the set I have, but the general tone quality of the instrumets is finally reproduced—it is bright without being thin, mellow without being thick. The delightful B-minor Suite is adorned with some virtuoso flute-playing by Georges Laurent, the orchestra's solo flutist. The richer-textured D-major contains the famous Air in its original—and most affecting—form.

Beethoven: SONATA NO. 14, IN C-SHARP MINOR, Op. 27, No. 2, played by Vladimir Horowitz, pianist (Victor M or DM 1115, $2.99). The esteemed wizard of the keyboard has his way, which is not ex-

MORE

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 10 1947

NOTABLES HEAR -:-

Mrs. Evelyn LaCroix, left, and Mrs. Eleanor Simpson, heading the large delegation of Bridgeporters at the festival.

Joseph L. Lazare, Bridgeport medical detailer, takes time out for a bit of ice cream between numbers.

Berkshire Festival Ends After Big Year

15 Concerts Draw 100,000 To Tanglewood Extravaganza

Today, the Berkshire festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. comes to an end. This year's festival, under the direction of Serge Kousse[illegible] all attendance records, with as many as 14,000 at single concerts, and more than 100,000 at the 15 concerts.

The 1947 festival included Bach and Mozart programs by a chamber orchestra, and nine festival concerts in the Music Shed.

These included a Beethoven cycle, culminating with the Ninth Symphony at an extra concert.

A special "Music for All" concert on July 29 demonstrated the Boston Symphony orchestra's part in the dissemination of symphonic music by phonograph and radio.

The Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky's summer school at Tanglewood, likewise completed, on August 10, its six-weeks session.

The 425 students were drawn from 40 states and 15 other countries.

The student orchestras gave concerts weekly, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assisting and student conductors.

Chamber music concerts were given under the supervision of William Primrose.

The chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, took part in the festival, singing in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mozart's Requiem, and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

The composition class was under Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, Samuel Barber taking the place of the latter when illness prevented him from completing the term.

The Opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, gave the first American performance of Mozart's Idomeneo on Aug. 4 and 6.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces the 11th season of Berkshire festival concerts for next summer at Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky, music director.

The festival will be given in July and August, 1948. The detailed plans will be made known later.

The Berkshire Music Center will simultaneously hold its sixth session, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 10 1947

Woonsocket Organist Will Make Concert Tour of Belgium, France

C. A. PELOQUIN FLIES TO EUROPE AUG. 23

5-Week Jaunt Is Under Auspices of Brussels Society

C. A. Peloquin

C. Alexander Peloquin, organist of the Precious Blood Church, Woonsocket, will fly to Belgium Aug. 23 on a 5-week concert tour of that country and France. He will return Sept. 28.

The trip is under the auspices of the Belgo-American Association of Brussels, whose president is Van Zeeland, former Belgian ambassador to the United States. More than 10 concerts have been planned.

Three years ago Peloquin landed in Europe as an army warrant officer. He spent nine months in Italy, appearing as piano soloist with the San Carlo Symphony Orchestra in several concerts.

After the Seventh Army's invasion of southern France in the Summer of 1944, Peloquin was transferred to Grenoble, where he met Jean Kluczinski, a prominent architect, who has invited Peloquin to be his guest on the current trip. Kluczinski's father was once president of the Warsaw Symphony Orchestra.

Worms, Germany, was next on Peloquin's wartime itinerary. There, on V-E Day, he led a band and chorus of ten thousand American soldiers in songs of celebration.

From Worms he travelled up the Rhine Valley to Cologne and Aachen and was finally sent to Namur. The seeds of Peloquin's coming tour were planted in Belgium, where he directed joint concerts of American and Belgium bands, and played in piano duets with Miss Gilberte Van Dijcke of Namur, a graduate of the Liege Conservatory with first prize in piano and composition.

The fame of these duets became wide-spread and has evidently lasted, because Peloquin is being called back again to share concerts with Miss Van Dijcke on his Belgium trip. Plans call for her to play Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" on the same program that Peloquin conducts the RAF concert band, as well as being his two-piano partner in other compositions.

Peloquin, who came to Woonsocket in 1936, studied piano with Jesus Maria Sanroma for five years in Boston. He has performed for the Providence Art Club and Art Museum.

In the Summers of 1940 and 1941 he held scholarships to the Berkshire [illegible] Center, and was soloist with Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copland, [illegible] Johnson conducting, the latter now leader of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

AUG 10 1947

Prokofieff: Suite No. 2, from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," played by the Boston orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky [Victor [illegible] two 12 inch records]. Back in 1937 when Serge Prokofieff came to town to play his third piano concerto with the Chicago Symphony, he introduced the first suite from what was then his brand new ballet. But the second has eluded us rather consistently and this brilliant album fills a deplorable gap. For this is extremely evocative ballet music in that you might call it music of demeanor. Knowing Shakespeare's characters, you can see them in Prokofieff's terms. So the Montagues and Capulets are proud folk with a low boiling point, Juliet is a young and volatile maiden with touches of the Classical Symphony in her blithe gait, the dance is touched with rapiers not quite sheathed, and Romeo at Juliet's grave is as darkly romantic as Dolin's Pavlova cloak in the tomb scene of "Giselle." The performance is on the magical side.

Serge Prokofieff

• • •

Ravel: Orchestral Fragments, Series 1 and 2, from "Daphnis and Chloé," played by the Paris Conservatory orchestra under the direction of Charles Münch [English Decca EDA-29; three 12 inch records]. After Mr. Münch's major American success last season no one is going to have to peddle his records, particularly not when they deal with Ravel's justly popular ballet music, which he plays with a beguiling sense of its darkly voluptuous textures.

• • •

French Songs: Sung by Lily Pons, soprano, with orchestra under the direction of André Kostelanetz and Maurice Abravanel [Columbia M-689; three 12 inch records]. On the whole, rather disappointing. Miss Pons is not in her best voice and in her pursuit of the stratosphere of coloratura display she has neglected the ecstatic subtleties and serenities of song to which the music in this album is willing to yield its secrets. But you may want to investigate four beguiling songs Darius Milhaud wrote at her behest, debonair and allusive trifles after the poet, Ronsard. Miss Pons skims their surface, and also has her way with "Chère Nuit," "Les Roses d'Ispahan," "L'Invitation au Voyage," and "Apres un Reve."

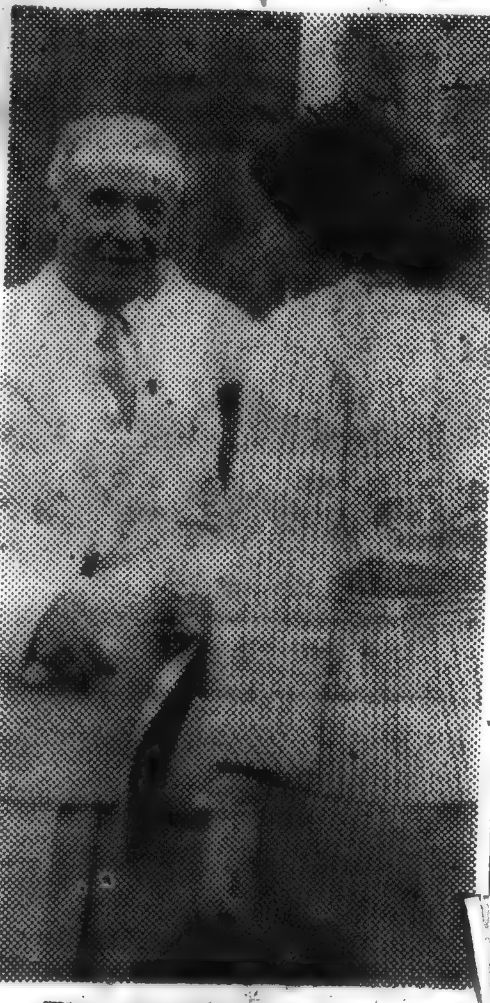
Lily Pons

-:- BOSTON SYMPHONY -:- -:- -:- AT TANGLEWOOI

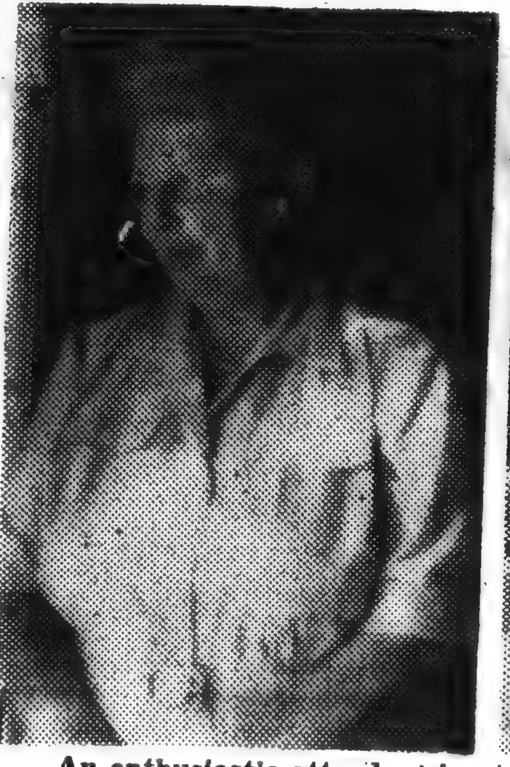
foremost viola play-
Primrose, displays
American-made in-

Here's a closeup of Robert Shaw, aged 31, the most sought-after choral conductor in the U. S.

Fritz Mahler, a favorite guest conductor with the Bridgeport Symphony, sends this greeting back to friends here.



The maestro himself, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, pauses to chat with some of his admirers.



An enthusiastic attendant is Mrs. Marian Beecher, president of the Conn. Federation of Music Clubs.

Frances Yeend, soprano, scores a triumph singing the lead in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

2 This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 10 1947

FINAL DAY OF BERKSHI

Serge Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symp

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ORE.
JOURNAL

AUG 10 1947

Ex-Portland Musicians Win Kudos at Berkshire Festival

Two former Portland musicians, Frances Yeend, soprano and Robert Mann, violinist, have appeared successfully at the famous Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which closes today.

Miss Yeend was one of the soloists August 5 in the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, the "Choral" symphony, which was broadcast over a national network and thus Portland friends had an opportunity to hear Miss Yeend's fine work. The symphony was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzk

* * *

ROBERT MANN, who violinist of the Juilliard quartet, appeared at one chamber music evenings sored by Mrs. Elizabeth S Coolidge. In a letter Tanglewood, Mrs. M. D Spencer, former Portland has made her home in N for several years, tells t Coolidge sat in the front each of these programs the close had to rise to edge the applause of the for her generous music age.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 10 1947

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Ginette Neveu, young French violinist who will play in this country for the first time next season, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 24 and 25 and the New York Philharmonic Nov. 13 and 14. . . . Dr. Antonia Brico, conductor, will sail shortly for Finland to conduct the Sibelius Festival in Helsinki for the second time since the war ended. . . . The Polonia Opera Company will open a season in Cleveland with "Helka" on Oct. 19.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

AUG 10 1947

* * *

THE members of the Boston Orchestra, who never seem to take a vacation, have moved from Symphony Hall where they played the annual pop concerts in May and June to the Charles River Esplanade where they played in early July to the Berkshire Festival where they are still functioning.

Since July 1 in Raleigh, N. C., the "Lost Colony" Symphonic Pageant has been regular fare. The Westminster Choir from Princeton is the unusual attraction in these concerts. There have been weekly chamber music concerts throughout the summer at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester.

The annual Saratoga Spa Music Festival will begin in September at Saratoga Spring, N. Y. In Chicago at Grant Park and Ravinia there have been concerts every night for more than a month. The Bayview Concerts at Petoskey, Mich., have just about run their annual ten week span. The National Music Camp concerts at Interlochen, Mich., which incidentally became front page news a year or so ago through Mr. Petrillo's efforts to keep them from being broadcast, have been running their regular course since late June. The University of Wisconsin has presented a summer course of six concerts. Cincinnati's "Opera at the Zoo" will conclude this week a season which began in June. And the almost three month operetta season in St. Louis has, if the news reports are correct, progressed just as efficiently this summer as it has through every summer since its inception.

* * *

IN California at Carmel-by-the-Sea the 10th edition of that community's annual Bach Festivals was played last month. The Budapest Quartet has been performing every Tuesday night throughout the summer at the San Francisco Museum of Art and each Wednesday evening at Mills College in Oakland. At the Hollywood Bowl the regular summer concert season has been in promer concert season has been in progress since approximately the first of last month.

And in two to three dozen other localities throughout the country there has been set forth the kind of music and performance which has usually graced the annual Faculty Concerts in Ann Arbor.

All this is a lot of music in a season which up to a few years ago has been thought of pretty largely as a vacation time from anything like the arts. But the whole matter of summer music has been progressing by leaps and bounds since the years before the war. Each year there are more concerts in a larger number of places. And moe frequently than not there are better concerts both as to content and execution.

And the audiences everywhere have become regularly larger. The summer vacation used to be in most cases just the annual rest period away from home if possible. Now in our travel-minded country it is almost always away from home, but it is not unusual when the general plans include a stop at a musical festival of one kind or another along the way.

* * *

THIS is a pretty picture. And it is pleasant to relate that it becomes a little prettier every year.

When we shall have some creditable summer music in Toledo is anybody's guess. But, when and if it ever comes, it will at least be advantageously situated. For our Walbridge Park Ampitheater is a splendid place for outdoor concerts.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 10 1947

Choral Concert Is Presented At Tanglewood

Robert Shaw Is on Podium at Final Saturday Event ofMusicFestivalProgram

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9.—The last of the Saturday night concerts of the current Berkshire Festival took place this evening in the Tanglewood Music Shed under the direction of Robert Shaw. This was the only choral concert presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer, although only last Tuesday the chorus had been heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as one part of an evening's presentation.

Mr. Shaw's program opened with Bach's Contata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," for double chorus and orchestra. This was followed by Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and the program concluded with Mozart's "Requiem Mass." Soloists in the last work were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Despite overcast skies, there was turnout of 2,000 at this morning's public rehearsal, which started at 10 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky was in charge of the rehearsal until the short intermission at 11:30. He devoted this time to work on three of the numbers in tomorrow's final concert of the season, namely, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the "Pavane Pour Unde Infante Defunte" and "Bolero," both by Ravel. The program will also include Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky often stopped the orchestra to smooth over a fine point, and there were times when he stepped down from the podium to show some of the orchestra men, at close range, what his intentions were or to point out some detail of the printed orchestral part on a given instrumentalist's music stand. Mr. Shaw took charge during the second half of the rehearsal period, conducting all three works of this evening's program, and well past the 1 o'clock limit of the prescribed rehearsal period he was still energetically rehearsing the Mozart requiem.

The onlookers applauded each work at the rehearsal as they would at a regular concert performance. After each work a few would saunter out and make their way to the outdoor lunch counters where they ate in picnic fashion at the wooden benches and tables or on the lawns as the sun was occasionally breaking its way through the clouded skies.

Last night the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center was heard in its last Friday concert of the season in the music shed. Two faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center's conducting department and three advanced students were on the podium at different times in the course of the evening.

Stanley Chapple and Eleazar de Carvalho, assistants to Mr. Koussevitzky, conducted music of Barber, Lao and Brahms. Russell Smith, a young student in Aaron Copland's composition class, was represented by a sinfonietta conducted by Claude Frank. This was the only student work presented in the student orchestra series this season. The general sentiment was that more such works on the programs of the student orchestra would be of great benefit both to the aspiring composers and to the general student body.

The program also included Copland's "Quiet City," conducted by Irving Fine, and the first movement of Hadyn's "Oxford" symphony in G major, under the direction of Harry John Brown.

Critical comment on the Boston Symphony concerts of this evening and tomorrow afternoon will appear in Monday's edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 10 1947

RECORDS: HANDEL

All 12 Concerti Grossi In Three Albums

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

IN recent months the record companies have shown signs of emerging from the cautious wartime period when little that was new or different was chanced. The results of this changed policy will take some time to unfold, since it requires a good many months to translate the recording session into the disks for sale in your neighborhood shop. But there is little doubt that even the major companies, usually the slowest to undertake extensive recording commitments of old and new works of value, have begun to work at expanding their available repertories.

While a good many exciting and important recordings are in the works, here is one that has reached the market. It is a performance of all twelve of Handel's Concerti Grossi, recorded by the Busch Chamber Players, with Adolf Busch conducting, and released by Columbia. The set runs to three fat albums. Volume I contains Concertos 1 through 4 and has seven twelve-inch records; Volume II has Concertos 5 through 8, on eight disks; Volume III has the final four on ten disks. The three albums, not sold individually, come to $28.50, exclusive of city sales taxes.

For the average collector this is probably a prohibitive sum, but those who can afford it—and certainly libraries, institutions and record clubs can—could scarcely make a better investment. Here is music of unflagging quality and spirit. Perhaps not every one of the concertos is of equal value, but there is enough in each work to warrant attention. And the twelve works together help to convey the stature of a towering genius.

Written in Month

The word for Handel is abundance. In these concertos there is abundance of ideas, of spirit, of tenderness and laughter, of sheer geniality. In the face of this achievement it is almost staggering to remember that Handel wrote the twelve works in a month. As Emanuel Winternitz, author of the adult program notes that accompany the set, remarks, this allowed Handel "about two and a half days for one concerto, less time than it would take an experienced copyist to make a fair copy."—

In speaking of the scores themselves, Mr. Winternitz has summed up well in the following lines:

"Handel's Concerti Grossi are characterized by utmost freedom in the handling of the thematic material. They are full of surprises in this respect. Ideas come to him in inexhaustible profusion, new motives and rhythmical patterns entering throughout the course of the movements. Motives which have just been introduced are transformed in the hands of the master and are spun out in multiform versions. Even the fugues are in a freer style than we would expect to find in this strict form. It is thus, one supposes, that Handel must have improvised on the keyboard. With the brilliance and the free, informal life of the Concerti Grossi before us, we can understand the sensation the Saxon devil created by his keyboard extemporizations among musical connoisseurs in Italy and England and how it is that he defeated at the organ no less a person than Domenico Scarlatti."

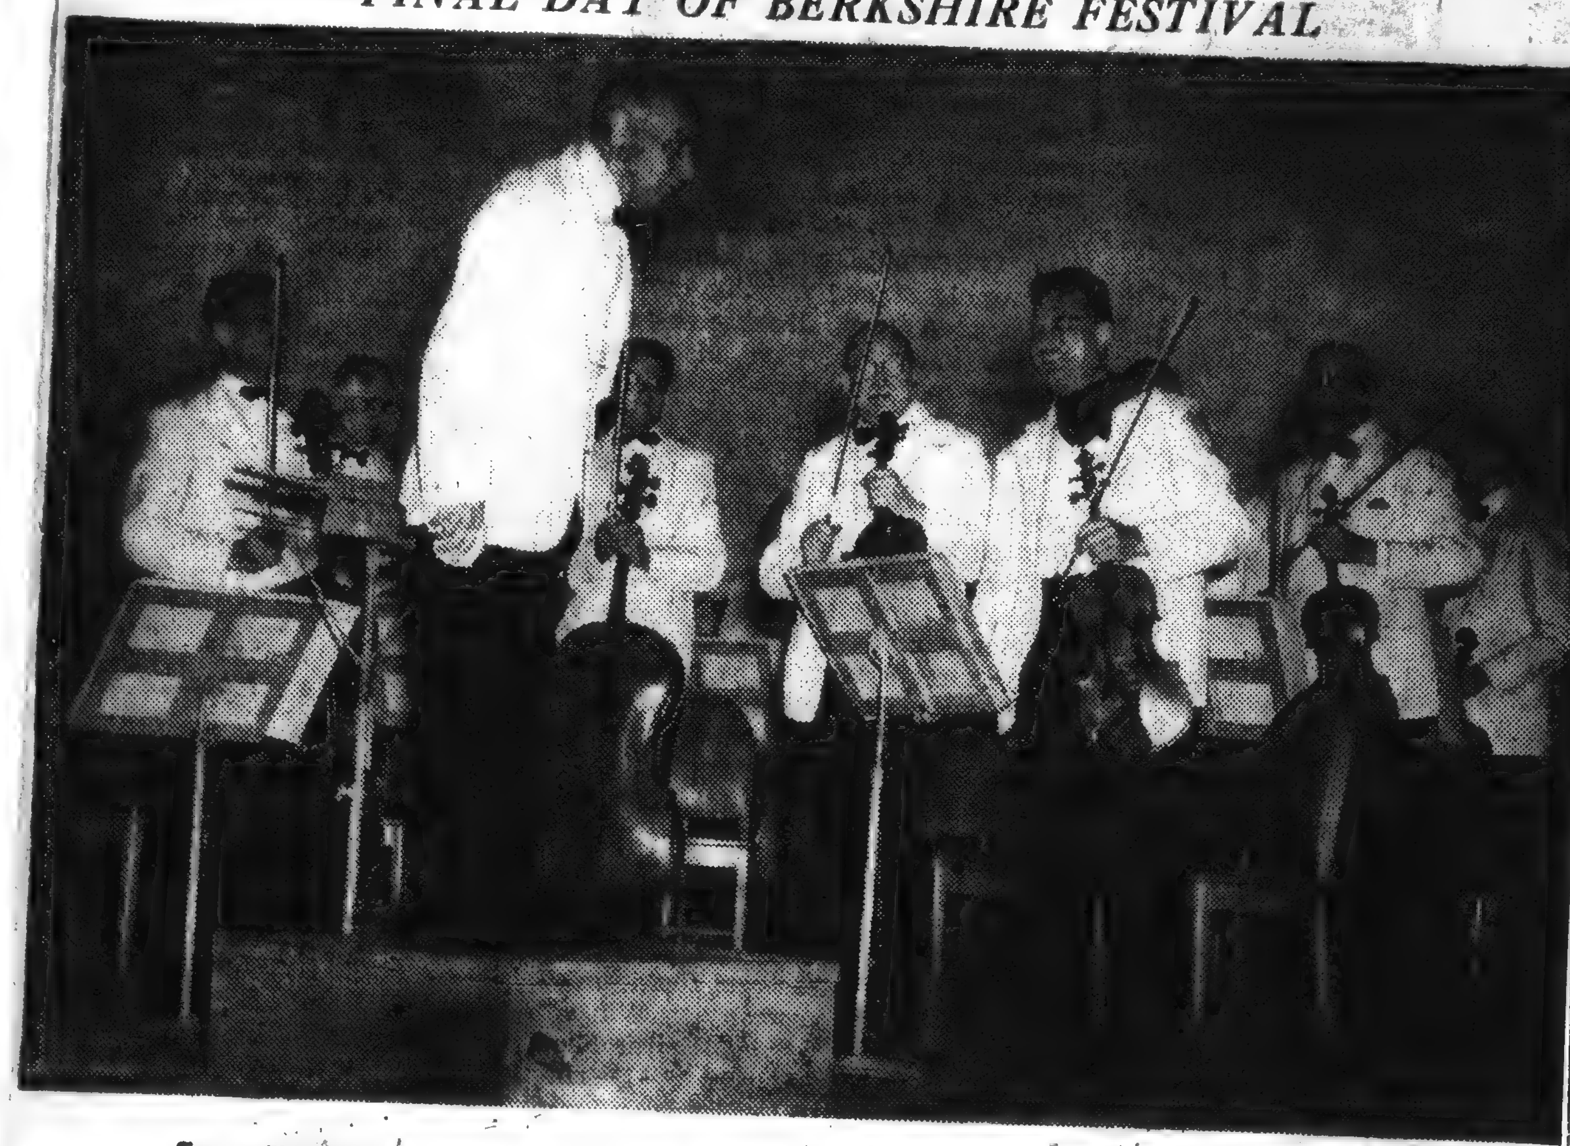
Mr. Busch and his ensemble have given the twelve works performances of thrust and vigor. The playing has solidity and spaciousness. If it lacks some of the refinement of tone and style other interpreters might have brought to this music, it has a sturdy vitality without which Handel would not be himself. The recording is good.

It might not be far wrong to suspect that it is one of the most happily planned structures of its kind in the country. There is no question but what it is one of the city's excellent fixed assets which might be used more frequently and with a little more thought to the talents of its occupants.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 1 0 1947

FINAL DAY OF BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL



H. S. Babbitt Jr.

Serge Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony take a bow at Tanglewood.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ORE.
JOURNAL

AUG 1 0 1947

Ex-Portland Musicians Win Kudos at Berkshire Festival

Two former Portland musicians, Frances Yeend, soprano and Robert Mann, violinist, have appeared successfully at the famous Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which closes today.

Miss Yeend was one of the soloists August 5 in the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, the "Choral" symphony, which was broadcast over a national network and thus Portland friends had an opportunity to hear Miss Yeend's fine work. The symphony was played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

* * *

ROBERT MANN, who is first violinist of the Juilliard String quartet, appeared at one of the chamber music evenings sponsored by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. In a letter from Tanglewood, Mrs. M. Donald Spencer, former Portlander who has made her home in New York for several years, tells that Mrs. Coolidge sat in the front row for each of these programs and at the close had to rise to acknowledge the applause of the audience for her generous music patronage.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 1 0 1947

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Ginette Neveu, young French violinist who will play in this country for the first time next season, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 24 and 25 and the New York Philharmonic Nov. 13 and 14. . . . Dr. Antonia Brico, conductor, will sail shortly for Finland to conduct the Sibelius Festival in Helsinki for the second time since the war ended. . . . The Polonia Opera Company will open a season in Cleveland with "Helka" on Oct. 19.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 1 0 1947

Choral Concert Is Presented At Tanglewood

Robert Shaw Is on Podium at Final Saturday Event ofMusicFestivalProgram

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9.—The last of the Saturday night concerts of the current Berkshire Festival took place this evening in the Tanglewood Music Shed under the direction of Robert Shaw. This was the only choral concert presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer, although only last Tuesday the chorus had been heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as one part of an evening's presentation.

Mr. Shaw's program opened with Bach's Contata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," for double chorus and orchestra. This was followed by Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and the program concluded with Mozart's "Requiem Mass." Soloists in the last work were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Despite overcast skies, there was turnout of 2,000 at this morning's public rehearsal, which started at 10 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky was in charge of the rehearsal until the short intermission at 11:30. He devoted this time to work on three of the numbers in tomorrow's final concert of the season, namely, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the "Pavane Pour Unde Infante Defunte" and "Bolero," both by Ravel. The program will also include Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky often stopped the orchestra to smooth over a fine point, and there were times when he stepped down from the podium to show some of the orchestra men, at close range, what his intentions were or to point out some detail of the printed orchestral part on a given instrumentalist's music stand. Mr. Shaw took charge during the second half of the rehearsal period, conducting all three works of this evening's program, and well past the 1 o'clock limit of the prescribed rehearsal period he was still energetically rehearsing the Mozart requiem.

The onlookers applauded each work at the rehearsal as they would at a regular concert performance. After each work a few would saunter out and make their way to the outdoor lunch counters where they ate in picnic fashion at the wooden benches and tables or on the lawns as the sun was occasionally breaking its way through the clouded skies.

Last night the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center was heard in its last Friday concert of the season in the music shed. Two faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center's conducting department and three advanced students were on the podium at different times in the course of the evening.

Stanley Chapple and Eleazar de Carvalho, assistants to Mr. Koussevitzky, conducted music of Barber, Lao and Brahms. Russell Smith, a young student in Aaron Copland's composition class, was represented by a sinfonietta conducted by Claude Frank. This was the only student work presented in the student orchestra series this season. The general sentiment was that more such works on the programs of the student orchestra would be of great benefit both to the aspiring composers and to the general student body.

The program also included Copland's "Quiet City," conducted by Irving Fine, and the first movement of Hadyn's "Oxford" symphony in G major, under the direction of Harry John Brown.

Critical comment on the Boston Symphony concerts of this evening and tomorrow afternoon will appear in Monday's edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JG 1 0 1947

RECORDS: HANDEL

All 12 Concerti Grossi In Three Albums

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

IN recent months the record companies have shown signs of emerging from the cautious wartime period when little that was new or different was chanced. The results of this changed policy will take some time to unfold, since it requires a good many months to translate the recording session into the disks for sale in your neighborhood shop. But there is little doubt that even the major companies, usually the slowest to undertake extensive recording commitments of old and new works of value, have begun to work at expanding their available repertories.

While a good many exciting and important recordings are in the works, here is one that has reached the market. It is a performance of all twelve of Handel's Concerti Grossi, recorded by the Busch Chamber Players, with Adolf Busch conducting, and released by Columbia. The set runs to three fat albums. Volume I contains Concertos 1 through 4 and has seven twelve-inch records; Volume II has Concertos 5 through 8, on eight disks; Volume III has the final four on ten disks. The three albums, not sold individually, come to $28.50, exclusive of city sales taxes.

For the average collector this is probably a prohibitive sum, but those who can afford it—and certainly libraries, institutions and record clubs can—could scarcely make a better investment. Here is music of unflagging quality and spirit. Perhaps not every one of the concertos is of equal value, but there is enough in each work to warrant attention. And the twelve works together help to convey the stature of a towering genius.

Written in Month

The word for Handel is abundance. In these concertos there is abundance of ideas, of spirit, of tenderness and laughter, of sheer geniality. In the face of this achievement it is almost staggering to remember that Handel wrote the twelve works in a month. As Emanuel Winternitz, author of the adult program notes that accompany the set, remarks, this allowed Handel "about two and a half days for one concerto, less time than it would take an experienced copyist to make a fair copy."

In speaking of the scores themselves, Mr. Winternitz has summed up well in the following lines:

"Handel's Concerti Grossi are characterized by utmost freedom in the handling of the thematic material. They are full of surprises in this respect. Ideas come to him in inexhaustible profusion, new motives and rhythmical patterns entering throughout the course of the movements. Motives which have just been introduced are transformed in the hands of the master and are spun out in multiform versions. Even the fugues are in a freer style than we would expect to find in this strict form. It is thus, one supposes, that Handel must have improvised on the keyboard. With the brilliance and the free, informal life of the Concerti Grossi before us, we can understand the sensation the Saxon devil created by his keyboard extemporizations among musical connoisseurs i Italy and England and how it i that he defeated at the organ n less a person than Domenico Scarlatti."

Mr. Busch and his ensembl have given the twelve works performances of thrust and vigor. Th playing has solidity and spaciousness. If it lacks some of the refinement of tone and style othe interpreters might have brought t this music, it has a sturdy vitalit without which Handel would no be himself. The recording is goo

---

It might not be far wrong to suspect that it is one of the most happily planned structures of its kind in the country. There is no question but what it is one of the city's excellent fixed assets which might be used more frequently and with a little more thought to the talents of its occupants.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
AUG 10 1947

The Record Player

Schumann Humoreske Given Fine Styling

Schumann: Humoreske. Paul Loyonnet, pianist. Concert Hall Society, unlimited release. A-1. $7.20. Though you may not know the name of Paul Loyonnet, do not let that keep you from buying this set. His pianism is of the finest romantic Gallic tradition. Remarkably enough, that very combination of styles makes his Schumann both elegant and warm-hearted. Schumann himself would probably not ask more.

This is an early work, dating from the year during which Schumann their marriage. More of a piece than Carnival, which came later, Humoreske has broad outlines and a bigness throughout which give it a genuine excitement. Loyonnet is practically perfect in every respect, if one excepts a little stiffness right at the beginning.

The piano tone is some of the finest on records, and the surfaces are excellent vinylite with only a little noise on side three.

Ravel: Daphnis and Chloe, suites 1 and 2. Paris Conservatory Orchestra directed by Charles Munch. Decca EDA. $7.35. What I am about to say is tantamount to heresy, in my book. Just the same, I cannot help myself. I like this Daphnis and Chloe better than that of the Boston Symphony with Koussevitsky.

Don't think for a minute that it hasn't taken weeks to reach this shattering opinion. For 15 years the Koussevitsky-Boston conception of this music has brushed off all rivals. Their old recording was great, their fairly recent one even more so. But here we have the old matter of a fine French conductor and orchestra exercising their subtle magic on a masterpiece of French music. The difference in the sound of the solo trumpets, solo flutes, and the rippling of both strings and woodwinds is one source of constant amazement.

So too is the astonishing difference afforded by the slightly more languid tempo which Munch adopts throughout. There is no more sensuous music than this, and Munch emphasizes that quality without sacrificing any of the rhythmic excitement which has always made Koussevitsky's reading so stunning. Also, in the first suite, of which this is the first modern recording, the ensemble playing of the Paris orchestra is of bravura quality.

Finally, as is practically always the way with English Decca records, their recording engineering is of such superior vein as to mock at our poor domestic average. Incidentally, this set, and all Decca sets from now on are of standard size for record changers. For my money, anyone who loves Ravel needs this album.

Puccini: Butterfly: Un bel di; also: Boheme: Mi chiamano Mimi. Victor. $1.05. Jeannette MacDonald, soprano, with orchestra under Frieder Weissman. Who has not recorded these arias? We have one or both of them from Grace Moore, Lucrezia Bori, Claudia Muzio, Bidu Sayao, Licia Albanese, Elizabeth Rethberg and countless others. Miss MacDonald is in every way unfit to sing them. Lacking imagination, finesse, proper attention to note values, and sounding only hard and lifeless, this singing has nothing to commend it.

Two by Bostonians

From Victor come two new albums by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. One is devoted to Bach's Suites, No. 2 and No. 3,—music of a freshness that belies its age and familiarity. The performance is a credit to the precision and brilliance of the Bostonians, and Georges Laurent, the flute soloist in the B minor Suite, does a handsome job.

The second album is Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony and Columbia reached the market with this score some months ago, and theirs is a clean, sprightly interpretation. But the Bostonians have a shade the better of it in spirit of performance and quality of recording. What is more, the Boston has managed to get the work onto three twelve-inch disks.

As to the merits of Shostakovich's symphony, they have been argued sufficiently here and in the Soviet Union. The truth is that the work is not important enough for all that discussion. It is agreeable, chipper, lightweight—a minor effort that should be received as such without requiring the poor composer to turn out a masterpiece every time he sets pen to paper.

In the Popular Field

Vox has released two exciting jazz albums. One, Charlie Christian Memorial Album, recalls the brilliant art of the late guitarist. The other, Louis Armstrong—Paris, 1934, makes available another fine jazz artist's work as it was more than a decade ago.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 10 1947

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducts the last concert of the Berkshire Festival this afternoon at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

FESTIVAL CLOSES

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give the last concert of the 1947 Berkshire Festival today at 3:30 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The program consists of Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. The Berkshire Music Festival also completes its six weeks session today. It had an enrollment of 425 students, who came from forty states of this country and fifteen other lands.

Another festival series will be presented by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood next July and August. This will be the eleventh festival by the official count, which omits the series given by the Center's student orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in 1942, the Mozart series of 1944 and the Bach-Mozart series of 1945. The Berkshire Music Center will hold its sixth session during the same period.

In all probability, the production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" by the Center's Opera Department under Boris Goldovsky's direction last Monday and Wednesday at Tanglewood was the first of this notable opera seria in the United States. The most experienced singer in a mainly student cast was Joseph Laderoute, the tenor who had shared the title role in last summer's Tanglewood production of Britten's "Peter Grimes," and his singing, in tone quality, production and style, was the best in Monday's performance. He sang the florid phrases of his principal aria with notable fluency and continuity of line.

Ann Bollinger, as Idamante, produced a likable voice with occasional unevenness; Nancy Trickey, as Ilia, displayed a voice of very appealing quality, although occasional spreading could be noticed in the uppermost tones. Paula Lenchner portrayed the role of Elettra with considerable emotional effectiveness, if also with a tendency to force her higher notes. Some of her music, in its style and expressive color, anticipated that of the Queen of the Night in "The Magic Flute," written eleven years later. Frank Guarrera sang Arbace acceptably.

The musical performance under Mr. Goldovsky (who doubled as stage director) was spirited and well integrated. There was room, indeed, for more flexibility of tempo and a greater range and variety of expressive color and atmosphere in this revelation of a remarkable score, but in weighing such impressions it should be considered that this was a mainly student production, and that "Idomeneo" would be an exacting, if rewarding task for a long-established professional organization. Mr. Goldovsky can be thanked for bringing forth an opera which represents Mozart's mature genius in this field, and has a vitality and appeal which should commend it to the attention of the Metropolitan or the New York City Center's company.

This Clipping From MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
AUG 10 1947

With The New Recordings

By THE REVIEWER

WILLIAM KAPELL, brilliant pianist, plays the little-known but elegantly rounded Beethoven Concerto No. 2 in B flat with the NBC symphony Orchestra under direction of Vladimir Golschmann. The B-flat concerto has everything —flashing melody, an almost Mozartian delicacy at times and some of the essence that put the composer at the zenith of the heap. You will revel in the gracious theme that recurs constantly throughout the three movements, to the rollicking rondo that brings this fine work to a conclusion. Mr. Kapell's piano playing is precise and has feeling. The orchestra gives a colorful reading to its score. By way of an encore, Mr. Kapell plays The Brahms Intermezzo in E. It's on the eighth side. Victor.

More Prokofieff

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony have added another to their growing list of fine performances from the Prokofeiff repertoire. This time Koussevitsky conducts four sections from the Second Suite based on the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The music is orthodox Prokofeiff, leaning all the way from his joyous and frenetic skips about the note range to those somber and distant episodes when the composer dwells on death. The Victor album contains two 12-inch discs and, from the seven sections of the Second Suite, these are included: Montagues and Capulets, Juliet the Maiden, Dance, and Romeo and Juliet's Grave. This is an album to add considerably to the fame of the composer, conductor and orchestra.

Songs Of France

Lily Pons is back between the covers of a Columbia album, for which she has waxed three 12-inch records with some of the art songs or "chansons" of France. Miss Pons sings in French, in a style which has made her famous, and she seems in better voice than usual. Four songs by Darius Milhaud under the caption, "Songs of Ronsard," claim both sides of one record, while on the others are Bachelet's "Lovely Night," Faure's "The Roses of Ispahan" and "After a Dream" and Duparc's "Dreamworld." All the selections have that quiet and delicate approach which the French have elected to use since Debussy and Ravel gave it a start. The orchestra is conducted by Andre Kostelanetz on some of these records, by Maurice Abravanel on others. An English translation of the songs is printed in the album.

Maryla Jonas Plays

Maryla Jonas, now world famous for her performances of Chopin music, hardly wanders afield in her choice of two Schubert pieces for a single 12-inch record released by Columbia. For both selections sound like Chopin, and Miss Jonas plays them as if they were. Schubert's Impromptu in G Major is on one side, and a mixture of waltzes on the other.

The final work completed by the dying Debussy was his Sonata No. 3, a luminous bit of chamber music which is increasing in popularity. Robert Casadesus is the pianist and Zino Francescatti the violinist. The combination is a happy one, and the result something no lover of chamber music should miss. It's a Columbia album. The odd side consists of Ravel's Berceuse.

Wienawski Concerts

The Concerto No. 2 in D major for violin by Wienawski receives sparkling treatment at the hands of Soloist Isaac Stern, magnificently supported by the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York and conducted by Efrem Kurtz in a Columbia album. A crisp reading by soloist and orchestra counterbalances the heavily romantic atmosphere to produce a fine recording of a lovely, melodic work.

Two ancient Hebraic chants whose origins are lost in time are movingly sung by Richard Tucker on a Columbia single disc with chorus and orchestra accompaniment. They are the traditional Kol Nidre and Eli, Eli. Both are solemn and poignantly beautiful.

Fine Recording

Hear the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski play a symphonic arrangement of the gay waltzes from Strauss' opera, Die Fledermaus. Here's a concert on a 10-inch that will make your nerves tingle by its three-four time beauty. One regrets that the Victor people left so much of the disc unused—but there's superlative quality here.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 10 1947

BETTER THAN THE 'MET'

Mitropoulos, No Fraud, Is Never Dull, Writes Eastern Critic

By CECIL SMITH
in The New Republic

Dimitri Mitropoulos made his Lewisohn Stadium debut with a concert version of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

The performance was an opportunity to hear the orchestra score played better than you will ever hear it done at the Metropolitan . . .

Mitropoulos made an impressive thing of it. There is no fraud about him. When he conducts a complicated work, he really knows it. He lacks the poised simplicity of Pierre Monteux, the serenity of Bruno Walter at his best, the patrician aristocracy of Serge Koussevitzky. His taut nervousness sometimes threatens to push the players into strident tone and jagged rhythmic attacks, so that his conducting has the excitement of impending calamity which, in the end, never occurs.

However, Mitropoulos is never dull and he never means to exploit himself at the expense of the music.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 9 - 1947

Festival Finale Starts Tonight

Robert L. Shaw, 31-year-old conductor, will take the podium in the Music Shed at Tanglewood tonight to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Festival chorus of 200 voices in a program of compositions by Bach, Stravinsky and Mozart

The 10th season of the Berkshire Festival will draw to a close over the week end at Tanglewood, with concerts in the Music Shed tonight and tomorrow afternoon.

Shaw Conducts Tonight

Robert Shaw, who for the past two seasons has prepared the chorus and taught choral conducting at the Berkshire Music Center, will appear as guest conductor tonight. Tomorrow afternoon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the closing concert.

Tonight's concert, which will start at 8.15, will be featured by Shaw conducting the orchestra and Festival chorus of 200 voices in the Bach contata No. 50 "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft"; Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," and Mozart's "Requiem Mass."

Soloists for the "Requiem" will be Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, who formed the quartet for Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" at Tanglewood Tuesday.

All previous attendance records for the season are expected to be shattered over the week end as reports continued to pour in from all parts of the county that hotels, inns and rooming houses were filled to capacity.

Mr. Shaw is a native of Red Bluff, Cal., where his father was a clergyman. Graduating from Pomona College, Claremont, Cal., where he conducted the college glee club, he came East in 1938 to form a radio glee club for Fred Waring. Until he entered the Navy in 1945, Mr. Shaw trained choruses for the Aquacade at the New York and San Francisco Expositions, "Carmen Jones," "Laughing Room Only," and "Seven Lively Arts," while continuing radio work.

In 1943 he received an award as the year's most important American-born conductor by the National Association for American Composers and Conductors and a Guggenheim fellowship.

In 1946 he was appointed director of choral activities for the Julliard School of Music in New York. Guest conductor of the Columbia Broadcasting System's Symphony Orchestra since 1944, he has appeared as guest conductor of the ABC and NBC Symphony Orchestra.

In 1941 he founded, and has since directed, the Collegiate Chorale, who have sung in concerts at leading halls in New York City and with leading orchestras, performing major choral works and giving initial performances of compositions by Barber, Britten, Copland, Foss and other contemporary composers. They performed this spring at the Harvard University Symposium of Contemporary Music new works by Copland, Hindemith and Malipiero.

Tomorrow's Program

Tomorrow afternoon's program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky will include Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," with two pianos; Ravel's "Pavane" and "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Because all seats for both concerts have been sold, large audiences are expected to listen from the lawn, as they did last Saturday and Sunday for the Beethoven programs. Admission tickets will be on sale three hours before the concert.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

AUG 11 1947

Edited by Jay Edgerton

Daily Times News Staff

Today, President Truman was back at his White House desk, refreshed after a cool week-end at Shangri-La; plans were being made for his South American jaunt; Republicans, Democrats battled over merits, demerits of the 80th congress; U. S. Army's CID cast suspicious eyes on the death of Princess Hermine, second wife of Germany's last Kaiser, also reported theft of $2,000,000 worth of her jewels; there was more trouble in Palestine; Moslem's state of Pakistan was being organized in India; the Henry Ford of Canada died; Postmaster General Bob Hannegan was planning a convalescent vacation in Hawaii; Boston Symphony's Dr. Serge Qoussevitzky bought tickets for Europe; Madame Peron was on her way home to Argentina; a parachute-jumper died in San Francisco bay, and an 18-year-old boy lost a one-out-of-six gamble with death playing "Russian roulette" in Port Huron, Mich.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
REGISTER

AUG 10 1947

Pop Concert To Feature Latin-American Music

A "Latin-American Night" program, with Alfred Gallodoro, saxophone and clarinet virtuoso as guest artist, will mark the fifth "Pop" concert in the Yale Bowl next Tuesday evening, August 12, at 8:15.

ALFRED GALLODORO
Pop Concert Artist

Mr. Gallodoro is one of those rare phenomena among performing artists, being equally at home with both popular and classical music. He has appeared with Paul Whiteman, among others in the popular field, and under the batons of Toscanini and Stokowski in the realm of classical music.

A musical commentator has said that "His clean execution of staccato passages is phenomenal — many of the passages in which he tongues each note would be considered difficult even if played legato."

Concerto By Creston

On Tuesday evening, he will play the "Concerto for Saxophone and Orchestra" by Paul Creston, a young composer, who has twice held a Guggenheim Fellowship, and is currently occupying the post of organist at St. Malachy's Church in New York City.

His clarinet offerings will include the "Fantasie Impromptu," by Chopin, in an arrangement for clarinet by Ted Dale; the "Serenade Espagnol,' by Cecile Chaminade; the passionate Roumanian dance, "Hora Staccato," by Dinicu, in an arrangement by Heifetz.

Conductor Harry Berman will lead the New Haven Symphony Orchestra in the overture to "Il Guarany," by Gomez and selections from the current Broadway hit, "Finian's Rainbow." The music for the latter was composed by Burton Lane and arranged for symphonic presentation by Robert Russell Bennett, who, incidentally, had a hand in arranging the original score. The orchestra also will present the popular "Malaguena," by Lecuona, the "Latin-American Symphonette," by Morton Gould and two Mexican dances by De-Campo and Partichela.

Lee To Be Emsee

Richard C. Lee, director of the Yale University News Bureau, will be the new master of ceremonies for the concert. Mr. Lee was instrumental in founding the "Pop" concerts, having served as the chairman of the Publicity and Promotion Committee since their inception. He also is a charter member of the New Haven Junior Chamber of Commerce, which is sponsoring the current series of concerts.

In the event of rain, the concert will be held on the first clear evening.

With the concluding concert this afternoon at 3:30, the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., comes to an end. The program includes the "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," with two pianos, by Martinu; two works by Ravel, the "Pavane" and the 'Bolero"; Symphony No. 4, in F minor, by Tschaikovsky.

This year's Festival broke all attendance records, with as many as 14,000 at single concerts, and more than 100,000 at the 15 concerts.

The Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky's summer school at Tanglewood, also completes its six weeks session today. The 425 students at this year's session were drawn from 40 states and 15 other countries. The student orchestras gave concerts weekly under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assisting and student conductors. Chamber music concerts were given under the supervision of William Primrose. The chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, took part in the Festival, singing in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mozart's Requiem, and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

The composition class was under Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, though Samuel Barber took the place of the latter when illness prevented him from completing the term. The Opera Department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, gave the first American performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo" last week.

The fame of the Tanglewood concerts is increasing year by year. Already they have attained a prominence in our national musical picture comparable to that of the famous Salzburg concerts in the European musical sphere.

Two items of interest to local musicians and composers have just been announced.

The first is an announcement by the Associated Concert Bureau about their second annual nationwide auditions for students of piano, violin, and voice. Auditions will be held in various cities all over the country. Winners of the local auditions are to be presented in State Concerts, with the finalists appearing at Carnegie Hall, New York City.

Eight first prizes of $500 will be awarded in the following eight divisions: piano, violin, soprano, mezzo soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass.

In this state auditions will be held in New Haven and Hartford at a time to be announced later. Additional information may be obtained by writing to the Associated Concert Bureau, Inc., 1775 Broadway, N. Y. City.

Expense Is Heavy

Naturally, there is considerable expense connected with this worthy project and the Bureau would be glad to hear from any persons or organizations interested in sponsoring the New Haven auditions.

The other item concerns Mona Paulee, distinguished mezzo soprano of the Metropolitan and Dean Holt, well known pianist and former orchestra leader.

Inspired by a typical American pioneering spirit, they have decided that they would like to do their share in helping further native composing talent in connection with their concert tour for the 1947-48 season.

Miss Paulee and Mr. Holt (Mr. and Mrs. in private) feel that the best way of helping promising composers is to bring their works constantly to the public, not just in New York, as is customary but to a nation wide audience. Believing that musical programs in general have too long been made up from the standard repertoire, they desire composers from all over the State to submit their works to them.

Will Choose 12 Best

They plan to choose the 12 best songs received and incorporate them into their program. The compositions will be alternatingly performed, which means that they will be heard at an average of about 20 times during the coming season and might even be published in an album which Miss Paulee has been asked to compile from the repertoire of her favorite songs.

Composers are asked to send in their works before September 1, to the Paulee-Holt residence in New York at 200 West 57th Street. All manuscripts must bear the name

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 11 1947

Attendance Record Set at Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11 (A. P.). —An attendance record was set this year at the tenth annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals, was announced as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

AUG 11 1947

Record Crowds At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10 (AP)—A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the three - week Berkshire Festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000 — the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 more than it was last year.

After the closing concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

During the afternoon program, Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whose "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," opened the concert, was called from the audience to share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra also performed Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte" and "Bolero," as well as Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

AUG 10 1947

Opera Premiere in Tanglewood

Joseph Babbitt, Jr.

Students in Berkshire Music Center shown in the third scene of Mozart's rarely-heard opera, "Idomeneo" directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky. Left to right: Dorothy Dawson as Idamante (a role taken at one of the performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger; Nancy Trickey as Princess Ilia and Joseph Ladourete as Idomeneo, King of Crete. The opera was sung twice. The Berkshire festival closes today with the Boston Symphony in compositions by Ravel and Tschaikowsky.

More Than 100,000 At 15 Concerts This Season

Today the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., comes to an end. This year's Festival under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, broke all attendance records, with as many as 14,000 at single concerts, and more than 100,000 at the 15 concerts. The 1947 Festival included Bach and Mozart programs by a chamber orchestra, and nine Festival concerts in the Music Shed. These included a Beethoven cycle, culminating with the Ninth Symphony at an extra concert. A special "Music For All" concert on July 29 demonstrated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's part in the dissemination of symphonic music by phonograph and radio.

The Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky's summer school in Tanglewood, likewise completes, today, its six weeks session. The 425 students were drawn from 40 states and 15 other countries. Student orchestras gave concerts weekly, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assisting and student conductors. Chamber music concerts were given under supervision of William Primrose, The chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, took part in the Festival singing in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mozart's Requiem, and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. The composition class was under Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, Samuel Barber taking the place f the latter when illness prevented him from completing the term. The opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, gave the first American performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo" on Aug. 4 and 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the 11th season of Berkshire Festival concerts for next summer at Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky, music director. The Festival will be given in July and August, 1948. The detailed plans will be made known later. The Berkshire Music Center will simultaneously have its sixth session, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

AUG 11 1947

★ ★

Koussevitzky

PLANNED: A European vacation (beginning Saturday), by Boston's Symphony conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, following the famed annual three-week Berkshire music festival, of which he is founder and director; in Lenox, Mass. This year Berkshire festival (closed yesterday) had an alltime attendance record: 146,000.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

This Clipping From
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

AUG 5 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard today over ABC and WELL in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 p. m. and concluding at 9:45 p. m., so that the entire symphony may be heard. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 11 1947

Miss Elizabeth Brandtlinger of New York City, Mr. Otto Bruhn and Mr. Eugene Lafleur of Wethersfield, were the weekend guests of Miss Pat Macpherson of Lee, Mass., where they attended the summer festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Sets Record

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11 (AP).—A new attendance record was set this year at the tenth annual Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended Sunday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Festival Has Record Crowd

Lenox, Mass, Aug 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music enter, said he would leave Aug 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

Glen Ridge, N.J.
Paper
7/II/47

MUSICAL WHISPERS

By AL WOHL

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA, under the baton of Eugene Ormandy, has broken all existing records. They have recorded more discs than any other orchestra in the business, and they have played to more people over a given period of time, than any other musical organization. The Philadelphia Society is proud of this honor, and according to their manager, they will continue to be the outstanding orchestra in the world. "The Serenade for Strings" by Tchaikovsky, was the last recording made by the orchestra for Columbia? The Seranade is in four movements, the second of them being the familiar and silken Waltz, in which some critics have detected a Spanish flavoring.

SHOSTAKOVICH'S NINTH SYMPHONY has finally been recorded and is now available. This symphony was begun shortly after VE day, and was completed in six weeks, and three months later, the Leningrad Symphony Orchestra played it for the first time. Audiences who haven't heard the Ninth are in for a shock. Mr. Shostakovich has always been known for his tragic and morbid music, and in this symphony, the melody is written in a gay and exuberant manner. The Boston Symphony with

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Ends Record Season

Lenox, Mass. — (AP) — A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL

AUG 11 1947

A new attendance record was set this year at the annual three-week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Mass. A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert Sunday. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for an European vacation.

Koussevitzky

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 11 1947

Berkshire Festival Closes; New Attendance Record Set

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10 (AP)—A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the three-week Berkshire Festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 more than it was last year.

AFTER THE CLOSING concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for thei homes in all parts of the Unite States and Europe.

During the afternoon program Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whos "Concerto Grosso for chambe orchestra," opened the concert was called from the audience t share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra also performed Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte" and "Bolero," as well as Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

AUG 10 1947

Opera Premiere in Tanglewood

Joseph Babbitt, Jr.

Students in Berkshire Music Center shown in the third scene of Mozart's rarely-heard opera, "Idomeneo" directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky. Left to right: Dorothy Dawson as Idamante (a role taken at one of the performances by Elizabeth Ann Bollinger; Nancy Trickey as Princess Ilia and Joseph Ladourete as Idomeneo, King of Crete. The opera was sung twice. The Berkshire festival closes today with the Boston Symphony in compositions by Ravel and Tschaikowsky.

More Than 100,000 At 15 Concerts This Season

Today the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., comes to an end. This year's Festival under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, broke all attendance records, with as many as 14,000 at single concerts, and more than 100,000 at the 15 concerts. The 1947 Festival included Bach and Mozart programs by a chamber orchestra, and nine Festival concerts in the Music Shed. These included a Beethoven cycle, culminating with the Ninth Symphony at an extra concert. A special "Music For All" concert on July 29 demonstrated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's part in the dissemination of symphonic music by phonograph and radio.

The Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky's summer school in Tanglewood, likewise completes, today, its six weeks session. The 425 students were drawn from 40 states and 15 other countries. Student orchestras gave concerts weekly, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assisting and student conductors. Chamber music concerts were given under supervision of William Primrose. The chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, took part in the Festival singing in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mozart's Requiem, and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. The composition class was under Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, Samuel Barber taking the place f the latter when illness prevented him from completing the term. The opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, gave the first American performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo" on Aug. 4 and 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the 11th season of Berkshire Festival concerts for next summer at Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky, music director. The Festival will be given in July and August, 1948. The detailed plans will be made known later. The Berkshire Music Center will simultaneously have its sixth session, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

AUG 11 1947

★ ★

Koussevitzky

PLANNED: A European vacation (beginning Saturday), by Boston's Symphony conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, following the famed annual three-week Berkshire music festival, of which he is founder and director; in Lenox, Mass. This year Berkshire festival (closed yesterday) had an alltime attendance record: 146,000.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

This Clipping From
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

AUG 5 1947

In the final broadcast of the season and the last this year from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard today over ABC and WELL in Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The broadcast will be on an extended time, starting at 8:30 p. m. and concluding at 9:45 p. m., so that the entire symphony may be heard. This will be one of the rare occasions when the entire "Choral" Symphony has been broadcast.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 11 1947

Miss Elizabeth Brandtlinger of New York City, Mr. Otto Bruhn and Mr. Eugene Lafleur of Wethersfield, were the weekend guests of Miss Pat Macpherson of Lee, Mass., where they attended the summer festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Sets Record

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11 (AP).—A new attendance record was set this year at the tenth annual Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended Sunday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Festival Has Record Crowd

Lenox, Mass, Aug 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concent to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of [illegible] Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music enter, said he would leave Aug 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

Glen Ridge, N.J.
Paper
7/11/47

MUSICAL WHISPERS

By AL WOHL

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA, under the baton of Eugene Ormandy, has broken all existing records. They have recorded more discs than any other orchestra in the business, and they have played to more people over a given period of time, than any other musical organization. The Philadelphia Society is proud of this honor, and according to their manager, they will continue to be the outstanding orchestra in the world. "The Serenade for Strings" by Tchaikovsky, was the last recording made by the orchestra for Columbia. The Seranade is in four movements, the second of them being the familiar and silken Waltz, in which some critics have detected a Spanish flavoring.

SHOSTAKOVICH'S NINTH SYMPHONY has finally been recorded and is now available. This symphony was begun shortly after VE day, and was completed in six weeks, and three months later, the Leningrad Symphony Orchestra played it for the first time. Audiences who haven't heard the Ninth are in for a shock. Mr. Shostakovich has always been known for his tragic and morbid music, and in this symphony, the melody is written in a gay and exuberant manner. The Boston Symphony with

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Ends Record Season

Lenox, Mass. — (AP) — A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL

AUG 11 1947

Koussevitzky

A new attendance record was set this year at the annual three-week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Mass. A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert Sunday. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for an European vacation.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 11 1947

Berkshire Festival Closes; New Attendance Record Set

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10 (AP)—A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the three-week Berkshire Festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 more than it was last year.

AFTER THE CLOSING concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for thei homes in all parts of the Unite States and Europe.

During the afternoon program Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whos "Concerto Grosso for chambe orchestra," opened the concert was called from the audience t share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphon Orchestra.

The orchestra also performed Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte" and "Bolero," as well as Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG 11 1947

Koussevitzky Gives Festival 'the Works'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11.—If concerts were rated as smash hits, Serge Koussevitzky produced one at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon. First, he lined up a program predominantly popular, symhonically speaking.

Then he and the Boston Symphony gave it the works, as they would not say in Boston. Some 12,000 people flocked to this final event of the 1947 Berkshire Festival.

The program opened with Mantinu's delightfully rhythmic and cheerful concerto Grosso. It qualifies for popular appeal and obviously caught the fancy of this audience.

Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighers were the pianists as they have been in other performances of this week.

Mr. Mantino was himself present to take to bows.

* * *

Pleasant to Hear.

Ravel's "Bolero" naturally overshadowed his "Pavane." The familiar virtuoso work was given a rousing performance. In the clean-cut acoustics of the music shed, each solo was a pleasure to hear, even with the slight mishap in the horn.

The accumulative power of the music had an electrifying effect. Ravel's tour de force has lost none of its impact when so played.

The Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony ended the concert. It, too, was given a virtuoso performance. The festival ended in a blaze of brass.

Koussevitzky gave it everything and few can match him in this music.

Still another conductor appeared on Saturday night.

It was a debut with a major orchestra for Robert Shaw. The program was choral, but the chorus was that of the Festival, not the collegiate chorale which is Shaw's stamping ground.

Once again, he proved to be a better director of choruses than an interpreter of choral music.

* * *

Great Enthusiasm

The program included Bach's Cantata, No. 50, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Mozart's Requiem Mass (heard recently in New Work). It created a great deal of enthusiasm.

A severe electrical storm in the late afternoon cut attendance to 8,500. It had been 14,000 the Saturday before.

Over 100,000 people attended all the concerts of this year's festival. This is a record to highlight the tenth season.

A grand total which included the activities of the Berkshire Music Center accounts for 146,000. It would appear that the story of Tanglewood is spreading farther and farther.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 11 1947

12,000 Hear Final Concert In Festival

Koussevitsky, Players Given Ovation for Tschaikowsky Work

BY T. H. PARKER.

Tanglewood, Lenox Mass., Aug. 10—(Special.)—The tenth annual Berkshire Music Festival came to a clamorous close here this afternoon.

Twelve thousand idolaters at the shrine of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a hail-and-farewell ovation to conductor and players for their vivid presentation of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony which concluded the 12 concerts of the 1947 season.

This came on the heels of an absolutely spectacular performance of Ravel's Bolero that reduced the steel girders of the music shed to a molten mass of twisted metal and tossed the roofboards for miles around, and with it provided a slightly colossal wind-up to the festival.

Opening the program, which also included Ravel's Pavane, was the Concerto Grosso for two Pianos by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer now living in this country and on hand today to receive a hearty tribute. Mr. Martinu's work is a not over-long composition of three standard movements, in pretty much traditional Concerto Grosso style, but modern enough in sound and temper. It is altogether an alert, deft, vigorous piece, right out of the heart of pre-war Mittel-Europa. These Czechs are indelible nationalist, and for all the contemporary sophistication of Mr. Martinu's writing, it is at heart full of Czech temperment, melodically and rhythmically. Modern Czech and not unadulterated, but Czech just the same.

First Movement Folksy.

The first movement is the most patently Czech, embullient and folksy. The writing, for flute, oboes, clarinets, horns, pianos and strings, is compact, fresh and shrewd. The work for the pianos is quite integrated, highly solid and inclined to be percussive. The second movement, andante, is mittel-European misery, a kind of chromatic lament, and here the piano writing is dense, contributing for the most part a mass of sound, and impact of dramatic weight. In the third movement, the work experiences a highly animated convalescence and the pianos ride to the fore. To some listeners this did not seem Czechoslavakian in color. Actually, I think, it was a union of an acute national sense of rhythm and American jazz, which at the time, 1938, was tickling their feet in middle Europe, and no composer who made pretensions of modernism, could not afford to try his hand at it.

In any event, Mr. Martinu's concerto is a stimulating, astute and engaging work, something of an etude in musical efficiency perhaps, but still brightly effective. Only the sudden and unprepared endings of each movement were a little disconcerting. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it an intent and invigorating reading. The orchestra found it hard to get together and into the Czech swing of things at the beginning but came through well enough eventually.

The Ravel was brilliantly performed except for some fluffing in the horns in the Bolero. The latter is the most dramatic, or probably theatric enterprize in the Boston-Koussevitzky repertoire. To watch the steam creep up in the boiler as conductor and players prepare to blow the top off, wide and handsome, is as agonizing as waiting for the man upstairs to drop the other shoe. People all around this deponent were pushing, rocking in their seats, trying to get to the climax before Mr. Koussevitzky. When it came, the shed blew up. It was the best answer to what Milt Gross means by "it gredually exploded," ever given.

Ardent Ending.

The Koussevitsky interpretations of Tschaikowsky need no analysis here. The great Doctor has been the Russian composer's best friend, forever drying his tears, giving him dignity and stature which other conductors deny him through sentimentality. Yesterday's performance opened with high fervor and huge sounds, but as the Boston conductor and his orchestra unfolded the rest of the score, the dimensions and the fever lessened somewhat, and the music and performance settled down to a good, vivid but unexaggerated presentation. The playing again alternated between brilliance and roughness. The acoustics of the shed throw the brass into high prominence, and so it is all the worse that they play so raggedly.

The shed audience lingered long to give conductor and orchestra a final storm of applause. Today's 12,000 raised the Festival attendance to 101,000, compared to the 83,000 who heard the series of concerts last year.

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

AUG 11 1947

101,000 ATTENDED BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10-AP-A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the three-week Berkshire festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 more than it was last year.

After the closing concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder [illegible] of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

During the afternoon program, Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whose "concerto grosso for chamber orchestra," opened the concert, was called from the audience to share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
AUG 11 1947

New Record Set At Tanglewood

LENOX, Aug. 11—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 1250,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
AUG 11 1947

New Attendance Record Is Set At Tanglewood

Lenox, Aug. 11—AP—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

This Clipping From
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

AUG 11 1947

Festival Sets Up Attendance Mark

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11. (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals, was announced by the directors as 146,000, as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

AUG 11 1947

RIPPLES FROM AIR WAVES

While the Boston Symphony musicians vacation, the WNAB-ABC network will present a three-week Light Opera Festival, Tuesday nights at 8:30, starting tomorrow, with Polyna Stoska, soprano, and Ernest McChesney, tenor, as soloists; Josef Stopak conducting .... Dumont's television station WABD starts a new program "Funnytime" tonight at 7:30 featuring Danny Webb reading comic strips to eight-year-old Betty Lou Keim of the Broadway production, "Rip Van Winkle." ... Tomorrow night at 7:30, WABD starts a television dramatic serial, "Highway to the Stars" starring Patricia Jones, songstress, and Pay Fay ... In a special program tomorrow night at 10, WNEW will receive an award from the National Safety Council for its series of public service spot announcements, the "Safety First" singing jingles ... When his "Symphonic Diary" is given its world premiere by the Chicago Philharmonic over WICC-MBS tomorrow night at 9:30, Sgt. Paul Siegel, currently serving in Vienna, will exchange short-wave greetings with his parents in Brooklyn .... Skip Farrell replaces Bobby Doyle on WNAB-ABC starting tonight at 8:15......Having lost its sponsor, WMCA's all-night record show has gone off the air.

This Clipping From
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 11 1947

Attendance Record Set at Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th Annual Three-Week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave August 16 for a European vacation.

A total of 425 music students participated in the festival.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 11 1947

A superlatively thrilling performance of Tschaikovsky's Fourth symphony before an audience of 12.000 that called Serge Koussevitzky back again and again [illegible] brought the 1947 Berkshire Symphonic festival to a close at Tanglewood, Lenox, yesterday afternoon.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

AUG 11 1947

Berkshire Music Festival Sets Attendance Record

LENOX, Mass.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

AUG 11 1947

101,000 AT TANGLEWOOD

Attendance for 3-Week Berkshire Music Festival Sets Record

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual 3-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12.000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
AUG 11 1947

'Hymn To Joy'

(Editorial in "Christian Science Monitor")

AMONG THE QUIET NEW England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing the mighty symphony to the triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhod of man.

During the last war a young anti-Nazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the Beethoven Ninth. When the chorus joined in the Schiller hymn, she wrote, they seemed to "sing from the bottom of their hearts, as though they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst of uneasy atomic peace. The same stars looked down—the stars that spoke to Schiller of a loving Father's reign.

The young anti-Nazi wrote that she wept as she listened, yet felt in her heart the joy of knowing that the law of brotherhood could not be forever hidden by the anarchy of war. Did any troubled heart the other night reach out through the botched, unhappy peace of today to the exultant joy that created the Ninth Symphony and that ordered the shining architecture of the stars?

In spite of the stupid slumbers and nightmares of men, reality breaks through to listening hearts

NEW YORK, N. Y.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG 11 1947

Koussevitzky Gives Festival 'the Works'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11.—If concerts were rated as smash hits, Serge Koussevitzky produced one at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon. First, he lined up a program predominantly popular, symhonically speaking.

Then he and the Boston Symphony gave it the works, as they would not say in Boston. Some 12,000 people flocked to this final event of the 1947 Berkshire Festival.

The program opened with Mantinu's delightfully rhythmic and cheerful concerto Grosso. It qualifies for popular appeal and obviously caught the fancy of this audience.

Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighers were the pianists as they have been in other performances of this week.

Mr. Mantino was himself present to take to bows.

* * *

Pleasant to Hear.

Ravel's "Bolero" naturally overshadowed his "Pavane." The familiar virtuoso work was given a rousing performance. In the clean-cut acoustics of the music shed, each solo was a pleasure to hear, even with the slight mishap in the horn.

The accumulative power of the music had an electrifying effect. Ravel's tour de force has lost none of its impact when so played.

The Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony ended the concert. It, too, was given a virtuoso performance. The festival ended in a blaze of brass.

Koussevitzky gave it everything and few can match him in this music.

Still another conductor appeared on Saturday night.

It was a debut with a major orchestra for Robert Shaw. The program was choral, but the chorus was that of the Festival, not the collegiate chorale which is Shaw's stamping ground.

Once again, he proved to be a better director of choruses than an interpreter of choral music.

* * *

Great Enthusiasm

The program included Bach's Cantata, No. 50, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Mozart's Requiem Mass (heard recently in New Work). It created a great deal of enthusiasm.

A severe electrical storm in the late afternoon cut attendance to 8,500. It had been 14,000 the Saturday before.

Over 100,000 people attended all the concerts of this year's festival. This is a record to highlight the tenth season.

A grand total which included the activities of the Berkshire Music Center accounts for 146,000. It would appear that the story of Tanglewood is spreading farther and farther.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 11 1947

12,000 Hear Final Concert In Festival

Koussevitsky, Players Given Ovation for Tschaikowsky Work

BY T. H. PARKER.

Tanglewood, Lenox Mass., Aug. 10—(Special.)—The tenth annual Berkshire Music Festival came to a clamorous close here this afternoon.

Twelve thousand idolaters at the shrine of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a hail-and-farewell ovation to conductor and players for their vivid presentation of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony which concluded the 12 concerts of the 1947 season.

This came on the heels of an absolutely spectacular performance of Ravel's Bolero that reduced the steel girders of the music shed to a molten mass of twisted metal and tossed the roofboards for miles around, and with it provided a slightly colossal wind-up to the festival.

Opening the program, which also included Ravel's Pavane, was the Concerto Grosso for two Pianos by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer now living in this country and on hand today to receive a hearty tribute. Mr. Martinu's work is a not over-long composition of three standard movements, in pretty much traditional Concerto Grosso style, but modern enough in sound and temper. It is altogether an alert, deft, vigorous piece, right out of the heart of pre-war Mittel-Europa. These Czechs are indelible nationalist, and for all the contemporary sophistication of Mr. Martinu's writing, it is at heart full of Czech temperment, melodically and rhythmically. Modern Czech and not unadulterated, but Czech just the same.

First Movement Folksy.

The first movement is the most patently Czech, embullient and folksy. The writing, for flute, oboes, clarinets, horns, pianos and strings, is compact, fresh and shrewd. The work for the pianos is quite integrated, highly solid and inclined to be percussive. The second movement, andante, is mittel-European misery, a kind of chromatic lament, and here the piano writing is dense, contributing for the most part a mass of sound, and impact of dramatic weight. In the third movement, the work experiences a highly animated convalescence and the pianos ride to the fore. To some listeners this did not seem Czechoslavakian in color. Actually, I think, it was a union of an acute national sense of rhythm and American jazz, which at the time, 1938, was tickling their feet in middle Europe, and no composer who made pretensions of modernism, could not afford to try his hand at it.

In any event, Mr. Martinu's concerto is a stimulating, astute and engaging work, something of an etude in musical efficiency perhaps, but still brightly effective. Only the sudden and unprepared endings of each movement were a little disconcerting. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it an intent and invigorating reading. The orchestra found it hard to get together and into the Czech swing of things at the beginning but came through well enough eventually.

The Ravel was brilliantly performed except for some fluffing in the horns in the Bolero. The latter is the most dramatic, or probably theatric enterprize in the Boston-Koussevitzky repertoire. To watch the steam creep up in the boiler as conductor and players prepare to blow the top off, wide and handsome, is as agonizing as waiting for the man upstairs to drop the other shoe. People all around this deponent were pushing, rocking in their seats, trying to get to the climax before Mr. Koussevitzky. When it came, the shed blew up. It was the best answer to what Milt Gross means by "it gredually exploded," ever given.

Ardent Ending.

The Koussevitsky interpretations of Tschaikowsky need no analysis here. The great Doctor has been the Russian composer's best friend, forever drying his tears, giving him dignity and stature which other conductors deny him through sentimentality. Yesterday's performance opened with high fervor and huge sounds, but as the Boston conductor and his orchestra unfolded the rest of the score, the dimensions and the fever lessened somewhat, and the music and performance settled down to a good, vivid but unexaggerated presentation. The playing again alternated between brilliance and roughness. The acoustics of the shed throw the brass into high prominence, and so it is all the worse that they play so raggedly.

The shed audience lingered long to give conductor and orchestra a final storm of applause. Today's 12,000 raised the Festival attendance to 101,000, compared to the 83,000 who heard the series of concerts last year.

This Clipping From LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
AUG 11 1947

New Record Set At Tanglewood

LENOX, Aug. 11—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 1250,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

AUG 11 1947

101,000 ATTEND BERKSHIRE [illegible]ets

LENOX, Mass., A[illegible] crowd of 12,000 attende[illegible] concert of the three-wee[illegible] festival today, bringing attendance for the series [illegible] the highest in the 10-year Tanglewood.

The [illegible]on's attendance w[illegible] mo[illegible]an it was last yea[illegible]

A[illegible] the closing concer[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, conduc[illegible] the Boston Symphony Or[illegible] and founder [illegible] Berkshire Music Center, sai[illegible] would leave Aug. 16 for a Euro[illegible] vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music stud[illegible] prepared to leave for their home[illegible] all parts of the United States [illegible] Europe.

During the afternoon program, Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whose "concerto grosso for chamber orchestra," opened the concert, was called from the audience to share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 11 1947

New Attendance Record Is Set At Tanglewood

Lenox, Aug. 11—AP—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

This Clipping From
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

AUG 11 1947

Festival Sets Up Attendance Mark

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11. (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals, was announced by the directors as 146,000, as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

AUG 11 1947

RIPPLES FROM AIR WAVES

While the Boston Symphony musicians vacation, the WNAB-ABC network will present a three-week Light Opera Festival, Tuesday nights at 8:30, starting tomorrow, with Polyna Stoska, soprano, and Ernest McChesney, tenor, as soloists; Josef Stopak conducting .... Dumont's television station WABD starts a new program "Funnytime" tonight at 7:30 featuring Danny Webb reading comic strips to eight-year-old Betty Lou Keim of the Broadway production, "Rip Van Winkle." ... Tomorrow night at 7:30, WABD starts a television dramatic serial, "Highway to the Stars" starring Patricia Jones, songstress, and Pay Fay ... In a special program tomorrow night at 10, WNEW will receive an award from the National Safety Council for its series of public service spot announcements, the "Safety First" singing jingles ... When his "Symphonic Diary" is given its world premiere by the Chicago Philharmonic over WICC-MBS tomorrow night at 9:30, Sgt. Paul Siegel, currently serving in Vienna, will exchange short-wave greetings with his parents in Brooklyn .... Skip Farrell replaces Bobby Doyle on WNAB-ABC starting tonight at 8:15......Having lost its sponsor, WMCA's all-night record show has gone off the air.

This Clipping From
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 11 1947

Attendance Record Set at Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th Annual Three-Week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave August 16 for a European vacation.

A total of 425 music students participated in the festival.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 11 1947

A superlatively thrilling performance of Tschaikovsky's Fourth symphony before an audience of 12,000 that called Serge Koussevitzky back again and again brought the 1947 Berkshire Symphonic festival to a close at Tanglewood, Lenox, yesterday afternoon.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

AUG 11 1947

Berkshire Music Festival Sets Attendance Record

LENOX, Mass.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
AUG 11 1947

'Hymn To Joy'

(Editorial in "Christian Science Monitor")

AMONG THE QUIET NEW England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing the mighty symphony to the triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhod of man.

During the last war a young anti-Nazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the Beethoven Ninth. When the chorus joined in the Schiller hymn, she wrote, they seemed to "sing from the bottom of their hearts, as though they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst of uneasy atomic peace. The same stars looked down—the stars that spoke to Schiller of a loving Father's reign.

The young anti-Nazi wrote that she wept as she listened, yet felt in her heart the joy of knowing that the law of brotherhood could not be forever hidden by the anarchy of war. Did any troubled heart the other night reach out through the botched, unhappy peace of today to the exultant joy that created the Ninth Symphony and that ordered the shining architecture of the stars?

In spite of the stupid slumbers and nightmares of men, reality breaks through to listening hearts.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

AUG 11 1947

101,000 AT TANGLEWOOD

Attendance for 3-Week Berkshire Music Festival Sets Record

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual 3-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

[225]

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
MORNING STAR
AUG 1 1 1947

George E. Sokolsky Says:

Cultural Upsurge Among Our People at Tanglewood

These Days

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from ~~the First to the Ninth~~.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive — in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

* * *

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture

* * *

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 1 1 1947

Music

Berkshire Festival Ends on High Note

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11.—For a long time after Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had finished conducting the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony an audience which had jammed the Tanglewood Shed stood cheering itself hoarse, while the good doctor bowed graciously, very pleased with the demonstration. Thus ended the Berkshire Festival of 1947, on a note of pure triumph for the little builder of musical dreams into imposing realities.

As befitted the occasion yesterday's program was the best performed of the series. Opening with the Martinu Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, the list offered, besides, two items by Ravel, the "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and the "Bolero."

In fact, I had the impression that this concert was of the language of music and all that it has to say through its creators. It was not a flashy exhibition of well-played notes and rhythms and harmonies—or dissonances—but in each instance a sensitive commentary on life in various manifestations, as expressed through music.

Color, and Precisions.

Certainly the Fourth of Tschaikowsky has rarely, if ever, found the Bostonians more congenial to the perfervid declamation of the greater part of its content or, as in the contrasting Scherzo, the bright and witty persiflage of pizzicato strings.

The Martinu, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera as pianists, likewise went through most sympathetic ministrations. And the two Ravel pieces were, as everyone knew they would be, treasures of orchestral color and precision.

On Saturday evening Robert Shaw conducted a program of works for chorus and orchestra. These comprised the Bach cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," the Stravinsky "Symphony of Psalms" and the Mozart "Requiem."

Perfect Balance.

This enormously gifted young musician, who has already made an important place for himself as a choral conductor, is well on the way to achieving an equal distinction in the handling of purely instrumental music, although none such was scheduled on Saturday evening.

But his book work in these numbers, none of which may be considered a sinecure, by the way, showed his great improvement in orchestral technique, yet affirming all that he has already attained in the choral line. He kept his forces, numbering close to 300 in voices and musicians, in perfect balance. He was shrewd in the distribution of tone, in the blend of voices and instruments, in the regularity of his tempos and the building of climaxes.

The high feature of the evening was the performance of the "Requiem." This composition, so nobly tragic and so moving he delivered brilliantly. The "Dies Irae" was a splendid study in menacing sonorities. And the sublime beauty of the "Recordare" touched the heart.

Polished Singing.

Vocal soloists in the "Requiem" were, as in the Beethoven Ninth, Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease. And again praise goes to their musical and polished singing.

Mr. Shaw was given an ovation at the conclusion. His modest, self-effacing efforts, to be sure, had not been lost on his listeners. And the young students of the Berkshire Music Center who comprise the Festival Chorus shouted their approval, completely forgetting, it seemed, the hard labor their relentless drillmaster had put them through for several weeks.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 1 1 1947

2 Concerts End Tenth Season At Tanglewood

Koussevitzky, Shaw Lead the Bostonians; 145,000 Heard All Presentations

By Arthur V. Berger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10.—The Berkshire Festival concluded its tenth season this afternoon with a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky in the Tanglewood Music Shed.

The program opened with Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra. Completing the first half of the list were the "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" and the "Bolero" by Ravel. Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony was heard after the intermission. After several wet days that kept away the overflow audience spreading itself ordinarily over the lawns outside the shed, the elements smiled benevolently on this final event of the season, and a well disposed attendance of 12,000 was on hand to give this day the expected festive character.

Martinu's Concerto Grosso, which gave a welcome esoteric slant to an otherwise popular program, has been heard in New York, and though I had anticipated rehearing it with a certain pleasure, I found, as it is generally true of Martinu's music, that its profile was something I did not recall too well because this highly musical and skilled Czech composer is rarely notable for the definiteness of his ideas. Its rhythmic drive was, however, an exhilarating experience in Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading and in this congenial outdoor setting; and there was some fine concertante work on the part of Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, who were intrusted with the two piano parts featured in the score.

A Tour de Force

I still feel that the final cadence chords, notably in the first two movements, were arrived at arbitrarily, but in general the progression of ideas is most fluent and tasteful, and it stands up very well indeed on rehearing. The dramatic effects in the second movement, where sustained violins ascend to giddy heights over percussive chords and later figures in the pianos, is somewhat unanticipated in a work for chamber orchestra of this character, and yet some contrast was needed to the steady Brandenburgian beats of the outer movements.

Mr. Koussevitzky maintains a very drawn-out pace in the "Bolero," and the piece thus becomes, for him, a tour de force in demonstrating the sustaining power of his magnificent orchestra. The orchestral streamlining of his ensemble is becoming more and more disturbed these days by some weaknesses in his brass section. There was not only an unfortunate crack-up for one brief moment in the "Bolero," but at Saturday's concert there was also an upsetting instance in the "tuba mirum" of Mozart's "Requiem." In the Ravel it was the woodwind section, rather, that stood in relief for its exceptionally limpid quality. Perhaps the acoustics of the platform contribute their share to the roughness of the brass, for in the Tchaikovsky it was more than the conductor's emphasis that contributed to the overpowering effect of this section on the strings. But this was only a detail in an exciting performance with the usual Koussevitzky massiveness and scope that scarcely require any recounting at this date.

Saturday night's concert of the Boston Symphony in the Music Shed was under the direction of Robert Shaw, who conducted three choice choral works with the collaboration of the festival chorus. This was the first opportunity we have had to observe what Mr. Shaw could do with a major orchestra, and it was thus an event of special interest.

Opens With Bach Cantata

The concert had a rather impressive opening with Bach's cantata "Nun Ist Das Heil und Die Kraft," for Mr. Shaw had established a tempo of considerable dignity and amplitude, wholly appropriate to the music's character, and the full sonority of the chorus was surprising indeed for a group that this energetic conductor had assembled less than six weeks ago from among the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

As the concert lengthened itself out with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and the Mozart "Requiem," it became increasingly evident that despite the substantial merits of the chorus it was incapable of the intensity and variety of Mr. Shaw's permanent collegiate chorale, a group that has trained over a much longer period with the astonishing rehearsal technique that has made so many musicians sit up and take notice.

It also became apparent that though Mr. Shaw can now, since he has had more experience, handle orchestral forces with quite a respectable grasp of things, his extraordinary gifts of leadership are urgently in need of more specific orchestral training if they are to realize their potentialities. Also, though his development in the direction of seriousness, as reflected in his admirable choice of this program, has taken place with incredible speed, he has still to go some before he can apprehend the fine ramifications of lyricism or strength in works like these of Stravinsky and Mozart.

There is more tenderness in the "Requiem" than Shaw communicated, and the Stravinsky was neither metallic enough in its control, nor sufficiently delineated with respect to the dark resignation and the moments of panic where an almost frenetic doubt intercedes. I prefer Stravinsky's more recent manner of presenting the peroration, namely, drawn out to an almost inhuman, but beatific, immobility, marked by the slow processional beats of the ostinato in the tympani.

Despite the above reservations this was, however, a distinguished occasion, and several of the discriminating members of the audience of 8,500 were profoundly moved.

Among the soloists, Frances Yeend, soprano, was able to shine more than the others, owing to the opportunities provided for her by Mozart's score. Vocally, she rose quite impressively to the occasion, though there is a certain prettiness in her style that detracts from the musical strength. The others were Eunice Alberts, control; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Statistics of the season's attendance at the festival concerts revealed that more than 100,000 persons heard the major presentations this season, as against more than 80,000 last year. There were, in addition, 45,000 this year who attended student and chamber concerts and public rehearsals.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 1 1 1947

Music Festival Breaks Record

Lenox, Mass.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and

---

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 1 1 1947

Tanglewood Record

LENOX, Aug. 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
MORNING STAR
AUG 11 1947

George E. Sokolsky Says:

Cultural Upsurge Among Our People at Tanglewood

These Days

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from ~~the First to the Ninth~~.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive — in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

* * *

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture

* * *

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Record

LENOX, Aug. 11 (AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 11 1947

Music Festival Breaks Record

Lenox, Mass.—(AP)—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended yesterday's closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated in the festival also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and

---

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
AUG 11 1947

Music

Berkshire Festival Ends on High Note

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11.—For a long time after Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had finished conducting the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony an audience which had jammed the Tanglewood Shed stood cheering itself hoarse, while the good doctor bowed graciously, very pleased with the demonstration. Thus ended the Berkshire Festival of 1947, on a note of pure triumph for the little builder of musical dreams into imposing realities.

As befitted the occasion yesterday's program was the best performed of the series. Opening with the Martinu Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, the list offered, besides, two items by Ravel, the "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and the "Bolero."

In fact, I had the impression that this concert was of the language of music and all that it has to say through its creators. It was not a flashy exhibition of well-played notes and rhythms and harmonies—or dissonances—but in each instance a sensitive commentary on life in various manifestations, as expressed through music.

Color, and Precisions.

Certainly the Fourth of Tschaikowsky has rarely, if ever, found the Bostonians more congenial to the perfervid declamation of the greater part of its content or, as in the contrasting Scherzo, the bright and witty persiflage of pizzicato strings.

The Martinu, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera as pianists, likewise went through most sympathetic ministrations. And the two Ravel pieces were, as everyone knew they would be, treasures of orchestral color and precision.

On Saturday evening Robert Shaw conducted a program of works for chorus and orchestra. These comprised the Bach cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," the Stravinsky "Symphony of Psalms" and the Mozart "Requiem."

Perfect Balance.

This enormously gifted young musician, who has already made an important place for himself as a choral conductor, is well on the way to achieving an equal distinction in the handling of purely instrumental music, although none such was scheduled on Saturday evening.

But his book work in these numbers, none of which may be considered a sinecure, by the way, showed his great improvement in orchestral technique, yet affirming all that he has already attained in the choral line. He kept his forces, numbering close to 300 in voices and musicians, in perfect balance. He was shrewd in the distribution of tone, in the blend of voices and instruments, in the regularity of his tempos and the building of climaxes.

The high feature of the evening was the performance of the "Requiem." This composition, so nobly tragic and so moving he delivered brilliantly. The "Dies Irae" was a splendid study in menacing sonorities. And the sublime beauty of the "Recordare" touched the heart.

Polished Singing.

Vocal soloists in the "Requiem" were, as in the Beethoven Ninth, Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease. And again praise goes to their musical and polished singing.

Mr. Shaw was given an ovation at the conclusion. His modest, self-effacing efforts, to be sure, had not been lost on his listeners. And the young students of the Berkshire Music Center who comprise the Festival Chorus shouted their approval, completely forgetting, it seemed, the hard labor their relentless drillmaster had put them through for several weeks.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 11 1947

2 Concerts End Tenth Season At Tanglewood

Koussevitzky, Shaw Lead the Bostonians; 145,000 Heard All Presentations

By Arthur V. Berger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10.—The Berkshire Festival concluded its tenth season this afternoon with a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky in the Tanglewood Music Shed.

The program opened with Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra. Completing the first half of the list were the "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" and the "Bolero" by Ravel. Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony was heard after the intermission. After several wet days that kept away the overflow audience spreading itself ordinarily over the lawns outside the shed, the elements smiled benevolently on this final event of the season, and a well disposed attendance of 12,000 was on hand to give this day the expected festive character.

Martinu's Concerto Grosso, which gave a welcome esoteric slant to an otherwise popular program, has been heard in New York, and though I had anticipated rehearing it with a certain pleasure, I found, as it is generally true of Martinu's music, that its profile was something I did not recall too well because this highly musical and skilled Czech composer is rarely notable for the definiteness of his ideas. Its rhythmic drive was, however, an exhilarating experience in Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading and in this congenial outdoor setting; and there was some fine concertante work on the part of Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, who were intrusted with the two piano parts featured in the score.

A Tour de Force

I still feel that the final cadence chords, notably in the first two movements, were arrived at arbitrarily, but in general the progression of ideas is most fluent and tasteful, and it stands up very well indeed on rehearing. The dramatic effects in the second movement, where sustained violins ascend to giddy heights over percussive chords and later figures in the pianos, is somewhat unanticipated in a work for chamber orchestra of this character, and yet some contrast was needed to the steady Brandenburgian beats of the outer movements.

Mr. Koussevitzky maintains a very drawn-out pace in the "Bolero," and the piece thus becomes, for him, a tour de force in demonstrating the sustaining power of his magnificent orchestra. The orchestral streamlining of his ensemble is becoming more and more disturbed these days by some weaknesses in his brass section. There was not only an unfortunate crack-up for one brief moment in the "Bolero," but at Saturday's concert there was also an upsetting instance in the "tuba mirum" of Mozart's "Requiem." In the Ravel it was the woodwind section, rather, that stood in relief for its exceptionally limpid quality. Perhaps the acoustics of the platform contribute their share to the roughness of the brass, for in the Tchaikovsky it was more than the conductor's emphasis that contributed to the overpowering effect of this section on the strings. But this was only a detail in an exciting performance with the usual Koussevitzky massiveness and scope that scarcely require any recounting at this date.

Saturday night's concert of the Boston Symphony in the Music Shed was under the direction of Robert Shaw, who conducted three choice choral works with the collaboration of the festival chorus. This was the first opportunity we have had to observe what Mr. Shaw could do with a major orchestra, and it was thus an event of special interest.

Opens With Bach Cantata

The concert had a rather impressive opening with Bach's cantata "Nun Ist Das Heil und Die Kraft," for Mr. Shaw had established a tempo of considerable dignity and amplitude, wholly appropriate to the music's character, and the full sonority of the chorus was surprising indeed for a group that this energetic conductor had assembled less than six weeks ago from among the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

As the concert lengthened itself out with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and the Mozart "Requiem," it became increasingly evident that despite the substantial merits of the chorus it was incapable of the intensity and variety of Mr. Shaw's permanent collegiate chorale, a group that has trained over a much longer period with the astonishing rehearsal technique that has made so many musicians sit up and take notice.

It also became apparent that though Mr. Shaw can now, since he has had more experience, handle orchestral forces with quite a respectable grasp of things, his extraordinary gifts of leadership are urgently in need of more specific orchestral training if they are to realize their potentialities. Also, though his development in the direction of seriousness, as reflected in his admirable choice of this program, has taken place with incredible speed, he has still to go some before he can apprehend the fine ramifications of lyricism or strength in works like these of Stravinsky and Mozart.

There is more tenderness in the "Requiem" than Shaw communicated, and the Stravinsky was neither metallic enough in its control, nor sufficiently delineated with respect to the dark resignation and the moments of panic where an almost frenetic doubt intercedes. I prefer Stravinsky's more recent manner of presenting the peroration, namely, drawn out to an almost inhuman, but beatific, immobility, marked by the slow processional beats of the ostinato in the tympani.

Despite the above reservations this was, however, a distinguished occasion, and several of the discriminating members of the audience of [illegible],500 were profoundly moved.

Among the soloists, Frances Yeend, soprano, was able to shine more than the others, owing to the opportunities provided for her by Mozart's score. Vocally, she rose quite impressively to the occasion, though there is a certain prettiness in her style that detracts from the musical strength. The others were Eunice Alberts, control; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Statistics of the season's attendance at the festival concerts revealed that more than 100,000 persons heard the major presentations this season, as against more than 80,000 last year. There were, in addition, 45,000 this year who attended student and chamber concerts and public rehearsals.

This Clipping From CANTON, OHIO
REPOSITORY

AUG 11 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

IT WAS not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the ~~Boston Symphony~~ in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

GEORGE SOKOLSKY

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

-:-

THE MUSIC FESTIVAL has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York, an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

-:-

AND THAT IS WHAT Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection.

As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured.

-:-

THE TASTE OF THE nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

-:-

I SPEAK HERE only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(© 1947, King Features Syndicate)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 11 1947

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL CLOSES

Attendance at Series Is Highest in Event's 10-Year History

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 10.—(AP)—A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the 3-week Berkshire Festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 higher than that of last year.

After the closing concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

During the afternoon program, Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whose "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," opened the concert, was called from the audience to share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals totalled 146,000, compared to 125,000 last year.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 11 1947

12,000 Hear Last Concert At Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra; Ovation Given Composer Martinu

By D. E. RITZ

Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra" opened the concert of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon.. A crowd of 12,000 was present to hear the closing performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and to give an ovation to the composer, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia.

The orchestra also performed Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" and that remarkable study in orchestration, "Bolero" with its ostinato drum figure. Following intermission the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony brought the festival to its conclusion.

Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were the assisting pianists for the "Concerto Grosso" which was the favorite of the reviewer. It was written in Paris in 1938 but was not played until the season 1941-42. It would require more than one hearing to write of intelligently—but it is virile writing and stimulating. An angular irregularity seems to be one of the important characteristics of the work.

The Saturday night program was conducted by Robert Shaw with the Festival Chorus assisting the members of the Boston Symphony. Works presented were most interesting. Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms, for Orchestra and Chorus" was outstanding with the Bach Cantata number 50 and the Mozart "Requiem Mass" making up the balance of the program.

Shaw is an excellent conductor and knows how to train choruses as any who have ever heard him conduct can attest. Complete cooperation from the Boston Symphony men helped make the concert one of the most satisfying of this year's festival.

In the "Symphony of Psalms" Stravinsky has used the 'cellos and basses as his strings and combined these with woodwinds and brasses in such a manner that the full archaic, Hebraic ritual effect is obtained. Without exception it qualifies as the most inspiring music of its kind that this reviewer has ever been privileged to hear.

Soloists for the Mozart Mass were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

Attendance figures for the series totalled 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood—with the season's attendance being 18,000 more than it was last year. Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals totalled 146,000 compared to 125,000 last year.

The 425 music students completed their studies at the Music Center yesterday and started for their home in all parts of the United State and Europe. Following the concert Dr. Koussevitzky stated that he will leave on Saturday for a European vacation.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 11 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY SAYS—

Large Tanglewood Audiences Show America Has Matured

Special to The BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Aug. 11.—It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky, directing the ~~Boston Symphony in~~ the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, the socially prominent in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunches with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills were Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE NINTH was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Bethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place.

FOR TANGLEWOOD is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Musical Fireworks Bring 1947 Festival to an End

Ravel's 'Bolero' and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony Highlight Final Tanglewood Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY W. HARLEY RUDKIN

In a burst of musical pyrotechnics, the 1947 Berkshire Music Festival came to a close ~~yesterday afternoon~~, paced by a rousing reading of the Ravel "Bolero," and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

From a viewpoint of [illegible] music values, the closing concert did not come up to the high levels reached in other programs, but what it might have lacked in quality, it more than made up in enthusiasm.

Long after the crashing climax of the Tchaikovsky Fourth, the capacity audience that filled the great shed and flowed far out onto the spacious Tanglewood lawns was still applauding and calling for Koussevitzky, the main cog of this tremendous musical event.

At long last it was all over, the final visitor had left the grounds, and there was nothing but a litter of picnic lunches, paper cups, soda bottles, half-eaten ice cream cones and cigaret stubs to show that more than 100,000 persons from all over the United States had invaded those lawns during the two months.

The closing program began with the Martinu Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, featuring Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera at the two pianos, and then moved into the stately and mournful "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," by Ravel. The orchestra gave this a grave and careful reading, and then came the "Bolero," which many listeners expected to be the high spot of the afternoon.

The "Bolero"

And it might have been, save for some slight misfortune among the horns in the early passages. Apart from that, Dr. Koussevitzky built the edifice of this stately dance with exacting care, from the almost painfully polite opening measures to the tremendous, crashing double fortissimi at the close.

The concert, and series came to completion with the Tchaikovsky Fourth. In the gallery of musical greats, Tchaikovsky is considered by many to rank only among the minor poets, a feeling not shared by this reviewer. It has become smart to look down the nose at Tchaikovsky's music; it has been called "pretty," and "program."

Peter Ilyitch wrote his Fourth Symphony at a period when his none-too-stable emotional life was all in pieces. It is reported that between its conception and finish, he tried to take his own life, so acute was his misery. He began it in the early part of 1877, and it was not until the winter of 1878 that it was completed, and the fateful happenings of that year have been recorded with deep emotion in a symphony that moves from the depths of despair into a new world of light and growing hope.

The great movement is the third, the Scherzo, in which the instruments toss the music about with a kind of mad abandon.

As interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday, it made a grandiose ending to a highly memorable season.

[227]

This Clipping From CANTON, OHIO
REPOSITORY

AUG 11 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

GEORGE SOKOLSKY

IT WAS not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

-:-

THE MUSIC FESTIVAL has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York, an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

-:-

AND THAT IS WHAT Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection.

As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured.

-:-

THE TASTE OF THE nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

-:-

I SPEAK HERE only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(© 1947, King Features Syndicate)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 11 1947

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL CLOSES

Attendance at Series Is Highest in Event's 10-Year History

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 10.—(AP)—A crowd of 12,000 attended the closing concert of the 3-week Berkshire Festival today, bringing the total attendance for the series to 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood.

The season's attendance was 18,000 higher than that of last year.

After the closing concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Aug. 16 for a European vacation.

Meanwhile, the 425 music students prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

During the afternoon program, Bohuslav Martin, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia, whose "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," opened the concert, was called from the audience to share the ovation given Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals totalled 146,000, compared to 125,000 last year.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 11 1947

12,000 Hear Last Concert At Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra; Ovation Given Composer Martinu

By D. E. RITZ

Bohuslav Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra" opened the concert of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon.. A crowd of 12,000 was present to hear the closing performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and to give an ovation to the composer, a native of Policka, Czechoslovakia.

The orchestra also performed Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" and that remarkable study in orchestration, "Bolero" with its ostinato drum figure. Following intermission the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony brought the festival to its conclusion.

Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were the assisting pianists for the "Concerto Grosso" which was the favorite of the reviewer. It was written in Paris in 1938 but was not played until the season 1941-42. It would require more than one hearing to write of intelligently—but it is virile writing and stimulating. An angular irregularity seems to be one of the important characteristics of the work.

The Saturday night program was conducted by Robert Shaw with the Festival Chorus assisting the members of the Boston Symphony. Works presented were most interesting. Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms, for Orchestra and Chorus" was outstanding with the Bach Cantata number 50 and the Mozart "Requiem Mass" making up the balance of the program.

Shaw is an excellent conductor and knows how to train choruses as any who have ever heard him conduct can attest. Complete cooperation from the Boston Symphony men helped make the concert one of the most satisfying of this year's festival.

In the "Symphony of Psalms" Stravinsky has used the 'cellos and basses as his strings and combined these with woodwinds and brasses in such a manner that the full archaic, Hebraic ritual effect is obtained. Without exception it qualifies as the most inspiring music of its kind that this reviewer has ever been privileged to hear.

Soloists for the Mozart Mass were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

Attendance figures for the series totalled 101,000—the highest in the 10-year history of Tanglewood—with the season's attendance being 18,000 more than it was last year. Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals totalled 146,-000 compared to 125,000 last year.

The 425 music students complete their studies at the Music Cente yesterday and started for the home in all parts of the Unite State and Europe. Following th concert Dr. Koussevitzky stat that he will leave on Saturday f a European vacation.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 11 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY SAYS—

Large Tanglewood Audiences Show America Has Matured

Special to The BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Aug. 11.—It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky, directing the ~~Boston Symphony in~~ the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, the socially prominent in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunches with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills were Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE NINTH was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Bethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place.

FOR TANGLEWOOD is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 11 1947

Musical Fireworks Bring 1947 Festival to an End

Ravel's 'Bolero' and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony Highlight Final Tanglewood Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY W. HARLEY RUDKIN

In a burst of musical pyrotechnics, the 1947 Berkshire Music Festival came to a close ~~yesterday afternoon~~, paced by a rousing reading of the Ravel "Bolero," and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

From a ~~viewpoint of~~ [illegible] music values, the closing concert did not come up to the high levels reached in other programs, but what it might have lacked in quality, it more than made up in enthusiasm.

Long after the crashing climax of the Tchaikovsky Fourth, the capacity audience that filled the great shed and flowed far out onto the spacious Tanglewood lawns was still applauding and calling for Koussevitzky, the main cog of this tremendous musical event.

At long last it was all over, the final visitor had left the grounds, and there was nothing but a litter of picnic lunches, paper cups, soda bottles, half-eaten ice cream cones and cigaret stubs to show that more than 100,000 persons from all over the United States had invaded those lawns during the two months.

The closing program began with the Martinu Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, featuring Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera at the two pianos, and then moved into the stately and mournful "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," by Ravel. The orchestra gave this a grave and careful reading, and then came the "Bolero," which many listeners expected to be the high spot of the afternoon.

The "Bolero"

And it might have been, save for some slight misfortune among the horns in the early passages. Apart from that, Dr. Koussevitzky built the edifice of this stately dance with exacting care, from the almost painfully polite opening measures to the tremendous, crashing double fortissimi at the close.

The concert, and series came to completion with the Tchaikovsky Fourth. In the gallery of musical greats, Tchaikovsky is considered by many to rank only among the minor poets, a feeling not shared by this reviewer. It has become smart to look down the nose at Tchaikovsky's music; it has been called "pretty," and "program."

Peter Ilyitch wrote his Fourth Symphony at a period when his none-too-stable emotional life was all in pieces. It is reported that between its conception and finish, he tried to take his own life, so acute was his misery. He began it in the early part of 1877, and it was not until the winter of 1878 that it was completed, and the fateful happenings of that year have been recorded with deep emotion in a symphony that moves from the depths of despair into a new world of light and growing hope.

The great movement is the third, the Scherzo, in which the instruments toss the music about with a kind of mad abandon.

As interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday, it made a grandiose ending to a highly memorable season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
8 1 1 1947

TANGLEWOOD ENDS A BANNER SEASON

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation at Finale of Festival, Which Attracted 146,000 Persons

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10—With an attendance of 146,000 persons for all events, including chamber music concerts and rehearsals, an increase of 21,000 over last year, the tenth season of the Berkshire Music Festival came to a close this afternoon in a demonstration unsurpassed and seldom equalled at Tanglewood.

An audience of 12,000 persons called and recalled Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the stage at the conclusion of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor, an appropriate composition for the closing number of the Berkshire's greatest music festival.

The other numbers, in order, were Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, pianists; Ravel's Pavane Pour une Infante Defunte and also Ravel's "Bolero," which brought down the house.

Martinu, who was in the audience, modestly declined the maestro's invitation to go on the stage to receive an ovation with the pianists.

The total attendance at this year's festival proper was 101,000 for fifteen concerts, compared with 83,000 for twelve concerts in 1946.

Some in today's audience also were present at the initial Berkshire festival—three concerts held in the open on the Dan R. Hanna farm at Stockbridge, in August, 1934, with a total attendance of 5,000. The late Henry Hadley, who was a founder of the festival, had a sixty-five piece orchestra that year.

Last night's Bach, Stravinsky and Mozart program was conducted by Robert Shaw, 31-year-old member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, who trained the participating chorus of 200 voices. He was called back to the stage six times at the conclusion of the final number.

Sharing in the acclaim was the quartet composed of Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Dr. Koussevitzky will sail next Saturday on the Queen Elizabeth for a six-week trip to France.

Most of the 425 students, representing forty states and seventy-five foreign countries, left here today.

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
AUG 11 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

TANGLEWOOD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that gathered to see some ebscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It otok a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can' explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947)

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
AUG 11 1947

Many New York Residents Attend Berkshire Music Fete

Beethoven Cycle Vies For Top Acclaim With Presentation Of Opera Idomeneo

By Helen Havener

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11.—This column will bear a Berkshire dateline, for, in common with many other New Yorkers, your scribe journeyed this past week to Tanglewood to hear the final concerts of the Beethoven cycle in this year's Berkshire Music Festival. "In common with many other New Yorkers" is well said, for a generous proportion of Park and Fifth Avenues, not to mention Long Island, was represented in the boxes at the Beethoven Concerts and at the opera Monday evening which brought Mozart's century and a half old opera, "Idomeneo" to the attention of an American public for the first time. Also New York license plates thickly dot the countryside in front of eating places so evenly spaced with the Duncan Hines seal of approval that one is more than ever impressed with the gargantuan gastronomic capacities of this king of the gourmets. Likewise the lower East Side and the upper West Side are well represented, for the love of music is by no means confined to those who drive Cadillacs and Chryslers. In every Berkshire Festival audience there are hundreds and hundreds of young people wearing shorts or slacks or dirndls who exhibit the "shining morning face" of the Shakespeare schoolboy and who applaud and shout bravo even more vociferously than their music-minded elders.

Makes History

Real musical history was made Monday and Wednesday evenings last with the presentation of Idomeneo. It is such a delightful opera, with such melodious and lovely music and such compelling drama, that it is hard to understand why no American impresario has essayed its performance before. Perhaps the reason is the length of the work in its uncut version and the cloudy development of the plot, which other producers have been too lazy to atempt to remedy. Boris Goldovsky, who directs the Berkshire Music Center Opera School, is obviously not of the languid class, and he undertook this substantial task. Originally he also had intended to translate the opera into English, but had just about begun when word was received that a translation existed abroad. This was negotiated for but did not arrive in time, so this tale of the Grecian King who makes a vow to Neptune to sacrifce the first person he sees upon landing on the shores of his native Greece if he may be saved from shipwreck, and then tries to evade execution of the vow when he is first accosted by his own son, was given in the language of the original libretto.

Get Big Chance

As rearranged and shortened by Mr. Goldovsky, it is a swift moving and dramatic work, and gave the young people of the opera school an opportunity to shine of which they took full advantage. Joseph Laderoute, whose tenor voice is of heroic proportions, sang the title role of the ill-fated king who is forced by the angry sea god to forsake his throne because of his deception. Nancy Trickey, who posesses a really lovely lyric soprano, appeared as the Princess Illia, beloved of Idomeneo's son, Idamante while Ann Bellinger on Monday night, and Dorothy Dawson on Wednesday sang the role of Idamante, designed in the original opera for a boy's voice, but sung at Tanglewood by a soprano.

For Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, and Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, for a number of years a member of the Young Artists Auditions Committee, who were here for the performance, chief interest centered in the fact that three Federation young people were in the cast. Paula Lenchner, dramatic soprano, and the federation's 1945 Young Artist winner, had the important role of Elettra, the Princess of Argos, who finally destroys herself for love of Idamante; and Joan Brainerd, 1945 winner, and Adele Addison, Plymouth District winner in the Paul Lavalle Scholarship competition, were members of the very exceptional chorus. Mrs. Gannett and Mrs. Miller glowed with pride the next morning when critics, almost without exception, singled out Miss Lenchner as the possessor of the most exception talent among the principals.

Rebuild House

Incidentally the presence of these two has given much impetus to plans for the dedication of the "Little Red House," former home of Nathaniel Hawthorne, on the Tanglewood property, which is being reconstructed under Federation auspices as practice studios for the Berkshire Music School. This will be dedicated at the opening of the 1948 season with a Federation Day which will be largely attended by members in the New England district, as well as by a scattering representation from other sections of the Country. A concert with Federation winners who have been Tanglewood students is mentioned as a possibility. In any event, an attempt will be made to secure a part of the Hawthorne exhibit, currently in the Berkshire Museum, for display at that time. This includes, among other things, many pictures and paintings of the "Little Red House," taken from diffferent angles, and the now practically priceless original script of The House of Seven Gables, which was written there. Reconstruction of the house has unquestionably stirred great interest in Hawthorne memorabilia in this section and much that is extremely interesting is being shown to the general public for the first time in many years. The contractor who is rebuilding has unearthed the bricks from the original chimney and the stones from the original fireplace and these will be used in the work. Also the old wrought-iron tongs with which Hawthorne in all probability stirred his fire were discovered when the foundations were being excavated. The structure, which is being built in replica of the original, is marked with a sign indicating what it is and the purpose for which it is being rebuilt, and consequently the building is the cynosure of all eyes.

Close Shop

A very moving human interest story developed here over the last week end. One of the 14,000 members of the audience at the concert a week ago Saturday was a Camden N. J., barber, taking his first day off for many years from his duty of shaving the populace. It was Max Lateiner, father of Jacob Lateiner, 19-year-old Cuban-born pianist, who played the spectacular Emperor Concerto as soloist with the Boston Symphony. The Lateiners have another son, Isadore, a 17-year-old violinist, studying here also, and father and mother could not resist traveling to the Berkshires to hear their offspring perform. Accordingly they hung a sign "Back on Monday" on the barber shop, and locked the door and pulled the curtains on Saturday for the first time since the shop opened.

It would be hard to say which really attracted the most attention—the Beethoven cycle or the "Idomeneo" performance. An audience of from 13,000 to 15,000 attended most of the Beethoven events, to be sure, surpassing all previous attendance figures for Tanglewood, but all the major New York critics flocked here for the "Idomeneo", and hundreds, unable to secure tickets, clamored for admission to the relatively small auditorium where the opera was presented, so that, too, was an unqualified success.

To most people who attended last Tuesday night's performance of the last two Beethoven Symphonies, the graceful and melodious Eighth and the triumphal and magnificent Ninth, it must have seemed that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky even out-Koussevitzkyed himself. He had everything to work with, of course, for the Boston Symphony is a superb instrument which can be played upon by a conductor as an organist plays upon an organ; also the chorus, as trained by youthful Robert Shaw, seemed to your columnist the finest she had ever heard. The quartet also was superb, including Frances Yend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. But it was not the quartet, the orchestra, or the chorus that made the performance so memorable. It was the unbelievable blend of the whole into one great sustained burst of mighty music for which the conductor was responsible which brought to Dr. Koussevitzky, accustomed to applause as he is, what must have been the greatest ovation of even his brilliant career.

Performance of the other symphonies, particularly the stirring Fifth, was a great experience for the listener, but it was the Ninth which appropriately constituted the climax of the series.

But enough as to setting and as to the celebrity-starred audience. It is the music that counts. Suffice it only to say that the week end and early week audiences of the Beethoven series attracted people of such diversified interests as ex-prizefighter Gene Tunney, Justice Felix Frankfurther of the United States Supreme Court, Boston's Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, Nationally and internationally famous patrons of the arts; Violinist Albert Spalding and his charming socialite wife; former Ambassador Joseph Kennedy and Mrs. Kennedy, Sir Arthur and Lady Salter and Sir Alexander Cadigan of London, and to cap the climax Prince Twfils Toussaum, head of the Egyptian delegation to the United Nations, who arrived with an impressive retinue for a five-day sojourn.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 11 1947

Music Organizations Thrive on State Funds

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

BEST evidence that interest is stirring in the proposal for a Hartford orchestra comes in the form of letters and clippings. Twice clipped was the column by Virgil Thomson, in the New York Herald-Tribune, concerning the Vermont State Symphony Orchestra.

A good deal has been written about this orchestra previously but this brings us up to date. The organization is thriving, mainly because of the combined enthusiasm of the "mechanics, postmen, school teachers, lawyers, farmers, barbers, stonecutters and wives of state legislators" who are participating.

What interested me most was the data on appropriations made out of public money in various other states which have orchestras to their credit, notably North Carolina, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Utah. The amounts range from $1,200 a year in Vermont to $150,000 in Oklahoma. Utah provides $15,000 and North Carolina $2,000.

This department has always been opposed to appropriation of city or state funds for this purpose, but can it be that there is a trend in that direction? It was a long while ago that San Francisco began appropriating money for opera and I have a recollection that Baltimore has done the same in behalf of symphony orchestra.

It is still my contention that in the new era, if that's what we are approaching, music can be made to pay its own way, even orchestral music. Don't ask me how but figures drawn up by Francis Goodwin, some details of which were presented here previously, go a long way towards showing that it can be done.

* * *

THIS YEAR'S Berkshire Festival broke all attendance records, with as many as 14 thousand at single concerts, and more than one hundred thousand at the 15 concerts.

The Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky's summer school at Tanglewood, completed a six weeks session. The 425 students were drawn from 40 States and 15 other countries. The student orchestras gave concerts weekly, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assisting and student conductors. Chamber music concerts were given under the supervision of William Primrose. The chorus under the direction of Robert Shaw, took part in the Festival, singing in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mozart's Requiem, and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. The composition class was under Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger, Samuel Barber taking the place of the latter when illness prevented him from completing the term. The Opera Department, under the direction of Boris Goldvosky, gave the first American performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo" on Aug. 4 and 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the eleventh season of Berkshire Festival concerts for next summer at Tanglewood during July and August. The detailed plans are yet to be announced.

This Clipping From EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW

AUG 11 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

A Message From Tanglewood

IT WAS not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender, it was not the Army-Notre Dame game, it was not the World Series, it was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans—socialites in boxes and students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them—came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we to tonight?"

It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

—:—

THE NINTH WAS done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals never had been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's Ode To Joy in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

—:—

BUT ALL OF them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means' satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years, but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite, but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contribution to American culture.

—:—

I SPEAK HERE only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art and the dance. And in time, even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between.

Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright 1947, King Features)

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

AUG 12 1947

New High In Attendance At Tanglewood Season

A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky closed the concert season with the stirring finale of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony Sunday afternoon with 12,000 music lovers in attendance, bringing the total attendance for the 1947 season to 106.600, an increase of 23,600 over last year's record.

Attendance at all events, including the student concerts and rehearsals, was announced by the directors as 146,000, compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This year's figure of 106,000 includes the three week-end concerts the extra Beethoven Ninth Symphony program and the "Music for All" promotion program as well as the Bach-Mozart concerts. Last year's figure of 83,000 includes the three week-end concerts and the Bach-Mozart Fetival series.

After the final concert, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Saturday on the Queen Elizabeth for a six-week vacation in France.

The 425 Music Center students, who took part in the Festival, today started to leave the Tanglewood area for their homes in all parts of the United States and abroad.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 11 1947

BIDDLE IN THE MIDDLE: Seated in the box section in the center of the Music Shed for the closing Berkshire Festival concert was former U.S. Attorney General Francis Biddle, who is a guest of Mrs. Andre Visson of Lenox, left. Mrs. Natalie Schaefer of Washington, D.C., and Dumbarton Oaks, also a guest of Mrs. Visson, is reading the Festival program.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 12 1947

Of Music and Musicians

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, demonstrated his faith in the musical intelligence of the American public this summer in his choice of programs for the Berkshire Festival concerts, which ended Sunday at Tanglewood, Mass. That Dr. Koussevitzky's faith was justified was proven by the attendance figures of the festival—18,000 more than last year.

The programs included a large proportion of new and serious works in addition to the complete cycle of Bethoven symphonies. Tanglewood is taking its rightful place as exponent of the modern composer and proving again that the American public can and does like other things than "gumdrops."

A chorus of about 50 voices from the Thursday Musical club, the Monday Musical club and the Poughkeepsie club sang Sunday at Cooperstown under the direction of Dr. Elmer A. Tidmarsh. Miss Helen Henshaw of this city gave a short organ recital before the program. Miss Carmela Stanco served as the accompanist with Mrs. Edmund L. Conklin of Albany assisting. The audience was estimated at about 3,000.

The Composers Press, Inc., 853 Seventh avenue, New York 19, NY, has announced two contests open to American composers. Winning compositions will be published by the Composers Press and the composers given a royalty contract. The contests close Oct. 1 and applications can be obtained on request. A $25 cash prize is offered for a first or second grade piano teaching piece and a $25 cash prize for a first or second grade violin teaching piece.

F. Charles Adler, director of the Saratoga Spa Music Festival, lived in Europe between 1930 and 1933. He was directing the Berlin State radio on its musical side and was publishing music as well.

Three works which were published by Mr. Adler in Europe will be played at th Spa festival in September. They are the overture to a comic opera of Haydn, "The World on the Moon," an aria by Haydn written to celebrate Nelson's victory at the battle of the Nile and a work by Karl Wiener called "In Memorium."

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 11 1947

106,600 Turn Out For 1947 Festival

JUDY GARLAND ATTENDS: Among the celebrities at the closing concert of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood was actress Judy Garland, who is spending several days in Stockbridge. She sat toward the rear of the Music Shed with a friend, Robert Knight. "I am thoroughly enjoying my first visit to the Berkshires," said the young actress.

New Attendance Records Are Set At Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. ~~Dr. Serge Koussevitzky closed~~ the concert season with the stirring finale of the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony yesterday afternoon with 12,000 music lovers in attendance, bringing the total attendance for the 1947 season to 106,600, an increase of 23,600 over last year's record.

Attendance at all events, including the student concerts and rehearsals, was announced by the directors as 146,000, compared with 125,000 in 1946.

This year's figure of 106,000 includes the three week-end concerts, the extra Beethoven Ninth Symphony program and the "Music for All" promotion program as well as the Bach-Mozart concerts. Last year's figure of 83,000 includes the three week-end concerts and the Bach-Mozart Festival series.

Koussevitzky Going Abroad

After the final concert, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said he would leave Saturday on the Queen Elizabeth for a six-week vacation in France.

The 425 Music Center students, who took part in the Festival, today started to leave the Tanglewood area for their homes in all parts of the United States and abroad.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, completing the performance of a dozen distinct programs in three weeks, to say nothing of the programs by smaller groups and sections of the orchestra, came to the close of its Herculean task riding an overwhelming wave of enthusiasm.

'Koussevitzky Weather'

Saturday evening when Robert Shaw had conducted the orchestra and the Berkshire Festival chorus in a program devoted entirely to works of religious and vocal importance, the weather had been less than dependable, but yesterday afternoon the skies were clear, the air coolish and crisp, in fact, it was what has come to be whispered about as "Koussevitzky weather." The heavens had been kind to the Festival. Not a concert was disturbed by rain, and only a couple gave the crowds inconvenient moments as they were en route to Tanglewood.

Robert Shaw joined the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center last year. The results he has achieved have endeared him as much to audiences as they have won the warm affection of his students. A great share of the spontaneous enthusiasm he earned Saturday was accorded him by the vocalists, who were loath to let him go, as that performance more or less marked the real, if not the formal, completion of the school term.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
AUG 11 1947

10th Season at Tanglewood Comes to Brilliant Close

Koussevitzky Roundly Applauded by Thousands; Attendance Records Shattered

By Willard M. Clark

Tanglewood, Aug. 10—The 10th season of Berkshire Festival concerts, Serge ~~Koussevitzky, director~~, came to a ~~triumphant~~ close this afternoon with an overwhelming performance of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 4 in F minor." It is almost a Festival tradition that the final concert close with a Tschaikowsky symphony. Almost perfect weather and the great performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra drew a record-breaking attendance to these concerts, with the largest audience numbering an estimated 14,000 persons. It is estimated that well over 100,000 persons attended the 15 concerts. The Berkshire Center school, with its 425 students from 48 states and 15 other countries also closed yesterday.

Many Highlights

There have been many musical highlights, among them Leonard Bernstein's conducting of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps"; the American premiere of Mozart's opera "Idomeno"; the choral concert directed by Robert Shaw which featured Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and, as always, the virtuoso performances of the Boston players and Dr. Koussevitzky's notable interpretations during the Beethoven cycle.

Today's concert was as brilliant as any. It opened with a Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra by Martinu. This is a strange work whose melodies seem in a continuous swirl. It demands close listening. Particularly effective was the second movement, a Lento, which had a distinct oriental flavor. Two pianos dominated the final movement. They were played by Lucas Foss and Bernard Zighera.

Next on the program was the Raval "Pavane pour une Infante defunte." If the tempo seemed a bit faster than usual, it heightened the effectiveness of the work, surely one of the lovliest from Ravel's pen. It is in such music that Dr. Koussevitzky is at his greatest.

"Bolero" Is Incredible

Ravel's famous "Bolero" was also featured. Its insistent beat, its tones rising to breath-taking crescendi almost brought the audience to its feet. It was an incredible performance which one had to hear to believe.

To listen to a performance of a Tschaikowsky symphony by the Boston orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky is a memorable experience. His reading of the Fourth Symphony this afternoon was spacious and powerful. He drove his players to the limit, but they responded to every demand, whether for the most delicate of pizzicati or for full-throated proclamation by the brasses. It was no surprise that applause followed every movement and that at the end conductor and players were awarded a tremendous ovation. They had earned it.

Center Chorus Sings

Saturday night's choral concert, conducted by Robert Shaw and featuring the Center chorus, was devoted to three great works, the Bach Cantata No. 50, "Nun Ist Das Heil Und Die Kraft," Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and Mozart's "Requiem Mass in D Minor." Mr. Shaw is a skilled choral director and one heard singing of consistent beauty of tone throughout a wide dynamic range. Entrances were perfect and pitch commendable.

The soloists, who had previously sung in the performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass. Their singing in the "Requiem" was commendable rather than exciting, with the two men taking the vocal honors.

Chorus Excels in Requiem

Perhaps the finest singing of the evening was lavished on the lovely setting by Stravinsky of the 150th Psalm. Moussorgsky and "Boris Godounoff" came to mind as it was being sung, for its melodic character and structure were much the same as choral portions of that opera.

The Mozart "Requiem" one hears too seldom. Its vitality and freshness were never more apparent. Its intricacies held no terrors for the chorus. The soloists sang acceptably.

His program had included a short Bach Cantata, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," for double chorus and orchestra, the Stravinsky symphony of Psalms, for chorus and specialized orchestra. (Strings above the cello are not used), and the Mozart Requiem Mass, in which the soloists were those who had sung in the Beethoven ninth symphony, Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The huge chorus had been so well prepared that Shaw found it unnecessary to give them more than their proportionate share of his attention during the performance, and was thus able to devote himself to the orchestra and to the general ensemble. The chorus was thoroughly responsive in the Symphony of Psalms, maintaining with a restrained quality the effective vocal line given them, in creating an atmosphere of the recognition of a paramount force. Stravinsky achieves this with exceptional economy, not only of instruments and notes, but with a transparency which never seems thin, and which Shaw maintained by requiring a definite timbre and a limited tone which he channeled skillfully and artistically in his conception of the whole piece. It is in three movements which are linked together with pause. It was dedicated in 1930 to the Boston Symphony orchestra on the occasion of their 50th anniversary.

The Mozart D minor mass allowed the chorus full scope and Shaw gave them every opportunity to take full advantage of it. Each division had a special character: The "Dies Irae" brimmed over with youthful and incisive vigor, whereas in the "Rex Tremendae" fullness and breadth was accentuated and, later, the "Confutatis" and "Lacrimosa" were examples of softly reposeful quiet and smooth moderation. The entrances here were marked by a sure but soft approach. The "Domine Jesu" and the "Sanctus" were the climax of the vocal efforts in the mass, with the great fugue "Cum sanctis tuis" in the final section raising the full magnificence of Mozart aloft. The chorus disobediently refused to stand to share the triumph of their chorus-master and insisted on remaining seated and adding their applause to the great surge of approval which came from beyond the stage. Shaw was called back, alone and with his soloists, and motioned the applauding orchestra to its feet each time.

Yesterday's Concert

Yesterday afternoon a concerto grosso for chamber orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, which had had its first performance by the Boston orchestra nine years ago, started the otherwise slightly meretricious program. The Martinu calls for a small orchestra with two pianos, which were played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera. After this came the Ravel "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" and his popular "Bolero," and, for the final act, the Tchaikovsky F minor symphony (No. 4).

Martinu was in the audience and was called to the front to acknowledge the applause following his concerto, a finely constructed three-movement work with exceptional felicity of sonorities. Of the Ravel studies, the Pavane was played with a poignant tenderness and the "Bolero" finally came to life after a very lingering start and was built up to a tremendous, roof-raising climax.

the excitement exceeded all demonstrations within record.

This has been a remarkable Festival. The programs have shown great care and skill in arrangement. There have been a gratifying number of works played of composers living, and, in many cases, on hand in person. The performances have maintained a standard which has set this Festival apart and above all other summer music enterprises, in that this offers the full complement of a famous orchestra with its main full-time leader, preparing and playing with all the serious respect for his audiences that is held for winter audiences. The quick succession of so many programs has tired both the men of the orchestra and any of the audience who faithfully attended all the concerts, but it has been a happy weariness, based on the consciousness of something well done and something worthy achieved.

NEW MASSES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 12 1947

RECORDS

THE Twelve Concerti Grossi of Handel are a monumental achievement of eighteenth-century music, one of the pillars on which the music of the entire following century rested. Unlike Bach, who tried to erect a musical bridge between his own times and the Middle Ages, with its communal folk spirit, its amazing structures of scholastic logic, its anguish and exaltation, Handel was wholly the child of his own middle-class times. In these concerti he attacked and solved every problem his times raised of harmony, counterpoint, musical construction, even of orchestration. For one can learn more of the science of handling instruments from these works for strings alone than from many works scored for everything from piccolo to kitchen sink. This wonderful music is given complete, for the first time on domestic records, in a top-notch performance by Adolf Busch and his chamber orchestra. Busch has the scholarship which makes not for pedantry but for freedom. These performances sound wholly within eighteenth-century style, yet make the music more varied and expressive than I have ever heard it before (Columbia 685). Two masterpieces by Bach in a similar style but vastly different in spirit, the Suite No. 2 for flute and strings and the Suite No. 3 with the famous "air," are performed by Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra. The reading is somewhat lacking in wit, but magnificent in sound (RCA Victor 1123).

Another member of the Busch family, the conductor Fritz Busch, makes a most welcome return to records in his fine accompaniments to lyrical excerpts from Lohengrin, Die Meistersinger, Parsifal and Tannheuser, sung by Torsten Ralf. Ralf has a good voice and style, hampered by short breath (Columbia 634). Jascha Heifetz appears as transcriber as well as violinist in an album of charming and impeccably performed little pieces taken mostly from the modern French school (RCA Victor 1126).

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
AUG 12 1947

Also included in the August Red Seal releases is an album of two 12-inch Red Seal records, recording portions of Prokofieff's Romeo and Juliet Ballet Suite No. 2. The work is played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by ~~Dr. Serge~~ Koussevitzky. Typically Prokofieffian, this excellently transcribed music will be enjoyed by all fans of Russian music. (RCA Victor Album DM—1129).

Waltzes From Die Fledermaus by Johann Strauss Jr. are offered on two sides of a new 10-inch Red Seal record by the Hollywood Bowl orchestra. Leopold Stowkowski is the director. This measures up to what you expect in a record. (RCA Victor 10-1310.)

This Clipping From NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO
TIMES

AUG 11 1947

THESE DAYS

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

TANGLEWOOD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialities in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applading, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, statisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

Music Captures Youth

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every notworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD
AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialities in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was not accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York — an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

* * *

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in Midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man — 73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

* * *

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist Most of them have never —or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

* * *

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadeliphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone. (c)

This Clipping From OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

AUG 11 1947

Music Inspires a Free America

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth symphony on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city.

This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval, but the Americans who love music come.

I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before.

When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music, brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original.

Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth, but all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection.

As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured.

The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth.

This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 11 1947

Tanglewood Season Ends, Concerts Drew 136,000

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Monday—The Berkshire Music Festival came to a close yesterday afternoon with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony in Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra," Ravel's "Pavane pour un Enfant Defunt," and "Bolero," and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4, in F Minor."

The final event drew an audience of 12,000.

It has required fifteen reviews and several columns to tell a small part of what happened here at Tanglewood during the past month. The exact attendance for the regular festival series was 101,000, and for the student concerts, 35,000. Last year the overall attendance was 125,000.

Ceaseless Serenade

The beautiful, expansive grounds have been given a ceaseless serenade not only from the festival concerts but by rehearsals and performances of 450 students of the Berkshire Music Center who are working determinedly for careers.

At least one fact has been conclusively proven during the past weeks—fine music has become very important to the American public. Vast audiences have made their way to the Tanglewood Shed. I have never seen more attentive audiences.

Koussevitzky's Dream

This has been a great chapter in the life of Serge Koussevitzky for whom Tanglewood is a realized dream. Any suspicion that his advancing age has affected the vitality of his conducting has been sharply dispelled.

Yesterday afternoon's concert evoked a series of ovations for Dr. Koussevitzky and for Bonuslav Martinu who was in the audience. Martinu's Concerto Grosso is a vitalized piece of music whose first movement is reminiscent of sections of the Khachatourian piano concerto. It has close-knit harmonies, strong rhythmic pulse, and a difficult score for two pianos, played by Bernard Zighera and Lukas Foss.

Pianos Brilliant

Its second movement (Lento) has a powerful, dirge-like melody which visits through the string sections, rising to a fiery crescendo with the pianos giving off a powerful chordal background. The finale is frenzied in character with the pianos brilliantly featured.

The "Pavane" by Ravel was given a beautifully sensuous performance in contrast to the "Bolero," which was marred by some unfortunate mishaps in the brasses but rose to a thunderous climax. The Tchaikovsky symphony was a typical Koussevitzky performance, to which description nothing need be added.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 13 1947

Miss Joan Brainerd Sings in Lenox Music School

Miss Joan Brainerd of Spring Glen and 18 East 60th Street, New York City, has returned from Lenox, Mass, after spending six weeks at the Berkshire Music School in Tanglewood.

Last Saturday Miss Brainerd was presented in the third act of "La Boheme" in the role of Mimi and as Violetta in the second act of "La Traviata," under the direction of Mr. Boris Goldovsky.

Miss Brainerd will sing on September 6 in Katonah, N. Y., for the Westchester Friends of Music and will then resume her studies in New York.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

AUG 13 1947

For RCA Victor this month, Serge Koussevitsky conducts the Boston Orchestra in four movements from the suite. The abbreviated version makes a satisfactory representation of the larger work, and the price, for only two records, is moderate.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 16 1947

At rehearsal one afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was dissatisfied with the orchestra's performance. When repeated correction had produced no improvement, he tossed his baton on the stand and cried:

"Gentlemen, after 20 years in Boston I have learned to tolerate beans, but I will not tolerate has-beens!"—E. E. E.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

AUG 13 1947

MAGAZINE DIGEST:

This Should Make You Love Bats

Mechanix Illustrated

Timorous music lovers may not think so, but the bats that swoop through Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass., where the Berkshire ~~Music Festival~~ is held, are considered one of the Festival's greatest assets, Clay Perry says. They keep the entire area free of mosquitos, a bat delicacy.

Another reason for being nice to bats: If atomic warfare should drive us into caves, the author foresees, the bats may become our guides.

Writing about Dr. Donald R. Griffin of Cornell and Charles E. Mohr, of the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, leaders in bat research, Perry tells us that valuable discoveries have resulted from their work. Chief of them is an aid to the blind using the application of "echo-location." Perry explains that bats fly by echolocation—finding their way in the dark by catching the echoes which bounce back from everything they approach.

He says that Mohr once transported 2,500 bats from their cave home 90 miles to another cavern inhabited by another bat colony.

Our World

Young Negro boys and girls are offered reefers (marihuana cigarets) free by dope peddlers determined to make them addicts and steady customers, Judy Grollman discloses. The vicious reefers, she writes, are cheap and plentiful—part of a narcotics racket that rakes in $25,000,000 in New York alone.

Miss Grollman says that the effect of marihuana is unpredictable. It may merely have a stupefying effect on some persons, but it may make others attack, kill, rob or commit suicide. "The habit," she observes, "leads to every form of human degredation."

Smoking a reefer may produce a craze that will last four or five hours, Miss Grollman tells us. She recalls that Billie Holiday, imprisoned as a result of her addiction, began by smoking reefers, ended up by spending $500 a week on drugs.

Junior Bazaar

Marriage—"It is the acceptance of responsibility toward another human being, as full of need from you as you may be from him; a creature of rags and snatches of patched-up ego, pent-up impulses and irrational responses . . . To give him happiness (your own depends on it), you will have to discover and respond to the man behind the man, his own submerged dream of himself."

So writes Alice S. Morris, reminding us that we must work to make marriage happy—a constant labor of love. It's smart to blame marriage failures on "progress" and "emancipation," she observes, "but it's smarter to know that a successful marriage is the highest form of progress. It can achieve . . . the profoundest freedom of all."

Our marriages fail, she declares, because we tend to measure them against the "doomed and vulgar conception" of Hollywood myth-marriages, radio breakfast teams, trash fiction and advertising banality."

* * *

Stephen Spender objects to the examination system in schools, protesting that they are no more than a test of the student's memory. He believes that a modern teacher must have these qualities: " . . . a passionate desire to communicate to others his own interest in his subject . . . an awareness corresponding to that of the novelist or the poet of the character, interest and potentialities of his pupils, and, "He must make his pupils know how to relate their learning to their living."

The teacher of Latin or the arts, he writes, must realize that his aim is not to "broaden the mind" of his student, but that these studies "are going to enrich and strengthen his spiritual and mental life and enable him to live more fully and even to act more effectively in the modern world."

United States News

The United States News finds that auto prices have risen because material costs since November have increased from 17 to 43 per cent, and labor costs have risen 12 per cent. Nevertheless, the magazine notes, the demand for cars is stronger than ever before. In fact, it is believed that if manufacturers added several hundred dollars more to their prices, they would not destroy the market for new cars. The real limiting factor on prices, however, is the industry's desire to safeguard the market of the future.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

AUG 13 1947

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

IT WAS NOT A FIGHT between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

Shouting and Waving

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

We Are On Upgrade

We speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

ORLANDO, FLA.
REPORTER-STAR

AUG 13 1947

Looking & Listening . . . with BEN GROSS

Something New! . . . A talent-seeking show that would give aspiring actors, singers and musicians a greater opportunity than any other like project now on radio is being considered by several advertising agencies. Already, of course, we have Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts, on CBS, and Eddie Dowling's The Big Break, on NBC. Also, we'll soon be hearing an amateur-pro period conducted by the bandleader Horace Heidt, probably in the slot occupied by CBS' It Pays to Be Ignorant. But, although such broadcasts do give a break to the newcomer, once he is selected and rewarded, that is usually the last the nation-wide audience hears of him. Those behind the contemplated project, therefore, have come up with a "different" twist. Their idea is to have the winner appear on successive broadcasts until he is defeated by another contestant. This is the technique used on Bill Cullen's quiz show, Winner Take All. It would serve to test not only the contestant's versatility but help to make him known to a tremendous number of listeners. This strikes me as an excellent plan—and also as a much needed one. For after all, about the only promising new talent uncovered in a systematic way by radio recently are two comics—Jack Paar and Bill Goodwin.

Arthur Godfrey

✡ ✡ ✡

Busy At ABC . . . With Wednesday already set as its comedy night of the radio schedule for next Fall, the boys at ABC are lining up Tuesday as the No. 1 evening for serious listening. Effective Sept. 2, America's Town Meeting of the Air will be switched from Thursday to Tuesdays at 8:30 p.m. immediately preceding the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will give fans two solid hours of forum and concert music. Thursday is also being slated as a comedy night

---

BUTTE, MONT.
MONTANA STANDARD

AUG 13 1947

'These Days'

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven ~~symphonies~~ in succession from the first to the ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, college students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the first to the ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment, it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

AUG 12 1947

Music Festival Sets Attendance Record

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12 (AP).—A new attendance record was set this year at the 10th annual three-week ~~Berkshire Music Festival~~ at Tanglewood.

A crowd of 12,000 attended Sundays closing concert to bring the total attendance for the series to 101,000—18,000 more than last year.

Attendance at all events, including the chamber music concerts and rehearsals was announced by the directors as 146,000 as compared with 125,000 in 1946.

After the final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and founder and director of the Berkshire music center, said he would leave August 16 for a European vacation.

The 425 music students who participated also prepared to leave for their homes in all parts of the United States and Europe.

[232]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 15 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY SAYS—

Age of Person Depends On His Mental Vigor

Special to The BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

NEW YORK, Aug. 15. — Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Nicholas Murray Butler, 85, only aged during the past five or six years. In spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time.

William Randolph Hearst, in financial difficulties some years ago, saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

THE MAGAZINE "World Report" sometime ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Years	Countries	Years
New Zealand	67	Germany	61
Sweden	66	France	57
Netherlands	66	Italy	55
U. S.	65	Russia	45
Britain	62	India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50%, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

PHYSICAL YOUTH is not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant.

During the depression, employers were laying off men at 50. Those who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way.

DUBUQUE, IOWA
TELEGRAPH-HERALD
AUG 15 1947

These Days
George Sokolsky

HOW OLD IS OLD?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Avg. Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation— we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain abo him.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR

AUG 15 1947

The Berkshire Festival was brought to a close last Sunday afternoon with the playing of a program made up of Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra, with two pianos; Ravel's Pavane and Bolero; and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony. The concert made a fitting and brilliant climax to a series which included four programs devoted to Mozart and Bach, and four to Beethoven, in which every one of the master's nine Symphonies was played. Six other miscellaneous programs were included in the Festival series.

Another festival series will be presented by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood next July and August. This will be the eleventh festival by the official count, which omits the series given by the Center's student orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in 1942, the Mozart series of 1944 and the Bach-Mozart series of 1945. The Berkshire Music Center will hold its sixth session during the same period.

Local people seen at last Sunday's concert were Virginia and Giovannina de Blasiis, Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Wright, Bradford Wright, and Dr. Richard Garrett.

There is much interest in music circles about three works to be played at the Saratoga Spa Music Festival in September, all of which became available for performance on recently. They are the overture a comic opera of Haydn, "The Wor on the Moon"; an aria by the sam composer, written to celebrate Ne son's victory at the Battle of the Nile, and another called "In Memoriam," by Karl Wiener. They have a romantic history.

In the years between 1930 and 1933 F. Charles Adler, director of the Spa Festival, was living in Europe. He was doing a good deal of conducting, directing the musical side of Berlin State Radio, and just to keep out of mischief, publishing music. Europe was, as it had been since the 18th century, opera hungry. So when Mr. Adler uncovered an opera by Haydn, long since out of circulation, the obvious thing was to publish it. This meant modernising the book which had been written by Goldoni, but which employed far too much archaic stage machinery. The operation was a tremendous success, 61 opera houses including it in their repertory during the first season.

The so-called Nelson aria was composed at Esterhazy where Haydn worked, and where Lord Nelson and Lord and Lady Hamilton came to spend a week-end. Haydn had lived much in England, so an English hero was a great hero to him. Furthermore, a lady in waiting had written a poem in English celebrating the famous naval victory. So Haydn set the words to music. This, too, was uncovered one hundred odd years later, and Mr. Adler promptly published it.

In 1933 Mr. Adler was lucky enough to escape the Nazis. But they, in turn, promptly confiscated all his possessions, including his publishing house. From 1933 to 1947 nothing more was heard of these scores. Suddenly, one day in the spring of 1947, several hundred pounds of music arrived in Saratoga Springs by express. The packages contained copies of many of the lost publishing house's scores. So, at Saratoga, there will take place the first American performance of these three works.

Mr. Wiener's work has a tragic implication. He was a fellow-worker with Mr. Adler at the Berlin radio. He disappeared, and no one knows what became of him, although the presumption is that the Nazis murdered him. So, "In Memoriam" as his work is entitled becomes doubly suitable.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

AUG 15 1947

THESE DAYS
BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

How Old Is Old?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

Sokolsky

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet he must have been young sometime or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the last five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N.-B. C. symphony.

○ ○ ○

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But our life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

○ ○ ○

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant.

George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression year they were laying off men at as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came,

---

This Clipping From NILES, OHIO
TIMES

AUG 15 1947

The "Beloved Berkshires"

—Around the World—

By TEMPLE MANNING

THERE is much to do, much to see, and a world to enjoy within the 959 square miles that make up the district of the Berkshire Hills of Western Massachusetts, the "Beloved Berkshires," to a devoted host of admirers and visitors.

Thousands of folk have been going to the Berkshires for years, and just can't see any other area for a perfect summer experience. Others have come to know and to love the region drawn there by the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood that has become world-famous. Twelve concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus nine concerts on consecutive week-ends, beginning July 24, make up the Festival. Another concert series has already been scheduled for Pittsfield.

Pontoosuc Lake with Mt. Greylock in the background.

Trout Streams

But to get back to holiday-making and some figures such as the 800 miles of trout streams, the 73,098 acres of beautiful state forest, to give you some idea of the attractions of the region, which is dominated by Greylock, highest mountain in Massachusetts, and is 3,500 feet high.

The 16 state forests are all beautiful, especially the one around Mt. Greylock, with an area of 8,660 acres. There are camping grounds and picnic grounds, hiking trails and nature trails, with beauty at every turn. Lovely, too, is the 8,000-acre tract on Beartown Mountain, with sixteen miles of road.

Near the west shore of Pontoosuc Lake is Balance Rock Park, dedicated to a natural phenomenon, a relic of the Ice Age. A triangular-shaped boulder rests delicately on its apex in a meadow, and while a husky man can make it sway, it is impossible to overturn the rock.

For wildlife enthusiasts there are beautiful sanctuaries at Lenox, at Hinsdale and at Hancock. For sightseeing by auto, three noted state roads cut through the Berkshires; Jacob's Ladder from Lee to Bonny Rigg, and on to Westfield; the Lebanon Mountain highway, west of Pittsfield, and the Mohawk Trail from North Adams to Greenfield.

Historical Interest

As for places, Stockbridge is a major objective for there is so much of historical and literary interest to see and admire. At Stockbridge, too, is a fine demonstration garden, for all the herbs and flowers that can be raised in the region offer many acres of growing delight.

Nearby, in Lenox, is the Pleasant Valley Sanctuary, a private reservation on a mountainside of 306 acres with eight miles of exquisite hiking and nature trails, and a 200-year-old farmhouse that offers rest and refreshment. Here is a beautiful region for a beautiful holiday that has a real American flavor well-laced with all kinds of interesting sporting events and fixtures, and crowned with many cultural events that are becoming increasingly important.

[233]

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 15 1947

THESE DAYS

—By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

LAST SUNDAY, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted ~~nine Beethoven~~ symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the last five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweeden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be herrible — he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 15 1947

Carvalho To Conduct Program Honoring Truman

Eleazar deCarvalho, assistant to Serge Koussevitzky in teaching ~~conducting at the Be~~rkshire Music Center during the past season, has been invited to conduct the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra Sept. 5 in a program of American music in honor of President Truman, who is expected to be in Brazil on that date.

On the program will be the third symphony by Aaron Copland, assistant director of the Tanglewood school, who will be present to hear it; and music by Samuel Barber, teacher of composition at the school, William Schuman and Peter Minnen.

Mr. Copland has left for South America. Mr. deCarvalho left Lenox today for New York. He will go to Rio de Janeiro Aug. 22 from La Guardia Field on a military plane, and will return to Boston in December.

This Clipping From MARION, OHIO
STAR
AUG 15 1947

How Old Is Old?

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

LAST Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Kousesevitzky, whon conducted ~~nine~~ Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the last five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call oid age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He is not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. and Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. Life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as absolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understaking of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From
OTTUMWA, IOWA
AUG 15 1947

These Days

What Is 'Old'?

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted ~~nine Beethoven~~ symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow and Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation — we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, concontinued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible.—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however — that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that Gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

MARTINSBURG, W. VA.
JOURNAL

AUG 15 1947

These Days

(By George E. Sokolsky)

How Old Is Old?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitsky, who conducted ~~nine Beeth~~oven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N.B.C. Symphony.

The Magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 percent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

[234]

This Clipping From
FARGO, N. D.
MORNING FORUM
AUG 15 194

Tanglewood, America At Its Best

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Sokolsky

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval.

But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

✣ ✣ ✣

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

✣ ✣ ✣

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 15 1947

H. I. PHILLIPS is on vacation.

The Sun Dial* will be resumed on his return.

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

How Old is Old?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries.	Average Span.
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was thirty-five years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the United States life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year, they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for eighty years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

BRUNSWICK, GA.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

MAESTRO WEDS

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

PASSAIC, N. J.
SUNDAY EAGLE
AUG 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 16 (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married secretly at his estate here yesterday to his scretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, a niece of his late first wife, it was learned today.

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven syphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assambly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can plain the growth of Beethoven's rsonality from the First to the nth.

But all of them, voluntarily, a conscious effort, in accordce with their means, satisfied a irning for perfection. As I lled in the crowd, during the ermissions, it came upon me re and more that this was a ing audience, that many thouids were GIs and their girls, h as decades ago might have ie to Coney island or Brighton ich or some such place. They young in years but their tastes re matured. The taste of the ion has matured. The culture the American people has been vated from the trivialities of moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one exssion of this cultural upsurge iong our people. What other tion can speak of at least 35 nphonic groups spread from ist to coast, playing not only to elite but to great masses as the Hollywood bowl, the Robin od Dell concerts in Philadella, the Stadium concerts in w York and in so many other ies that it is hard to keep them in mind? And over the radio, Philharmonic, the NBC and Detroit symphonies, week er week, enrich a nation with ir contributions to American ture.

speak here only of music, for the moment it is music that captured the imagination of erican youth. This lust for a ter life will pour itself into etry, art, the dance and in time n the theater will respond to stimulus. We are on the upde.

And what is so glorious about is the utter freedom of paripation. No government plays part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

On The Air Tonight

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Eastern Standard—for Daylight add one hour except ABC times, which fit either Daylight or Standard.

New York, Aug. 12, (AP).—In between programs, broadcasting constantly is looking over its prospects, both immediate and future. In that connection here are some current developments:

Pending selection of a regular MC to take over from Milo Boulton, who has left the program after five years, We The People of CBS has scheduled guests for that post the next two weeks. Tonight at 8 it will be George Carson Putnam, specialist in newscasting.

Jimmie Fidler will be on two networks with his Sunday night Hollywood comment, when he returns September 7 from vacation. MBS says it will carry him at 7:30 p. m., with ABC reporting that he will continue on its chain, too, but at the new time of 10:30.

Coming up tonight: ABC 8:30 first of a series of three light opera festivals, Josef Stopak conducting, to occupy the Boston Symphony hour. ... MBS 9:30 in place of the usual American Forum, first broadcast of "Symphonic Diary," composed by Sgt. Paul Siegel of Brooklyn.

Tuning Tonight—NBC — 7 Milt Berle Comedy; 8 Call The Police drama; 8:30 Fred Waring music; 9 Philip Marlowe Adventures; 9:30 Romberg Concert.

CBS—7 Big Town Drama; 8 We The People; 8:30 Studio One "Mysterious Mickey Finn;" 9:30 Return Engagement Drama.

ABC—7:30 Green Hornet; 8:15 Bobby Boyle Show; 9:30 Summer Serenade; 10 Museum of Modern Music; 10:45 Earl Godwin.

MBS—7 Warden's Cases; 7:30 The Falcon; 9:30 Dance Time.

Rhapsody by Sokolsky

Speaking of Tanglewood, George E. Sokolsky waxes eloquent over those Saturday nights when 25,000 Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony.

What is so glorious about it, says Mr. Sokolsky, "is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

"Tanglewood, like every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state."

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH
AUG

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

New York, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years. Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Marries Secretary

NEW YORK –(AP)– Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Maumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
FARGO, N. D.
MORNING FORUM
AUG 15 194

Tanglewood, America At Its Best

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval.

But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

✣ ✣ ✣

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

✣ ✣ ✣

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
AUG 15 1947

H. I. PHILLIPS

THESE D

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will Koussevitzky, who conducted nine B phonies and two concertos in a week, other programs at Tanglewood, at a festival, looked like a graying youth concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man old? I do not recall the time when I d my father as an old man; yet, he m young some time or other. They tell children think of their parents as parents imagine themselves veritable woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler ing the past five or six years, althou 85 and in spite of the infirmities of w age, his mind has been crystal clear th decades when, according to tradition, live on borrowed time. A few years ag with him, I was astonished at the vivi of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in fin ties some years ago. He saved his e manages them today with unbelievab
He not only edits his newspapers, business of his properties, setting a pa for a young man to follow. And To directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, World Report, s listed the average span of life in va
They gave the following data:

Countries.
[illegible] Zealand ....
[illegible]n ....
[illegible]lands ....
[illegible] States ....
[illegible] Britain ....
Germany ....
France ....

---

be Goldberg.

Th

Paris, week in breaks t breaks
It is ha how the ing pers tell y that th
they me hoping s ing littl never se who at perhaps month o judge pe
French vacation classes,
Paris is

They t is still o ers don't with or
It can be if you c nothing market e

Garba
This is certainly French waste a impossib and if it is impos or to bre
yard of half a y day rath

Shop

BRUNSWICK, GA.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

MAESTRO WEDS

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

[235]

PASSAIC, N. J.
SUNDAY EAGLE
AUG 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 16 (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married secretly at his estate here yesterday to his scretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, a niece of his late first wife, it was learned today.

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven syphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assambly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GIs and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to the stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

On The Air Tonight

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Eastern Standard—for Daylight add one hour except ABC times, which fit either Daylight or Standard.

New York, Aug. 12, (AP).—In between programs, broadcasting constantly is looking over its prospects, both immediate and future. In that connection here are some current developments:

Pending selection of a regular MC to take over from Milo Boulton, who has left the program after five years, We The People of CBS has scheduled guests for that post the next two weeks. Tonight at 8 it will be George Carson Putnam, specialist in newscasting.

Jimmie Fidler will be on two networks with his Sunday night Hollywood comment, when he returns September 7 from vacation. MBS says it will carry him at 7:30 p. m., with ABC reporting that he will continue on its chain, too, but at the new time of 10:30.

Coming up tonight: ABC 8:30 first of a series of three light opera festivals, Josef Stopak conducting, to occupy the Boston Symphony hour. ... MBS 9:30 in place of the usual American Forum, first broadcast of "Symphonic Diary," composed by Sgt. Paul Siegel of Brooklyn.

Tuning Tonight—NBC — 7 Milt Berle Comedy; 8 Call The Police drama; 8:30 Fred Waring music; 9 Philip Marlowe Adventures; 9:30 Romberg Concert.

CBS—7 Big Town Drama; 8 We The People; 8:30 Studio One "Mysterious Mickey Finn;" 9:30 Return Engagement Drama.

ABC—7:30 Green Hornet; 8:15 Bobby Boyle Show; 9:30 Summer Serenade; 10 Museum of Modern Music; 10:45 Earl Godwin.

MBS—7 Warden's Cases; 7:30 The Falcon; 9:30 Dance Time.

Rhapsody by Sokolsky

Speaking of Tanglewood, George E. Sokolsky waxes eloquent over those Saturday nights when 25,000 Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony.

What is so glorious about it, says Mr. Sokolsky, "is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

"Tanglewood, like every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state."

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH
AUG

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

New York, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Marries Secretary

NEW YORK -(AP)- Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Maumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

Tanglewood Center for U. S. Music

To the Editor of The Knickerbocker News:

Now that the Berkshire Music Festival is concluded, it would seem appropriate to recall a few interesting facts as to its origin.

The idea of creating an American music festival was suggested by the famous Salzburg (Austria) concerts. The first group of concerts was given by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in August, 1934 on Dan Hanna's Stockbridge estate, with Dr. Henry Hadley conducting. About 2,000 people attended, and, subsequently eagerly looked forward to the next year.

In 1935, the Berkshire Festival Society was incorporated, and two years later the permanence of its program was assured when Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Boston and Lenox, presented "Tanglewood," her family estate, for the festival's future home. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky agreed to play at six concerts. A large tent, holding 5,000 people was provided, crowds poured into Lenox and Stockbridge from every point of the compass, and the music was broadcast over a national hookup with Olin Downes as commentator.

During the 1937 concerts, a storm, climaxed by a cloudburst, dramatically interrupted an all-Wagner program. Conflict with the weather crystallized the idea of providing a music shed, as protection from sun and rain.

Within a few months, more than $80,000 was collected for this structure, itself a triumph of engineering and architectural invention. The Shed, constructed of 300 odd towns of steel, has a roof of two-inch planks, and an exterior of a sound-deadening composition. The main auditorium holds about 6,000 people and 3,000 more may sit in the colonnade.

Dr. Koussevitsky has visualized Tanglewood as widening its scope to become a significant center of the arts in America. The success of the festival suggested the next step in this direction, a musical academy to be developed simultaneously with the yearly concerts. "A center of music," wrote the conductor in a communication to the trustees of the orchestra, "would be a boon for those who want to study the fine arts in their relationship to culture; who are anxious to refresh their minds and personalities through contact with the best in art and the most distinguished in culture, and, for those who long for a creative rest in the summer." The proximity of the great ensemble, its conductor and members is of great advantage to the students. Here is an opportunity for students of instruments to devote a reasonably brief, concentrated term to the study of actual orchestral works in performance, under the guidance of practical and experienced orchestral musicians.

Such an institution is, no doubt, unique and far greater than any similar institution existing. Only a few great visionaries have dared to dream of it. Today this dream hac come true.

There is every indication that the immediate future for music is in the United States, and the resources and enthusiasm that America can bring to the cultivation of great art.

YOLA C. DE PIETRO.
East Hartford, Aug. 11.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

Symphony Leader Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

If Your Radio Loudspeaker Could Speak for Itself

By JIM TRANTER

Ho-h-ho-hummm . . . . well, here's another day starting off and I'll bet the old man hops out of bed and starts griping right away about getting up at 6 A. M. He always does and then hears that early morning music and before you know it he's almost human. For my part I don't mind Buehly's chatter at this hour but some of that blaring music that comes over is enough to bend my poor cone.

WELL, the Master finally got out of the house and—whoops!—here comes that group of daytime serials that the Mrs. listens to every day. Y'know, some day they'll have more music on in the morning and then I'll be able to relax and enjoy part of the day. As it is, by the time I've spouted all the grief and trouble that seems to be a "must" in these cliff-hangers and Fred Waring comes in with that great group of his, well — it's a wonder I haven't blown a tube.

THEN THERE'S the afternoon stuff. Why, only the other day the Missus tuned in a flock of give-away shows that came in one right after the other and, so help me, if I hadn't been glued to the cabinet, I'd have rushed right down to get in on that John Reed King "Give and Take Show" just to cop a few prizes. The things he gives away for answers to questions that only a moron could miss! Bet I could come home loaded with junk.

John Reed King

Of course, after you get the audience-participation shows over with (can't see what the Missus sees in hearing other folks win big gobs of hard-to-get stuff) the natural thing is to twist my dial until we get some more smooth music with only one or two little commercials to interfere and that's where I get a chance to catch my breath and pick up enough strength for the nightly tuning with Father.

IT'S A LOT of fun to play along with the Chief when he plants himself beside me and starts dialing for his favorite shows. Oh, once in a while he'll try a new one but mostly he knows right where to stop and you can almost see a groove in my face where he leaves the thing set for the comedy shows, or a bit of good drama.

Finally, at 11 o'clock, we get the news, he stretches, yawns and says: "Not a bad night. Wish I didn't have to get up in the morning." And so to bed. Guess the life of a loudspeaker isn't so bad at that . . . but I wish he'd get FM in here so I could really give him some good listening.

* * *

Tips on Tuning

Light Opera for Berkshire Festival, WKBW at 8:30.

George Carson Putnam, guest on We, the People, WGR at 9.

Waring does Walt Disney program, WBEN at 9:30.

* * *

Beginning of the End

WHEN FRANK SINATRA takes over the Hit Parade on NBC this Fall he'll bar anyone under 18 years of age from the broadcasts as part of his bid for recognition as a serious and dignified singer of pop songs. Why can't stars be satisfied with the things that made them stars?

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass.

This Clipping From ESTHERVILLE, IOWA
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussgevitzky, 73-year old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

SPRINGFIELD, MO.
NEWS & LEADER
AUG 16 1947

Famed Conductor Weds Secretary of 18 Years

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Kousevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumopf, 46.

Kousevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BATH, ME.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS SECRETARY

Serge Koussevitzky Of Boston Symphony Weds Bride of 46

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lennox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the Hill in Lennox, at 2 p. m.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

Koussevitzky said he planned to visit several countries to seek compositions written during the war years, but still not published, for possible presentation when he returns to Boston the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season.

"I have the names of some composers," he said, "but I don't know what has happened to them. There is one French composer, Messian, whom I asked to write a composition. It will be a symphony in 10 movements which will be ready either at the end of this coming season or in October, 1948. Mr. Messian said he needed two years to write this composition."

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
AUG 15 1947

'These Days'

By George E. Sokolsky

HOW OLD IS OLD?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N.B.C. Symphony.

The Magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question, Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. Theye were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Marries Secretary Of 18 Years

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 12 1947

These Days

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as a decade ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the Nation has matured.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American Culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

JOPLIN, MO.
NEWS-HERALD
AUG 16 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MARRIED

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Kousevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Kousevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

NEW YORK, Aug. 12—It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty.

It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, for from any big city.

This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?"

It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant American found their ispiration. The Music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads.

The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots premeval.

But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before.

When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist.

Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection.

As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thusands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton beach or some place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

FOR Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people.

What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philiadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No governments plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

A free people choose between Beethhoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features

FORT DODGE, IOWA
MESSENGER-CHRONICLE

AUG 16 1947

WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

16 1947

Behind the Mike

with WILLIAM MOYES

The first radio performance of his own "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra" will be presented by Nicolai Berezowsky, Russian-American composer, when he conducts ABC's Saturday Concert broadcast on KEX at 2 P. M. Berezowsky will present an All-American program.

The cello work was first performed in February, 1945, by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. It was written in 1933-34 when Berezowsky was summering at Amaganset, Long Island. The balance of the program is: Jubilation Overture by Robert Ward, and suite, "Appalachian Spring" by Copland.

Andy Russell returns to the star vocalist spot on Your Hit Parade, KGW at 8, after a month's vacation from the air. While absent from the program Russell was replaced by baritone Dick Haymes.

Martha Tilton will continue her long Hit Parade run as featured femme vocalist of the program and Russell's singing co-star. The Pied Pipers, singing group, and Mark Warnow and the orchestra also remain in their regular featured spots on the weekly broadcasts.

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe.

DES MOINES, IOWA
TRIBUNE

AUG 16 1947

Boston Conductor Is Married at 73

NEW YORK, N. Y. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was married Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

OTTUMWA, IOWA
COURIER

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

AUG 16 1947

CONDUCTOR, 73, WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds

New York, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoof, 46.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

AUG 17 1947

Pleasant Evening Promised

Harriet Kaplan is to be soloist in the all alfresco musicale at the Jewish Community Center next Sunday night when she appears in the Mozart C minor piano concerto. Miss Kaplan tells us she prepared the research for Moses Smith in his Koussevitzy biography of recent unpleasantness between an excellent music critic and the distinguished subject of his anecdotes.

The Community Center hospitality to Harrie Johnston's ensemble seems to be providing an evening of musical delight which should be recognized by an eager attendance.

* * *

A duty of this column is to attend when the two Summer theaters receiving a first-string review may be seen later for some additional comment. After a matinee at Cohasset on the hottest day of the season (some miles of a drive) it was possible without aid of friendly drama lovers with kindly cars to go in restful independence over to the Fairhaven Summer Theater alone that night to pick up on "Ah Wilderness."

Having sat in tearful appreciation before George M. Cohan's opening of the O'Neill play, it was understood that interpretation would be the measuring stick for Frank McHugh's performance at the Fairhaven Town Hall last week.

We gathered enough to create future interest in McHugh's son who was entirely adequate for the role of the play son; to decide our own Spouters had a superior sweetheart of the lad when Lucille Bouvier was cast in the role in the beach scene; to note that McHugh had depended too long on a camera that could shoot him wherever he moved, while at the Town Hall he too often gave us his portly back; to delight in the splendid comedy of John Clubley, who pretty near outshone the actor whose role he should have taken, to note the well-directed work of Martha Lewin (they say she takes direction well) as the first shabby experience of an innocent boy.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

AUG 17 1947

Symphonic Conductor Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, [illegible]
Serge Koussevitzky, 73, [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] tra, and Miss Olga [illegible] his secretary for [illegible] were married [illegible] conductor's estate [illegible]
he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a [illegible] conductor's late wife, [illegible]
in 1942.

Koussevitzky told [illegible] the marriage as he [illegible] boarded the liner Queen [illegible] beth for a honeymoon in [illegible]
He said not even [illegible] went to the ship to [illegible] had been told of the wedding.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 12 1947

These Days

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzsky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as a decade ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the Nation has matured.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American Culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

JOPLIN, MO.
NEWS-HERALD
AUG 16 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MARRIED

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Kousevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Kousevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Tanglewood

By George E. Sokolsky

NEW YORK, Aug. 12—It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty.

It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, for from any big city.

This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?"

It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant American found their ispiration. The Music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads.

The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots premeval.

But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

THE Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before.

When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist.

Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection.

As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thusands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton beach or some place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

FOR Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people.

What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philiadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind?

And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No governments plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen.

A free people choose between Beethhoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features

FORT DODGE, IOWA
MESSENGER-CHRONICLE

AUG 16 1947

WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

16 1947

Behind the Mike

with WILLIAM MOYES

The first radio performance of his own "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra" will be presented by Nicolai Berezowsky, Russian-American composer, when he conducts ABC's Saturday Concert broadcast on KEX at 2 P. M. Berezowsky will present an All-American program.

The cello work was first performed in February, 1945, by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. It was written in 1933-34 when Berezowsky was summering at Amaganset, Long Island. The balance of the program is: Jubilation Overture by Robert Ward, and suite, "Appalachian Spring" by Copland.

Andy Russell returns to the star vocalist spot on Your Hit Parade, KGW at 8, after a month's vacation from the air. While absent from the program Russell was replaced by baritone Dick Haymes.

Martha Tilton will continue her long Hit Parade run as featured femme vocalist of the program and Russell's singing co-star. The Pied Pipers, singing group, and Mark Warnow and the orchestra also remain in their regular featured spots on the weekly broadcast.

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

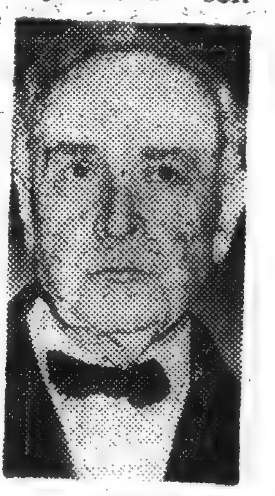
Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe.

DES MOINES, IOWA
TRIBUNE

AUG 16 1947

Boston Conductor Is Married at 73

NEW YORK, N. Y. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was married Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.



KOUSSEVITZKY.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

OTTUMWA, IOWA
COURIER

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

AUG 16 1947

CONDUCTOR, 73, WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

[237]

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds

New York. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoof, 46.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

AUG 16 1947

the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

AUG 17 1947

Pleasant Evening Promised

Harriet Kaplan is to be soloist in the all alfresco musicale at the Jewish Community Center next Sunday night when she appears in the Mozart C minor piano concerto. Miss Kaplan tells us she prepared the research for Moses Smith in his Koussevitzy biography of recent unpleasantness between an excellent music critic and the distinguished subject of his anecdotes.

The Community Center hospitality to Harrie Johnston's ensemble seems to be providing an evening of musical delight which should be recognized by an eager attendance.

* * *

A duty of this column is to attend when the two Summer theaters receiving a first-string review may be seen later for some additional comment. After a matinee at Cohasset on the hottest day of the season (some miles of a drive) it was possible without aid of friendly drama lovers with kindly cars to go in restful independence over to the Fairhaven Summer Theater alone that night to pick up on "Ah Wilderness."

Having sat in tearful appreciation before George M. Cohan's opening of the O'Neill play, it was understood that interpretation would be the measuring stick for Frank McHugh's performance at the Fairhaven Town Hall last week.

We gathered enough to create future interest in McHugh's son who was entirely adequate for the role of the play son; to decide our own Spouters had a superior sweetheart of the lad when Lucille Bouvier was cast in the role in the beach scene; to note that McHugh had depended too long on a camera that could shoot him wherever he moved, while at the Town Hall he too often gave us his portly back; to delight in the splendid comedy of John Clubley, who pretty near outshone the actor whose role he should have taken, to note the well-directed work of Martha Lewin (they say she takes direction well) as the first shabby experience of an innocent boy.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

AUG 17 1947

Symphonic Conductor Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

RADIO NEWS AND COMMENT

Rich Repast Offered In Opera Programs Hitting Ether Today

BY JOHN CALDWELL.

The first program in a three-week series of "Light Opera Festivals" and a special broadcast of a new symphony written by an American soldier mark this day as one followers of better music should enjoy. For other listeners, the regular summer schedule will hold forth.

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra off the air after the Berkshire Music festival, the ABC network will present the light operas for three weeks. Joseph Stopak, who has just completed his summer season as director of the Pittsburgh Light Opera Co., will direct the orchestra.

In the vocal line, the first program will feature Polyna Stoska, soprano, and Ernest McChesney, tenor. Miss Stoska has sung 26 major operatic roles in five languages, as well as in such Broadway musicals as "Street Scene." She has appeared with the New York City Center Opera Co., the Boston Symphony and the Minneapolis Symphony and was heard in Mexico City last month. McChesney, who was born in West Orange, N. J., is the leading tenor of the Chicago City Opera Co. He has just completed a summer season with the Pittsburgh company.

Tonight's program, to be aired from 7:30 to 8:30 over WSAI, includes "Joy of Life," from "Girl Crazy," "One Alone" from "Desert Song," "Touch of Your Hand" from "Roberta," "A Boy Like You" from "Street Scene," and "Strange Music" from "Song of Norway."

A MBS-WCPO special program from 10:15 to 11:15 p. m. presents the first airing of a three-movement musical opus called "Symphonic Diary." The symphony, written by Sgt. Paul Siegel of Brooklyn, tells the composer's impressions of a GI.

The musical jottings portray feelings of a city-bred soldier as he progresses from induction to combat training. The second and third movements give Siegel's impressions of actual battle and in the Army of Occupation.

Presented by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra this premiere broadcast replaces, for this week only, the "American Forum of the Air."

Siegel will be heard on the broadcast, speaking from Vienna.

* * *

George Carson Putnam is guest emcee on "We, The People" tonight as the network continues its search for somebody to replace Milo Boulton, who quit the show with last week's program.

* * *

—Wide World Photo.

TURNTABLE TIKE

Robin Morgan, 5, is a full-fledged disk jockey, although she prefers to be called a story-teller because "it's more dignified." She tells her favorite stories and plays her favorite records each Saturday morning over WOR in New York on a 15-minute program. The theme sounds very familiar.

Tuning Tips.

THE PLAYS:

7 p. m., WKRC: Steve Wilson must be slipping, because on tonight's episode, he calls in the G-Men to help him solve the case of "Claws of Death."

7:30 p. m., WCPO: Mike (The Falcon) Waring is right in the middle of the numbers racket.

8:30 p. m., WKRC: Eliot Paul's slightly zany comedy, "Mysterious Mickey Finn," is the Fletcher Markle adaptation for Studio One.

9 p. m., WLW: Van Heflin is Philip Marlowe again.

THE MUSIC:

6 p. m., WSAI: The guest band spot on To Cincinnati At Six is filled by Tommy Dorsey's orchestra.

6:30 p. m., WKRC: Club 15 echoes the song of Bob Crosby and Patti Clayton.

8:30 p. m., WLW: Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians offer music from Walt Disney pictures. Donald Duck waddles onto the stage for a personal appearance.

9:30 p. m., WLW: Sigmund Romberg conducts the orchestra in selections from "Carousel" and "Student Prince."

10:30 p. m., WSAI: Evening concerts offers Handel's "Concert Grosso No. 6," Grieg's "Concert in A minor" and "Symphony N 1" by Brahms.

FM PRAGRAMS TODAY:

WLWA: On the air from noo to 11:30 p. m. on channel 251 98.1 megacycles.

7:15 p. m.: Pulse of the Press.

WCTS: On the air from noon midnight on channel 245 at 96 megacycles.

5:45 p. m.: Easy Rh[illegible]n pr sents "Stella By Starligh

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 16 1947

More Artists, New Music Would Help Tanglewood

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Since the Berkshire Music Festival is a source of summer music well on the way to attaining world-wide interest, it may not be amiss, at this point, to offer some suggestions for the improvement of its own conduct, as well as that of surrounding circumstances.

This past season, Dr. Koussevitzky and two other conductors—Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw—have appeared during the symphonic programs. Bernstein presided twice and Shaw once, although more in the capacity of choral-orchestral batonist. So we begin to see indications of a future schedule, perhaps, which will bring distinguished leaders to the Tanglewood shed.

It is not difficult for one already addicted to the Berkshire Festival to envision a season of noted guests from here and abroad, each possibly bringing new music to swell the rather picayune amount of it now available. In such a situation the question of competition for Dr. Koussevitzky does not exist; we know only too well how he abides in the hearts of music lovers.

Besides, if such there were, is it not said that competition always stimulates trade, and isn't trade, after all, an important aim of any musical organization, regardless of its artistic ones?

Furthermore, with due respect for the performances of orchestral and chamber music by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, one should like to attend recitals or concerts, vocal and instrumental, by top-notch artists during those lackadaisical afternoons when little of a musically absorbing nature takes place.

So far the Opera Department at Tanglewood has made two successive hits—last year with Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" and this year with Mozart's "Idomeneo." Both times students have mostly been the interpreters, and I should think that Boris Goldovsky, a modest young man whose knowledge of the lyric theater is vast, should be a bit happier with more professional talent, or am I wrong?

The above suggestions for the musical part of the Festival will do for the moment, particularly since they are not devoid of hovering implications. But certainly there could be improvement in the housing and feeding of the thousands of visitors to this Mecca of the tonal art.

The Berkshire Hills Conference and the management of the Boston Symphony have worked industriously on this aspect of the proceedings, and while there has been some amelioration of the rather unsatisfactory state of things last year, there is still much to be done.

Some of the prices for rooms, of which there are scarcely enough, were outrageous, according to reputable suckers—pardon, I mean sources. Fifteen and 20 dollars a day, without meals, if you please. There have been all too many instances of this, I'm told. Of course, a few of the natives did not take advantage of a situation which comes to them once a year.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 16 1947

Non-Union Musicians Prove Very Annoying To Boston Symphony

Lenox, Aug. 16—The mystery of the buzzing noises on recordings made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was solved today, and Conductor Serge Koussevitzky had a novel plan for eliminating them.

When the Tanglewood festival closed here last Sunday, the orchestra planned to spend the week making recordings. But the first batch that came back contained buzzings that weren't in the musicians' scores.

Koussevitsky soon discovered that birds and cicadas had settled on the roof of the recording shed. So he stationed a man on the roof armed with a white flag which he waves during recordings to shoo away the offenders.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

AUG 16 1947

NEW YORK—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conducter of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitsky Married

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

SAN PEDRO, CAL.
NEWS-PILOT

AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS

NEW YORK. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE

1947

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, and a niece of his late wife, were married at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., and left on the Queen Elizabeth for a trip in Europe.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
BEE

16 1947

URDAY, AUGUST 16, 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73 year old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, in Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA
TIMES-REPUBLICAN

AUG 16 1947

markets.

Koussevitzky, At 73, Weds His Secretary

New York, N. Y. —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942

OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Reveals Marriage to Secretary

New York (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoff, 46.

Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife who died in 1942.

BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

AUG 17 1947

Conductor Weds

New York, Aug. 16.—(U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, revealed Saturday as he sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he was married Friday at his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the last 18 years. She sailed with him Saturday.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE

AUG

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have recorded a portion of Prokofieff's Ballet Suite "Romeo and Juliet." Album of two disks, RCA Victor. The work is not a recent one, having been written in 1935. The four episodes included are: "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Dance," and "Romeo and Juliet's Grave." Prokofieff has succeeded in creating a musical work that is romantic in mood, as it should be, yet avoids the saccharine and banal quality that plagues most composers who have taken a turn at Shakespeare's tragedy. Particularly moving is th closing section, "Romeo and Juliet's Grave," of noble and elegaic quality. Its profound and sage pathos is all the more touching for its supreme simplicity. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it con amore.

SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

AUG 16 1947

SYMPHONY LEADER MARRIES

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
EVENING STAR-TELEGRAM

AUG 16 1947

Symphony Leader Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

This Clipping From HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

AUG 16 1947

Conductor Weds

New York, Aug. 16, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his sec-

---

MONTEREY, CALIF.
PENINSULA HERALD

AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in [illegible]

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

AUG 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY, 73, WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today disclosed that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
AUG 16 1947

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

TANGLEWOOD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing ~~the Boston~~ symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun he hotels and boarding houses, he telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive —in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. met a friend who drove up hat Saturday night—listened — nd drove back to New York—an ight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesay night in midsummer and the udience was enormous, perhaps s many as 12,000. A chorus of 50 young music students, be~~tween the ages of 18~~ and 22, sang ~~Beethoven's chorals had never~~ een sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last ote, the audience was on its feet heering, shouting, applauding, vaving. The old man—73 this ear—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood neans. It is something much nore than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never —or could ever—read Schiller's 'Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G.I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years, but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite, but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on upgrade.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW
AUG 16 1947

Many Thrills at Festival

Orchestra Conductor Returns From Musical Event

Returning from the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., an annual event which draws the music-minded from all parts of the country, Harold Paul Whelan, conductor of Spokane's Philharmonic orchestra, can recount one thrill after another. He has heard concerts by the Boston symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and ~~he has~~ heard some of the country's leading soloists in a music center rich in tradition.

Tanglewood is the estate made famous by Hawthrone. As a matter of fact, the fireplace with the original mantel before which he wrote his "Tanglewood Tales" is one o the historic relics at the music center.

Broadcast and Filmed.

"We watched the Boston symphony and 'Koussy' go through their routine under kleig light with Jean Hamilton as the announcer—a program going out ove a nation-wide broadcast. M.-G.-M took pictures at the same time, fo a forthcoming short ('The Tale o Tanglewood')," Mr. Whelan noted commenting on his summer there

During his stay there he heard some 35 concerts, 12 by the Boston symphony, five by the student orchestra, and others by outstanding chamber ensembles. Those who revel in the music of Beethoven ~~will be envious~~, for Mr. Whelan heard a Beethoven cycle, complete in four concerts, the nine symphonies and two piano concertos. The student orchestra, by the way, is a group of some 95 young musicians of high professional caliber, Mr. Whelan commented.

Bernstein Conducts.

Something to remember was "Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston symphony in a wonderful performance of 'The Rite of Spring' (Stravinsky) and Copland's 'Appalachian Spring,' with the student orchestra."

Mr. Whelan says a new name to watch is Eleazhar de Carvalho, young Brazilian, who was sharing Koussevitzky's favors along with Bernstein. "De Carvalho was recognized to such an extent that he will be a guest conductor of the Boston symphony for two weeks this winter" Mr. Whelan went on to say, adding his own lavish praise, "a most brilliant and dynamic conductor." We let Mr. Whelan take over at this point:

"I met Primrose, the world-famous violist, whom I saw at the Goodmans' after his Spokane concert. He invited me to a coaching session of a fine student quartet. He is a great man, as well as great musician, modest and cordial to every one.

Sees Copland.

"I had a most interesting and informative session with Aaron Copland, head of composition at the Berkshire music center, and one of America's truly great composers. We went over his 'Appalachian Spring,' which we are going to present in Spokane this season. Interesting were his remarks about certain passages, as he compared Bernstein's treatment of this work with Koussevitzky's recent recording. From that comparison and his own conception I have a fairly good idea of what he wants."

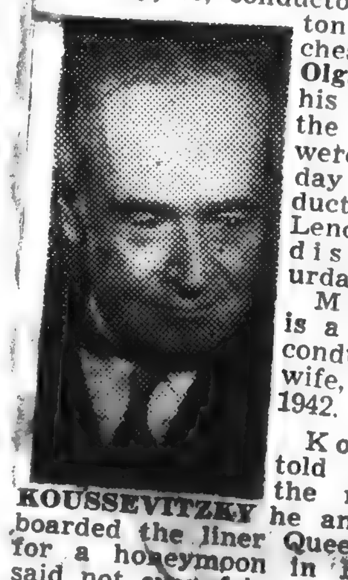
The opera contingent of the Berkshire Music center gave a performance of Mozart's "Idomeneao" at Tanglewood. The critics referred to it as a "noble experiment" and "most valuable to all lovers of Mozart." In the opera's first American performance, Joseph Laderoute sang the leading role.

When Koussevitzky arranged his "Music for All" feature, an added event for the 19447 Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, a special train from New York city brought 100 special guests, including music critics from points as distant as Dallas, Texas. Three hundred other guests accepted Koussevitzky's invitation for this event, as well as the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Incidentally, Dr. Koussevitzky observed his 73d birthday this summer, but his birthday cake had 10 not 73, candles; 10 for the Berkshire festival's 10th season at Tanglewood.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
AUG 17 1947

NEW YORK.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.



KOUSSEVITZKY

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES
AUG 17 1947

Symphony Leader Marries Secretary

New York. (AP—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of ~~the Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra, disclosed that he was married Friday to his secrettary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
16 1947

How Old Is Old? Years No Guide

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the wood.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

New Zealand, 67; Sweden, 66; Netherlands, 66; United States, 65; Great Britain, 62; Germany, 61; France, 57; Italy, 55; Russia, 45; India, 27.

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the United States life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 percent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—those are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

STAR
AUG 16 1947

Just How Old Is An Old Man, Asks Sokolsky

By George E. Sokolsky

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

George Sokolsky

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation — we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian — which must be horrible — he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say — not I, however — that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at

---

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Radio Highlights

Jack Paar Will Take ABC Show

ABC HAS taken a 13-week option on a seven-year contract with Jack Paar, former Indianapolis resident, for a Wednesday night half-hour show beginning Oct. 1. He is now substituting for Jack Benny on a Sunday evening session (6 p.m., WIRE-NBC).

Paar began his career as a radio announcer on WIRE and, after his induction into the Army, won acclaim by satirizing officers overseas in a show called "Fungus Vaudeville."

NICOLAI BEREZOWSKY, Russian-American composer, will conduct his "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra" on this afternoon's Saturday Concert (4 p.m., WISH-ABC). The work was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in February, 1945. Other pieces featured on the airing are the "Jubilation" overture and "Appalachian Spring" suite.

MARK WARNOW, maestro of the Army Recruiting Service's "Sound-Off," will move from the Sunday spot with his entire cast tonight to a Saturday evening position (6:30 p. m., WFBM-CBS). Film and radio celebrity Dorothy Lamour will appear as guest songstress on the initial broadcast of the new series.

LABOR AND CAPITAL will send their representatives to "Cross-Section, U. S. A." this afternoon to discuss "What Is A Fair Profit?" in the face of persistent price rises threatening the nation's economy (4 p. m., WFBM-CBS). Members of the panel include spokesmen from AFL, NAM, CIO, and the U. S. Chamber of Commerce.

ANDY RUSSELL, bobby-soxer favorite, will return to the star vocalist post on "Your Hit Parade" (8 p. m., WIRE-NBC). Martha Tilton, the Pied Pipers and the Mark Warnow Orchest re also on the billing.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ORE.
JOURNAL

Conductor Takes Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.-(AP)- Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Marries

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)— Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumof, 46.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
AUG 16 1947

Boston Maestro, 73, Weds Secretary, 46

NEW YORK, AUG. 16—(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

TORONTO, CANADA
SATURDAY NIGHT
AUG 16 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Middle-Brow Soloist Still Has a Place

By JOHN H. YOCOM

CONRAD THIBAULT is a handsome, suave, well-wearing baritone whose place on the concert stage is well to the left of the high-brow centre but nevertheless appears to be an acceptable and firm one. Such a vocal classification is fairly common in radio but rarer on the concert platform. At last week's Prom concert with the Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra, Maurice Abravanel conducting, Thibault sang a couple of arias (Massenet's "Promesse de Mon Avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore" and Bizet's "Toreador Song") with conventional aplomb and production, if hardly with operatic distinction, and the audience with equally conventional and almost reflexive response applauded well. But it was when Conrad did his middle-brow work—in things like "Ol' Man River" and "The Blind Ploughman"—that one was reminded of his real forte.

Then Thibault's urbanity, razor-keen sense of presentation and gift of humor, which is rare among singers of any classification, took over. His warm and flexible baritone voice, impressively dramatic or relaxed as required, was pleasing — if one didn't look too closely.

It is easy enough for one snobbbishly to find fault with such vocalizing—for instance, to want more operatic numbers and less flamboyancy in certain lyrics and less bathos in others — but the truth is that Conrad Thibault knows his capacities, has exploited them carefully and has achieved a successful career of singing to please people, i.e., most of the people. Better that than warmed-over high-brow efforts beyond the singer's powers. In attack, tone, diction and shading the renderings were admirable.

The one sub-Thibault-standard was Berlin's "All Alone." Even props like a gaudily arranged string accompaniment and Conrad's suavity and glow couldn't make that number middle-brow either in performance or content.

Maurice Abravanel did a refreshingly peppy job of conducting Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" Overture and the Prom orchestra gave a performance well rounded-off with bounce and tunefulness. However, not so precise was the playing of the second and third movements of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. Furthermore, for those of us who like symphonies to be played in their entirety, hearing a couple of movements plucked here and there from their roots is an unsatisfying experience. Regardless of the symphony's construction, which in this case, as the program notes defensively pointed out, was "more like suites," the fact remains that one becomes accustomed, through countless previous concert performances or from recordings, to getting the symphony as a complete emotional experience in four movements.

Good Prom fare with spirited execution made up the balance of the program: Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite" with a fine flute and harp duet in one of the units, Chabrier's "Espana" and a bagful of Strauss — "Emperor Waltz," "Pizzicato Polka," etc.

Prom Conductor

Maurice Abravanel who last season conducted the Broadway Elmer Rice-Kurt Weill music-drama "Street Scene" — for box-office reasons not billed as an opera (S.N., Aug. 2), flew from Mexico City to conduct the Prom last week and the one following. Abravanel has been conducting a series of symphony concerts, as well as directing Opera Nacional's performances of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Thais." Abravanel was born in Greece of Spanish-Portuguese parents and educated in Switzerland. In 1922 he conducted opera and symphony in Germany and in 1932 became the musical director of Blanchine's Ballet in Paris. Guest appearances in Rome, Geneva and Australian cities followed. From 1936-38 he conducted at the Met and in 1938 began conducting Broadway hit shows — "Knickerbocker Holiday," "Lady in the Dark," "One Touch of Venus," Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts." He still managed to get in guest conducting jobs at Chicago, New York and other U.S. cities. Maurice Abravanel's appointment as permanent conductor and music director of the Utah Symphony in Salt Lake City has just been announced.

For the Aug. 21 Prom Jose Forgues, soprano-winner of the "Stars of Tomorrow" radio show, will be guest artist with Rex Battle conducting and playing Grieg's A-minor Concerto.

Last year Canadian-born tenor Joseph Laderoute sang the title role in the first U.S. performance of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes." The occasion was the Berkshire Music Centre session at Tanglewood, Mass. A fortnight ago at the same place Laderoute took the title role in another North American première, this time Mozart's "Idomeneo." Critics present reported that Laderoute's work both in solo and duet numbers (with Nancy Trickey as Princess Ilia) was of a high quality.

Newfoundland Folksongs

Recently Leslie Bell, director of the famed all-girl Bell Singers and professor of Music Education Methods at the Ontario College of Education, accompanied by handsome, youthful Canadian composer and arranger Howard Cable, flew to Newfoundland, there to spend the rest of the summer getting a tan, some fish (?), and folksong material. They will listen to fishermen sing native melodies, then put down on paper what they hear (and overhear). For other songs they will scratch through old native collections. Any material they pick up will be considered for a national compilation on which the two men are working.

This Clipping From BAKER, ORE.
DEMOCRAT-HERALD
AUG 16 1947

CONDUCTOR MARRIED

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Oga Naumoff, 46.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is niece of the conductor's late wife who died in 1942. The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mas radius it might become a place of pilgrimage and its volcano an object of worship.

---

There is a belief that another lonely island, Tristan da Cunha, is part of an enormous continent which once connected South America, Africa, and Australasia, and the "Albatross" hopes to clear up some of the mystery which surrounds this.

A glance at the map shows, for instance, a long chain of islands stretching from Malay and Australia. Geologists believe that these—Sumatra, Java, Borneo, New Guinea among them—are the remains of a great neck of land which at one time united Asia with the southern continent.

There is, of course, a theory that at one time a lost continent joined India with Africa. It was before man appeared on earth, and the land was inhabited by giant reptiles, lemurs, huge tortoises and similar creatures. This vanished world was a luxuriant jungle. It rose, or was stationary, for some 20 million years, then began to sink, and finally vanished.

The "Albatross" will then sail on through the Mediterranean and so into the Atlantic, where she will be faced by the most alluring of all lost land mysteries, that of fabled Atlantis.

Finally, nearest home of all, the "Albatross" will come across another baffling problem. Sixty [illegible]

Tanglewood Proves We're On Upgrade

George E. Sokolsky

ON THE RECORD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago migh have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will your itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

REDDING, CAL.
SEARCHLIGHT
AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY MARRIES

NEW YORK —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, and Secretary, 46, Marry

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he and his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, were married Friday.

Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN-NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed in New York today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Kousseyitzky Marries Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER
AUG 18 1947

Symphony Conductor Weds His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzy told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe

---

This Clipping From GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary of 18 Years

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, age 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church On the Hill in Lenox.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today disclosed he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky and his bride boarded the Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, Pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

oussevitzky Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

[240]

TORONTO, CANADA
SATURDAY NIGHT
AUG 16 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Middle-Brow Soloist Still Has a Place

By JOHN H. YOCOM

CONRAD THIBAULT is a handsome, suave, well-wearing baritone whose place on the concert stage is well to the left of the high-brow centre but nevertheless appears to be an acceptable and firm one. Such a vocal classification is fairly common in radio but rarer on the concert platform. At last week's Prom concert with the Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra, Maurice Abravanel conducting, Thibault sang a couple of arias (Massenet's "Promesse de Mon Avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore" and Bizet's "Toreador Song") with conventional aplomb and production, if hardly with operatic distinction, and the audience with equally conventional and almost reflexive response applauded well. But it was when Conrad did his middle-brow work—in things like "Ol' Man River" and "The Blind Ploughman"—that one was reminded of his real forte.

Then Thibault's urbanity, razor-keen sense of presentation and gift of humor, which is rare among singers of any classification, took over. His warm and flexible baritone voice, impressively dramatic or relaxed as required, was pleasing—if one didn't look too closely.

It is easy enough for one snobbbishly to find fault with such vocalizing—for instance, to want more operatic numbers and less flamboyancy in certain lyrics and less bathos in others—but the truth is that Conrad Thibault knows his capacities, has exploited them carefully and has achieved a successful career of singing to please people, i.e., most of the people. Better that than warmed-over high-brow efforts beyond the singer's powers. In attack, tone, diction and shading the renderings were admirable.

The one sub-Thibault-standard was Berlin's "All Alone." Even props like a gaudily arranged string accompaniment and Conrad's suavity and glow couldn't make that number middle-brow either in performance or content.

Maurice Abravanel did a refreshingly peppy job of conducting Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" Overture and the Prom orchestra gave a performance well rounded-off with bounce and tunefulness. However, not so precise was the playing of the second and third movements of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. Furthermore, for those of us who like symphonies to be played in their entirety, hearing a couple of movements plucked here and there from their roots is an unsatisfying experience. Regardless of the symphony's construction, which in this case, as the program notes defensively pointed out, was "more like suites," the fact remains that one becomes accustomed, through countless previous concert performances or from recordings, to getting the symphony as a complete emotional experience in four movements.

Good Prom fare with spirited execution made up the balance of the program: Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite" with a fine flute and harp duet in one of the units, Chabrier's "Espana" and a bagful of Strauss — "Emperor Waltz," "Pizzicato Polka," etc.

Prom Conductor

Maurice Abravanel who last season conducted the Broadway Elmer Rice-Kurt Weill music-drama "Street Scene"—for box-office reasons not billed as an opera (S.N., Aug. 2), flew from Mexico City to conduct the Prom last week and the one following. Abravanel has been conducting a series of symphony concerts, as well as directing Opera Nacional's performances of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Thais." Abravanel was born in Greece of Spanish Portuguese parents and educated in Switzerland. In 1922 he conducted opera and symphony in Germany and in 1932 became the musical director of Blanchine's Ballet in Paris. Guest appearances in Rome, Geneva and Australian cities followed. From 1936-38 he conducted at the Met and in 1938 began conducting Broadway hit shows — "Knickerbocker Holiday," "Lady in the Dark," "One Touch of Venus," Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts." He still managed to get in guest conducting jobs at Chicago, New York and other U.S. cities. Maurice Abravanel's appointment as permanent conductor and music director of the Utah Symphony in Salt Lake City has just been announced.

For the Aug. 21 Prom Jose Forgues, soprano-winner of the "Stars of Tomorrow" radio show, will be guest artist with Rex Battle conducting and playing Grieg's A-minor Concerto.

Last year Canadian-born tenor Joseph Laderoute sang the title role in the first U.S. performance of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes." The occasion was the Berkshire Music Centre session at Tanglewood, Mass. A fortnight ago at the same place Laderoute took the title role in another North American premiere, this time Mozart's "Idomeneo." Critics present reported that Laderoute's work both in solo and duet numbers (with Nancy Trickey as Princess Ilia) was of a high quality.

Newfoundland Folksongs

Recently Leslie Bell, director of the famed all-girl Bell Singers and professor of Music Education Methods at the Ontario College of Education, accompanied by handsome, youthful Canadian composer and arranger Howard Cable, flew to Newfoundland, there to spend the rest of the summer getting a tan, some fish (?), and folksong material. They will listen to fishermen sing native melodies, then put down on paper what they hear (and overhear). For other songs they will scratch through old native collections. Any material they pick up will be considered for a national compilation on which the two men are working.

---

radius it might become a place of pilgrimage and its volcano an object of worship.

There is a belief that another lonely island, Tristan da Cunha, is part of an enormous continent which once connected South America, Africa, and Australasia, and the "Albatross" hopes to clear up some of the mystery which surrounds this.

A glance at the map shows, for instance, a long chain of islands stretching from Malay and Australia. Geologists believe that these —Sumatra, Java, Borneo, New Guinea among them — are the re[illegible] a great neck of land which [illegible] united Asia with the southern continent.

There is, of course, [illegible] that at one time a lost con[illegible] India with Africa. It was [illegible] appeared on earth, and the la[illegible] inhabited by giant reptiles, lemurs, huge tortoises and similar creatures. This vanished world was a luxuriant jungle. It rose, or was stationary, for some 20 million years, then began to sink, and finally vanished.

The "Albatross" will then sail on through the Mediterranean and so into the Atlantic, where she will be faced by the most alluring of all lost land mysteries, that of fabled Atlantis.

Finally, nearest [illegible] the "Albatross" will come [illegible] her baffling problem, [illegible] on

---

This Clipping From
BAKER, ORE.
DEMOCRAT-HERALD
AUG 16 1947

CONDUCTOR MARRIED

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed ~~today that~~ he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Oga Naumoff, 46.

[illegible] MO.
STAR-TIMES

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old ~~conductor of the Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, disclosed today that h[illegible] was married yesterday to his sec[illegible]retary of the past 18 years, Mis[illegible] Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is [illegible] niece of the conductor's late wif[illegible] who died in 1942. The weddin[illegible] was performed at the conductor[illegible] estate, "Saranac" at Lenox, Mas[illegible]

Tanglewood Proves We're On Upgrade

George E. Sokolsky

ON THE RECORD

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony ~~in the~~ Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago migh have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will your itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the State. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

REDDING, CAL.
SEARCHLIGHT
AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY MARRIES

NEW YORK —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
[illegible] 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, and Secretary, 46, Marry

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed ~~today~~ that he and his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, were married Friday.

Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational [illegible] the Hill in Lenox.

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN-NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed in New York today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

ELMIRA, [illegible]
ADVERT[illegible]
AUG [illegible]

Symphony Conductor Weds His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old ~~conductor of the Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzy told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe.

Koussevitzky Marries Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

This Clipping From GARY, [illegible]
POST-[illegible]

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary of 18 Years

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, ~~disclosed today that he was~~ married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, age 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church On the Hill in Lenox.

[illegible], CALIF.
[illegible]UNE SUN
[illegible] 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today disclosed he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky and his bride boarded the Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, Pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

oussevitzky Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—erge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old ~~conductor of the Boston~~ Symphony rchestra, disclosed today that he s married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss ga Naumoof, 46.

SHOSTAKOVITCH IN PRAGUE

By CARLETON SPRAGUE SMITH

AT THE May Festival in Prague I had an opportunity to see something of Dmitri Shostakovich and his attractive wife, Nina Vasilyevna, since as guests of the Syndikát Ceskych Skladate‿u, we took many of our meals in the Narodni Club and attended the same concerts. So far as I know, this was the first time Shostakovich has been out of Russia since 1927.

The much discussed Soviet composer proved himself to be an extremely shy young man who although forty-one, looks ten years younger. He is perhaps 5 feet 9 inches tall, with clean-cut features, rather delicate physique and somewhat abrupt motions. He reminded me of a timid college instructor, both curious and cautious—sensitive and reticent. His bows are jerky in the old-world embarrassed bourgeois mold and he is anything but relaxed and at ease.

How much of this is manner and how much actual feeling is hard to say. Shostakovich is a composer and a teacher at the Moscow Conservatory; he gives a studious impression and it is easy to understand that he is a hard worker and omnivorous reader. He told me about his large collection of scores and books and his eyes lighed up as he spoke: "I should like to have compositions by European and American colleagues which are not available in Russia," he exclaimed in his rather well-pronounced English. This is the only foreign language that the composer speaks; his wife is fluent in French, though ignoring English. I suspect Shostakovich finds it easier to talk than to understand for he frequently stops and says he can't follow. Here his wife comes to the rescue in her more voluble French. It is touching to see the two together; Dimitri relies on Nina Vasilyevna constantly for protection, interpretation and translation. Whereas he is shy and introspective, she is naturally out-going, enjoys talking to people and is better adjusted to society. Neither strikes one as especially Russian. Shostakovich's musical tastes are international though he is not oblivious to the folk-lore elements of his country. It would be a mistake, however, to classify him as a nationalist; he is a believer in tradition and conscious of composition in the past. One of the topics on which I found him most talkative was the education of children and he spoke of playing a wide variety of music on the piano to his daughter, Galya, and his son, Maxim. The latter apparently has a marked talent and may well become a musician. Shostakovich's enthusiasm for teaching is evidently very genuine. When I asked whether he believed in playing phonograph records to children he answered that while this was valuable, he personally thought more was to be gained by playing the piano, stopping and explaining and analyzing as one went along.

Shostakovich as Pianist

No one could call the Russian composer a virtuoso pianist — his playing is a little stiff—but general musicianship carries him through and he has the quality and defects of the composer-performer. At a special concert in the Rudolfinum devoted solely to his chamber music works, Shostakovich played with the magnificent Russian violinist, David Oistrach, the 'cellist Milos Sádlo and the Ceskoslovenské String Quartet. The program consisted in the well-known piano quintet, Opus 57, written in 1940 (which received the Stalin prize of 100,000 rubles—"the largest sum of money ever paid for one piece in the history of music."); the Trio for piano, violin and 'cello (1944); and the second Sonata (1943.) The evening was a success—people even sitting on the stage—but the harrassed composer didn't seem to be enjoying himself even though he had an obvious desire to make his pieces known. Our hero did not appear, as sometimes in Russia, with medals displayed on his conventional full evening dress; on the contrary his tense shyness had a most endearing quality—and the audience was with him from the first note. Technically the performances were not of the highest quality to the brief rehearsals but the music is not difficult, follows classical lines and the general effect was impressive. The Piano Sonata puzzled the audience. The march-like first movement was played with considerable seriousness, as indeed were all the pieces, and it "came off", but the second movement disconcerted the Czechs by its disonant harmonies while the finale with its set of variations on a simple theme made them wonder whether it belonged with the two preceding sections. Extremely interesting to me was the audience reaction since the Czechs definitely wanted to enjoy the music of a fellow Slav; they found it easier in the orchestral than the chamber music pieces.

Shostakovich read a paper on Soviet music at the Czech Radio Corporation one morning in which he stressed the happy lot of Russian musicians, particularly the rest-home of the Soviet composers Union near Ivanovo (not unlike our MacDowell Colony) and so forth. The general effect was more of a school exercise than an intimate causerie, however.

Other Composers

The Prague Festival was also attended by the composers Frank Martin, William Walton, Leonard Bernstein, Alois Haba and others; the instrumentalists Hepzibah and Yehudi Menuhin, David Oistrach, Jacques Fevrier, Ricardo Odnoposoff and The Philharmonia Quartet from London; and the conductors Charles Muench, Eugene Mravinski and George Singer. Compositions by Honegger, Ravel Martinu, etct. were featured as well as the Slav pieces. Many were curious to know what Shostakovich would think of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony. Half a dozen people must have asked him and the poor chap was "on the spot." Apparently he liked the first two movements—was less happy about the rest. His own "Eighth" led by Eugene Mravinski received a perfectly tremendous ovation. It was the only work on the particular program and the sparsely orchestrated symphony which develops slowly and is brilliantly planned for its time effects and mass appeal brought down the house. The march rhythms have a strong emotional effect and Mravinski (to whom the work is dedicated) drew every ounce there was out of the score. Shostakovich's nervous little bows, when called to the stage, drove the crowd wild and both composer and conductor were applauded for full twenty minutes after the performance had stopped. Part of this may have been due to Pan-Slavic enthusiasm, but no one can deny the monumental effectiveness of the writing.

Comparing the Shostakovich and Copland symphonies—the former is created carefully and artfully—the latter with an almost studied simplicity. The Russian thinks of his audience much less sophisticated than ours—and produces unabashed, sure-fire compositions. The American is more abstract, eschewing immediate popularity.

Quarter-Tone Opera

One evening a number of us, including Shostakovich, Walton and Bernstein, went to listen to Alois Hába's quarter-tone opera, "The Mother." This work, written in 1929, is a curious drama based on a Czech national story; the moral being that raising a large family is perhaps the chief end in life. The melodic lines of the arias are surprsingly satisfactory and the quarter-tone effects (several instruments are especially made for this purpose) quite acceptable, after a few minutes. The most questionable moments are the chromatic glissandos. The rest of the time, however—and, of course, it is not always written in quarter-tones—it is unusually effective. Shostakovich, as a humanistic musician, was fascinated by Hába's music and his ideas generally. Several days later he went to the conservatory with the Italian theorist, Ed. Cavallini, and myself to see Hába's quarter-tone piano and six-tone harmonitum demonstrated. Hába explained the uses of the instruments for teaching purposes while the composer Karel Reiner performed several compositions for us. Hába is a good Communist but ironically enough the conservative capitalist nations have shown more interest in his experiments than the "liberal" Communist countries.

Shostakovich's curiosity was illustrated by the time he devoted in Prague to looking at scores of young composers. Part of this may have been "noblesse oblige" but he seems very happy when he can get off in a corner and read music to his heart's content.

One day we spoke of the much played Prokofieff Sonata, Opus 94, originally written for flute and later transcribed for violin, Szigeti, who prepared the bowings of the Am-Rus edition, told me in April that Prokofieff could not have been concentrating when he thought of the work for flute as it was so eminently violinistic. Shostakovich on the other hand, stated that the sonata is much better in its original form and not really a violin sonata at all.

De gustibus . . . Dmitri Shostakovich and his wife Nina Vasilyevna are direct and simple people who would make many friends in this country. Perhaps, despite the political clouds on the horizon, they will visit us before long.

PALO ALTO, CALIF.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

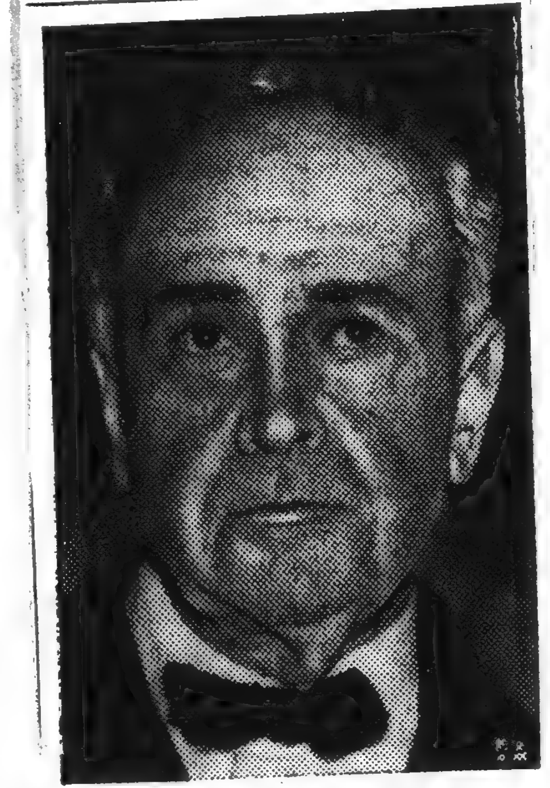
KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS
AUG 16 1947

Kousevitzky Takes Bride

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Kousevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today



SERGE KOUSEVITZKY

that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Kousevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

RENO, NEV.
EVENING GAZETTE
AUG 16 1947

MARRIED

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumof.

POPULAR BLUFF, MO.
AMERICAN REPUBLIC
AUG 16 1947

ORCHESTRA DIRECTOR, 73, WEDS SECRETARY, 48

By the Associated Press

New York, Aug. 16 — Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE
AUG 16 1947

Maestro Married to Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TELEGRAM
AUG 16 1947

Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
AUG 16 1947

Musician Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Marries Secretary

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds 46-Year-Old Niece of Late Wife at Lenox Estate.

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

GREENVILLE, PA.
RECORD ARGUS
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds

New York, Aug. 16 —(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Married in Lenox to Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill, Lenox.

YORK, PA.
DISPATCH
AUG 16 1947

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
UNION
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Marries Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owens, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill, in Lenox, at 2 P. M.

MASSILON, OHIO
INDEPENDENT
AUG 16 1947

Orchestra Leader Weds Secretary

NEW YORK. (AP). — Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

Conductor Weds His Secretary

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-REPUBLICAN
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitsky Weds

NEW YORK, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

PONTIAC, MICH.
PRESS
AUG 16 1947

Serge Koussevitsky, 73, Weds Secretary, 46

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73 year old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 16 1947

NEWLYWEDS OFF TO EUROPE

Associated Press Photo.
Serge Koussevitzky and bride on the Queen Elizabeth.

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

73-Year-Old Symphony Conductor Makes Announcement Just Before Sailing.

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony, told reporters today as he boarded the Queen Elizabeth that he was married yesterday to his 46-year-old secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, niece of his late wife.

The wedding ceremony, he said, was performed at his Lenox (Mass.) estate, Saranac, by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox. Miss Naumoff has been his secretary for the past eighteen years. Koussevitzky's first wife died in 1942. The conductor posed with his wife for photographers in his stateroom, after telling reporters that not even friends who had come to see him off knew of the wedding.

Koussevitzky said that during his vacation trip through several European countries he planned to seek compositions written during the war but still not published. He hopes to present some of them when he returns to Boston in the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season, he said.

"I have names of some composers," Koussevitzky said, "but I don't know what has happened to them." He mentioned specifically a French composer, Messian, whom he had asked to write a symphony in ten movements.

Rex Harrison, British film actor, sailing to make a picture in his homeland, expressed the hope that the film tax dispute between England and America "can be straightened out for both our sakes." He was accompanied by his wife, Lili Palmer. and his son, Carey. Also sailing were John Mills, British actor, and his playwright wife, Mary Hayley Bell, and a third British actor, David Farrar.

Other passengers included the Right Rev. James P. De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Long Island Diocese, and his wife. Bishop De Wolfe said that he would [illegible] a series of sermons on church [illegible] at Canterbury Cathedral, [illegible] Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and St. George's [illegible].

Dr. [illegible] Silvers, chairman of [illegible] Emergency Council, was en route to the biennial meeting of the council's actions committee, beginning August 24 in Zurich. The 2,141 passengers also included Representative Orville Zimmerman (D.-Mo.), who will attend the World Farm and Agricultural Conference in Switzerland; Frederick E. Wakeman, author of "The Hucksters"; Igor Sikorsky, aviation engineer; Dr. Juan Oropesa, Venezuelan Ambassador to Great Britain, and Mrs. Jose Ferrer, known on the stage as Uta Hagen.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
AUG 16 1947

Conductor Koussevitzky Married To His Secretary

NEW YORK, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the hill in Lenox, at 2 P. M.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

Koussevizky said he planned to visit several countries to seek compositions written during the war years, but still not published, for possible presentation when he returns to Boston the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season.

"I have the names of some composers," he said, "but I don't know what has happened to them. There is one French composer, Messian, whom I asked to write a composition. It will be a symphony in 10 movements which will be ready either at the end of this coming season or in October, 1948. Mr. Messian said he needed two years to write this composition."

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitsky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BANGOR, MAINE
COMMERCIAL
AUG 16 1947

Noted Conductor Takes A Bride

NEW YORK. Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conduct of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] today that he was marrie yesterday to his secreary of the pas 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Kaussevitzky told newsmen of th marriage as he and his bride boar ed the liner Queen Elizabeth for vacation trip through Euro[illegible] bride is a niece of the conducto late wife, who died in 1942.

ST. JOHNSBURY, VT.
CALEDONIAN RECORD
AUG 16 1947

NOTED CONDUCTOR WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 P. M.

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES
AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY, 73, WEDS SECRETARY, 46

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen o the marriage as he and his brid boarded the liner Queen Elizabet for a vacation trip through Eu rope. The bride is a niece of th conductor's late wife, who died i 1942.

YAKIMA, WASH.
MORNING HERALD
AUG 16 1947

Conductor Marries

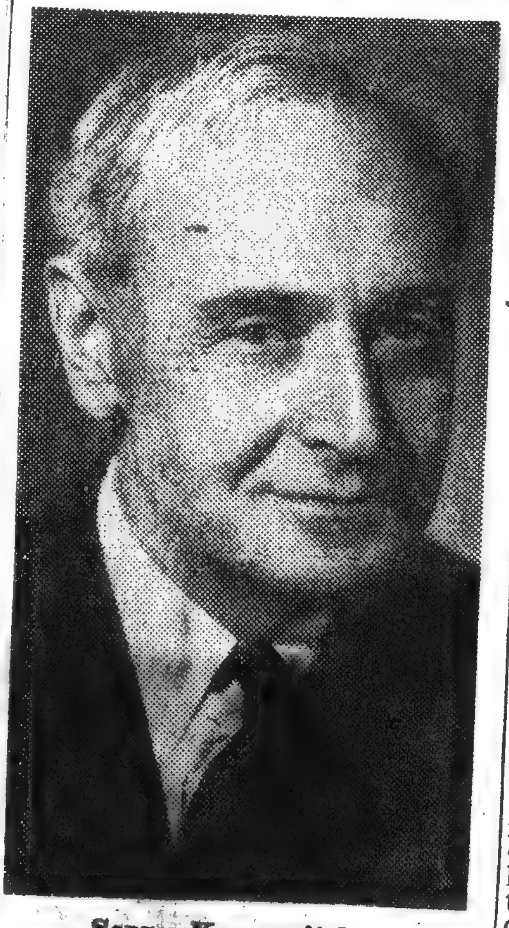
New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe.

Bloomfield, N.J.
Press
7/25/47

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL finally gets on its merry way. For three successive week-ends there will be many concerts given by outstanding musicians and orchestras. The Boston Symphony will give a series ~~of eleven~~ concerts which will include a full Mozart and Bach program. Visitors at the Jersey Shore are also in for a real treat. The BerkeleyCartret Hotel in Asbury Park will give a series of [illegible] concerts in August.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Marries Long-Time Secretary



Serge Koussevitzky

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, at Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 PM.

Kept Secret

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

Koussevitzky said he planned to visit several countries to seek compositions written during the war years, but still not published, for possible presentation when he returns to Boston the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season.

"I have the names of some composers," he said, "but I don't know what has happened to them. There is one French composer, Messian, whom I asked to write a composition. It will be a symphony in 10 movements which will be ready either at the end of this coming season or in October, 1948. Mr. Messian said he needed two years to write this composition."

The only attendants at the ceremony were Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and his wife, Ruth Posselt, concert violinist. Others present were Dr. and Mrs. Edward A. Forsley of Lenox, Mr. Owen's wife and two unidentified servants at the estate.

The couple were married in the drawing room before a fireplace, over which hangs a large portrait of the conductor with the bass viol which he played early in his musical career. Dr. Koussevitzky was dressed in a white linen suit and his wife wore a simple, cream-colored afternoon dress. After the ceremony, a buffet luncheon was served.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

Dr. Koussevitzky Married to Niece

Lenox, Aug. 16—Dr. Serge Kousivitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was revealed today to have married Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, niece of his first wife, yesterday in a secret ceremony.

The marriage was disclosed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church, who performed the ceremony in the living room of a conductor's summer home.

[242]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzlay Weds at 73

Sails With Niece of His Late Wife

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today that he was married yesterday to Olga Naumoof, 46, niece of his late wife and his secretary for the past 18 years.

The maestro said the ceremony was performed at his Lenox, Mass., home. He made his announcement as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth, which sailed for Southhampton.

Koussevitzky, whose previous wife died in 1942, said his trip was primarily a vacation and honeymoon but that he would look for new musical works to present next season.

Others who sailed on the ship were Rex Harrison, an actor, and Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, who was on his way to Zurich for the council's biennial meeting.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
AUG [illegible] 1947

Koussevitsky Weds Niece of His Late Wife

(Photos on Page 20)

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today that he yesterday married Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for 18 years and niece of his late wife.

The announcement was made as Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky sailed on the Queen Elizabeth for England and Europe. Mrs. Koussevitzky is 46.

Not even friends of the farewell party knew of the marriage until the conductor announced it. He said the ceremony was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregation- l Church on the Hill, Lenox, ss., at Koussevitzky's estate "Saranac."

The conductor said he planned to seek compositions written during the war years. He mentioned specifically a symphony in 10 movements by the French composer Messian.

The Queen Elizabeth also carried three British film players, Rex Harrison and his wife, Lili Palmer, and their son, Carey; John Mills and his wife, Mary Hayley Bell, and David Farrar.

Others were the Rt. Rev. James Pinette de Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Long Island Diocese, and Mrs. de Wolfe. Another was Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, en route to a meeting in Zurich, Switzerland.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
AUG 17 1947

Mrs. Louis Glickman has returned to her home in Cedarhurst from Saratoga and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts.

IOWA CITY, IOWA PRESS CITIZEN
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitsky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK (AP) — Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
TIMES
AUG 17 1947

Musicians' Club Activities For 1947-48 Outlined In New Books

The Musicians Club of Wichita Falls, Texas, was organized in January, 1910 and became a member of the Federation in May, 1913. The club is affiliated with the National Federation of Music Clubs, the Texas Federation of Music Clubs and the Wichita Falls Woman's Forum. Its membership is made up of active, professional, associate and honorary members including approximately 175 musicians of this city. Also, the Junior Musicians Club is an auxiliary to the Musicians Club of Wichita Falls. And members of the club are acting as counselors and directors of the A Cappella Choir of Wichita Falls High School; Hardin College Music Club and the Wichita Falls High School Orchestra.

Adopting as their motto "Success Crowns Labor," the club will begin its 37th year of active service when the 1947-48 club year opens with a dinner and concert program on Oct. 21 at the Woman's Forum Clubhouse. Mrs. F. R. Collard will serve as president of the club for the current year and will be assisted by an official staff to include: Mrs. David E. Franklin, first vice president; Mrs. James O. Trulove, second vice president; Mrs. Grady England, third vice president; Mrs. Clyde Tittle Jr., recording secretary; Mrs. O. G. Stephens, corresponding secretary; Mrs. T. B. Parnell, treasurer; Mrs. Lucille Brooks Huff, parliamentarian; Mrs. David MacPherson, accompanist, and Mrs. Elizabeth LaRue, historian.

The committees named for the 1947-48 term will be: the executive board, Mrs. Collard, Mrs. Harley F. Goble, Mrs. J. M. Baber, Mrs. G. T. Buchanan, Miss Erma Nala Voss; program committee, Mesdames David Franklin, David MacPherson, Lloyd Haseltine, J. M. Baber, Elizabeth LaRue; finance committee, Mrs. T. B. Parnell, Mrs. Frances Allen Derden and Miss Joza Lou Bullington; extension committee, Mrs. James O. Trulove, Miss Florence Sammons, Mrs. W. C. Hamilton, Mrs. H. F. Goble and Mrs. George Henderson; arrangement committee, Mrs. Grady England, Mrs. Charles E. Borland, Mrs. Edwin A. Bebb, Mrs. W. L. Parker and Mrs. J. E. Biggs; constitution and by-laws, Mrs. Lucille Brooks Huff, Mrs. W. T. Knight and Mrs. Lester Jones; press committee, Mrs. E. A. Nelson, Mrs. O. J. Didzun, Mrs. H. B. VanEmden, Mrs. James F. Smith, Mrs. D. Elwood Miles, and Mrs. C. M. Linehan; telephone, Mrs. Albert Ellis, Mrs. C. A. Rogers, Mrs. Eddie Lee Fitzhugh, Mrs. O. F. Marchman, Mrs. A. L. McAlister, Mrs. James G. Oakley, Mrs. J. W. Hill, Mrs David Langford, Mrs Mary B. Adams, Mrs. John B. Miller, Mrs. C. E. Pimlott, Mrs. Irma Carpenter, Mrs. J. H. Allison and Mrs. J. M. Hawley.

W. L. Underwood has been named representative to the press, Mrs. C. E. Beavers, representative to the Woman's Forum and junior counselors are Mrs. J. W. Akin Jr., Mrs. O. J. Didzun, Miss Erma Nala Voss and Miss Sara Dunn Sistrunk.

Meeting Plan

The club meetings are conducted at the Woman's Forum Clubhouse with the regular study and business meetings being held the first Thursday of each month at 10:30 o'clock and the evening meetings on the third Tuesday at 8 o'clock. Meetings for the year will begin with the third Tuesday in October and close with the first Thursday in May. The last meeting is held as the May luncheon and the installation of officers is presented at this time. The club presents a Christmas concert each year and this year the concert will be given at the First Methodist Church, Dec. 14 at 4 o'clock with Mrs. Lucille Brooks Huff and Miss Erma Nala Voss as chairman and co-chairman, respectively. Special programs for "music week" will be given and Stella Stacy and Flora Greenwood will be guest artists at this time.

A "guest day" musicale will be featured at the Woman's Forum on March 16 with Mrs. W. T. Knight and Mrs. W. L. Parker, as chairman and co-chairman. Members of the executive board and past presidents of the Musicians Club will be hostesses for this afternoon program.

For the opening program Harley Goble will preside as master of ceremonies and Mrs. Edwin Bebb will serve as chairman with Mrs. Charles Borland as co-chairman. Artists presented on this program will include James Lester Lewis, Max Kreutz, Mrs. Arline M. Roberts and Miss Beverly Minton, Olive Irene Hallmark and Carlye Ramey.

Book Reviews

Mrs. Wayne J. Holmes will be the first book review artist of the year and will give a review of "Koussevitsky" by M. Smith for the morning musicale which will be given on Nov. 6. The musical numbers for this program will be given by Homer C. Donohoo Jr., and Mesdames Flaude Gammill, A. J. Evans, David Langford, Henry G. Truly and James O. Trulove.

Other studies presented on morning musicales will include "Verdi"—Franz Werfel, given by Willard Underwood; "Mozart on the Stage"—C. Benn, by Miss Voss; "The Life of Maurice Revel"—Madeline Goss, by Mrs. James H. Landes; "Chopin"—Henry Bidou, by Mrs. O. B. Kiel and "Beethoven, the Man Who Freed Music"—Robert Haven Schauffler, given by Mrs. Charles William Wallace.

In addition to the chairmen and co-chairmen already named for the evening concerts, others to serve in this capacity during the year will include Mrs. C. A. Rogers and Mrs. W. C. Hamilton for the November concert; Mrs. Lester Jones and Mrs. Albert Ellis in January; Mrs. T. B. Parnell and Mrs. James G. Oakley in February and Mrs. O. J. Didzun and Mrs. E. A. Nelson for the final concert in April. Members of the Junior Musicians Club will provide the regular concert for the March program. And hostesses for each meeting have been chosen and their names appear in the club yearbook.

Every meeting held during the year will feature a well-planned musical program which will be presented by members of the club. Those to be featured for each program have been chosen and the artist's name appears in the club year book.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET
AUG 17 1947

"The Light Opera Festival" crammed with music from, naturally, ight opera, and the clear and true, but expressionless singing of Polyna Stoska, opened a three week stand last week at 5:30 p.m. on WOKO, a far cry from the inspiring Boston Symphony, but good background music for a good book. This week there'll be Gilbert and Sullivan, Victor Herbert, Cole Porter, Kern and Gershwin.

JUST MARRIED . . . Serge Koussevitzky and his bride as they sailed today on the Queen Elizabeth. The Boston Symphony conductor and the former Olga Naumoff, his secretary, were married yesterday.

JOPLIN, MO.
GLOBE
AUG 17 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETARY

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

SCOTTSBLUFF, NEB.
STAR-HERALD
AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Leader Is Wed to His Secretary

New York, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46 his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
AUG 17 1947

Conductor Marries Dead Wife's Niece

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 17 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Marries Secretary

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

PROVO, UTAH
HERALD
AUG 17 1947

CONDUCTOR WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (U.P.) — Serge Koussevitsky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today as he sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he was married yesterday at his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the past 18 years. She sailed with him today.

GUTHRIE, OKLA.
LEADER
AUG

73-Year-Old Maest Marries Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—S Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of Boston symphony orchestra, Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secre for the past 18 years, were mar Friday at the conductor's estate Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturd

Miss Naumoff is a niece of t conductor's late wife, who died 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of th marriage as he and his bride board ed the liner Queen Elizabeth fo a honeymoon in Europe. He sai not even friends who went to th the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

WATERLOO, IOWA
COURIER
1 7 1947

Conductor and Bride Sail

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his bride of a day, the former Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, revealed their marriage as they sailed from New York for Europe yesterday on the liner Queen Elizabeth. The bride is the niece of the conductor's late wife who died in 1942. Marriage took place at Lenox, Mass. (AP Wirephoto direct to Courier.)

DUBUQUE, IOWA
TELEGRAPH-HERALD
AUG 17 1947

MUSICIANS IN THE DAY'S HEADLINES

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and his bride of a day, the former Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for past 18 years, disclose their marriage as they sail from New York for Europe on the liner, Queen Elizabeth. Bride is the niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. (AP Wirephoto)

Koussevitzky Marries His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass. by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the hill in Lenox, at 2 p.m.

BRADENTON, FLA.
HERALD

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the hill in Lenox.

MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

ALBANY, GA.
HERALD

AUG 17 1947

Conductor Marries

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor Marries Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Mr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

AUG 16 1947

Conductor Marries Private Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The weding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

CLEARWATER, FLA.
SUN

AUG 17 1947

MARRIES SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussev, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT

AUG 17 1947

CONDUCTOR WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP) —Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES

AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds

NEW YORK —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
AUG 17 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 16— (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the

---

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Reveals Marriage To Aide

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

PETERSBURG, VA.
PROGRESS INDEX

AUG 17 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS

AUG 17 1947

Hub Conductor on Honeymoon

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (UP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed today on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary Olga Naumoof.

Koussevitsky revealed that the wedding was performed yesterday at his estate in Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Lenox Congregational church.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 17 1947

WEDDING CANTATA FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

NEW YORK (UP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sailed yesterday on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary Olga Naumoof.

LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor Marries Secretary

NEW YORK. (AP). Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

AUG 17 1947

Boston Maestro Weds

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY SUN

AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony's Conductor Discloses Marriage to Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73 - year - old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife who died in 1942.

TOPEKA, KAN.
CAPITAL
AUG 17 1947

Serge Koussevitizky, Symphony Orchestra Leader, Weds Secretary

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

OKLA.
R
7 1947

Old Ma
Secretar
Aug. 16—(A 3, conducto ny orches off, 46, his s years, were onductor's e disclosed S is a niece wife, who old newsmen nd his bride ueen Elizabe Europe. H who went him off had ing.

[244]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky, At 73, Marries Secretary, 46

Conductor Lets Secret of Friday Ceremony Slip Out as They Sail for Europe

Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-three-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed yesterday before sailing on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Southampton that last Friday he secretly married Olga Naumoff, forty-six, his secretary for eighteen years and a niece of his late wife.

Mr. Koussevitzky inadvertently gave the news to the press in answering a ship news photographer's question while posing at the gangplank. Approached later for an interview in his crowded stateroom, he hustled a reporter into the passageway to avoid revealing the secret to friends who had come to see him off. The maestro beamed and twinkled as he related details of the ceremony, which took place at 2 p. m. Friday in the living room of his estate, Seranak, near Lenox, Mass.

Concert Master Is Witness

Mr. Koussevitzky, born in Russia, is a member of the Greek Orthodox Church, but the ceremony was performed by an old friend, the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox. Richard Bergin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Bergin were official witnesses, and with eight other persons present were sworn to secrecy. The Town Clerk of Lenox, who issued the marriage license earlier in the week, had also agreed to keep mum.

The bride wore an afternoon dress of ivy-colored crepe without a bouquet for the double ring ceremony. The house was decorated with gladioli, and after a brief reception the couple left for New York by automobile.

Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky were among 2,125 passengers departing aboard the Cunard White Star liner at 11:05 a. m. yesterday from Pier 90, Hudson River and Fiftieth Street. The conductor said he is planning a holiday trip through England, France and Switzerland and will do no conducting or composing. Before returning to the United States about Oct. 1, however, he hopes to discover musical scores written during the war years but still unpublished, for possible presentation during the fall and winter season of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's late wife, Natalya Konstantinova Ouchkoff, died in 1942.

British Film Actors Hopeful

Four British motion picture players returning to England after working in Hollywood studios or vacationing here were optimistic that the ban on export of American films to England will be raised or modified. Rex Harrison, who sailed with his wife, the actress Lili Palmer, said he thought the matter "can be straightened out for both our sakes." These sentiments were echoed by John Mills and his playwright wife, Mary Havely Bell, and David Farrar. Mr. Mills, who is in "Great Expectations," said he expects to return to Hollywood in February, as will Mr. Farrar, who is in "Black Narcissus."

Others sailing included Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the American section of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, and Dr. Emanuel Neumann, president of the Zionists Organization of America, who will attend a meeting of the General Zionist Council Actions Committee in Zurich, Switzerland, starting Aug. 24. Dr. Silver said the committee will meet until after the report of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine is made public, and will then formulate policies for the Zionist movement.

The Right Rev. James Pinette De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese of Long Island, and Mrs. De Wolfe are bound for England and France, where the bishop will preach at Canterbury Cathedral, Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral in London, and St. George's Church in Paris. He will study conditions overseas to estimate relief needs for the information of his own diocese.

Among the 2,125 Passengers Sailing Yesterday on the Queen Elizabeth

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and his bride, the former Olga Naumoff, off on a wedding trip

Herald Tribune—Acme

The Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, and Mrs. DeWolfe, who will visit England and France

---

SA[illegible] UTAH
[illegible]UNE

AUG 17 1947

Music Conductor Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
STAR

AUG 17 1947

(oussevitzky Veds Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Kous-evitzky, 73-year-old conductor of he Boston Symphony orchestra, lisclosed Saturday that he was narried yesterday to his secre-ary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 17 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

AUG 17 1947

Boston Maestro Weds

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
STAR

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Leader And Secretary Wed

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussenvitzky, 73, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES

AUG 17 1947

Koussvitszky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
DAILY CHIEF

AUG 16 1947

Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—The 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, has disclosed that he was married yesterday to his secretary. He announced his marriage as he boarded the Queen Elizabeth today for a European vacation. He identified his bride as his secretary for the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof. Miss Naumoof's age was given as 46 years. She is the niece of Koussevitzky's late wife, who died in 1942.

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

AUG 18 1947

CONDUCTOR WEDS

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 18.—Sergei Koussevitzky, 73-years-old conductor f the Boston Symphony Orchestra, vas married secretly at his estate here Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, a niece of his ate first wife, it was learned today.

The Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill, officiated at the ceremony at Koussevitzky's spacious estate, Saranac.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

AUG 17 1947

Orchestra Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BEAUMONT, TEXAS
ENTERPRISE

[illegible] 17 [illegible]

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETAR

NEW YORK, Aug. 6. (INS).—D Serge Koussevitsky, 73, world-fame conductor of the Boston Symphon orchestra, revealed today his mar riage to his secretary of 18 year Miss Olga Nauoof, 46, niece of hi deceased first wife.

The announcement of the su prise wedding was made simultane ously by Koussevitsky and Rev. Herbert Owen, who officiated at the ceremony yesterday at the Lenox, Mass., summer home of the orchestra leader.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
HERALD-EXPRESS

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Symphony Leader, 73, Weds Secretary

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

This Clipping From SOUTH BEND, IND.
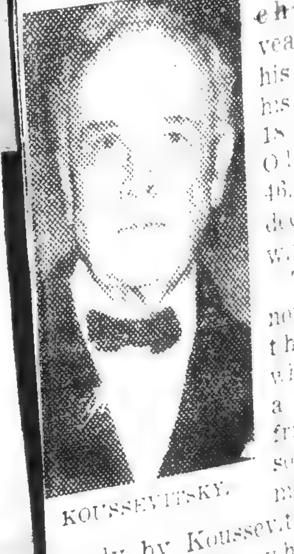
TRIBUNE

[illegible] 17 194

Koussevitsky Weds Niece Of Late Wif

By International News Service.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. — Serge Koussevitsky, 73, wo famed conductor of the Bos Symphony chestra, vealed to his marriag his secreta 18 years, Olag Nau 46, niece of hi deceased firs wi



KOUSSEVITSKY.

The an nouncement o the wedding which came a a surprise t friends and as sociates, wa made simultan eously by Koussevitsky a Rev J. Herbert Owen, who officiated at the simple ceremony Friday a the Lenox, Mass., summ home of the orchestra leader.

Koussevitsky made an nouncement as he board er Queen Mary in New for

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 1 7 1947

Koussevitzky, At 73, Marries Secretary, 46

Conductor Lets Secret of Friday Ceremony Slip Out as They Sail for Europe

Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-three-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed yesterday before sailing on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Southampton that last Friday he secretly married Olga Naumoff, forty-six, his secretary for eighteen years and a niece of his late wife.

Mr. Koussevitzky inadvertently gave the news to the press in answering a ship news photographer's question while posing at the gangplank. Approached later for an interview in his crowded stateroom, he hustled a reporter into the passageway to avoid revealing the secret to friends who had come to see him off. The maestro beamed and twinkled as he related details of the ceremony, which took place at 2 p. m. Friday in the living room of his estate, Seranak, near Lenox, Mass.

Concert Master Is Witness

Mr. Koussevitzky, born in Russia, is a member of the Greek Orthodox Church, but the ceremony was performed by an old friend, the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox. Richard Bergin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Bergin were official witnesses, and with eight other persons present were sworn to secrecy. The Town Clerk of Lenox, who issued the marriage license earlier in the week, had also agreed to keep mum.

The bride wore an afternoon dress of ivy-colored crepe without a bouquet for the double ring ceremony. The house was decorated with gladioli, and after a brief reception the couple left for New York by automobile.

Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky were among 2,125 passengers departing aboard the Cunard White Star liner at 11:05 a. m. yesterday from Pier 90, Hudson River and Fiftieth Street. The conductor said he is planning a holiday trip through England, France and Switzerland and will do no conducting or composing. Before returning to the United States about Oct. 1, however, he hopes to discover musical scores written during the war years but still unpublished, for possible presentation during the fall and winter season of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's late wife, Natalya Konstantinova Ouchkoff, died in 1942.

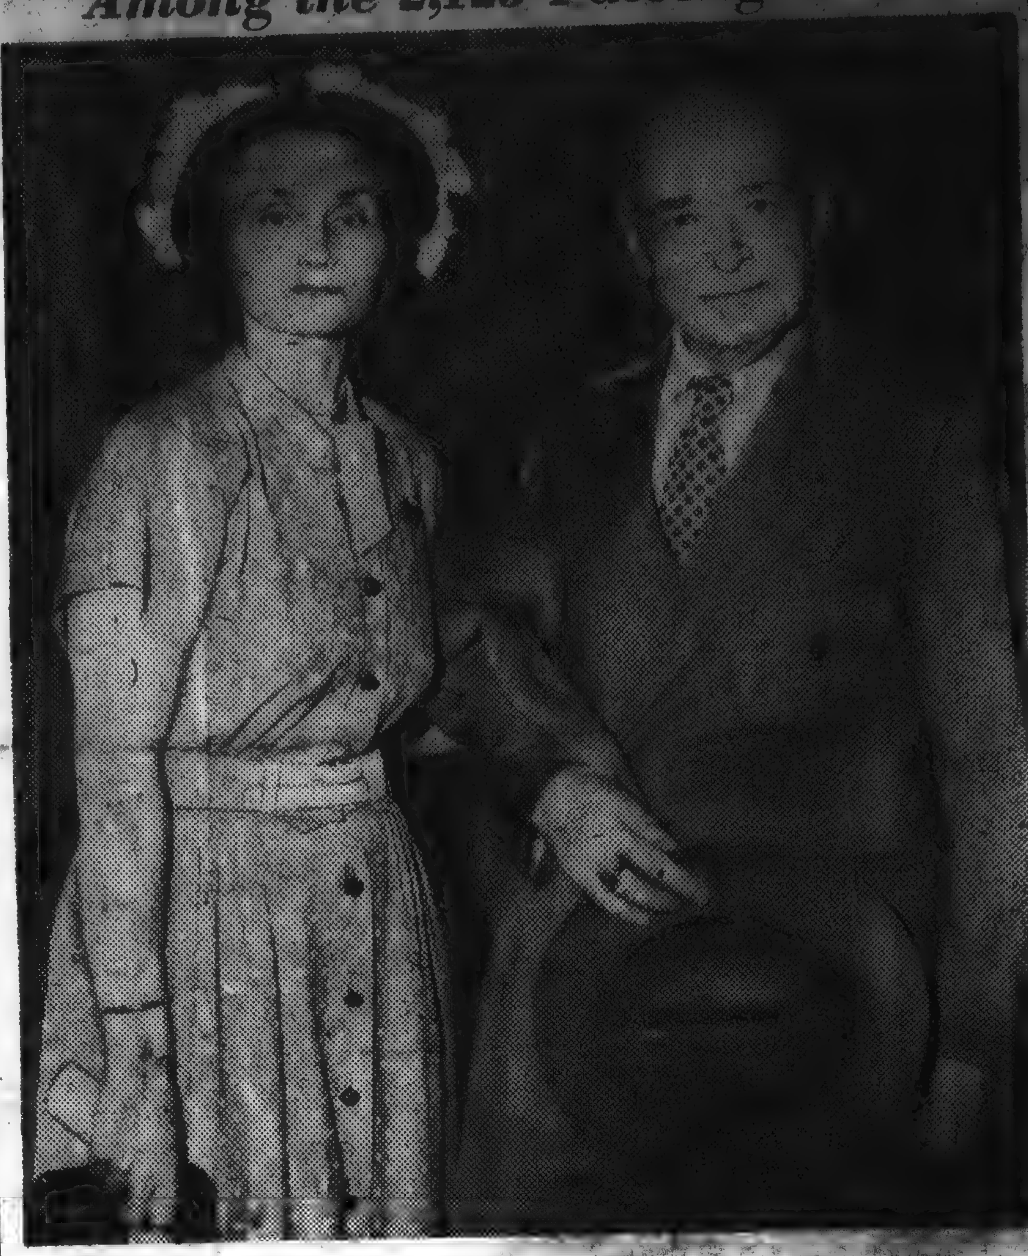
British Film Actors Hopeful

Four British motion picture players returning to England after working in Hollywood studios or vacationing here were optimistic that the ban on export of American films to England will be raised or modified. Rex Harrison, who sailed with his wife, the actress Lili Palmer, said he thought the matter "can be straightened out for both our sakes." These sentiments were echoed by John Mills and his playwright wife, Mary Havely Bell, and David Farrar. Mr. Mills, who is in "Great Expectations," said he expects to return to Hollywood in February, as will Mr. Farrar, who is in "Black Narcissus."

Others sailing included Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the American section of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, and Dr. Emanuel Neumann, president of the Zionists Organization of America, who will attend a meeting of the General Zionist Council Actions Committee in Zurich, Switzerland, starting Aug. 24. Dr. Silver said the committee will meet until after the report of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine is made public, and will then formulate policies for the Zionist movement.

The Right Rev. James Pinette De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese of Long Island, and Mrs. De Wolfe are bound for England and France, where the bishop will preach at Canterbury Cathedral, Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral in London, and St. George's Church in Paris. He will study conditions overseas to estimate relief needs for the information of his own diocese.

Among the 2,125 Passengers Sailing Yesterday on the Queen Elizabeth



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and his bride, the former Olga Naumoff, off on a wedding trip

Herald Tribune—Acme

The Right Rev. James P. DeWolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, and Mrs. DeWolfe, who will visit England and France

---

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

AUG 1 7 1947

Boston Maestro Weds

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

WINTER HAVEN, FLA.
DAILY CHIEF

AUG 1 6 1947

Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—The 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, has disclosed that he was married yesterday to his secretary. He announced his marriage as he boarded the Queen Elizabeth today for a European vacation. He identified his bride as his secretary for the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof. Miss Naumoof's age was given as 46 years. She is the niece of Koussevitzky's late wife, who died in 1942.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
HERALD-EXPRESS

AUG 1 6 1947

Koussevitzky
Symphony Leader, 73, Weds Secretary

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
STAR

AUG 1 7 1947

Symphony Leader And Secretary Wed

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussenvitzky, 73, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

AUG 1 8 1947

CONDUCTOR WEDS

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 18.—Sergei Koussevitzky, 73-years-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married secretly at his estate here Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, a niece of his late first wife, it was learned today.

The Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill, officiated at the ceremony at Koussevitzky's spacious estate, Saranac.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
STAR

AUG 1 7 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

[illegible] 1 7 194

Koussevitsky Weds Niece Of Late Wif

By International News Service.

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. —
Serge Koussevitsky, 73, wo famed conductor of the Bo
Symphony
chestra, vealed to his marria his secreta
18 years,
Olag Na
46, niece deceased wife.
The nouncement the wedding which came a surp friends and a sociates, made simultan

KOUSSEVITSKY.

eously by Koussevitsky a
J. Herbert Owen, who offic the simple ceremony F
the Lenox, Mass., summ of the orchestra leader.
Koussevitzky made nouncement as he board er Queen Mary in New

SAL[illegible] UTAH
[illegible]NE

AUG [illegible] 1947

Music Conductor Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 17 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES

AUG 17 1947

Koussvitszky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

AUG 17 1947

Orchestra Conductor Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BEA[illegible] TEXAS
[illegible]PRISE

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETAR

NEW YORK, Aug. 6. (INS).—D
Serge Koussevitsky, 73, world-fame conductor of the Boston Symphon orchestra, revealed today his marriage to his secretary of 18 years Miss Olga Nauoof, 46, niece of his deceased first wife.

The announcement of the surprise wedding was made simultaneously by Koussevitsky and Rev. Herbert Owen, who officiated at the ceremony yesterday at the Lenox, Mass., summer home of the orchestra leader.

SHAWNEE, OKLA.
NEWS

AUG 1 7 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

AUG 1 7 1947

Conductor Koussevitsky, 73, Takes ~~Secretary,~~ 46, Bride

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conducto's estate at Lenox, Mass.. he disclosed yesterday.

—Acme Telephoto
Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

AUG 1 6 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 1 7 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
AUG 1 7 1947

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

AUG 1 7 1947

Symphonic Conductor Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

PITTSBURG, KANS.
SUN
AUG 1 7 1947

CONDUCTOR MARRIES.

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past eighteen years, Miss Olga Naumoff. Koussevitzky told news men of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds

NEW YORK (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

ATHENS, OHIO
MESSENGER

AUG 1 7 1947

Boston Musician, 73, Marries Secretary, 46

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed ~~today he was married~~ Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoff, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

ANNISTON, ALA.
STAR

AUG 1 7 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary, Aged 46

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

[246]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 1 7 1947

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

READERS have written me that they, too, get the Tanglewood broadcasts of the Boston Symphony performances of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Piano Concerto with the sound distorted in the ways I have described. And one reader has spoken of the monitoring of volume which on the one hand has leveled off crescendos and robbed them of their climaxes, and on the other hand produced sudden surges in passages that should have proceeded on one sustained level.

Such monitoring, I found, was especially noticeable in the crescendos of the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on Aug. 5. And even the leveled-off sonorities at the climaxes of such crescendos again were as though shattered by their own impact. This was true of the very first fortissimo statement of the chief theme of the movement to which the hushed opening builds up, and the tremendous prolonged statement of this theme at the beginning of the recapitulation was a prolonged confusion of shattered sound.

But all this was only a further distortion by A. B. C.'s technicians of a performance that was itself a monstrous distortion of the symphony, and no less so for the fact that Koussevitzky produced it with love in his heart and, no doubt, tears rolling down his cheeks. Love certainly is one thing a musician must have to play a Beethoven symphony; but it won't get very far without the mere ability to set a right tempo, keep it after it has been set, and keep all changes related to it.

In that connection a letter from an excellent musician I know is interesting. I remarked a couple of weeks ago about the Mozart Serenade which Koussevitzky broadcast that I couldn't imagine what different impression the work might make when properly paced and moulded and phrased; but apparently my friend could. "I heard the broadcast," she writes, "and the first movement came through so dull and spiritless that I felt as you did about the music. Then as it went on and I strained against the performance I heard the beautiful moving Mozart of the slow movement, the delicious gayety and sweetness and playfulness of the other movements, and thought why in God's name could they not put some phrasing, some understanding, some consciousness of what was happening, into the playing. I got so angry at Koussevitzky that I finally had to laugh when I suddenly remembered an interview in some magazine in which the interviewer had asked Toscanini what he thought about people calling him the world's greatest conductor, and Toscanini had said: 'It isn't that I am the world's greatest conductor; it is that I am the only good one.' Well, listening to the hopeless performance, without dynamics, nuance, phrasing, in which the players plodded along conscientiously enough, but leaving ME, ME with all the work of putting in the coloring, the light and shade and some delights of feeling, I thought: 'What could be truer, since Koussevitzky has to fumble in this way?'" And her last sentence is what I think Toscanini meant by his statement (if he actually made it): that he was the only conductor who did not commit the acts of what to him was sheer incompetence that he heard in the performances he listened to.

The Aug. 5 broadcast was the first in which A. B. C. extended the hour fifteen minutes in order to permit the Ninth Symphony to be heard in its entirety (previous broadcasts of the Boston Symphony's performances of this work had begun with the second movement). But Station WLAW, in Lawrence, Mass., from which I had to get it, cut it off in the middle of the finale for the program of popular music regularly scheduled at 9:30. Here are a few programs:

Today—A.M.: Schubert's Duo in A major, played by Hinda Barnett, violinist, and Mario Janaro, pianist, WJZ, 8:30; works of Bach and Loeillet, played by Biggs and assisting artists, C. B. S., 9:15; excerpts from Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," WNYC, 10 P.M.; Beethoven's Piano Sonata Opus 111, Bloch's Violin Sonata, WQXR, 1; Schubert's String quintet Opus 163, WQXR, 3.

Monday—P.M.: Music of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Delius, Berlioz (Beecham), WQXR, 7:30.

Wednesday—P.M.: Bach's B minor Mass, WNYC, 8:30; a Purcell Fantasia, Vaughan Williams's "On Wenlock Edge," played by Herrmann with the C. B. S. Symphony and William Hess, tenor, C. B. S., 11:30.

Friday—P.M.: Works of Schubert, WNYC, 8 to 10:30.

Saturday—P.M.: Prokofieff's Quartet No. 2, WQXR, 8:30; Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, WQXR, 8.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
7/17/47

'Idomeneo' To Have Premiere At Tanglewood

Mozart's opera "Idomeneo" will be performed for the first time in America by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, of which Serge Koussevitzky is the director. The production is announced as the major activity of the Opera Department, and will be directed and conducted by Boris Goldovsky; Richard Rychtarik will design the sets. The orchestra and singers, as in the production of "Peter Grimes" last season, will consist of pupils of the Berkshire Music Center.

There will be two performances in the Theatre-Concert Hall during the last week of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on Monday and Wednesday evenings, August 4 and 6. Admission will be by invitation to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mozart wrote his "Idomeneo, King of Crete" in 1780, in his twenty-fourth year. It is generally considered one of his greatest works, but owing to its length and the absence of printed parts, it has only occasionally been performed in Europe. Since no parts exist in America, a full set is being copied for the Tanglewood production. Boris Goldovsky has edited the score, preserving all the important scenes. The opera will be sung in the original Italian language.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
AUG 17 1947

Critic's Notebook:

Tanglewood Festival Plans

By Francis D. Perkins

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Another festival series will be presented by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood next July and August. This will be the eleventh festival by the official count, which omits the series given by the center's student orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in 1942, the Mozart series of 1944 and the Bach-Mozart series of 1945. The Berkshire Music Center will hold its sixth session during the same period.

In all probability, the production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" by the center's opera department under Boris Goldovsky's direction at Tanglewood was the first of this notable opera seria in the United States. The most experienced singer in a mainly student cast was Joseph Laderoute, the tenor who had shared the title role in last summer's Tanglewood production of Britten's "Peter Grimes," and his singing, in tone quality, production and style, was the best in Monday's performance. He sang the florid phrases of his principal aria with notable fluency and continuity of line.

Ann Bollinger, as Idamante, produced a likable voice with occasional unevenness; Nancy Trickey, as Ilia, displayed a voice of very appealing quality, although occasional spreading could be noticed in the uppermost tones. Paula Lenchner portrayed the role of Elettra with considerable emotional effectiveness, if also with a tendency to force her higher notes. Some of her music, in its style and expressive color, anticipated that of the Queen of the Night in "The Magic Flute," written eleven years later. Frank Guarrera sang Arbace acceptably.

AUSTIN, TEXAS
AMERICAN-STATESMAN
AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Head Weds First Wife's Niece

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 16—(INS)—Dr. Serge Koussivitzky, 73-year-old ~~conductor of the~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra, was revealed Saturday to have married Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, niece of his first wife, Friday in secret ceremony.

HAYS, KAN.
NEWS
AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor, 73, Weds Secretary, 46

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—~~Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor~~ of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER
AUG 17 1947

Boston Band Leader Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73. conductor of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
7/17/47

Programs Listed For Music Center

In the third week of the Berkshire Music Center, eight concerts will be given at Tanglewood, including the opening program of the Berkshire Festival on Sunday afternoon, July 13.

Sunday morning the chamber music group gave a concert. In the afternoon, with Luboshutz and Nemenoff, duo-pianists, as guest artists in two concertos, Serge Koussevitzky conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Bach program, in the theatre-concert hall, and a second performance was given Tuesday evening. Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, in the theatre-concert hall, there was a program by the orchestra and chorus of department 5.

On Wednesday evening at 8:15 the Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble, composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played the last of a weekly series of three chamber music concerts presented to the center by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The program included the Sinfonia Concertante Quartet by Mozart; the first performance of the Fantasy Quintet dedicated by Kornsand to Mrs. Coolidge; La Cheminee du Roi Rene by Milhaud; Rapsodie for Piano, Flute, Oboe and Clarinet by Honegger; and Sextet, Op. 39 by Hill.

The chorus of department 5 will sing Thursday afternoon at 4:30 and at 8:15 opera scenes will be performed. On Friday evening the school orchestra, led by students of conducting and by members of the faculty will give its third weekly concert in the Festival shed.

Seats are available for the extra concert on Tuesday, Aug. 5, when Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's 8th and

---

SEATTLE, WASH.
POST INTELLIGENCER
AUG 17 1947

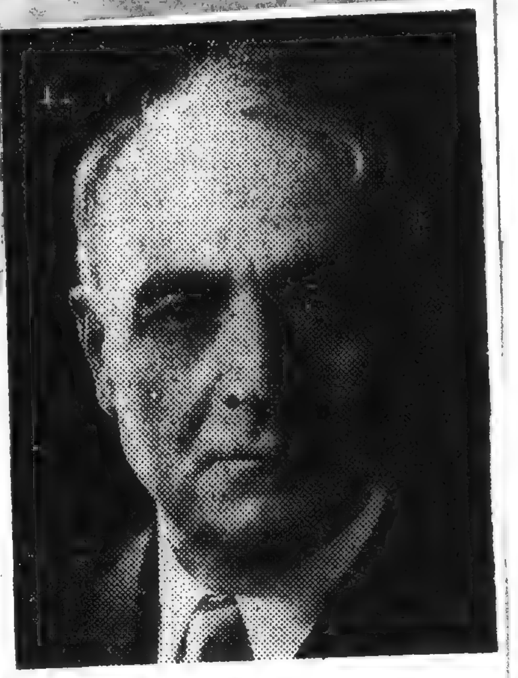
S. ~~Koussevitzky~~ Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
AUG 16 1947



Takes Bride

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who married his secretary yesterday.

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today disclosed he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation in Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

Koussevitzky said he planned to visit several countries to seek compositions written during the war years, but still not published, for possible presentation when he returns to Boston the first week of October for the opening of the Boston symphony season.

"I have the names of some composers," he said, "but I don't know what has happened to them. There is one French composer, Messian, whom I asked to write a composition. It will be a symphony in 10 movements which will be ready either at the end of this coming season or in October, 1948. Mr. Messian said he needed two years to write this composition."

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
AUG 17 1947

Q. How many musicians compose the Boston Symphony Orchestra? R. H.

A. In the ~~season of 1946~~ there were 103 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 17 1947

WFMR ITEMS

Clayton to Sing Old Folk Song

WFMR Schedules 'Barbary Allen'

In his search for little-known folk songs, Paul Clayton, star of WFMR's "Songs of Our Country," has come upon an American version of one of the better-known English folk songs, "Barbara Allan." This version is entitled "Barbary Allen." He will sing it tomorrow night on his program at 6:45.

Tonight at 7 the outstanding exponent of the blues, Ethel Waters, will be heard with the Chittison Trio over WFMR. Among other songs she will sing a song Helen Morgan made famous, "Can't Help Lovin' That Man." Next Saturday, screen actor, Sonny Tufts will star in the radio play, "Roses Are Red."

At 7:15 that Saturday WFMR will have as its guest, Meyer Davis and his famous society orchestra.

Following are the Designed for Listening programs which are scheduled at 8 each night.

Today—"Quartet No. 3 in E Flat Major," Antonin Dvorak, the Busch Quartet; "Ballet Suite: Gayne," Aram Khachaturian, Efrem Kurtz conduts the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York.

Tomorrow — "Symphonie Fantastique," Hector Berlioz, the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Tuesday—"Symphony No. 13 in G Major," Haydn, Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra; "Concerto No. 4 in G Major," Ludwig von Beethoven, Walter Giesking and the Saxon State Orchestra conducted by Karl Bohm.

Wednesday—"Two Nocturnes for Orchestra," Debussy, Eugene Ormandy leads the Philadelphia Orchestra; "Symphony No. 5," Serge Prokofieff, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thursday—Organ Ricital by B. Frank Michelsen from Grace Episcopal Church: "Grand Chorus," Alexandre Guilmant: "Elevation in A Flat," Alexandre Guilmant; "Andante Religioso," Edmond Lemaigre; Chorale: "Hark! A Voice Saith, All Are Mortal," Bach; Hymn, "My Faith Looks Up To Thee," Mason, Soloist, Barbara Bedford; "Cantabile," (from "Samson and Dalila"), Saint Saens; "Fugue and Postlude in E Flat," Rinck.

Friday—"Double Concerto in A Minor," Johannes Brahms, Jascha Heifetz and Emanuel Feuerman with the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy; "Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini," Sergei Rachmaninoff, Sergei Rachmaninoff, with the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Leopold Stowkowski.

Saturday—"Manfred Symphony," Tchaikovsky, Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, Fabien Sevitzky conducting.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP). —Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last eighteen years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary, 46

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-three, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, forty-six, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky revealed the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT
AUG 17 1947

BOSTON SMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETARY

New York.—(AP)—~~Serge Kous-~~sevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass, by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 16 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WED TO HIS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 16 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today disclosed that he was married Friday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Dr. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip in Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
AUG 17 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WEDS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Marries Secretary

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
AUG 16 1947

CONDUCTOR WED

New York, Aug. 16. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky and his bride left on the Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was perromed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

New York, Aug. 16 (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, revealed today as he sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he was married yesterday at his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the past 18 years. She sailed with him today.

The conductor said the wedding was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at his estate. The bride is the niece of Koussevitzky's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky said he planned a trip through several European countries to seek compositions written during the war years.

Koussevitzky's first marriage took place in Russia in 1905 when he was a struggling young conductor. His wife, Natalya Konstantinova Ouchkoff, was the daughter of a wealthy manufacturer and helped to finance her husband's early concert tours.

CHICO, CALIF.
RECORD

NEW YORK — (INS) — Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, 73, world-famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed yesterday his marriage to his secretary of 18 years, Miss Olga Nauoof, 46, niece of his deceased first wife.

The announcement of the surprise wedding was made simultaneously by Koussevitsky and the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, who officiated at the ceremony Friday at the Lenox Mass., summer home of the orchestra leader.

Koussevitsky made his announcement as he boarded the liner Queen Mary in New York for a combination honeymoon and business trip through Europe.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(P)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Secretly Wed at 73 To Secretary, He Reveals on Ship

A photographer's routine question yesterday scored an unexpected scoop. It brought the news that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married on Friday to Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for the past 18 years and niece of his late wife.

The disclosure of the marriage of the conductor, who was 73 years old on July 26, and his 46-year old bride came when they boarded the Queen Elizabeth at Pier 90. Maurice Maurel, Acme photographer, asked the conductor to pose for the usual shipboard picture. Then, taking it for granted that the woman with the conductor was his wife, Mr. Maurel asked, "Is your wife accompanying you on your trip?"

The conductor hesitated a moment, then replied, "Yes."

"Come on over here and let's have a shot," said Mr. Maurel.

In telling the story later, Mr. Maurel said he became a bit bewildered at this point, for one of the publicity men of the Cunard White Star line came up to him and whispered that Dr. Koussevitzky was not supposed to be married.

Nothing daunted, Mr. Maurel took the picture, then walked over to the conductor and said: "Look. I need this information for a caption. Is this woman your wife, or your sister, or a friend? Is it Mrs. or Miss?"

At this point the woman broke in and replied, "Miss." Mr. Maurel asked Dr. Koussevitzky to "give it to him straight." Whereupon the conductor took the photographer aside and confessed: "We were married yesterday but it's a secret. Don't tell the papers until the ship sails."

Just a short time before the ship sailed Mr. Maurel got in touch with a reporter, who raced to Dr. Koussevitzky's cabin, filled with friends of the conductor who had come to see him off. None of them knew of the marriage. When the reporter told Dr. Koussevitzky what information he would like the conductor rushed him into the corridor.

There, affably and confidentially, Dr. Koussevitzky explained that his friends knew nothing of the marriage which had taken place at 2 P. M. at Seranak, his estate at Lenox, Mass. He said the trip to Europe was a honeymoon and vacation. He added that he planned to seek compositions written during the war years for possible presentation when he returns to Boston in the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season.

His first wife, Natalie, in whose honor he established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, died in 1942. He married her in Russia in 1905. According to his marriage license, his second wife was born in Iver, Russia, and he was born in Samara, Russia.

The wedding ceremony was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-On-the-Hill in Lenox, in the conductor's summer home overlooking Mahkeenac Lake.

During the double-ring ceremony the couple stood in front of a portrait of Koussevitzky playing a double bass. In front of the portrait stood an open Bible. The bride wore an afternoon dress of ivory colored crepe. There were only ten persons present. Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bergin were the two witnesses of record. Mr. Bergin is concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Others present included Mrs. Owen and several members of the household. After the reception the newly-married couple left by car for New York.

Everyone connected with the event was pledged to secrecy. The wedding was denied at Seranak up to noon yesterday. Mr. Owen, who has been a friend of the conductor for a number of years, confirmed the marriage when convinced the news had been disclosed in New York.

Film Players Aboard

Among the other 2,123 passengers bound for Southampton were British motion picture players including Rex Harrison and Mrs. Harrison, whose professional name is Lili Palmer; John Mills and his playwright wife, known as Mary Hayley Bell, and David Farrar. They recently completed movies in Hollywood.

Mr. Harrison said his trip had nothing to do with the recently announced 75 per cent tax on American film receipts in Great Britain. He said he was on his way to make a picture at the British Film Center, Denham. He asserted England had a six to eight-month supply of American films, and thought American film producers and the British Government probably could work out some agreement before the expiration of that period.

Mr. Farrar, whose two films "Black Narcissus" and "Frieda" opened on Broadway last week, said he would be back in this country to make further pictures next year. He also hoped a "satisfactory solution" would be found to the American-British film tax dispute.

Mr. Mills said he was on his way to England to complete a film for the J. Arthur Rank organization based on the story of Capt. Robert Fulton Scott, Antarctic explorer. He said he expected to return here in February to do a movie.

Other passengers included the Right Rev. James Pinette de Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Long Island Diocese, and Mrs. de Wolfe; Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, en route to join other members of the council's Action Committee for the biennial meeting opening next Sunday in Zurich; Dr. Juan Oropesa, Venezuelan ambassador to Great Britain, who said he had not been in Europe since before the war, and Frederick E. Wakeman, author of "The Hucksters," who with Mrs. Wakeman is taking a four-month vacation trip.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, were married Friday, he disclosed.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary at 73

Serge Koussevitzky and his bride, the former Olga Naumoff, pictured at a dinner recently. A. P. Photo.

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today that he was married yesterday in his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years and the niece of his late wife.

Mr. Koussevitzky made the announcement as he boarded the Cunard-White Star liner Queen Elizabeth with his bride.

The conductor said the wedding was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose late wife died in 1942, said he planned a trip through several European countries to seek compositions written during the war years.

Several British theatrical people sailed for England. They included Rex Harrison and his wife, Lili Palmer; David Farrar, John Mills and his playwright wife, Mary Hayley Bell.

Mr. Harrison said his return to Britain had nothing to do with the recently announced 75 per cent tax on American films in Great Britain.

Another passenger was the Rt. Rev. James Pinette De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, with Mrs. De Wolfe. Bishop De Wolfe said he would preach in Canterbury Cathedral Aug. 24.

Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, left aboard the vessel to join other members of the council's action committee in Zurich, Switzerland, for a meting Aug. 24.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD
AUG 18 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 18 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL
AUG 18 1947

Boston Orchestra Leader, 73, Marries His Secretary, 46

New York, Aug. 17.—A photographer's routine question yesterday scored an unexpected scoop. It brought the news that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married on Friday to Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for the past 18 years and niece of his late wife.

The disclosure of the marriage of the conductor, who was 73 years old on July 26, and his 46-year-old bride came when they boarded the Queen Elizabeth at Pier 90. Maurice Maurel, Acme photographer, asked the conductor to pose for the usual shipboard picture. Then, taking it for granted that the woman with the conductor was his wife, Mr. Maurel asked, "Is your wife accompanying you on your trip?"

The conductor hesitated a moment, then replied, "Yes."

"Come on over here and let's have a shot," said Mr. Maurel.

In telling the story later, Mr. Maurel said he became a bit bewildered at this point, for one of the publicity men of the Cunard White Star Line came up to him and whispered that Mr. Koussevitsky was not supposed to be married.

Nothing daunted, Mr. Maurel took the picture; then walked over to the conductor and said: "Look. I need this information for a caption. Is this woman your wife, or your sister, or a friend? It is Mrs. or Miss?"

At this point the woman broke in and replied, "Miss." Mr. Maurel asked Mr. Koussevitsky to "give it to him straight." Whereupon the conductor took the photographer aside and confessed: "We were married yesterday, but it's a secret. Don't tell the papers until the ship sails."

[248]

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
AUG 18

Orchestra Conductor Weds

New York, Aug. 18—(AP)—Serge Kouss[illegible] old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, has disclosed that he was married to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass. by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, Friday at 2 p. m.

DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS
AUG 17 1947

Conductor Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

The former Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Aide on Eve of Sailing

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, sailed for Europe on the Queen Elizabeth yesterday after announcing to newsmen that he was married Friday to his secretary, Miss O[illegible] Naumoff, 46. Miss Naumoff is [illegible] niece of his late wife. Mr. Koussevitzky is 73.

The wedding ceremony was performed at Saranac, the Koussevitzky estate at Lenox, Mass., with the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox, officiating.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that [illegible] planned to spend a vacation traveling through several European countries, and he hoped to fi[illegible] a number of compositions writt[illegible] during the war but as yet unpublished.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first wi[illegible] died in 1942. Miss Naumoff ha[illegible] been his secretary 18 years.

Also sailing on the Queen Elizabeth was the Rev. James P. D[illegible] Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, and his wife. H[illegible] said he would deliver a series [illegible] sermons on church unity at Canterbury Cathedral, St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, all i[illegible] London, and St. George's in Paris.

Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, also sailing on the Queen Elizabeth, expected to attend the biennial meeting of the Council's action committee in Zurich, Switzerland, Aug. 24.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
AUG 17 1947

2 Suites by Bach Recorded

SUITES NO. 2 and 3, by Johann Sebastian Bach, have been published in an album of five records by RCA Victor, employing the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky. Georges Laurent plays the solo flute.

While Koussevitzky's interpretation takes some liberty with the scores, the recording is excellent mechanically and the music such as to appeal to everyone, whether he is a Bach lover or no.

The Third Suite contains the familiar "Air for the G String," favorite concert piece.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
17 1947

Koussevitzky Secretly Wed at 73 To Secretary, He Reveals on Ship

A photographer's routine question yesterday scored an unexpected scoop. It brought the news that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married on Friday to Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for the past 18 years and niece of his late wife.

The disclosure of the marriage of the conductor, who was 73 years old on July 26, and his 46-year old bride came when they boarded the Queen Elizabeth at Pier 90. Maurice Maurel, Acme photographer, asked the conductor to pose for the usual shipboard picture. Then, taking it for granted that the woman with the conductor was his wife, Mr. Maurel asked, "Is your wife accompany ing you on your trip?"

The conductor hesitated a moment, then replied, "Yes."

"Come on over here and let's have a shot," said Mr. Maurel.

In telling the story later, Mr. Maurel said he became a bit bewildered at this point, for one of the publicity men of the Cunard White Star line came up to him and whispered that Dr. Koussevitzky was not supposed to be married.

Nothing daunted, Mr. Maurel took the picture, then walked over to the conductor and said: "Look. I need this information for a caption. Is this woman your wife, or your sister, or a friend? Is it Mrs. or Miss?"

At this point the woman broke in and replied, "Miss." Mr. Maurel asked Dr. Koussevitzky to "give it to him straight." Whereupon the conductor took the photographer aside and confessed: "We were married yesterday but it's a secret. Don't tell the papers until the ship sails."

Just a short time before the ship sailed Mr. Maurel got in touch with a reporter, who raced to Dr. Koussevitzky's cabin, filled with friends of the conductor who had come to see him off. None of them knew of the marriage. When the reporter told Dr. Koussevitzky what information he would like the conductor rushed him into the corridor.

There, affably and confidentially, Dr. Koussevitzky explained that his friends knew nothing of the marriage which had taken place at 2 P. M. at Seranak, his estate at Lenox, Mass. He said the trip to Europe was a honeymoon and vacation. He added that he planned to seek compositions written during the war years for possible presentation when he returns to Boston in the first week of October for the opening of the Boston Symphony season.

His first wife, Natalie, in whose honor he established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, died in 1942. He married her in Russia in 1905. According to his marriage license, his second wife was born in Iver, Russia, and he was born in Samara, Russia.

The wedding ceremony was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-On-the-Hill in Lenox, in the conductor's summer home overlooking Mahkeenac Lake.

During the double-ring ceremony the couple stood in front of a portrait of Koussevitzky playing a double bass. In front of the portrait stood an open Bible. The bride wore an afternoon dress of ivory colored crepe. There were only ten persons present. Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bergin were the two witnesses of record. Mr. Bergin is concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Others present included Mrs. Owen and several members of the household. After the reception the newly-married couple left by car for New York.

Everyone connected with the event was pledged to secrecy. The wedding was denied at Seranak up to noon yesterday. Mr. Owen, who has been a friend of the conductor for a number of years, confirmed the marriage when convinced the news had been disclosed in New York.

Film Players Aboard

Among the other 2,123 passengers bound for Southampton were British motion picture players including Rex Harrison and Mrs. Harrison, whose professional name is Lili Palmer; John Mills and his playwright wife, known as Mary Hayley Bell, and David Farrar. They recently completed movies in Hollywood.

Mr. Harrison said his trip had nothing to do with the recently announced 75 per cent tax on American film receipts in Great Britain. He said he was on his way to make a picture at the British Film Center, Denham. He asserted England had a six to eight-month supply of American films, and thought American film producers and the British Government probably could work out some agreement before the expiration of that period.

Mr. Farrar, whose two films "Black Narcissus" and "Frieda" opened on Broadway last week, said he would be back in this country to make further pictures next year. He also hoped a "satisfactory solution" would be found to the American-British film tax dispute.

Mr. Mills said he was on his way to England to complete a film for the J. Arthur Rank organization based on the story of Capt. Robert Fulton Scott, Antarctic explorer. He said he expected to return here in February to do a movie.

Other passengers included the Right Rev. James Pinette de Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Long Island Diocese, and Mrs. de Wolfe; Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, en route to join other members of the council's Action Committee for the biennial meeting opening next Sunday in Zurich; Dr. Juan Oropesa, Venezuelan ambassador to Great Britain, who said he had not been in Europe since before the war, and Frederick E. Wakeman, author of "The Hucksters," who with Mrs. Wakeman is taking a four-month vacation trip.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, were married Friday, he disclosed.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary at 73

Serge Koussevitzky and his bride, the former Olga Naumoff, pictured at a dinner recently. A. P. Photo.

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today that he was married yesterday in his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years and the niece of his late wife.

Mr. Koussevitzky made the announcement as he boarded the Cunard-White Star liner Queen Elizabeth with his bride.

The conductor said the wedding was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose late wife died in 1942, said he planned a trip through several European countries to seek compositions written during the war years.

Several British theatrical people sailed for England. They included Rex Harrinon and his wife, Lili Palmer; David Farrar, John Mills and his playwright wife, Mary Hayley Bell.

Mr. Harrison said his return to Britain had nothing to do with the recently announced 75 per cent tax on American films in Great Britain.

Another passenger was the Rt. Rev. James Pinette De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, with Mrs. De Wolfe. Bishop De Wolfe said he would preach in Canterbury Cathedral Aug. 24.

Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council, left aboard the vessel to join other members of the council's action committee in Zurich, Switzerland, for a meting Aug. 24.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD
AUG 18 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 18 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Aide on Eve of Sailing

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, sailed for Europe on the Queen Elizabeth yesterday after announcing to newsmen that he was married Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46. Miss Naumoff is a niece of his late wife. Mr. Koussevitzky is 73.

The wedding ceremony was performed at Saranac, the Koussevitzky estate at Lenox, Mass., with the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox, officiating.

Mr. Koussevitzky said that he planned to spend a vacation traveling through several European countries, and he hoped to find a number of compositions written during the war but as yet unpublished.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first wife died in 1942. Miss Naumoff had been his secretary 18 years.

Also sailing on the Queen Elizabeth was the Rev. James P. De Wolfe, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, and his wife. He said he would deliver a series of sermons on church unity at Canterbury Cathedral, St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, all in London, and St. George's in Paris.

Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, chairman of the Zionist Emergency Council also sailing on the Queen Elizabeth expected to attend the biennial meeting of the Council's action committee in Zurich, Switzerland, Aug. 24.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
AUG 18

Orchestra Conductor Weds

New York, Aug. 18—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, has disclosed that he was married to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass. by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, Friday at 2 p. n.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL
AUG 18 1947

Boston Orchestra Leader, 73, Marries His Secretary, 46

New York, Aug. 17.—A photographer's routine question yesterday scored an unexpected scoop. It brought the news that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married on Friday to Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for the past 18 years and niece of his late wife.

The disclosure of the marriage of the conductor, who was 73 years old on July 26, and his 46-year-old bride came when they boarded the Queen Elizabeth at Pier 90. Maurice Maurel, Acme photographer, asked the conductor to pose for the usual shipboard picture. Then, taking it for granted that the woman with the conductor was his wife, Mr. Maurel asked, "Is your wife accompanying you on your trip?"

The conductor hesitated a moment, then replied, "Yes."

"Come on over here and let's have a shot," said Mr. Maurel.

In telling the story later, Mr. Maurel said he became a bit bewildered at this point, for one of the publicity men of the Cunard White Star Line came up to him and whispered that Mr. Koussevitsky was not supposed to be married.

Nothing daunted, Mr. Maurel took the picture; then walked over to the conductor and said: "Look. I need this information for a caption. Is this woman your wife, or your sister, or a friend? It is Mrs. or Miss?"

At this point the woman broke in and replied, "Miss." Mr. Maurel asked Mr. Koussevitsky to "give it to him straight." Whereupon the conductor took the photographer aside and confessed: "We were married yesterday, but it's a secret. Don't tell the papers until the ship sails."

[248]

DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS
AUG 17 1947

Conductor Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

The former Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
AUG 17 1947

uites Bach corded

'ES NO. 2 and 3, by Jo- ebastian Bach, have been ed in an album of five by RCA Victor, employ- e Boston Symphony Or- a under Koussevitzky. es Laurent plays the solo lle Koussevitzky's inter- ation takes some liberty with scores, the recording nt mechanically and the ic such as to appeal to every- whether he is a Bach lover

The Third Suite contains the amiliar "Air for the G String," favorite concert piece.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Leader Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP.)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conduc of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

This Clipping From
CHICKASHA, OKLA.
EXPRESS

AUG 17 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WEDS HIS SECRETARY

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naunoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naunoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER

AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky Wed To His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16. (AP) —Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to see them off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
TERRE HAUTE, IND.
TRIBUNE

AUG 17 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR MARRIES

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN

AUG 18 1947

Conductor Marries

NEW YORK, Aug., 17 (AP)—Serg Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conduc tor of the Boston Symphony orch estra, disclosed today that he mar ried his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46 yesterday. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor Weds His Secretary

New York—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth

---

This Clipping From DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Conductor, 73, Sails With Bride, 46

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary, Olga Naumoof. They were married yesterday.

SILVER CREEK, N. Y.
NEWS
8/14/47

Chautauqua Concert

—†—

The first concert performance anywhere of the Bohemian Suite for Orchestra by Suk-Eiger will be performed by the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Franco Autori at Chautauqua Institution, Chautauqua, New York on Saturday evening, August 16.

The Bohemian Suite is to be performed extensively during the winter by various orchestras, including the Boston Symphony.

Mariam Solovieff, violinist, will appear as soloist in the Concerto in A Major for Violin and Orchestra by Mozart. Stravinsky's Firebird Suite completes the program.

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

AUG 17 1947

Bach: Suites Nos. 2, in B Minor and 3, in D: Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; Georges Laurent, flutist; Five 12" RCA-Victor records DM-1123.

Victor's output of Bach's compositions continues to fascinate the connoissuers. For their latest triumph, the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky's baton brings us a peerless performance of the "father of music's" two and three Suites. Recorded at the Boston Symphony's summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., these recordings are remarkable in their high-fidelity and brilliant technical qualities. The interpretive and authentic artistic ability of Koussevitzky is clearly demonstrated here, as he presents the Suites in a manner seldom heard today, particularly in Bach works. The conventional style is evident, yet never becomes "dry" at any time. Georges Laurent, flutist, contributes superb work in the Second suite. His playing reveals expression and excellent musicianship. A magnificent addition to your Bach library.

* * *

This Clipping From RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

AUG 17 1947

Serge Koussevitsky Weds His Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
NEW ALBANY, IND.
TRIBUNE

AUG 18 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY ARRIES SECRETARY

New York, Aug. 18 (AP)—Serge oussevitzky, 73-year-old conduc or of the Boston Symphony Or estra, disclosed Saturday that e was married Friday to his sec etary of the past 18 years, Miss lgo Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen at he marriage as he and his bride oarded the Liner Queen Elizabeth or a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the con uctor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky Weds—

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942. Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

AUG 18 1947

ROCKPORT

Miss LaPlante Will Speak

Miss Rita La Plante will speak informally on Serge Koussevitzky and the Bershire Musical Centers tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 o'clock in the church women's club house at 6 Pier avenue in connection with brief reviews of three recent books dealing with this famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his contribution to American music.

These three books, "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, "Serge Koussevitzky" by Hugo Leichtentritt and "The Tale Of Tanglewood" by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, will be outlined by the chairman of the book review committee, Miss Jennie Frost, after which Miss La Plante, who has studied at Tanglewood and knows Mr. Koussevitzky, will speak from her personal experiences. The purpose of this department of the Rockport Council of Church Women is to present current publications in fiction, biography and history which encourage and strengthen. Mr. Koussevitzky demands recognition, apart from his musical genius for four outstanding characteristics; his passionate, uncompromising devotion to his art under all conditions; his self-mastery in overcoming as a director his lack of adequate early musical education; his generous help to young artists and his work in developing at Tanglewood not only great summer Symphonic festivals but a permanent all the year round school for the training of the new generation of American artists.

The discussion will be led by Miss Elizabeth Rankin and Miss Mary Condon. The session is open to the public.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
TRIBUNE

AUG 18 1947

NOTED CONDUCTOR WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 18 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the Liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From BUTTE, MONT.
MONTANA STANDARD

AUG 18 194

'These Days'

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. symphony.

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries—	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the United States life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. In his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From WACO, TEXAS
NEWS TRIBUNE

AUG 18 1947

Conductor, 73, Weds

NEW YORK, Aug. 17 — UP — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary, Olga Naumoof.

Koussevitzky revealed that the wedding was performed yesterday at his estate in Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Lenox Congregational Church.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

AUG 18 1947

FRED DOUGLAS CLUB No. 5
Scovill Ave.

Koussevitzky Married

NEW YORK, Aug. 18—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed Saturday as he sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he had married Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the last 18 years.

This Clipping From
NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

AUG 18 1947

Record Rendezvous

By OWEN CALLIN
International News Service
Staff Correspondent

HOLLYWOOD, Aug. 18 (INS) — The first post-war recording of a complete opera has been released by Columbia and the story of its accomplishment is quite a tale. The opera is Verdi's popular "La Traviata," issued in two volumes of 15 twelve-inch disks.

The work was recorded in Rome in 1945 with the Rome Opera Chorus and Orchestra and soloists Adriana Guerrini, soprano; Luigi Infantino, tenor, and Paolo Silveri, baritone.

No recording gear was available in Italy so it was necessary to transport complete recording apparatus and hundreds of wax disks from England. Long discussions with authorities were carried on before the valuable machinery was allowed in the country. Then, waxes made at each recording session were flown from Rome to England where they were processed that same night.

The result is a fairly good performance of the opera and although the Italian singers seem a bit below our American-dictated par, one would never know, the difficulties that attended the making of the album.

Week's Top Hits

TODAY'S HIT — "Just Plain Love"
SONG TO WATCH — "Don't Tell Me"
BEST FOR DANCING — "Stinson Album 201" (Phil Harris)
TOP COUNTRY — "Dangerous Ground"
TOP NOVELTY — "The Lady from Twenty-Nine Palms" WEEK'S BLUEST — "It's a Good Little Deal" (Jesse Price-Capitol)
WEEK'S HOTTEST — "Dizzy Fingers" and "Tattletale" (Benny Goodman-Capitol)
CLASSIC OF THE WEEK — J. S. Bach's "Brandenburg Concertos 2 and 5" and "Suites 2 and 3"

The fact that "Just Plain Love" has reached hit status is a break for Johnny Desmond, whose recording of it for Victor was one of the first. Since Desmond has a nice style, his disk should sell even without his invariable sales talk. Claude Thornhill also has waxed the tune for Columbia. Ditto the Pied Pipers for Capitol.

The Phil Harris album by Stinson consists of four obvious oldies by Harris but they're fine for dancing and Harris fans will want them. Included are "Just A-Whistlin'," "Careless," "What's the Matter with Dixie" and "Rose Room."

The novelty tune of the week is definitely bound for a splash; best recording so far is Freddy Martin's which has the added attraction of being backed by a swell version of "Cumana" with Barclay Allen at the keyboard. Then there's the Andrews Sisters disk for Decca and Tony Pastor's for Columbia . . . Jimmy Lawson for Columbia and Roy Rogers for Victor are responsible for the top country . . .

Campaign for Good Music

Victor is continuing its campaign to furnish good music by Bach with two more albums using Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra for the medium. Since the Boston is one of the finest musical organizations in the nation, the campaign is very worthy. Newest works include two more of the Brandenburg Concertos (2 and 5) in Album 1118 and Suites 2 and 3 in Album 1123.

Talk about revivals — Phil Brito's latest disk for Musicraft pairs a couple of tunes popular when your scribe rushed into the orchestra business with a $25 banjo and an adolescent tenor. The songs: 'If I Could Be With You" and "Nevertheless I'm in Love With You." Erskine Butterfield has a cute "Cecilia" for Musicraft.

Once in a while, an outstanding disk comes along which must be talked about. This time it's, "On an Evening in Paris" and "Tango of Roses" by the Three Suns. . .what's the idea of dropping Andy Russell's Latin choruses, epecially in a number like "On the Old Spanish Trail?"

Newest [illegible] disk is Gaylord Carter's "Song of the Volga Boatman" and "Meadowland" for Black & White.

This Clipping From
MANSFIELD, OHIO
NEWS JOURNAL

AUG 16 1947

Symphony Leader Weds Secretary

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today he was married to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR

AUG 18 1947

PELHAM

Mr. and Mrs. Paul N. Rothe of 29 Franklin Place have as their houseguest Miss Monna Van Koy of Delray, Fla. Miss Van Koy, who has been attending the Berkshire Musical Festival, will remain for a week.

Superintendent of Schools W. W. Fairclough is spending his vacation with Mrs. Fairclough at their Summer home in Essex, Conn.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 18 1947

Frank Gigliotti Wins Boston University Degree

Frank N. Gigliotti, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Gigliotti of 7 Morgan avenue, was among the 618 students who received degrees from Boston university at commencement exercises held Saturday afternoon in Boston's Symphony hall. He received the degree of bachelor of science in business administration after completing the summer course at the university's college of business administration.

Mr. and Mrs. Gigliotti and their two daughters, Lola and Catherine, attended the graduation program. Mr. Gigliotti served in the navy during the war.

DOVER, OHIO
DAILY REPORTER

AUG 18 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Secretary

NEW YORK — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, revealed as he sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe, that he was married at his Lenox, Mass., home to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary for the past 18 years. She sailed with him.

MODESTO, CALIF.
BEE

AUG 18 1947

CONDUCTOR WEDS

NEW YORK, Aug. 18.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73 year old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
AUG 18 1947

These Days

The Wisdom Of Experience

By George E. Sokolsky

LAST Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the busines of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

THE magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

DURING the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the exerience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, [illegible] Features Syndicate, Inc.)

The new "Battle of Britain" is being fought with money but that doesn't matter, we can still furnish the ammunition.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

AUG 18 1947

Maurice Belsky Receives Degree From Boston U.

Maurice Belsky, son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Belsky of 22 Westfield, Rd., this city, was graduated with a degree of bachelor of laws from the Boston university school of law at the 33rd annual summer commencement exercises held Saturday in Boston Symphony hall.

A Holyoke high school graduate, Belsky attended American International college before entering Boston University. A veteran of two years service in the European theatre as radio operator on a B-24 he is holder of the Air Medal with four Oak Leaf clusters.

This summer's graduating class at Boston university was the largest in the school's history, numbering 618 students. Principal speaker, Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, university president, delivered an address on "Wars Begin In the Minds of Men." The graduate's pledge was administered to students by Warren S. Freeman, executive alumni secretary.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEXAS
HERALD-POST

AUG 18 1947

MARRIES SECRETARY

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Aug. 18. — Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 18 1947

Boston's Maestro Weds.

New York, Aug. 18 (UP). — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary, Olga Naumoff.

Koussevitzky revealed that the wedding was performed Sunday at his estate in Lenox, Mass. The conductor's first wife, Natalya Konstantinova Ouchkoff, whom he married in Russia in 1905, died in 1942. His bride was a niece of his late wife.

This Clipping From DENVER, COLO.
POST

AUG 20 1947

Koussevitzky Sails to London on Honeymoon

NEW YORK, Aug. 20.—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed on the liner Queen Elizabeth for England on a honeymoon with his 46-year-old former secretary, Olga Naumoof.

Koussevitzky revealed that the wedding was performed at his estate in Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Lenox Congregational church.

The conductor's first wife, Natalya Konstantinova Ouchkoff, whom he married in Russia in 1905, died in 1942. His new bride was a niece of his late wife.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
UNION

AUG 17 1947

Symphony Head Weds Niece of Late Wife

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitizky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed yesterday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

Koussevitsky, 73, Marries His Secretary, 46, Secretly

Special From The New York Times to The Courier-Journal.

New York, N. Y., Aug. 16.—A photographer's routine question today scored an unexpected scoop. The news that Serge ~~Koussevitsky~~, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married Friday to Miss Olga Naumoff, his secretary for the past 18 years and niece of his late wife, broke as the result of a photographer's query.

The discovery of the marriage of the conductor, who was 73 on July 26, and his 46-year old bride, developed when they boarded the Queen Elizabeth. Maurice Maurel, Acme photographer, asked the conductor to pose for the usual shipboard picture.

Then, taking it for granted that the woman with the conductor was his wife, Maurel asked, "Is your wife accompanying you on your trip?"

'Yes,' He Says, Finally.

The conductor hesitated a moment, then replied, "Yes."

"Come on over here and let's have a shot," said Maurel.

In telling the story later, Maurel said he became a bit bewildered for at this point one of the publicity men for the Cunard White Star Line whispered to him that Koussevitsky was not married.

Nothing daunted, after he took the picture Maurel went up to the conductor and said, "Look. I need this information for a caption. Is this woman your wife, or your sister, or a friend? Is it Mrs. or Miss?"

At this point the woman broke in and replied, "Miss," according to Maurel. Realizing that "something was funny," Maurel again asked Koussevitsky to "give it to him straight." Whereupon, the photographer related, the conductor took him aside and confessed, "We were married yesterday, but it's a secret. Don't tell the papers until the ship sails."

Friends Were Uninformed.

Koussevitsky then explained that none of his friends knew of the marriage which had taken place at Seranak, his estate at Lenox, Mass. He said that this trip to Europe was a honeymoon and vacation.

His first wife, Natalie, in whose honor he established the Koussevitsky Music Foundation, died in 1942. According to his marriage license, his second wife was born in Iver, Russia, and he was born in Samara, Russia.

The wedding ceremony Friday was performed by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, Congregational pastor.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
AUG 18 1947

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK, Aug. 17—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed Saturday that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The ceremony was performed at the conductor's estate, Saranac, at Lenox, Mass., by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill, in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

The couple were married in the drawing room before a fireplace, over which hangs a large portrait of the conductor with the bass viol which he played early in his musical career. Dr. Koussevitzky was dressed in a white linen suit and his wife wore a simple, cream-colored afternoon dress. After the ceremony, a buffet luncheon was served.

The conductor said that not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitsky and Secretary Wed, Take Trip to Europe

(Picture on Page Two)

(By International News Service)

New York, Aug. 16.—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, aged 73, world-famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, revealed today his marriage to his secretary of 18 years, Miss Olga Nauoof, aged 46, niece of his deceased first wife.

The announcement of the wedding, which came as a surprise to his friends and associates, was made simultaneously by Koussevitsky and the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, who officiated at the simple ceremony Friday at the Lenox, Mass., summer home of the orchestra leader.

Koussevitsky made his announcement as he boarded the liner Queen Mary in New York for a combination honeymoon and business trip through Europe.

The simple double ring ceremony was witnessed by four persons, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Burgin and Dr. and Mrs. Edward Forsley. Burgin is first violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A secretary to Koussevitsky revealed the doctor will search for compositions written during the war years in Europe. He will present these when he returns to the United States in October. The secretary also revealed that the new Mrs. Koussevitsky will continue to act as the conductor's secretary.

The first Mrs. Koussevitsky, daughter of a wealthy Russian family before the revolution, died in 1942. She and the conductor became American citizens in 1940.

Rensselaer, N.Y.
Review
8/8/47

RADIO HIGHLIGHTS

By LOIS LUDOWIC

MONDAY . . . .

Louise Massey and Her Westerners are back in the fold again, this time at 11:30 a.m. on WTRY. Another of the Masseys, Curt, has been doing pretty well for himself on his own. He and Louise have had pleasing voices for many air-years . . . . Interesting and unusual are the Hector Chevigny plays, called "Plays By Ear" because the writer is blind, heard with an excellent cast at 8 p.m. on WGY. "Cavalcade of America" returns next Monday . . . . . The sometimes too-gruesome for sleeping pleasure "Inner Sanctum" has a charming bit planned for 8:30 p.m. on WTRY—"Night of Death" . . . Catching on like wild fire is the magnificent "First Piano Quartet"—the program this week includes music of Tchaikowsky, Lecuona, Chopin, Liszt, Mendelssohn and Weber. This Monday night brightspot is at 10:30 p.m. on WGY . . . . .

TUESDAY . . . .

Hank and Gay sip a "Second Cup" at 11:30 a.m. on WTRY, with a chat about what's going on where . . . A three week "Light Opera Festival" replaces the Boston Symphony on WOKO at 8:30 p.m. with Joseph Stopak of the Pittsburgh Light Opera Company presiding. Polyna Stoska and Ernest McChesney star . . . .

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
AUG 18 1947

Yes, We Have Music

One does not have to be a music fan to glean inspiration from a wholesome talkly George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, at Lenox last week at a meeting ~~attended~~ by a number of Albany musicians.

Mr. Judd told why the future of American music lies with orchestras in cities the size of Albany. We have always thought their greatest influences was the capacity for good music they have taught our local instrumentalists and to our townspeople who increase their appreciation of good music in listening to it. Mr. Judd emphasized that here, in local orchestras, was the training school from which the great musicians of our country should emerge.

The Boston manager said the day was past when leading organizations depended on Europe for their featured performers. If that is true, we wish it were more so. The music pages of the metropolitan press are dominated by advertising of the "great European tenor" or "the sensational European pianist." America, and the metropolitan area particularly, have made a fetich of believing nothing great came into music except from Europe. We don't agree, of course, although the Met for years fostered the myth. Music may have roots in Europe but this energetic republic has transplanted many roots and created many virtues of its own. We do not think the chaos in Europe makes it a more fertile field for musicians. Rather it opens the door to an era in which America should honestly look more to its own for preeminence in all art. And be ashamed if it cannot produce it.

What Mr. Judd said about local orchestras weeding out the stuffed shirts from their boards and getting in workers merely repeated what he said about musicians—get the real workers in and the "names" out. The workers always are the builders.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
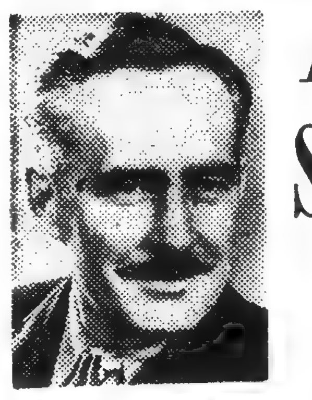
PRESS
AUG 18 1947



Radio by STANLEY ANDERSON

Readers Seeking Guest Column Spots Are Being Fair in Opinions

Press readers, writing for the Guest Column Contest, are being extremely fair in their opinions of radio. Most of them realize the programming problems being met by the industry. Likewise, just as many are pointing out that radio fails to take cognizance of glaring evils.

Dialers realize radio contradicts itself, as does every searching human being or institution. Let me outline an excellent example of a contraction in programming:

Not long ago WJW canceled a Boston Symphony concert. This was the last broadcast from the Berkshire Festival and the event was the playing of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony is among the world's best; the festival is famous; the Ninth Symphony has only a few competitors; Koussevitky is scarcely an apprentice in the business.

For this four-star event WJW substituted its coverage of the K. C.-Grotto baseball game, an event which has a definite public but which is by no means comparable in stature to the Beethoven-Koussevitzky combo.

The ball game gave Jimmy Dudley a chance to show his public how he calls balls and strikes. However, the complaints against the program shift were many. Protests in my mail were numerically greater than those I have received after suggesting we could sacrifice Upton Close to Brother Peron of Argentina.

Now WJW has done an about-face in its thinking. Rudolph Ringwall, who has been associate conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra for 21 years, will emcee a platter show of semi-classical music. Starting Sept. 4, this will be heard every Thursday between 7:30 and 8.

I have heard an audition recording of the program. It will please the many followers Dr. Ringwall has collected in his various local activities. The music will be enhanced by the conductor's slow, soft speech and his dry sense of humor. His musical knowledge and anecdotes will be invaluable.

All dialers will give praise for the manner in which the sponsor, Society for Savings, identifies itself on the program. No more commercial gab is used than what you hear on "Greatest Story Ever Told." All in all, the whole affair is an effectively dignified presentation.

Radio programming is done for the dialers—or should be done for them. If you have definite opinions on this, you can express them as a guest columnist in The Press during the period Sept. 1 through 15, during which six columns from readers will be used.

The submitted letter, whether in praise or in condemnation, should not exceed 350 words. Use only one side of the paper and include your name, age, address, nearest telephone number and occupation. Also a clear photograph of the contributor should accompany the column.

Letters postmarked after midnight Wednesday cannot be accepted. Address your column to Guest Column Contest, Radio Department, The Cleveland Press, Cleveland (14).

During the Sept. 1-15 period guest columns by local radio figures also will be presented. These will include WTAM's Bob Waldrop, WGAR's John F. Patt, WJMO's Howie Lund, W8XUB's Don Crockett and WJW's Walt Kaye.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
AUG 18 1947

NOW WE KNOW

To the Editor of The Courant:

Now we know why it was not possible for T.H.P. to send us any better musical criticisms of the recent Taglewood concerts. It must be that T.H.P. is somewhat psychic, and knew all the time that Conductor ~~Koussevitzky~~ had something else on his mind besides the exact downswing of his famous baton. For at last Koussevitzky has finally broken down and told the newsmen all. It was his marriage, no less, and the famous Conductor and his bride are off on a vacation-bridal tour of European countries.

All is forgiven, Parker. Of course, you knew it was something, and now we know it, too. Next time we'll look behind the story, with more critical vision, await the denouement, and your vindication.

CRITIQUE.

Hartford.

PITTSBURG, KAN.
HEADLIGHT
AUG 18 1947

Conductor Marries.

New York, Aug. 18.—(AP)—Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~, 73-year old conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, disclosed Friday that he was married Saturday to his secretary of the past eighteen years. Miss Olga Naumoff. Koussevitzky told news men of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

GRAND FORKS, N. D.
EVENING HERALD
AUG 18 1947

MUSICIAN WEDS

NEW YORK — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and ~~Miss Olga Naumoff~~, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER
AUG 17 1947

Koussevitzky, 73, Weds Secretary

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

[251]

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 18 1947

Machine Rivals Live Orchestra At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven Egmont Overture. Midway in the performance, the live musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Of course, the instrument used is a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the custom built line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called, Music for All which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last thirty years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the oustomer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

AUG 18 1947

Koussevitzky Marries His Secretary, 46

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 18—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was married secretly at his estate here Friday to his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, a niece of his late first wife, it was learned.

The Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational church on the hill, officiated at the ceremony at Koussevitzky's spacious estate, "Saranac."

The couple left immediately for New York where they boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for Europe where Koussevitzky will make guest performances.

Miss Naumoff had been Koussevitzky's secretary for nearly 18 years. His first wife died in 1942.

Koussevitzky had been conducting the orchestra at Berkshire Music festival concerts which ended a week ago.

ABERDEEN, S. D.
AMERICAN NEWS

AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Weds

NEW YORK— (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

CROOKSTON, MINN.
TIMES

AUG 18 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Cultural America Leads The World

(Copyright 1947, by King Features Syndicate)

IT was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the first to the ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could never—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few men can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the first to the ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney island or Brighton beach of some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The tasts of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood dell concerts, in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Leader, 73, Weds His Secretary, 46

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46 his secretary for the last 18 years were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox Mass., he disclosed today.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitkzy' told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN

AUG 18 1947

Author of Controversial Book On Koussevitzky May Attend Tea

A tentative acceptance of an invitation to the Citizen Authors' Tea has been received from Moses Smith, author of the biography "Koussevitzky," published this year. Mr. Smith has been in a hospital in Boston the past month, but has recovered sufficiently to r eturn to his home in Brookline. His brother, Major Louis Smith, one of the owners of the Guild-Northland mills in Laconia, has promised to bring the long-time Boston music critic to this city by automobile on the 27th, the day of the Tea.

A copy of Mr. Smith's biography of the noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was presented to the Laconia Public Library last spring by Maurice Landon Doust, local music teacher.

E. B. Dane Leading Contributor

A detail of Belknap county interest in the book is the account of the support of the symphony orchestra by Ernest B. Dane of Center Harbor. For several years, according to Mr. Smith, Mr. Dane was the principal contributor, and his annual offering usually amounted to $50,000.

After Mr. Smith's book appeared Dr. Koussevitzky endeavored to suppress it by injunction on the ground that it was "unauthorized" but the New York courts finally held that it could be sold. The Evening Citizen reprinted a two column article about the book by Virgil Thomson, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, who praised it highly. Mr. Thomson offered as one of the principal reasons why Dr. Koussevitzky strove to bar its appearance the fact that Mr. Smith told of the doctor's marriage to a ballet dancer and their divorce in 1905, prior to his marriage to the daughter of a wealthy Russian merchant.

The second Mrs. Koussevitzky died in 1942, and the conductor's marriage to his secretary, Olga Naumott, was announced on Saturday, when he and his bride sailed for Europe on a honeymoon.

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JUN 18 1947

George E. Sokolsky—

Mind Controls Age?

LAST SUNDAY, HERBERT HOOVER WAS [illegible] YEARS OLD. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties. And Toscanini, at 80 directs the NBC symphony.

* * *

THE MAGAZINE, "WORLD REPORT," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data.

New Zealand, 67; Sweden, 66; Netherlands, 66; United States, 65; Great Britain, 62; Germany, 61; France, 57; Italy, 55; Russia, 45; India, 27.

[illegible] young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate)
(Opinions expressed in this column are those of the writer.)

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 1 8 1947

Artists Billed to Appear Here

Artists who will perform here in the 1947-48 Eastman concert series include (left from top): Serge Koussevitzky, Eleanor Steber and Mischa Elman. Members of the piano quartet (at right) are Adam Garner, Vladimir Padwa, Frank Mittler and Edward Edson.

1947-'48 Concert Series Bookings Announced

Highlighted by the return of the Boston Symphony and the First Piano Quartet and the first Rochester recital by Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan Opera soprano, the Eastman Theater Concert Series for 1947-48, its Silver Anniversary season, was announced today by the Civic Music Association.

Besides the piano quartet, first heard here two years ago, the Eastman piano artists will be Vladimir Horowitz and Myra Hess.

Violinists Return

Violinists will be Zino Francescatti, who has been hailed as "worthy of the mantle of Paganini," and Mischa Elman, veteran of the concert stage.

Miss Steber was selected for the series after her appearance here with the Metropolitan Opera's production of "The Marriage of Figaro" last May.

The other vocalist will be Igor Gorin, young baritone, who has sung to several packed houses at the Eastman in recent years.

2 Ballets Booked

Two ballet companies will be presented, one in each series. One will be the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The company features Alexandra Danilova and Frederic Franklin.

In the opposite series will be the Markova-Dolin Ensemble, a relatively new group organized by Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin, heirs to the great traditions of classical Russian ballet.

The complete series schedule follows (all concerts will be on Fridays unless otherwise noted):

Series A
First Piano Quartet, Oct. 17.
Igor Gorin, Nov. 14.
Zino Francescatti, Jan. 16.
Vladimir Horowitz, Feb. 6.
Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, Apr. 5 (Monday).

Series B
Mischa Elman, Oct. 23 (Thursday).
Myra Hess, Nov. 28.
Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, Dec. 10 (Wednesday).
Markova and Dolin Ensemble, Feb. 27.
Eleanor Steber, Mar. 19.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 1 8 1947

Conference Festival Report Nearly 100 Per Cent Spotless

The Berkshire Festival is over, and although there were rumors enough of visitors having paid outrageous room prices, the summary from the Berkshire Hills Conference is all sweetness and light.

From more than 12,000 letters, telegrams and telephone calls, only six complaints were received. received from people recommending places where they have stayed, While officials discount phone calls more than 300 congratulatory letters or personal calls to the office have proved guests placed by the Conference have been happy with their lot.

More damning of room price demands than any other report was that of Ben Shahn, the Boston Museum School painting instructor, who said he paid $190 for six days spent in two rooms in Hinsdale. It has been discovered that rooming house was not checked by the Berkshire Hills Conference,

Guest Paid Off

Most interesting anecdote to come from this summer's paying guests was the man who telephoned Saturday from Detroit to say he was coming for the week end, and said he would arrive at 4.

The home-owner, whose place is on the shore of Pontoosuc Lake thought he meant 4 the following day. But promptly on the hour named, an amphibious plane soared over the cottage, circled the lake landed and taxied to her dock. On Sunday home-owner and guest took a trip—over Tanglewood and around Greylock.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

AUG 1 7 1947

Boston Conductor WedsWife's Niece

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL

AUG 1 7 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY WED

NEW YORK (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, revealed Saturday as he sailed for Europe, that he was married Friday to Miss Olga Naumoof, 46, who has been his secretary 18 years. She sailed with him.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

AUG 17 1947

Orchestra Conductor Weds His Secretary

New York (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
AUG 19 1947

Victor Alessandro . . . "City's taste improving"

City Symphony Chief Brewing Choice 'Menu'

By MARY JO CLEMENTS

Victor Alessandro, genial conductor of the Oklahoma Symphony orchestra, back from a triumphant trip to the east, has dived into his music files.

Alessandro, whose guest conductorship of the Milwaukee symphony last month still has the critics penning praise, is a busy man although the season's first concert is still two months away.

He's preparing a repertoire for his scattered musicians to practice ahead of the first rehearsal date, November 6.

Music Menu Previewed

A preview of musical bill-of-fair includes a contemporary English work of William Walton, the "Cotillon Suite" of Arthur Benjamin, and Corelli's "Suite for Strings."

There may be some Debussy, Ravel, Morton Gould, and Dukas. Dukas wrote "The Sorceress' Apprentice," which the movie crowd heard as musical sequences of "Fantasia."

Asked what Oklahoma City audiences prefer in symphonic music, Alessandro replied, "There are few things they don't like. Oklahoma City is getting cosmopolitan in its music taste . . . a healthy sign of a growing and progressive city."

Taste Improves

Alessandro, who is starting his tenth season as conductor here, said public taste has improved greatly. It prefers a more serious type of music now.

"A symphony is more than a cultural and educational institution, you know," Alessandro stated. "It is the reflection of the city's personality, and the symphony is judged by the city's taste."

That the symphony is a direct influence on the musical preference of the city is borne out by record sales in the music stores. Alessandro said 10 years ago, the stores sold 90 per-

PLEASE TURN TO PAGE 2, COLUMN 4 Symphony

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN
MORNING TRIBUNE

AUG 1 7 1947

BEST-SELLING RECORDS

CLASSICAL — Sonata in F minor, "Appassionata" (Beethoven) played by Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Concerto for Piano & Orchestra (Khatchaturian) played by William Kapell and Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky.

POPULAR—That's My Desire, by Frankie Laine; An Apple Blossom Wedding, by Eddy Howard.

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

AUG 1 7 1947

MAESTRO MARRIED

NEW YORK—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years were married at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
AUG 19 1947

—(AP) Wirephoto

Sailing Serge Koussevitsky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his bride of a day, the former Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, revealed their marriage as they sailed from New York for Europe on the liner Queen Elizabeth.

YAKIMA, WASH.
MORNING HERALD
AUG 17 1947

Boston Symphony Conductor Marries

New York, Aug. 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the last 18 years, were married yesterday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed today. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

PASTE OVER

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

AUG 1 9 1947

Radio Fans! Beware Of "Ides Of August," Deadliest Dial Time

BY JOHN CALDWELL.

If the soothsayer who warned Julius Caesar about the ides of March were still handing out advice he probably would tell radio listeners to beware of the ides of August.

It is the deadliest time in radio. Since it is still too early for most of the big name programs to return to the air, most of the summer replacements just continue to poke along, entertaining hardly anyone and making themselves pretty miserable.

Only two or three wintertime programs have gotten back on the bandwagon so far. The others will return in their own good time, from week to week and day to day, so that by the first of October even the comedians will feel the need to return to work.

* * *

ABC's "Light Opera Festival," the short-term replacement for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved with the first showing last week that its type of program is what people like.

Rather than broadcasting complete symphonies or operas, Light Opera Festival programs the more popular songs picked from the best-known light operas.

The music tonight (air time, 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., ABC-WSAI) will include works of Gilbert and Sullivan, Victor Herbert, Cole Porter, Jerome Kern and George Gershwin. Josef Stopak will conduct and Polyna Stocka and Ernest McChesney again sing.

The Mutual network has announced more changes. "Meet Me At Parky's," featuring Parkyakarkus, joins the growing list of co-operative type programs the net is to carry beginning in October. For two years this show has been on NBC. Also new of the net is Win Elliott's taking over as emcee on "Quick As A Flash," another quiz show, in September.

JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS

JUL 1 7 1947

Boston Symphony Head, 73, Weds Secretary, 46

New York, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

KOUSSEVITZKY told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip thru Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

AUG 1 9 1947

How Old Is Old?

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

Wide Range Of Averages

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. Symphony.

The Magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries, giving the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question, medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

Learning With The Years

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright 1947, King Features Synd.)

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

AUG 1 9 1947

Boston Symphony to Feature Eastman Concert Series

The return of Serge Kussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will highlight the Eastman Theater Concert Series for 1947-48, its 25th anniversary season.

This was announced yesterday by the Civic Music Association, which also scheduled the first Rochester recital by Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan Opera soprano.

MYRA HESS

VLADIMIR HOROWITZ

The First Piano Quartet, first heard here 2 years ago, will open the series, and other piano artists will be Vladimir Horowitz and Myra Hess.

Zino Francescatti, hailed as "worthy of the mantle of Paganini," and Mischa Elman, veteran of the concert stage, will be violinists.

Miss Steber appeared with the Metropolitan Opera's production of "The Marriage of Figaro" last May. The other vocalist will be Igor Gorin, young baritone, who has sung several times at the Eastman in recent years.

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, featuring Alexandra Danilova and Frederic Franklin, will be presented in the one series. In the opposite series will be the Markova-Dolin Ensemble, a relatively new group organized by Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin.

The complete series schedule follows (all concerts will be on Fridays unless otherwise noted):

Series A

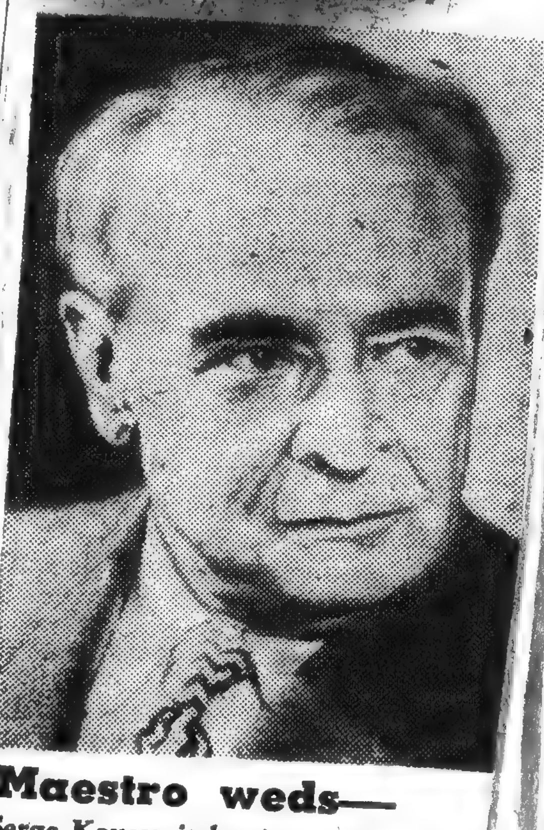
First Piano Quartet, Oct. 17.
Igor Gorin, Nov. 14.
Zino Francescatti, Jan. 16.
Vladimir Horowitz, Feb. 6.
Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, Apr. 5 (Monday).

Series B

Mischa Elman, Oct. 23 (Thursday).
Myra Hess, Nov. 28.
Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussewitsky, Dec. 10 (Wednesday).
Markova and Dolin Ensemble, Feb. 27.
Eleanor Steber, Mar. 19.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES

AUG 1 7 1947



Maestro weds—

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, and Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, are married at maestro's estate at Lenox, Mass. They leave for honeymoon in Europe. Bride is

---

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

AUG 1 7 1947

NEW YORK—Serge Koussevitsky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married here to Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years. She is a niece of his late wife, who died in 1942.

KOUSSEVITSKY AND BRIDE

This Clipping From COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.
GAZETTE

AUG 1 9 1947

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

AUG 1 7 1947

MAESTRO WEDS—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, were married at Lenox, Mass. The bride is a niece of the conductor's first wife, who died in 1942.

THESE DAYS . . . . . By George E. Sokolsky

HOW OLD IS OLD?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; Yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, altho he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear thruout those decades when according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80 directs the NBC symphony.

The magaine, "World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Averag eSpan
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—were were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 percent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life — these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian — which must be horrible — he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, altho some would say — not I, however — that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how — which is more than their great grandchildren can prove experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL

AUG 1 7 1947

Another album that this reviewer is willing to let gather dust is the recording of the brief Sonata No. 3 for Violin and Piano by Debussy. That may sound like heresy since this last fully completed work by the great French composer is interpreted for the discs by two top artists, Zino Francescatti, violinist, and Robert Casadesus, pianist. It is not Debussy at his best, although the interpreters are in excellent form. (Columbia MX-280.)

Excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite, No. 2, give the Boston Symphony orchestra and Conductor Serge Koussevitzky an opportunity to shine. Striking tonal effects are achieved in these episodes, the first, second, fourth and seventh movements. (RCA Victor DM-1129.)

EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.
JOURNAL

JUL 1 7 1947

WEDS SECRETARY

NEW YORK (AP) Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday. Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD

AUG 19 1947

FIVE CONCERTS TO BE GIVEN DURING SEASON

CIVIC MUSIC ASSN. ANNOUNCES LIST

Sinfonietta, Male Quartet, Pianist, Soprano and Baritone Coming

ELLABELLE DAVIS OCT. 24

Young Negro Soprano to be First At College Auditorium

In First Concert

Ellabelle Davis

Five concerts, including a 20-member sinfonietta, male quartet, pianist, and soprano and baritone vocalists, will make up the 1947-48 program of the Cortland County Civic Music Association, it was announced today.

First on the program, October 24, will be Ellabelle Davis, young Negro soprano, who has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and the Philadelphia orchestra under the baton of Eugene Ormandy. Miss Davis has given two Town Hall recitals in New York and has been heard over the air as soloist with the N.B.C. Symphony.

Julius Katchen, 19-year-old pianist, will be presented here November 10. Beginning his career as a child prodigy at 11, he is now an assured artist, having been soloist with such orchestras as the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia and Chicago symphonies. He has also broadcast as soloist with the Ford Sunday Evening Hour.

Cortland music-lovers will hear the National Male Quartet December 17. Each of the four singers Giulio Gari and Attilio Baggion tenors, Vernon Sanders, baritone and Bruce Mackay, bass, has established his reputation in the concert halls of the country and over the air. The singers run the gamut from the opera house to the operetta stage. They present familiar classics in attractive new arrangement and selections from the outstanding composers of the present day.

Fourth concert of the season will be given by Robert Hall Collins baritone, March 9. Native of Boston, Mr. Collins has a voice of exceptional quality and is said to have an operatic career before him.

Final presentation of the Civic Music Association April 9 will be the Farbman Sinfonietta with Edith Schiller, piano soloist. Since December 1940, when the ensemble made its debut in Town Hall, it has become a top-ranking attraction of the nation's concert stage.

The group is comprised of 20 highly-skilled young musicians, many of whom have distinguished themselves in Town Hall and Carnegie Hall recitals. Leading music critics and audiences from coast to coast are agreed on their brilliance, unity and unfailing musical taste.

Organized by Harry Farbman, well-known concert violinist and assistant conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, the sinfonietta, in the words of the New Yorker magazine, has become "one of the country's most valuable musical institutions".

Miss Schiller, who will play a concerto with the group, is a young American artist who has received excellent notices on her intelligent musicianship and technical facility.

All five concerts will be presented in the Cortland State Teachers College auditorium, it was announced. Membership cards will be mailed to subscribers prior to the first concert of the season.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 20 1947

There have been an increasing number of ballet suite albums from the major recording houses in the past year or so, and a notable addition to the growing list is the suite No. 2 from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (RCA Victor Album M/DM-[illegible]). The suite consists of [illegible] movements, four of which have been recorded on two 12-inch records. These are "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet The Maiden," "The Dance," and "Juliet's Grave."

This Clipping From
MITCHELL, S. D.
REPUBLIC

AUG 20 1947

RADIO PROGRAMS

BY ASSOCIATED PRESS
All Times CST

With ABC's Wednesday schedule or fall lined up as comedy-variety night with such personalities as Bing Crosby, Abbott and Costello and Jack Parr, the network has put its revampers to work on the Tuesday list. It proposes to make that one discussion and concert night in keeping with what the network is beginning to call "pattern programming."

Basis for this setup is the previously announced transfer of America's Town Meeting from Thursdays to 7:30 Tuesdays, effective Sept. 2, with the Boston Symphony to follow in the next hour. Along with Town Meeting, the commentary conducted by the Christian Science Monitor just ahead of it at 7:15 Thursdays aso is being moved to the same Tuesday time.

Listening tonight (Wednesday) NBC 6 Gramps, comedy sketch; 6:30 Summerfield Band; 7:30 District Attorney; 8 Big Story, "The Clean Sreep;" 8:30 Pat O'Brien theater.

CBS 6 American Melody; 6:30 Dr. Christian drama; 7 Rhapsody in Rhythm; 7:30 Meredith Willson music; 8:30 Doorway to Life.

ABC 7:30 Paul Whiteman music; 8 Beulah; 8:30 Eddie Albert skit; 9:30 Reflections in Rhythm.

MBS 6 Crime Book drama; 6:30 Johnny Modero adventure; 7:30 Name of Song quiz; 8 Shadows of

---

This Clipping From INTERNATIONAL FALLS, MINN.
JOURNAL

AUG 20 1947

(Central Standard Time)

New York—(AP)—With ABC's Wednesday schedule for fall all lined up as comedy-variety night with such personalities as Bing Crosby, Abbott and Costello and Jack Parr, the network has put its revampers to work on the Tuesday list. It proposes to make that one discussion and concert night in keeping with what the network is beginning to call "pattern programming."

Basis for this setup is the previously announced transfer of America's town meeting from Thursdays to 7:30 Tuesdays, effective Sept. 2, with the Boston symphony to follow in the next hour. Along with town meeting, the commentary conducted by the Christian Science Monitor just ahead of it at 7:15 Thursdays also is being moved to the same Tuesday time.

This Clipping From
ALBERT LEA, MINN.
TRIBUNE

AUG 20 1947

Young Mill City Soprano To Sing Norse Melodies

Patricia Hauke, Minneapolis soprano, will present a program consisting mainly of Norwegian songs at the VFW hall in Albert Lea Wednesday, Aug. 27, at 8:30 p.m.

Her appearance here is being sponsored by the local Sons of Norway lodge. Her father is supreme president of that fraternal order.

Miss Hauke won the Minneapolis Aquatennial vocal contest in 1944 and a year later was awarded a scholarship at the Academy of Vocal Arts in Philadelphia. She has toured the midwestern states in opera—one of her roles being that of Gretel in "Hansel and Gretel." She has also given concerts in major cities from coast to coast.

In the summer of 1946 she appeared in the American premiere of "Peter Grimes" at the Berkshire Music festival of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

At her appearance here she will be accompanied by Marilyn Alm, Minneapolis pianist.

Varied Program

She will open her program here with a group of Kjerulf melodies, following this with a variety group including "El Pano Moruno" and "Nana" by Manuel de Falla; "O del mio amato ben" by S. Donaudy; "Soir" by Gabriel Faure; and "Vieille Chanson" by Georges Bizet.

Then will come the aria "Mi Chiamoni Mimi" from Puccini's opera, "La Boheme."

Her concluding group consists of Grieg compositions, including "Solveigs Sang," "Tak for dit Raad," "Det foerste Moete" and "En Svane."

The singer has expressed her readiness to supplement her regular program with special selections requested by the audience.

This Clipping From
GRAND ISLAND, NEB.
INDEPENDENT

AUG 20 1947

DAY BY DAY On The Radio

New York, Aug. 20. (AP) — With ABC's Wednesday schedule for fall all lined up as comedy-variety night with such personalities as Bing Crosby, Abbott and Costello and Jack Parr, the network has put its revempers to work on the Tuesday list. It proposes to make that one discussion and concert night in keeping with what the network is beginning to call "pattern programming."

Basis for this setup is the previously announced transfer of America's Town Meeting from Thursdays to 7:30 Tuesdays, effective September 2, with the Boston symphony to follow in the next hour. Along with Town Meeting, the commentary conducted by the Christian Science Monitor just ahead of it at 7:15 Thursdays also is being moved to the same Tuesday time.

Two other discussion series, Lavor USA and the N. A. M. program which follow each other Saturday evenings, are to become Tuesday broadcasts September 2. They are to be fitted into the half-hour at 9:30.

What to do about Thursday nights, where the Town Meeting move is leaving quite a gap, has not been settled. It is possible the concentration there will be on drama.

As to Wednesday nights, another addition has been made. It is the veteran Vox Pop type of interviews conducted by Parks Johnson and Warren Hull. It will get the 7:30 spot beginning October 1. This program, on the air upwards of 15 years, was on CBS last year.

YORK, PA.
GAZETTE & DAILY

AUG 18 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Weds His Secretary

New York, Aug. 17 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed yesterday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

HYANNIS, MASS.
CAPE COD STANDARD TIMES

AUG 20 1947

Concert to Aid Church Fund

Artists to Appear At Hyannis Sunday

HYANNIS, Aug. 20—Second annual musical concert in First Baptist Church will be given at 7:30 p.m. Sunday. Artists will be Susan Godoy, pianist; Mrs. Sarah Holmes Gleason, vocalist; Mrs. Esther Hinckley, violinist, and Mrs. Frances B. Clarke, organist. Special offering will benefit the church's music fund.

Miss Godoy, instructor of music at Wellesley College, was graduated from Radcliffe College, studied with Jesus Maria Sanroma of Boston Symphony Orchestra for [illegible] years and with Heinrich Gebhard. On Sunday night's program will be a Saint-Saens concerto which Miss Godoy recently played with the Reading Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Gleason, a teacher of voice, began her music career at Holderness Music School in New Hampshire. She has studied with Charles White of New England Conservatory of Music, Prof. Allen B. Daugherty of Boston, Marie Stoddard of Hollywood, Bertha Putnam Dudley of Boston, Prof. Igor Astrow, former assistant director of the Russian Opera in Paris; Harry Jonpulsky of New York and the late Madame Ella Backus Behr, well-known Hyannis artist.

Mrs. Gleason will leave for New York this Fall to continue her musical career with Leo Braun, teacher of opera and radio stars. For her Italian and French repertoire, she will study with Maestro Enrico Rosati, teacher of Beniamino Gigli, James Melton and other singers.

Mrs. Hinckley, frequent guest violinist at the church's worship service, studied with Ruth Posselt and Emmanuel Ondriceck of Boston and New York, and has done solo work in Boston and on the Cape.

Mrs. Clarke, a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, is a teacher of piano and is organist of the Baptist Church. She was a pupil of Charles Dennee and Albert [illegible] of Boston and more recently, Madame Behr of Hyannis.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Weds Former Wife's Niece

New York, Aug. 16 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married Friday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, aged 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductors' late wife, who died in 1942.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky Discloses Marriage to Secretary

New York, Aug. 16—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
HERALD-EXPRESS

AUG 16 1947

Koussevitzky

Symphony Leader, 73, Weds Secretary

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Aug. 16.—Serge Koussevitsky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the past 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoff, 46.

Koussevitzky told newsmen of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

The wedding was performed at the conductor's estate, "Saranac," at Lenox, Mass., by the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church on the Hill in Lenox, at 2 p. m.

[255]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

AUG 20 1947

THESE DAYS

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I RECENTLY wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A.S.C.A.P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated.

It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music.

And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A LAYMAN may look at the George Washington bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian.

He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

THE expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy And Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale.

I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

THEY tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say?

Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his 'Symphony For Strings."

It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-41. And at the end, I could have shouted "viva la France!" but what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

(Copyright, 1947, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From CUMBERLAND, MD.
NEWS

AUG 20 1947

THESE DAYS By George E. Sokolsky

Music for Non-Musicians

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are profesionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the theme of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious Summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Kousevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat," and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familliar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahm's First or a Sousa March, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Vive la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER

AUG 20 1947

MUSIC FOR NON-MUSICIANS

I recently wrote about attendin some concerts at the Berkshire Musi Festival and brought down on my hea the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music excep those who are professionally in th business. Yet, a mother sings a lullab without the consent of A. S. C. A. P Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musician and music critics talk politics and ec onomics and they sound like musician Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a politica party which Paul Robeson, a musicia was associated. It seems perfectly a right for musicians to talk politics bu not for political writers to talk musi The assumption is that there is some thing mystical, something esoteric an mysterious about music. And yet small boy can whistle a tune and mos of the themes of Beethoven's grea symphonies are simple enough fo small boys to whistle. Perhaps tha is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious Summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they wil go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 20 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokplsky

Music For Non-Musicians

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of ASCAP, Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect: he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious Summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. Carmen may be a classic, but to a great many people so are Porgy and Bess, Show Boat and Oklahoma, and who shall say them nay?

It is a mater of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and [illegible] ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played — his Symphony for Strings. It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

AUG 20 1947

A SECOND VERSION of the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony, previously recorded by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Efrem Kurtz, has been brought forward by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. The tone quality is better in the Boston Orchestra and the details are more distinctively polished. The music is ingeniously put together but is trivial for the most part. (RCA Victor, three records.)

[256]

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

AUG 20 1947

THESE DAYS

by GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

COPYRIGHT BY KING FEATURES

Music for Non-Musicians

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of ASCAP, Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics, but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

* * *

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music at Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shali I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transplanted to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

* * *

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa March, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played — his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-41. And at the end, I could have shouted "Vive la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

AUG 20 1947

Discussion and Concert Is ABC Tuesday Plan

By FRANCE RAINE

ABC program executives are continuing their policy of "pattern programming" with a revamping of the Tuesday night schedule. The Wednesday evening hours on the network already have been lined up for the coming season on a comedy-variety basis. Thus, Tuesday night will be devoted chiefly to discussion and concert. It had previously been announced that "America" Town Meeting was moving from Thursdays to Tuesdays at 8:30 p. m., effective Sept. 2. The Boston Symphony, on its return Oct. 7, will occupy the next hour, but in the meantime, the network will fill with "Summer Serenade" and "Museum of Modern Music." The commentary conducted by the Christian Science Monitor, now heard on Thursdays ahead of Town Meeting, will be moved to the same time on Tuesdays, and also to become Tuesday broadcasts on Sept. 2 will be the discussion series titled "Labor, U. S. A." and the National Association of Manufacturers program.

The term "pattern programming" is another name for the style introduced on WCKY many months ago, called 'block programming."

This Clipping From ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER

AUG 20 1947

[These Days]

By GEORGE SOKOLSKY

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of ASCAP, Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated.

●

IT SEEMS perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Bldg. and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious Summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

●

THE EXPERT has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitsky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma!," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

●

THESE EXPERTS say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa March, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

Copyright 1947

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
AUG 20 1947

THESE DAYS

—By George E. Sokolsky

I RECENTLY wrote about some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite.

Apparently no one may discuss music except ehose who are professionally in the business.

Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians.

Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated.

It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music.

The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music.

And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle.

Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

* * *

ONE may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology.

One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian.

He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician.

It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic.

If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say.

But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music.

"Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge.

My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes.

Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale.

I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear.

But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him.

Again, it is a matter of taste Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

* * *

THEY tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance, the music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods.

It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me!

All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that ar must not be photographic Then why do they reproduc exact noises of industrial pro duction?

Besides, what are they try ing to say?

Whether it is Beethoven' Ninth or Brahm's First or Sousa march, the compose speaks to me.

At Tanglewood, one of th moderns, Arthur Honnegge was played—his "Symphony Fo Strings." It spoke as thoug with words of despair France in 1940-1.

And at the end, I could hav shouted "Viva la France!" Bu what is said by the mathe matical musicians who pro duce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, n opera, no musical comedy cou be played only for the expert There are more of me th go to concerts than of him. H has his little place to note th weakness of the brass. I jus like music.

This Clipping From OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD

AUG 21 1947

He Is No Expert, Just Likes Musi

By George E. Sokolsky

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A.S.C.A.P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

Beauty

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165 thousand persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It's Dissonance

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much [illegible]

After all, no [illegible] no opera, no musical [illegible] played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

opyright, 1947, King Features [illegible]

[257]

This Clipping From WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD

AUG 20 1947

Famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, 73, is shown with his bride, the former Olga Naumoff, 46, as they sailed from New York for England, on the liner Queen Elizabeth. The bride, the conductor's secretary for 18 years, is the niece of Koussevitzky's wife, who died five years ago. (International Soundphoto)

This Clipping From
Floral Park N.Y.
Gateway

Musical Musings

of George Weigl

The "Three B's," Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, are universally considered the three greatest men in music. It was at one time my contention that this idea was correct. I had been taught to believe it, I guess; but after reading some new ideas upon the subject recently it seems that the Three B's conception is open to some argument.

It is not my intention to argue the point; however, it may prove of interest to us if we stopped a moment to think about a few other truly great composers, several of whom, I think you will agree, are certainly as much to be reckoned with as any of the Three B's.

Mozart, we know, was the only composer ever to master both the opera and the symphony. Mozart composed some of our finest symphonies, and his operas "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni "have never been surpassed by any composer. Yet Mozart is not considered by musicologists in a class with the Three B's. It seems to me that in many ways Mozart was the equal of any of them, and in some ways superior certainly to Brahms, if not Bach or even Beethoven.

Haydn was labled "The Father of the Symphony." He was the originator of the symphony, and for that reason he ought, certainly to be classed with the Three B's if for no other reason. Haydn originated the symphony, Beethoven brought it up to its highest form; but could Beethoven have developed it to its highest form if Haydn, his teacher, hadn't taught him how to write a symphony? I wonder.

Brahms was a pupil of Robert Schumann, among others; and yet we have been taught to believe Brahms to be greater than Schumann. The Schumann piano pieces, his lovely A Minor Piano Concerto, and his orchestra compositions are today among the finest musical compositions in existance. Yet we are taught to believe Brahms the greater of the two. There again, I wonder. Schumann never wrote a musical phrase in which he did not insert a portion of his heart. It was he who inspired Brahms to write the beautiful "Lullaby," but Schumann's "Traumerie" will be played right along with that lullaby until the end of time.

As the music master he was, we are never taught Wagner in the proper manner, it seems to me.

Wagner wrote the greatest German operas, we are told. But he not only wrote the operas. He wrote his own librettos for most of his operas also. He was the greatest mental giant of all. His descriptive pieces, which were a part of his operas, have never been equaled for orchestral effects, by that I mean orchestration, and his overtures to his operas appear on all symphony programs with more regularity than do the major symphonies themselves.

Schubert is acknowledged the greatest song writer who ever lived; yet his "Unfinished Symphony" is one of the most beautiful of all symphonies. His "Seventh Symphony," incidentally, has only this year come into its own in the United States where, through the efforts of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstien, it has been given more than 36 performances alone by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His sonatas are positively gems of the first class. And historians will have us believe that Schubert was primarily a song writer. He wasn't. He was one of the greatest composers of song and symphony. He was a master composer, and that's all there is to it.

Musings

When we give it a little thought, therefore, the Three B ideaology becomes confusing.

It seems to me that it is not correct to ever advance a statement as to who was and who was not the greatest composer. Those things are better left to personal opinion, it would seem.

Every composer has his place, just as every type of music has its place. The person who says, "I hate classical music" is never seriously reckoned with in music circles; and by the same reasoning the musician who says, I hate jazz or call it boogie-woogie or what have you,also can not be seriously considered; for all music has its place.

And by the same reasoning it seems to me that all composers have their respective places in music. I don't think Brahms was better than Schumann or Schubert, nor would I rather listen to the Brahms Third than the Ceasar Franck D Minor Symphony, for that matter. And I am not the one to say everything Bach wrote is out of this world, though personally I do believe that some of his pieces should have gone out long ago. I can't believe that Wagner did not make as great a contribution to music as Beethoven did.

But those are purely opinions; and I haven't the slightest doubt that the Three B's will continue to be classed as the three greatest composers who ever lived, in spite of all I've had to say.

This Clipping From
NEW ULM, MINN.
JOURNAL

AUG 20 1947

Radio Day by Day

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
CENTRAL STANDARD TIME

New York —(AP)— With ABC's Wednesday schedule for fall all lined up as comedy-variety night with such personalities as Bing Crosby, Abbott and Costello and Jack Parr, the network has put its revampers to work on the Tuesday list. It proposes to make that one discussion and concert night in keeping with what the network is beginning to call "pattern programming."

Basis for this setup is the previously announced transfer of America's Town Meeting from Thursdays to 7:30 Tuesdays, effective Sept. 2, with the Boston Symphony to follow in the next hour. Along with Town Meeting the commentary conducted by the Christian Science Monitor just ahead of it at 7:15 Thursdays also is being moved to the same Tuesday time.

ROCHESTER, MINN.
POST BULLETIN

AUG 20 1947

George E. Sokolsky—

Musicians Dislike Non-Expert Criticism

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of ASCAP, Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with hich Paul Robeson, a musician, as associated. It seems perfectly l right for musicians to talk polics but not for political writers to lk music. The assumption is that here is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can histle a tune and most of the emes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for mall boys to whistle. Perhaps that s why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington bridge or the Golden Gate bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauy. He is not an engineer or an rchitect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is disonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahm's First or a Sousa March, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-41. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 20 1947

THE N. Y. PRESS THIS EVENING:

'Wisdom' of Legal Bookies

THE WORLD-TELEGRAM sees wisdom in legalized bookmaking which would "greatly reduce police temptation and corruption born of the bookmaker's present need of police protection." Costly investigations and shakeups disturb public confidence in the police, and all this results from trying to enforce an unpopular and unforceable statute, the paper explains.

* * *

THE JOURNAL-AMERICAN expresses disgust with the "political hippodrome" proceedings marking the aborted Hughes investigation, calling it "a scatter-gun type of inquisition which politicians launch at their own whim, and then drop when they find it back-firing against them." Now the investigators themselves should be made to produce the real facts, if any such facts exist, says the paper.

* * *

THE SUN says the Wyatt plan for housing got off to a bad start because of its dependence on Federal control over "a very complicated set of conditions." A consequence, declares the Sun, has been "a smothering of that incentive which would have stimulated the building industry to start work on thousands of rental housing projects."

In the Columns

UPTON CLOSE (Journal-American) calls England's Socialism "mass blindness" induced by war weariness and fear of the future. As a result, individual liberty in Britain is all but stamped out, with much time lost in government red tape, he says, hoping that "one day the old courage of the British will be there again."

* * *

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT (World-Telegram) reports that an increasing number of women are protesting the possible recurrence of war, but adds there is little that women can do because governments are still in the hands of men. Women can insist, though, that they get representation on all levels of government, she adds.

* * *

E. T. LEECH (World-Telegram) says Russia has a "big advantage" over us in that she represents a system which is older and easier to maintain than is democracy. It's hard work to govern yourselves whereas it's easier to let some one else do it, and that's why democracy has encountered so many difficulties, he says.

* * *

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY (Sun) can't understand why he was criticized for commenting on the Berkshire Music Festival, being a political writer. But, he says, Paul Robeson, the singer, and Jo Davidson, the sculptor, show plenty of interests in politics. Further, a layman can marvel at the George Washington Bridge without being an architect, he argues.

This Clipping From
LUFKIN, TEX.
NEWS
AUG 20

These Days + +

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

HOW OLD IS OLD?

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music fesival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are ev more significant. George Be d Shaw at 91 has a whale of od time. In spite of his be in vegetarian—which must be ho e—he manages to keep ch r. It is his mind. When that ol y talks about being in his se childhood, he has his to in his cheek, although some w say—not I, however—that he ver escaped his first childho ing the depression years, th were laying off men at 50 as inished. The dopes who th ht up that gimmick lacked un standing of the world in w they live. They were old fa ned. When the war came, th were begging the old boys to me back, because the old bo knew how—which is more th their great grandchildren ca prove experience and wisdom co with age and if the oldste , in addition, are mentally vigrous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fre out of college who know ho to read a statistical curve bu lack the experience and wisdo to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 20 1947

H. I. PHILLIPS is on vacation.

The Sun Dial* will be resumed on his return.

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

Music for Non-musicians.

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic but to a great many people, so is "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma!" and who shall say them nay.

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms's First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-41. And at the end, I could have shouted "Vive la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From ENID, OKLA.
EAGLE
AUG 20 1947

Music Thoughts

By George E. Sokolsky

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party which which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington bridge or the Golden Gate bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony. God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-41. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva La France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I must like music.

Millerton N.Y.
News
AUG 21 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Marries Secretary

Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed before sailing for Europe on Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the Conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

Koussevitzky announced the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth for a honeymoon in Europe. He said not even friends who went to the ship to see him off had been told of the wedding.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 21 1947

Networks Favor Program Groups

ABC to Concentrate Plays, Comedy, Talks

A dozen years ago Rudy Vallee, Show Boat and Paul Whiteman made Thursday "variety night" on NBC. Later, Tuesday on NBC evolved as comedy night, with Hope, Fibber, Skelton and the rest.

THERE ARE varied views in the industry about spotting too many programs of similar nature on a given night, but the ABC Network is going ahead with what it calls "pattern programming."

Tuesday will be discussion-and-concert night on ABC in the Fall, with Town Meeting, Boston Symphony, Monitor news and the Labor USA and NAM series.

This Clipping From SUFFOLK, VA.
NEWS-HERALD

AUG 21 1947

Is Music So Mysterious?

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A LAYMAN MAY look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he nows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious Summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to isten to such music as Koussevizky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma" and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of teste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

THESE EXPERTS say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sous March, the composer speakes to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played— his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 5,658)

This Clipping From
ALBERT LEA, MINN.
TRIBUNE

AUG 21 1947

By George E. Sokolsky

Is Music Somebody's Private Property?

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economic and they sounded like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for politcal writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a smal boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington bridge or the Golden Gate bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect: He knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go [illegible] matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. DeBussy's Orientalia is European: Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer DeBussy. Shall I argue with them?

Not Only For Experts

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" but what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From
LONGVIEW, TEXAS
NEWS

AUG 21 1947

George E. Sokolsky

MUSIC FOR NON-MUSICIANS

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A.S.C.A.P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington bridge or the Golden Gate bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. DeBussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer DeBussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me. All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played — his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 21 1947

News in the Advertising Field

National Ad Volume Up

Expenditures for national advertising increased 18 per cent during the first six months of 1947, according to Dr. Hans Zeisel, manager of research development of McCann-Erickson, Inc., writing in the current issue of "Printers' Ink."

Newspapers show an increase of 38 per cent over the 1946 level, for the biggest gain of all media, he reported. Weekly magazines, farm papers and outdoor advertising all showed increases of about 30 per cent. National radio advertising expenditures during the first half of 1947 were 4 per cent below the corresponding level of 1946.

Radio and Television Notes

Bayuk, Inc., has renewed "Inside of Sports" on Mutual. . . . "Meet Me at Parky's" will start as a co-operative feature over the Mutual network Sunday, Oct. 5, at 9 p. m. . . . Adam J. Young jr., Inc., has been appointed exclusive national representative for WPIC, Sharon, Pa. . . . Clifford Glick, formerly of N. B. C., has joined the WMCA sales staff as an account executive. . . . Miss Joan Usoskin, formerly of C. B. S., has been named script-writer-editor of Video Associates, Inc., television package agency. Miss Joanna Neilson has joined the publicity department as assistant and staff photographer. . . . "Serious" programs will be featured on A. B. C. on Tuesday nights, starting Sept. 20. "America's Town Meeting" will be shifted from Thursday to Tuesday and will be followed by the Boston Symphony. News and discussion programs will be heard before and after those programs. . . . Thirty-six local sponsors have been signed for the Abbott & Costello co-operative show on A. B. C.

Agency Appointments

International Diesel Electric Co., Inc., has appointed Gotham Advertising Co. for a newspaper campaign in Mexico.

F. W. Berk & Co., Inc., Wood Ridge, N. J., makers of mercury and mercurials, has appointed House of J. Hayden Twiss.

Benjamin Uydess & Sons, maker of precision tools and dies, has named Gunn-Mears Advertising Agency to handle advertising of Bench King, a new type of vise.

Personnel Notes

Bradshaw Thurston has been appointed an account executive with Seidel Advertising Agency, Inc.

Albert Lefcourte, art director of Buchanan & Co., Inc., has resigned, effective Sept. 15.

Advertising Briefs

A business meeting of members' will be held in conjunction with the first day's session of the thirtieth annual convention of the Direct Mail Advertising Association, Oct. 23 to 25 at the Carter in Cleveland. . . . Dante Raul Quinterno, publisher of "Cuenteme," Argentine edtion of the International True Story Group, has flown back to Buenos Aires after a week's visit in New York. . . . Ted Gravenson, vice-president of Gravenson Co., has been appointed to instruct courses in production and art direction at Long Island University. . . . The annual golf party and outing of the sales staffs of "American Weekly" and "Puck" will be held Monday at the Westchester County Club, Rye, N. Y.

Campaigns

British Travel Association will release the first of a series of advertisemtnts on the theme, "Come to Britain in 1948" in national magazines in October. Newspapers will be used in the early spring. Cecil & Presby, Inc., is the agency.

A new advertising campaign in newspapers and magazines will announce the availability of Modess, made by Personnel Products, Corp., Milltown, N. J., in three sizes. Copy will break in the fall, using 934 newspapers and thirty-two national magazines.

Appointed by Cadillac

Charles W. Schooley, who has been appointed merchandising manager of the Cadillac motor car division of General Motors Corp. succeeding Charles H. Betts who has resigned. Charles F. McGinnis, of General Motors Acceptance Corp., has been named assistant merchandising manager of the Cadillac division

---

[illegible] ton N. Y.
[illegible]

A[illegible] 1947

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who wed Miss Olga Naumoff on Friday at his Lenox, Mass. estate.

This Clipping From
EL DORADO, ARK.
TIMES
AUG 21 1947

Phonograph Rivals 'Live' Orchestra At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (UP)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an accoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstation was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside The occasion was the public introduction of The Berk.shire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal accoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instruments used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Musicf or All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

This Clipping From STURGIS, MICH.
JOURNAL
AUG 21 1947

Phonograph Rivals "Live" Orchestra At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this Summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instrument used as a deluxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
AUG 21 1947

Hawthorne Road At Tanglewood To Be Paved

Boston Symphony Orchestra members and officials and Tanglewood boxholders should have a smoother ride from the highway, Route 183, to the rear entrance next summer, according to the State Highway Department here. Hawthorne Street, the road which extends around the north rim of the Stockbridge Bowl, will be further paved this fall.

To date, 2800 feet of this road has been paved. More construction requiring 85 days is slated for completion this year. Bids opened yesterday in Boston revealed Nat Beacco & Sons of Stockbridge as low bidder with $18,976.60. Petricca of Pittsfield bid $22,884.75.

The Summer Street, Lee, bid, was due to be opened yesterday, was postponed because of a delay in the layout of road plans. Bids for the construction of this road which extends from the Lee bridge to Foxhollow School will be advertised again this week.

The only bidder on a maintenance project in Williamstown was David M. Deans of that town with a $4502.50 bid.

[260]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
AUG 21 1947

RADIO PROGRAMS TAKE TREND TO DAILY PATTERNS

Tuesday Featured by Talks, Music

Another addition has been made to ABC's Wednesday evening lineup—it's Vox Pop, veteran network interview program, with Parks Johnson and Warren Hull. Bing Crosby, Jack Paar, Henry Morgan, and Abbott and Costello also are on ABC's Wednesday night schedule.

There are changes in the network's Tuesday evening programs, too. That night will be devoted mainly to discussions and concert music. America's Town Meeting and the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast form the basis for this program plan. Labor, U. S. A., and the National Association of Manufacturers' programs also will shift to Tuesday. The Boston Symphony will not return to the air until Oct. 7, so two half hour concerts, Summer Serenade and Museum of Modern Music, will be heard in the interim.

This system of grouping a certain variety of radio programs into one evening of listening is something new in radio and is termed "program pattern programming."

At present Thursday nights on ABC looks like drama night, with the Mr. President series and the Willie Piper skits slated to continue.

Mutual's Tom Mix program will present, in coöperation with the National Safety council, a safety campaign, starting next month. Pointers on safety will be presented to juvenile listeners in place of commercial announcements.

The Radio Theater will begin its 14th season next Monday at 8 p. m. via WBBM-CBS. Bette Davis and Glenn Ford will co-star in "A Stolen Life" on the first program.

Television topics: Video receivers now in operation in Chicago total 5,027, which makes the cost of advertising on WBKB $375 an hour, a rate based on set census. This rate will prevail until 15,000 receivers are installed. . . . Football telecasts will begin with the Chicago Rockets Los Angeles Dons game at Soldiers field Aug. 29. . . . A new sports show, Inquiring Sports Reporter will be launched on WBKB next Monday. Jack Brickhouse, who will handle the show, is to visit the office of an athletic notable each week.

This Clipping From OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
AUG 21 1947

Music Isn't Played For the Musicians

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire music festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. . . . .

Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of ASCAP, Petrillo, or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music.

And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington bridge or the Golden Gate bridge or the Empire State building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect, he knows nothing about stresses or strains, but he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say, but if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music.

"Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma," and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ears, but I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. DeBussy's orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer DeBussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God foregive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa march, the composer speaks to me.

At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his 'Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1901, and at the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France in 1940-1941, and at the end, mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
AUG 21 1947

Miss Lillian Kallir Will Play Piano Solos at Benefit Concert

Miss Lillian Kallir, the pianist who will render the piano part of the Brahms Horn Trio opus No. 40, on Saturday night at the Gloucester High school auditorium, is going to play the following solos besides the horn trio. Proceeds will be for the benefit of Quaker Food Parcels for Europe.

Bach Prelude and Fugue C. sharp minor, Nocturne by Chopin, Isle joyeuse by Claude Debussy.

Miss Kallir is a young promising pianist, born in Prague, Czechoslovakia. She began her studies at an early age. In 1938 she came to this country and continued her studies in New York with J. Grab and Hugo Kauder; the Sonata for horn and piano she is going to play with Willem A. Valkenir in the same concert. This summer she has studied at the music center at Tanglewood where she distinguished herself in Chamber music performances.

Clarence Knudson, violinist, who will render the violin part of the seldom heard Horn Trio, is well known in this neighborhood, as he is a native of Beverly, where he spent his childhood. At the youthful age of 17, he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the youngest violinist ever to enter the orchestra. He has been a member of the Chardon Quartet and has been widely heard as soloist. Mr. Knudson and his family are summer residents of Annisquam.

Willem Valkenier, French horn, studied music at the Conservatory of Rotterdam, Holland. He then held positions in orchestras in Holland, Switzerland and Austria. Before coming to America, he was solo horn of the Berlin State Opera. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1923, and has performed in chamber music concerts all over the country.

Both Mr. Valkenier and Mr. Knudson are members of the faculty of the Music Center at Tanglewood whence they will arrive here today for rehearsals for the benefit concert for which they volunteered their services.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
AUG 22 1947

Bolet and Laderoute Give Concert Monday

Relations in culture and their integration between Canada and Latin America will again be stressed in the fourth of the series of broadcast concerts which is to take place at the Hermitage of Monday, starring Jorge Bolet, the distinguished Cuban pianist, and Joseph Victor Laderoute, the well-known Canadian tenor. These concerts are open free to the public at the invitation of the CBC International Services, Latin American section, under Philip Cook's supervision.

Sencr Bolet, who has been hailed as Cuba's most distinguished virtuoso pianist, will be making his first public appearance in this city although he has fulfilled broadcast engagements with the Latin American section of the CBC International Service previously A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia and a winner of the Naumburg Award, he made his New York debut In a Town Hall recital which proved to be the first of a number in the American metropclis. Three of these were given to packed houses in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Laderoute, a native of Ontario, recently made a great success in the leading role of Mozart's Idomeneo when it was given its American premiere at Tanglewood in the Berkshires under Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Laderoute has had the frequent honor to be chosen personally by Arturo Toscanini to sing in the Maestro's broadcast programs . This will be his first Montreal appearance since he was heard as Florestan in Bethoven's Fidelio, produced here by the Opera Guild the season before last.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
AUG 21 1947

INDIANAPOLIS on the AIR

By Martha McHatton

WIBC microphones will pick up activities at a real old-fashioned street fair tonight and Friday night at 7:30 o'clock in a program to be called Show of Progress. The event is being held on the corner of 42d Street and College Avenue with Mike Dunn, Dave Hamilton, Tom Moriarity, Jack Simpson and Paul Burton, of WIBC, offering air entertainment. There will be a pet parade tonight and a crowning of the north side queen and a concert by The Newsboys Band Friday night.

Because of the special shows, WIBC is moving Veterans' Affairs to 8:30 o'clock tonight when C. W. Stall, promotion editor of the Hoosier Farmer, will discuss opportunities for veterans in Hoosier agriculture. And Family Theater will switch to Saturday night at 8 o'clock for the one time only.

The ABC network has lined up a fine Wednesday night show and now is busy working on a strong Tuesday night lineup. First will be radio's oldest audience participation forum, America's Town Meeting, moving from Thursday nights to Tuesdays effective September 2, at 7:30 p. m. The Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting will play at 8:30 p. m.

We were curious about Thursday nights since the Town Meeting move left quite a gap, but learn from ABC that the schedule has not been settled. It is possible the concentration that night will be, on drama with the present Mr. President series, starring Edward Arnold, expected to continue. Likewise, the Willie Piper sketches will continue but at a better time. Counting other changes, almost 3 hours will still be available for fill in.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
AUG 22 1947

RECORDS

Prokofieff Suite; Brahms; Bartok; Wagner; Strauss; Heifetz; Jonas; Tucker; Populars

By William Leonard

PROKOFIEFF: "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite, No. 2; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky (Victor album DM-1129, two twelve-inch records). This highly interesting music is worthwhile in its own right, and its recording fills what had been a noticeable void on the record shelves. Of mid-'30s vintage, the suite finds the Soviet composer at his most imaginative, the imagery being so vivid the listener almost can identify the Shakespearian story in programmatic fashion with thematic material and its treatment. The album contains the first, second, fourth and seventh movements from the second of two suites arranged from the ballet score, and they must constitute a picture that is not incomplete, for the music sounds highly unified, especially with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting a luminous reading.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
AUG 22 1947

Chamber And Orchestral Works Among New Releases

A MISCELLANY of attractive items, most of them music with which the average record collector is not too familiar, remains to be considered on the Victor and Columbia release lists for the month. There is a rarely held but characteristic work of Dvorak, played for home consumption by the Cleveland Orchestra, and a first domestic recording of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" suite by the Boston Orchestra: these and others.

The Dvorak is the Bohemian composer's Symphony No. 1, a work of considerable freshness and lyrical charm, built on the folk songs of his native land. It could replace the over-done "New World" symphony in the concert repertoire quite satisfactorily, while that most familiar of all symphonies is given a well-deserved rest. The Cleveland orchestra, still under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf when the recording was made, gives it a lively performance.

A MODERN treatment of Shakespeare's love tragedy, composed originally for ballet, is the new Prokofieff contribution to the record collector's delight. It is the second of two suites arranged by the composer from his full-length dance drama, which attracted considerable attention when it was new in 1935 because Prokofieff first gave the oft-told story a happy ending, and then reversed himself. It is a brilliant piece in the composer's best vein and quickly likely to please if you like Prokofieff as much as you admire the superb tonal qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
AUG 22 1947

over Hollywood (CBS, 12:30).

The new March of Time documentary film on radio, titled "Is Everybody Listening" presents Walter Winchell in the fast-moving nd tense setting of the ABC newsroom in New York. The film also shows Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony, and a glimpse of Town Meeting of The Air during their discussion of the question "What shall we do about Germany now?"

Fran (Aunt Fannie) Allison has landed herself a straight role in a new radio comedy-darma series starting tomorrow morning at 11 on NBC. Show is titled Meet the Meeks, and Fran plays the role of Mrs. Mortimer Meek.

An FM station in Allentown, Pa. is making radio history. At 6:30 every Sunday night it carefully advises its litseners to tune in some other station and hear Greatest Story Ever Told. The FM station's announcement states: "WMFZ regrets that it is unable to carry this program for you on FM, since we sincerely believe it is the finest broadcast on the radio today!" Petrillo's ban on duplication of music on AM and FM is the reason the station cannot carry the show. After urging listeners to tune out and listen to Greatest Story, the FM station carries on with a record program.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN
AUG 22 1947

Beethoven's B-flat major piano concerto, rarely is given publicly because it has apparently become the thing to underestimate its very real pleasures. Even the far-sighted Donald Tovey ignores it in all of his six volumes of comprehensive "Essays in Musical Analysis." Only in his Beethoven book does a mention occur. Then he dwells briefly on the pleasant discursiveness of the orchestra.

John A. Burk, program annotator for the Boston Symphony, in a Modern Library volume devoted to Beethoven, discovers more in this concerto which he believes to have been written in 1794, performed by the composer the next year in Vienna. Burk calls it "the earliest orchestral work he saw fit to publish." While Beethoven's C-major piano concerto, opus 15, is marked No. 1, it actually is his second one, written two years later in 1797, performed in 1798 and published in 1801 like the B-flat major concerto.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR
AUG 22 1947

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 72-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was married last Friday to Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for 18 years, and a niece of his late wife.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the news to the press last Saturday, in answering a ship news photographer's question while posing at the gang plank of the Queen Elizabeth, on which he and his bride were about to sail.

The ceremony took place in the living room of his estate near Lenox, Mass. Although Dr. Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia, is a member of the Greek Orthodox Church, the ceremony was performed by an old friend, the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church in Lenox. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Burgin were official witnesses.

The conductor told reporters that he plans to take a holiday trip through England, France and Switzerland and will do no conducting. Before returning to the United States about Oct. 1, he hopes to discover musical scores written during the war, but still unpublished. From these he may select works to be presented during the Fall and Winter season of his orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky's first wife died in 1942.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
AUG 17 1947

RECORDED MUSIC.

'Romeo and Juliet' Ballet a Find for Prokofieff Fans

THE GROWING audience of Prokofieff admirers, who have found that he "wears" better than the younger Sh[illegible]kovitch, will applaud the new album of excerpts [illegible] his ROMEO AND JULIET BALLET SUITE NO. 2 (Victor [illegible]-1129, $2.99). This music, dating to 1936 (and Prokofieff's first ballet assignment after returning to Soviet Russia) is not well known, but it is vintage Prokofieff and full of his cleverness, originality and charm.

The Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky plays the four movements with characteristic finesse and opulence, giving a glow to the grave episodes and crackle to the brisk ones. The music has all Prokofieff's [illegible]-fingered instrumentation, [illegible] contrasted moods (from [illegible]scene to Juliet's dance) [illegible]ed with a delicacy that [illegible] several sonorous

---

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL
AUG 23 1947

Music and Drama

Listeners Gain Most From Music Festivals

By COLIN SABISTON

APART from the music heard and the exquisite setting in which the performances took place, there was new inspiration in a first visit to the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, recently concluded its tenth summer season.

The resounding success of this festival raises the question why all established orchestras cannot give annual festivals of performance (as distinct from competitive festivals) within the scope of their opportunities and limitations. Such festivals of performance only offer something the competitive festival lacks. The Tanglewood venture has become international, but there still is a place for the smaller regional event of the same type. In proportionate measure, the inspiration provided in Massachusetts could be evoked anywhere.

The inspiration was provided by the crowds of auditors which came in waves from all over the continent and beyond. Many remained for the whole period, but most of the visitors to this 210-acre Festival centre chose one of the three series of orchestral concerts for their visit, moved on to make room—in hotels and guest homes for 20 miles around, as well as in the grounds—for newcomers.

These crowds were as cosmopolitan as any to be found in North America, comprising as many social, economic and racial groups as are to be found on the continent. About a third of them brought scores of their favorite works with them; but those who did not obviously were present for the same reason as those who did—less for the immediate pleasure than for the opportunity to advance their capacity for appreciation as listeners. For, despite the inevitable presence of many professional and amateur musicians, all audiences were just that—audiences with well-established concert-going habits, but on this occasion seriously intent on finding new values as listeners.

It was in accordance with this common impulse that this writer chose to hear the Beethoven cycle, with Mozart's opera, Idomeneo, and some other specialties, thrown in.

Listeners' Reward

THE experience was valuable on many counts—not least having been that already mentioned, to have seen at first hand the intensity of listener-interest across and up and down the continent, as revealed by a cross-section of all its peoples.

Primarily, of course, the attraction was this orchestra in Beethoven, and to express what one felt of the cycle as a whole it is perhaps best to speak of the Pastoral and the Seventh Symphonies, as the performance given these works shed light also upon the two final works as well as the "baby Beethoven" as represented in the earlier compositions.

The Pastoral, being programmatic, often is given performances that are casual, trite, perfunctory and at times slipshod. The Seventh with its economy of thematic material and its wealth of invention in the elaboration of this material, frequently suffers the same faults, representing as it does about the limit to which this kind of writing can be carried.

Make allowance for Koussevitzky's showmanship, there was valuable reward in seeing him conduct these works. In the Pastoral there was never a moment during which all the inner parts of the composition were not clearly placed; and in the Seventh there was never a moment when variant methods of treating the subject were not clearly revealed. Showmanship or not, it was a meticulous musicianship which made these performances stand out even above those of works which are more agreeable, from the listener's point of view.

The Festival Idea

NOTABLE in these two symphonies were such refinements as the smooth gradations of volume—especially in the strings—without loss of quality in the texture. As sections, the strings and woodwinds were particularly fine, with the solo 'cellist and flautist showing exceptional merit. The tempest passage in the third movement of the Sixth exemplified most of the virtues of both the conductor and orchestra.

There was no effort to pretend that the orchestra was not imitating a storm; but likewise there was no loss of fine musical values—mostly by reason of the control of sections with the resulting textural quality which distinguishes music from orchestral noise. The same feeling for values was carried into the succeeding joyous passage, so that much as one may mental values undoubtedly is the dominant factor underlying the world-wide interest in this festival. It is of secondary importance that the Berkshire Festival is a remarkably fine "show-window" for the Boston Symphony. It is paramount that here is a festival, without competitions and without prizes, where music is played for all comers as well as a carefully disciplined orchestra of adequate proportions can play it.

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
AUG 21 1947

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

MUSIC FOR NON-MUSICIANS

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head [illegible]dictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet, a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge or the Golden Gate Bridge or the Empire State Building and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama or Mount Shasta or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies, watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma", and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony, God forgive me! All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exact noises of industrial production? Besides, what are they trying to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth or Brahms' First or a Sousa March, the composer speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. At the end, I could have shouted "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me that go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

This Clipping From
OTTAWA, CANADA
EVENING JOURNAL

AUG 23 1947

IN MANHATTEN

Critic on Straw Hat Circuit Irked by Dead Fish Smell

By WILLIAM BOSS.
Canadian Press Staff Writer.

NEW YORK, Aug. 23.—(CP)—Drama critics forsook the stage this week, entranced by the antics of the customers.

They found it more amusing to comment on whatever it was that urged patrons to the straw-hat circuit—persons on holiday, presumably bent on enjoying themselves — to wear dinner jackets and fur wraps in temperatures of 90-plus with humidity ratings often higher.

Absence of comment on what went on behind the footlights made it obvious about their reactions to the six new plays presented during the week along the New England Summer theatre row.

There was an acid note in the Daily News, whose critic apparently suffered in Provincetown, Mass.

His agony took place in the local wharf theatre, already full of overdressed citizens, but rendered further odoriferous by fish inconsiderately dropped into the building's underpinnings by Atlantic high tides and left to rot. Besides perfumes dropped through the floorboards, scent also had to be passed among the perspiring faithful, he reported.

Anyhow.

Whatever the weather, the Donaldson awards — the theatre world's Oscars—are being presented tonight. Arthur Miller's "All My Sons" has been chosen as best play of the year and "Finian's Rainbow", by E. Y. Hamburg and Fred Saidy, best musical.

Best actor is Sir Laurence Olivier, who did "Oedipus Rex" and other plays while here with London's Old Vic company last Winter.

Ingrid Bergman's "Joan of Lorraine" made her best actress.

Twenty-three other awards were made by the New York theatre's 3,000 professionals, whose balloted decisions were announced last week in the Billboard, trade paper.

Cancelled.

Sir Barry Jackson has called off the Canadian tour he intended for the coming season. He was to have brought his Stratford-on-Avon company, all 40 performers, for a six-month tour of Canada and the United States. "The T mpest", "Cymbeline", "Macbeth" and Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus" were to have been among works presented. Either the Summer heat or the Winter cold, as well as Britain's dollar troubles, surely numbered among his difficulties.

The critics' circle will have seven new Broadway shows to pass on in September. Agents say even more are likely.

Judas.

Eyes focus most on "Dear Judas", a religious play in which the traitor apostle is placed in sympathetic light as a friend of the Holy Family.

A semi-official Roman Catholic group already has protested the blank-verse play written by Michael Myerberg, based on a poem by Robinson Jeffers. Myerberg almost called his project off, but encouragement from The Churchman, a Protestant publication, persuaded him to continue.

His production will give New York a new twist in staging. It will employ one set devised in three planes. Main piece of scenery will be an artificial tree to cost more than $5,000.

And Going Strong.

Longest present Broadway run will be marked Monday when "The Voice of the Turtle" gives its 1,400th performance. John Van Druten's comedy has been surpassed for longevity on Broadway only by "Life With Father", "Tobacco Road", "Abie's Irish Rose" and "Arsenic and Old Lace". Acting The Turtle's only three characters now are Louisa Horton, Boyd Crawford and Peggy French.

One Way.

Last Saturday, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston symphony Orchestra found one remedy for the heat. He married Olga Naumoff, his secretary of 18 years' standing and headed with her into the Atlantic breezes on a liner trip to Europe.

The conductor said he was on a musical exploration as well as a honeymoon. Looking for new composers, he also seeks "one-named Messian" whom before the war he commissioned to do a 10-movement symphony. As Messian's a modern, some critics still haven't wished the maestro success.

Meanwhile, they do envy him those breezes. . .

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

AUG 23 1947

Hub Symphony Trades Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor since 1924 was traded yesterday to the New York Philharmonic for Bruno Walter, two violin players, a cellist, and an undisclosed amount of cash, the Symphony's front office announced last night. The trade is expected to strengthen both outfits. Koussevitzky, noted for his handling of younger players, will be invaluable in bringing along the recruits that came up through the Philharmonic's farm system last spring. Boston gains needed strength in the string section which has been notoriously weak. The Symphony front off also announced that Ersatz, the triangle player, has been sent back to the Red River Silver Cornet Bank in the Cornhusker League for further seasoning; he failed to come up with a bingle at critical juncture in last Friday's concert.

As a silly season pastime, you might work out for yourself some engaging variations on the theme. After all, why shouldn't the musical world have the same tightly-knit organization the baseball industry finds profitable?—Executives' Digest.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

AUG 23 1947

Two-Hour Program

Artists of World-wide Fame Due at Stadium Tomorrow

40 Bands and Many Soloists to Appear At Festival of Quebec Amateur Bands

Several internationally known artists will contribute to the program tomorrow evening at the Montreal Stadium, Delorimier and Ontario streets, at the festival of the Quebec Amateur Bands Association, in which 40 bands from as many Quebec towns and 2,000 instrumentalists will take part.

Among them will be Alfred Gallodoro, of New York, clarinetist and saxaphonist, Leona May Smith, woman cornetist of the Radio City Music Hall orchestra, and Joseph Victor Laderoute, tenor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAURICE COUTU, of Shawinigan Falls, co-organizer with Edgar Genest, of the Bands Festival to be held tomorrow evening at the Montreal Stadium. He is secretary-treasurer of the Quebec Amateur Bands Association.

The program will begin at 7.30 o'clock, with a review-parade of the bands, to be identified by a commentator, E. Ferdinand Daemen. Each band, consisting of from 45 to 70 musicians, will play a different march. The two-hour program will include several numbers by the entire massed bands, "Summertime," written by George Gershwin, cornet solos by Miss Smith in "Au Clair de la Lune" and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," and a sing-song of Canadian folk songs, led by Rev. Charles Emile Gadbois.

Canadian folklore will also be interpreted by the local quartet, "Imperial Grenadiers," composed of Francois Brunet, Albert Viau, Paul Emile Corbeil and David Rochette, who have been singing together since 1930.

Played In Picture

Gallodoro, one of the soloists, was engaged in 1942 by the N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowsky. He had played successively with the orchestras of Isham Jones, Rudy Vallee, Dave Rubinoff, Nataniel Shilkret and Paul Whiteman. He also played clarinet in the picture "Rhapsody in Blue."

Three years ago, Laderoute, the tenor soloist, together with Pierrette Alarie, won a Metropolitan Opera contest. Recently he has distinguished himself with the N.B.C. and Boston Symphony Orchestras. He will shortly appear in the new English Opera, "Peter Grimes" by Leonard Bernstein, and will also have the main part in the Mozart Opera, "Idomenee."

Co-organizers of the festival are Edgar Genest and Maurice Coutu, assisted by Arthur Vinet, president of the association, and Emile Rouillier, vice-president. The committee of music directors is composed of Lucien Rochon, Ralph Nolet and Philippe Fillon.

Mayor Camillien Houde will preside at the festival, and the Provincial Government will be represented by three ministers. Each of the 40 cities represented by bands will send its mayor.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

AUG 23 1947

Latin-America Concert At Hermitage Monday

Joseph Victor Laderoute, one of the most successful tenors Canada has produced in recent years, has been chosen by the Latin American section of the CBC International Service to appear in joint recital with Jorge Bolet, the Cuban pianist, in a concert broadcast to be given at the Hermitage on Monday, under the general direction of Philip Cook. The event is open free to the public and is a part of the policy of integrating Canadian and Latin-American cultures.

GEORGE BOLET

Mr. Laderoute is regarded as one of the most versatile singers before the public today in North America. It has been said of him that hard work, great intelligence and outstanding musicianship have won him his leading position as much as beauty of voice. No less conductors than Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky have specially honored Mr. Laderoute by choosing him for leading roles under their direction.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

AUG 23 1947

Tommy Dorsey, Woody Herman, and Dave Barbour will indulge in a little trombone-clarinet-and-guitar jam session during the Summer Electric Hour tomorrow (CBS, 4:30).

Maria Kurenko who has, according to one critic, the soprano voice most perfectly adapted to broadcasting, performs again Sunday afternoon with the CBS Symphony (CBS, 3). The program will feature Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4. Mr. Berezowsky has been associated with the Symphony for many years, as first violinist, and on several occasions as conductor. Tomorrow afternoon he will take his usual place in the violin section while Bernard Herrmann conducts his symphony. "But," he adds quickly, "the violin part is very difficult to play." The composition is reflective and lyric in style, and though this is its radio premiere, it was first played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in the season of 1943-44. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor, to whom Berezowsky and his wife and children were deeply devoted.

This Clipping From
NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS
AUG 23 1947

Pops Concert Committee Meets Tues.

Tickets To Be Ready For Distribution To General Public Wednesday

Tickets for the Naugatuck Daily News "Pops" concert will be available Tuesday evening at a meeting of the committee to be held in the office of the News at 7:30 o'clock, it was announced today.

Distribution of the tickets to the general public will commence Wednesday for the novel musical event, which will be held Friday evening, Sept. 12 on the Tuttle Lawn at 8 o'clock.

Considered a step toward advancing musical activities in Naugatuck, the more than 30-member committee is already working diligently under the co-chairmanship of Jesse F. Davis and Mrs. John J. Wrinn.

The program of light classical and popular compositions will be played by the Waterbury Civic orchestra under the direction of Mario DiCecco. The orchestra includes a personnel of about 50 musicians, the majority being professionals in the field of music.

Mr. DiCecco, who is well-known for his furtherment of music in the area, does not compare the orchestra with the Boston Symphony or the New Haven Philharmonic, but standing on its own record, there is shown great strides in its presentation of the better type music to the public.

There will be nothing "stuffy" about the program to be presented in Naugatuck, for it is the expressed intentions of the orchestra conductor and the committee to present to the borough's residents an evening of good music for enjoyment and relaxation.

The local newspaper is sponsoring the event for the pleasure of the borough's populace. Any profit realized from the proceeds after all expenses are paid will be given to the committee, which will establish a fund for the purpose of furthering musical activities in the borough.

It is expected between 1,500 and 2,000 adults and children will attend the concert, which in the case of rain Sept. 12, will be held Sunday, Sept. 14 at the same time and place.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

AUG 23 1947

Maria Kurenko who has, according to one critic, the soprano voice most perfectly adapted to broadcasting, performs again Sunday afternoon with the CBS Symphony (CBS, 3). The program will feature Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4. Mr. Berezowsky has been associated with the Symphony for many years, as first violinist, and on several occasions as conductor. Tomorrow afternoon he will take his usual place in the violin section while Bernard Herrmann conducts his symphony. "But," he adds quickly, "the violin part is very difficult to play." The composition is reflective and lyric in style, and though this is its radio premiere, it was first played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in the season of 1943-44. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor, to whom Berezowsky and his wife and children were deeply devoted.

This Clipping From
OTTAWA, CANADA
EVENING JOURNAL

AUG 23 1947

IN MANHATTEN

Critic on Straw Hat Circuit Irked by Dead Fish Smell

By WILLIAM BOSS.
Canadian Press Staff Writer.

NEW YORK, Aug. 23.—(CP)—Drama critics forsook the stage this week, entranced by the antics of the customers.

They found it more amusing to comment on whatever it was that urged patrons to the straw-hat circuit—persons on holiday, presumably bent on enjoying themselves — to wear dinner jackets and fur wraps in temperatures of 90-plus with humidity ratings often higher.

Absence of comment on what went on behind the footlights made it obvious about their reactions to the six new plays presented during the week along the New England Summer theatre row.

There was an acid note in the Daily News, whose critic apparently suffered in Provincetown, Mass.

His agony took place in the local wharf theatre, already full of overdressed citizens, but rendered further odoriferous by fish inconsiderately dropped into the building's underpinnings by Atlantic high tides and left to rot. Besides perfumes dropped through the floorboards, scent also had to be passed among the perspiring faithful, he reported.

Anyhow.

Whatever the weather, the Donaldson awards — the theatre world's Oscars—are being presented tonight. Arthur Miller's "All My Sons" has been chosen as best play of the year and "Finian's Rainbow", by E. Y. Hamburg and Fred Saidy, best musical.

Best actor is Sir Laurence Olivier, who did "Oedipus Rex" and other plays while here with London's Old Vic company last Winter.

Ingrid Bergman's "Joan of Lorraine" made her best actress.

Twenty-three other awards were made by the New York theatre's 3,000 professionals, whose balloted decisions were announced last week in the Billboard, trade paper.

Cancelled.

Sir Barry Jackson has called off the Canadian tour he intended for the coming season. He was to have brought his Stratford-on-Avon company, all 40 performers, for a six-month tour of Canada and the United States. "The Tempest", "Cymbeline", "Macbeth" and Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus" were to have been among works presented. Either the Summer heat or the Winter cold, as well as Britain's dollar troubles, surely numbered among his difficulties.

The critics' circle will have seven new Broadway shows to pass on in September. Agents say even more are likely.

Judas.

Eyes focus most on "Dear Judas", a religious play in which the traitor apostle is placed in sympathetic light as a friend of the Holy Family.

A semi-official Roman Catholic group already has protested the blank-verse play written by Michael Myerberg, based on a poem by Robinson Jeffers. Myerberg almost called his project off, but encouragement from The Churchman, a Protestant publication, persuaded him to continue.

His production will give New York a new twist in staging. It will employ one set devised in three planes. Main piece of scenery will be an artificial tree to cost more than $5,000.

And Going Strong.

Longest present Broadway run will be marked Monday when "The Voice of the Turtle" gives its 1,400th performance. John Van Druten's comedy has been surpassed for longevity on Broadway only by "Life With Father", "Tobacco Road", "Abie's Irish Rose" and "Arsenic and Old Lace". Acting The Turtle's only three characters now are Louisa Horton, Boyd Crawford and Peggy French.

One Way.

Last Saturday, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston symphony Orchestra found one remedy for the heat. He married Olga Naumoff, his secretary of 18 years' standing and headed with her into the Atlantic breezes on a liner trip to Europe.

The conductor said he was on a musical exploration as well as a honeymoon. Looking for new composers, he also seeks "one named Messian" whom before the war he commissioned to do a 10-movement symphony. As Messian's a modern, some critics still haven't wished the maestro success.

Meanwhile, they do envy him those breezes. . .

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

AUG 23 1947

Hub Symphony Trades Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor since 1924 was traded yesterday to the New York Philharmonic for Bruno Walter, two violin players, a cellist, and an undisclosed amount of cash, the Symphony's front office announced last night. The trade is expected to strengthen both outfits. Koussevitzky, noted for his handling of younger players, will be invaluable in bringing along the recruits that came up through the Philharmonic's farm system last spring. Boston gains needed strength in the string section which has been notoriously weak. The Symphony front office also announced that Ersatz, the triangle player, has been sent back to the Red River Silver Cornet Bank in the Cornhusker League for further seasoning; he failed to come up with a bingle at a critical juncture in last Friday's concert.

As a silly season pastime, you might work out for yourself some engaging variations on the theme. After all, why shouldn't the musical world have the same tightly-knit organization the baseball industry finds profitable?—Executives' Digest.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

AUG 23 1947

Two-Hour Program

Artists of World-wide Fame Due at Stadium Tomorrow

40 Bands and Many Soloists to Appear At Festival of Quebec Amateur Bands

Several internationally known artists will contribute to the program tomorrow evening at the Montreal Stadium, Delorimier and Ontario streets, at the festival of the Quebec Amateur Bands Association, in which 40 bands from as many Quebec towns and 2,000 instrumentalists will take part.

Among them will be Alfred Gallodoro, of New York, clarinetist and saxaphonist, Leona May Smith, woman cornetist of the Radio City Music Hall orchestra, and Joseph Victor Laderoute, tenor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAURICE COUTU, of Shawinigan Falls, co-organizer with Edgar Genest, of the Bands Festival to be held tomorrow evening at the Montreal Stadium. He is secretary-treasurer of the Quebec Amateur Bands Association.

The program will begin at 7.30 o'clock, with a review-parade of the bands, to be identified by a commentator, E. Ferdinand Daemen. Each band, consisting of from 45 to 70 musicians, will play a different march. The two-hour program will include several numbers by the entire massed bands, "Summertime," written by George Gershwin, cornet solos by Miss Smith in "Au Clair de la Lune" and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," and a sing-song of Canadian folk songs, led by Rev. Charles Emile Gadbois.

Canadian folklore will also be interpreted by the local quartet, "Imperial Grenadiers," composed of Francois Brunet, Albert Viau, Paul Emile Corbeil and David Rochette, who have been singing together since 1930.

Played In Picture

Gallodoro, one of the soloists, was engaged in 1942 by the N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowsky. He had played successively with the orchestras of Isham Jones, Rudy Vallee, Dave Rubinoff, Nataniel Shilkret and Paul Whiteman. He also played clarinet in the picture "Rhapsody in Blue."

Three years ago, Laderoute, the tenor soloist, together with Pierrette Alarie, won a Metropolitan Opera contest. Recently he has distinguished himself with the N.B.C. and Boston Symphony Orchestras. He will shortly appear in the new English Opera, "Peter Grimes" by Leonard Bernstein, and will also have the main part in the Mozart Opera, "Idomenee."

Co-organizers of the festival are Edgar Genest and Maurice Coutu, assisted by Arthur Vinet, president of the association, and Emile Rouillier, vice-president. The committee of music directors is composed of Lucien Rochon, Ralph Nolet and Philippe Fillon.

Mayor Camillien Houde will preside at the festival, and the Provincial Government will be represented by three ministers. Each of the 40 cities represented by bands will send its mayor.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

AUG 23 1947

Latin-America Concert At Hermitage Monday

Joseph Victor Laderoute, one of the most successful tenors Canada has produced in recent years, has been chosen by the Latin American section of the CBC International Service to appear in joint recital with Jorge Bolet, the Cuban pianist, in a concert broadcast to be given at the Hermitage on Monday, under the general direction of Philip Cook. The event is open free to the public and is a part of the policy of integrating Canadian and Latin-American cultures.

GEORGE BOLET

Mr. Laderoute is regarded as one of the most versatile singers before the public today in North America. It has been said of him that hard work, great intelligence and outstanding musicianship have won him his leading position as much as beauty of voice. No less conductors than Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky have specially honored Mr. Laderoute by choosing him for leading roles under their direction.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

AUG 23 1947

Tommy Dorsey, Woody Herman, and Dave Barbour will indulge in a little trombone-clarinet-and-guitar jam session during the Summer Electric Hour tomorrow (CBS, 4:30).

Maria Kurenko who has, according to one critic, the soprano voice most perfectly adapted to broadcasting, performs again Sunday afternoon with the CBS Symphony (CBS, 3). The program will feature Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4. Mr. Berezowsky has been associated with the Symphony for many years, as first violinist, and on several occasions as conductor. Tomorrow afternoon he will take his usual place in the violin section while Bernard Herrmann conducts his symphony. "But," he adds quickly, "the violin part is very difficult to play." The composition is reflective and lyric in style, and though this is its radio premiere, it was first played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in the season of 1943-44. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor, to whom Berezowsky and his wife and children were deeply devoted.

This Clipping From
NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS

AUG 23 1947

Pops Concert Committee Meets Tues.

Tickets To Be Ready For Distribution To General Public Wednesday

Tickets for the Naugatuck Daily News "Pops" concert will be available Tuesday evening at a meeting of the committee to be held in the office of the News at 7:30 o'clock, it was announced today.

Distribution of the tickets to the general public will commence Wednesday for the novel musical event, which will be held Friday evening, Sept. 12 on the Tuttle Lawn at 8 o'clock.

Considered a step toward advancing musical activities in Naugatuck, the more than 30-member committee is already working diligently under the co-chairmanship of Jesse F. Davis and Mrs. John J. Wrinn.

The program of light classical and popular compositions will be played by the Waterbury Civic orchestra under the direction of Mario DiCecco. The orchestra includes a personnel of about 50 musicians, the majority being professionals in the field of music.

Mr. DiCecco, who is well-known for his furtherment of music in the area, does not compare the orchestra with the Boston Symphony or the New Haven Philharmonic, but standing on its own record, there is shown great strides in its presentation of the better type music to the public.

There will be nothing "stuffy" about the program to be presented in Naugatuck, for it is the expressed intentions of the orchestra conductor and the committee to present to the borough's residents an evening of good music for enjoyment and relaxation.

The local newspaper is sponsoring the event for the pleasure of the borough's populace. Any profit realized from the proceeds after all expenses are paid will be given to the committee, which will establish a fund for the purpose of furthering musical activities in the borough.

It is expected between 1,500 and 2,000 adults and children will attend the concert, which in the case of rain Sept. 12, will be held Sunday, Sept. 14 at the same time and place.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

AUG 23 1947

Maria Kurenko who has, according to one critic, the soprano voice most perfectly adapted to broadcasting, performs again Sunday afternoon with the CBS Symphony (CBS, 3). The program will feature Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4. Mr. Berezowsky has been associated with the Symphony for many years, as first violinist, and on several occasions as conductor. Tomorrow afternoon he will take his usual place in the violin section while Bernard Herrmann conducts his symphony. "But," he adds quickly, "the violin part is very difficult to play." The composition is reflective and lyric in style, and though this is its radio premiere, it was first played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in the season of 1943-44. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor, to whom Berezowsky and his wife and children were deeply devoted.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 24

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

ARTHUR BERGER'S Serenade—played for the first time on the radio by Bernard Herrmann and the C. B. S. Symphony on the Aug. 13 Invitation to Music—is a piece in one movement which, except for brief slow interludes, is kept going by ostinato figures. Its idiom is untraditionally modern to the point of being, for me, incoherent; and the ostinato figures perform the additional function of providing an element of coherence in the progression.

Milhaud's "Household Muse"—also played for the first time on the radio on the same occasion—is supposed to be the musical record of the day's events in the home. I could detect no connection between most of the brief movements and their titles, but found several of them enjoyable simply as pieces of music. It was an excellent idea to slip in each title before the particular movement, and would have been even better without the elaborately varied introductory phrase before each title.

The week before, Invitation to Music offered a Suite for strings by Szabo, a Hungarian who transplanted himself to Russia, where he writes the facile simplicities that Russians write.

All these works were well performed by the excellent orchestra under Herrmann's direction.

* * *

At two of its Sunday afternoon broadcasts (August 3 and 10) the N. B. C. Symphony was conducted by one of its own members, Milton Katims, who plays at the first stand of the violas, and who also plays chamber music with the Budapest Quartet. I heard only the performances of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony (K.297) and two excerpts from Copland's music for "Rodeo." A publicity release said that Katims had prepared for the broadcasts with the help of Toscanini; and one could take as evidence of this the real Andantino tempo of the exquisite middle movement. This moderately paced movement was played with at least some degree of plasticity and ease; but in the Allegros there was a tense, hard pushing of the sounds into place instead of a relaxed allowing them to fall easily into place, and there were only solid masses of tone, not textures of sensitively inflected tonal lines.

* * *

Maybe there is some one who could put Mussorgsky's "The Flea" across in English, but I doubt it; for what the English words do is to reveal the absence of anything in the text to justify those passages of laughter. And in Pinza's performance on the August 4 Telephone Hour not only was the laughter more hollow and phony because of the way he hammed it up, but the song was laid waste by his heavy foreign accent. On the other hand his voice was beautifully deployed in the sustained legato phrases of Lully's "Bois epais," and "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi" from Mozart's "Figaro" was delivered with all the Pinza dramatic exuberance, but with its effect lessened by an orchestral accompaniment that could not manage to catch up with his singing.

The technician with whom I have been corresponding about the recent Boston Symphony broadcasts is sure their defects were caused by microphone placement and by use of a volume compressor which "on very loud sonorities cut down the sound level like a rabbit punch and produced with this unnatural change of volume level the severe harmonic distortion that you heard as disintegration." And he insists it is my duty to demand answers from A. B. C. to these questions: "(1) why was this compressor used at such an extraordinary level, and (2) why wasn't it readjusted in the successive broadcasts when its distortion must have been obvious?" But I insist it is the radio public's duty to demand those answers of A. B. C., and that only the public's demand will have any effect.

Here are a few programs:

Today—A.M.: Works of Boccherini, Faure and Ravel, played by Sydney Edwards, cellist, and Mario Janaro, pianist, WJZ, 8.30 P.M.: Sonatas of Haydn and Mozart, WQXR, 1; Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4, music of Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff, played by the C.B.S. Symphony under Herrmann with Maria Kurenko, soprano, C.B.S., 3.

Monday—P. M.: Mozart's Requiem, WNYC, 9.

Tuesday—P.M.: Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 453, WQXR, 11:15.

Wednesday—P.M.: Haydn's Symphony No. 83, played by the C.B.S. Symphony under Herrmann, C.B.S., 11:30.

Thursday—P.M.: Choral music of Vaughan Williams, sung by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Singers, NB.C., 11:30.

Saturday—P.M.: Works of Borodin, Lalo, Berlioz and Debussy, played by the American Broadcasting Symphony under Bronislav Gimpel with Arnold Eidus, violinist, WJZ, 5; quartets of Haydn and Schubert, WQXR, 11.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
AUG 23 1947

The Music World . .

Two Pop Concerts Will End Season

BY ELMORE BACON

Presenting the final concerts the coming week the Cleveland Summer Symphony's longest and most successful Pop Concert season comes to a close.

It is expected that the final concert will bring the total attendance at the Public Hall music fiestas to 125,000, a record of which the Musical Arts Association sponsoring the season may well be proud.

Under the gifted direction of Dr. Rudolph Ringwall, whose program comments and general informal microphone stance have been prime factors in the public's approval of these concerts, a long list of excellent soloists has been presented along with programs that please all tastes.

The coming week also features at Public Hall the forerunner of a busy music season—a concert by the Vatican Singers, the group making its Cleveland debut under direction of the Rt. Rev. Mons. Licinio Refice.

Another music event in keeping with the summer season is the concert to be given by the Cleveland Municipal Band under the fine direction of Angelo Vitale at Gordon Park tomorrow afternoon at 4, the program to be repeated Thursday evening at 8 at Edgewater Park.

Pop Concert Finals

Eunice Podis makes her second appearance of the season at the Pop Concert Wednesday evening, playing the famous Tschaikowsky Piano Concerto. And the final concert a week from tonight presents two soloists, Mildred Mueller, mezzo soprano, well known Cleveland singer, and Richard Kapuscinski, first cellist of the Summer Symphony, the latter playing the first movement of the Lalo Concerto in D Minor.

Miss Podis is making her ninth appearance at these pop concerts, being soloist there more times than anyone else. She has made rapid strides as a concert pianist since starting her career as a protege of Frances B. Kortheuer a few years ago. Her fine artistry has won her a wide following in Cleveland as well as along the radio lanes on which she has broadcast with major orchestras.

Director Ringwall offers music on the familiar side mostly for this final Wednesday program, including Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary," Prelude of "Hansel and Gretel," "A Night on Bald Mountain," "New Moon" excerpts, the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "Singing In the Rain" as arranged by Maurice Leysens, member of the orchestra's violin section.

Mildred Mueller

Eunice Podis

Saturday Pop

Miss Mueller, well known Cleveland singer, a graduate of the Institute of Music where she studied with Marie Simmelink Kraft, sang with the Boston Pops earlier this season. She has just completed her second year of study at the Berkshire Music Festival with Boris Gold[illegible]

The Mueller program on the final Saturday night concert includes "O Mio Fernando" from "La Favorita," and the Gypsy Song from "Carmen." Familiar encores will be forthcoming.

Cellist Kapuscinski was cello soloist for the Philadelphia Opera Co. for two years prior to his graduation from the Curtis Institute of Music. A member of the Cleveland Orchestra for four years, he shares the assistant solo chair. A former student of Leonard Rose and Felix Salmond, he has been first cellist at the Pops for three years.

Director Ringwall and the orchestra present an all request program at this final concert, the compositions receiving the most requests being the Overture to "Mignon," the Largo from the New World Symphony, "Finlandia," Debussy's "Arabesques," the Liszt "Les Preludes," and "Deep Purple." Tickets for the concerts are available at Taylor's and on concert nights at the Lakeside ticket office at Public Hall.

Thomas L. Sidlo, president of the Musical Arts Association, in summing up this most successful pop season, expressed gratitude to the Pop patrons as well as to the Friends of the Cleveland Orchestra whose contributions to the maintenance fund make the summer concerts possible.

Vatican Singers

The Vatican Singers, a group touring the United States and Canada by special authorization of Pope Pius XII, come to Public Hall for a concert Tuesday evening under direction of Rt. Rev. Mons Licinio Refice, Professor Superior at the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music in Vatican City. The choir includes 24 boy sopranos and 30 men—all singers from the various churches in Vatican City.

Their program includes music of Palestrina, Vittorio Viadana and other masters of religious music, as well as Mons. Refice's own "Messa Italica," and other numbers Ferruccio Vignanelli is accompanist.

Park Concerts

Angelo Vitale, one of the best known Cleveland band directors, and long a prominent figure in musical circles, directs the Cleveland Municipal Band in a free concert at Gordon Park tomorrow afternoon at 4.

He repeats the program Thursday night at 8 at Edgewater Park. The program includes "The Dance of the Hours," Brahms Hungarian Dance No. 5, "Desert Song" excerpts, "Southern Roses Waltz," by Strauss, Goldman's "On the Mall" and other music.

These concerts are financed by the Cleveland Federation of Musicians and are given under sponsorship of the city recreation department.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
AUG 23 1947

Phonograph Becomes Live Orchestra's Rival

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 23 (U.P.)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this Summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of the Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

Gives Wider Range

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" overture. Midway in the performance the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Of course the instrument used was a de luxe model, which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate, for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to [illegible]

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All," which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Old Records Played

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by M-G-M, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
AUG 24 1947

Speaking of Records

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have turned out a fine recording of Prokofieff's Romeo and Juliet, Ballet Suite No. 2. Released recently by RCA Victor, the album's four sides comprise the Second Suite's first, second, fourth, and seventh movements.

With the first bars of the opening movement, "Montagues and Capulets," Prokofieff sets the stage for the tragedy that is to follow. The introduction is slow and intensely tragic. The music then flows into a strutting allegro, charming and melodic, that is perfectly descriptive of the pride-bound families involved. In contrast, a graceful mid-section represents Juliet dancing.

The second movement, "Juliet the Maiden," is a fine tone portrait of Juliet, and the flute work in this portion is especially good. Here, one sees Juliet's growth from an impulsive girl into a young woman aware of love. "The Dance" which follows is spicy, shaded with a touch of irony. "Romeo and Juliet's Grave," the concluding movement is a beautifully poignant lament.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
AUG 24 1947

Under Koussevitzky's direction, the Boston Symphony performs Prokofieff's colorful composition in a sure but delicate manner. The orchestra gave the Second Suite its American premiere, under the composer's baton, on March 25, 1938, in Boston. Both the performance and the recording are excellent.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 24 1947

Fall also means football and again this year, WNBH-ABC will be on hand Saturday afternoons at the major football contests. The curtain goes up on the gridiron classics a week from Wednesday night when ABC sports director Harry Wismer broadcasts the annual Fresh Air Fund football game from New York. This year, the Eastern College All-Stars with Army spearheads Glenn Davis and Doc Blanchard, meet the New York Giants, Eastern professional football champions. Regular Saturday afternoon games start on Sept. 27.

Another Fall change of note is the result of the American Broadcasting Company's policy of "patterned programming." Under this new setup, Tuesday night on WNBH-ABC becomes serious in nature. And leading the parade of serious programs will be "America's Town Meeting" and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Sept 2, Town Meeting moves to 8:30 Tuesday nights and is to be followed by the hour-long broadcast of the symphony. A series of other news and discussion programs is also being arranged for that night.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 24 1947

WNBH SHAVINGS: Allen Prescott subs for Don McNeill on Monday and Tuesday again this week on the Breakfast Club . . . Jim Lanagan and Jim Gleason will be at the ringside to broadcast the Jackie Weber-Buddy Hayes championship fight from Sargent Field at 9:30 Tuesday night . . . Walter Winchell, "America's Town Meeting" and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all heard over WNBH-ABC, are featured in the newest March of Time documentary film . . Paul Whiteman interviews Morton Gould and plays a rare Louis Armstrong record on his Paul Whiteman Club at 3:30 tomorrow afternoon . . . Louella Parsons interviews movie producer Jerry Wald at 9:15 tonight and Harry Von Zell substitutes for vacationing Jimmie Fidler 15 minutes later . . . Mary Lou Williams is "Piano Playhouse" guest star at 11 Saturday morning . . . David Harding deals with some free-lance spies when he solves the "Case of the Stolen Report" at 5:30 this afternoon . . . The "Listening Post" devotes itself to a special program of narration and songs dedicated to Irving Berlin at 10:45 tomorrow morning . . . "Call Not Any Man a Fool," illustrating the need for understanding one another, is the "Greatest Story Ever Told" at 6 tonight.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
AUG 24 1947

THE RADIO PREMIERE

. . . of Nicolai Berezowsy's Symphony No. 4 will be given by the CBS symphony orchestra under the direction of Bernard Herrmann at 1 o'clock this afternoon over the Columbia Network. The symphony was commissioned by Sergei Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1943 and was dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitsky to whom the composer, and his wife and children were deeply devoted. Though it was written in the time of war, the symphony is reflective and lyric in style. Mr. Berezowsky is a member of the CBS symphony and will take his usual place in the violin section while Mr. Herrmann conducts his symphony.

THE SAN CARLO

. . . opera company directed by Fortune Gallo will open a three week's season at the Civic Opera house in Chicago on October 6th. This will take the place of the regular series usually given by the Chicago Opera company which is not in the field this season. Twenty four performances of 14 works will comprise the repertoire; "Carmen;" "Madama Butterfly;" "Tosca"; "La Boheme"; "La Travita;" "Il Trovatore;" "Aida" "Barber of Seville"; "Cavaleria "Rigoletto"; "Faust"; "Lucia" Rusticana"; "Pagliacci" and Lohengrin."

This Clipping From
NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
AUG 24 1947

Following its policy of "patterned programming" ABC will present a period of "Block Programming." On Sept. 2 radio's oldest audience participation forum "America's Town Meeting," will shift from Thursday evening to Tuesday at 8:30. This program will be followed by the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts.

* * *

Thus by putting two programs of similar serious appeal back-to-back the network hopes to be of additional service to the many in the listening audience who want thought provoking forums and enjoy serious music.

Each Saturday afternoon from Sept. 27 through Nov. 8, the American Broadcasting company will air the football "game of the week" under the sponsorship of the U. S. Army and Air Forces Recruiting Service.

In addition to these seven games, ABC will broadcast the ninth annual charity football game between the Eastern Sollege All-Stars and the New York Giants, Eastern professional football champions. This game will be played at the Polo Grounds in New York Wednesday night. The game will be described in its entirety over ABC and WGH starting at 8:30.

Harry Wismer will be at the microphone to give the play-by-play account of each game.

Here is something unique in radio annals. WFMZ in Allentown, Pa., a new FM outlet, tells its listeners to tune in their nearest ABC station on evenings while it puts on a musical program. The ABC outlets air "The Greatest Story Ever Told," at that time. The FM station states, "WMFZ' regrets that it is unable to carry this program fo. you on FM. . . . since we sincerely believe it is the finest broadcast on the radio today!"

"The Greatest Story Ever Told" is broadcast over WGH each Sunday at 6:30 p.m.

"The Doctors Talk It Over" broadcast over WGH-ABC tomorrow night at 10 will take as its topic "Cerebral Palsy." This is a crippling condition, whose victims are almost as numerous as those of infantile paralysis. Authoritative facts about the program and wha can be done for it will be given o the broadcast.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS COURIER
AUG 24 1947

Liszt: "Mephisto Waltz". Arthu Rodzinski conducting the Philharmonic Symphony orchestra o New York. Col. Set X-MX-281. Two 12" records.

Technically well directed. The performance on the whole does not contain the diabolical intensity of the RCA Victor recording with the Boston Symphony. Recording good.

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
AUG 24 1947

New Records:

Columbia Produces First Full Opera Recording Since War

By HUBERT ROUSSEL

Columbia has brought out the first complete recording of an opera since the war—a version of "Traviata" by the company of the Rome Opera House with Vincenzo Bellezza conducting. The reproduction is of unusual quality. That can hardly be said of all the artists involved, but the general results are good reward for the effort expended.

Principal singers are Adriana Guerrini as Violetta, Maria Huder as Flora and Annina, Luigi Infantino as Alfred and Paolo Silveri as Germont. Of these, only Guerrini is a really impressive performer. She has a soprano of fine strength and exceptional purity of intonation, and sings with assured style and musicianship. The voice lacks warmth—but you can't have everything nowadays. Guerrini is a brilliant Violetta. There are few sopranos about now who can do "Fors e lui" and "Sempre libera" with such firmness and ease.

Infantino is a well-routined tenor but worn, straining badly for some of his top notes, and is not the musician that his partner is. Silveri does a workmanlike Germont, but one that offers few points of distinction. The same may be said of Maria Huber's account of the mezzo parts. The chorus is splendid and the ensembles are excitingly handled.

But in the end the most valuable artist is Bellezza, whose conducting is remarkably fresh, pointed and sensitive to this music of Verdi. He preserves fine balance and movement, and these records project a large share of the dramatic power of the opera.

◆ ◆ ◆

PROKOFIEFF, SERGE—"Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite No. 2 (excerpts), played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Victor album DM-1126.

◆ ◆ ◆

My reaction to this music is that I would like to see the ballet for which it was written. Though it had its premiere in Czechoslovakia, it now seems to reside strictly in Soviet Russia. One reason, though it may not be the principal one, is that Prokofieff wrote for the Russian taste, which demands that a single ballet fill an entire evening.

The music was finished in 1936 but production of the work was delayed. While waiting on the choreographers, the composer drew from his score two symphonic suites and a series of piano pieces. Heard on these records are four sections of the second orchestra suite. They are entitled "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Dance and "Romeo and Juliet's Grave."

This is sound, brilliant, pictorial and in its ultimate section tragic music. Koussevitzky refines it with infinite care, and the Boston orchestra plays in its most eloquent style. The result is dramatic and interesting.

◆ ◆ ◆

BEETHOVEN—Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major, played by William Kapell and the NBC Symphony orchestra, conducted by Vladimir Golschmann. Victor album DM-1132.

◆ ◆ ◆

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
AUG 24 1947

Bedetti will be heard as soloist i the Saint-Saens Violoncello No. 1, i A minor, Op. 33 and Bruch's "Ko Nidrei." The orchestra is schedule to play Auber's overture to "Masaniello," Ponchielli's "Dance of Th Hours" from "La Gioconda," ex cerpts from Rodgers' "Carousel and Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture."

Bedetti arrived here last week fo several weeks vacation before h returns to Boston to resume h work with the Boston Symphor this fall. He conducted classes 'cello and ensemble work at th Berkshire Festival during the summer.

* * *

Here's good news for Mischa E man fans in this area. He is r turning by popular demand for t fourth consecutive season.

The eminent violinist will pear here on Dec. 8 in a recital Miami Senior high school. His pearance will be sponsored by University of Miami.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
AUG 24 1947

On the Records

Concert Hall issues an unlimited plastic edition of Schumann's "Humoresque," played by Paul Loyonnet, pianist. A first-rate job (6 sides).

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, turns off Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet Ballet Suite No. 2" in distinguished fashion (Victor, 4 sides). Singles: Estralita, Ponce, and March, Korngold, played by Jascha Heifetz, violin, and Emmanuel Bay, piano (10-inch); "Fledermaus" waltzes, Strauss, transcribed by Leopold Stokowski and played by the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, conducted by Stokowski (10-inch). G. Y. L.

ABILENE, TEXAS
MORNING REPORTER NEWS
AUG 24 1947

RADIO ROW

The American Broadcasting Company's programs, America's Town Meeting of the Air and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are featured in the new March of Time documentary film on radio, titled Is Everybody Listening?

Walter Winchell, ABC's Sunday night commentator, is portrayed dramatically as America's leading radio news reporter on the basis of his vast listening audience. The documentary film presents Winchell in the fast moving and tense setting of the ABC newsroom in New York.

Other ABC programs given recognition by the new March of Time film are the documentary broadcasts, Hiroshima, Schoolteacher — 1947, and the housing programs, Slums I and Slums II.

Discovering Mrs. H. A. Twigg of Chicago and Miss Kathryn Trees of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in the audience at a recent broadcast of ABC's Breakfast Club, Toastmaster Don McNeill asked the ladies to stand and take a "bough."

When Edward Arnold, heard in the title role of ABC's Mr. President every Thursday evening, was on his vacation last week near San Francisco, he met Herbert Hoover, former chief executive. Arnold told the only living ex-president all about his program and requested information about Hoover's experiences in the White House for possible dramatization on ABC. Hoover was impressed with the idea and told Arnold that he will send him some behind-the-scenes material of his administration.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
AUG 24 194

Program Notes

Philharmonic Repertoire for Next Season and a Comparison

By John Rosenfield.

The Dallas Symphony Orchestra is one of the few such provincial establishments that enjoys the unreserved esteem of its own constituency.

We didn't say affection as most orchestras have that, even if the city apologizes for backwardness or waywardness in its problem child. Respect is another thing; the Dallas Symphony has it and is not about to lose it, either.

This priceless asset was developed, we think, by the pursuit of two policies. One, of course, has been a voluntary civic subsidy of sufficient generosity to permit the engagement of good musicians and the arrangement of adequate rehearsals. The orchestra, in short, is a notably good one.

The other is Antal Dorati's assumption that the Dallas public is as musical as any other public. The week-in-week-out programs never condescend, never patronize. They balance established repertoire with the new, the classical with the romantic and both with the contemporary. In other words, Dallas Symphony patrons hear programs of a level found in Philadelphia's Academy of Music, New York's Carnegie Hall or Boston's Symphony Hall.

-◆-

A study of last week's partial prospectus of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is illustrative. Bruno Walter, musical director, who will conduct many concerts, announces a performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote" with Leonard Rose, cellist, and William Lincer, violist. This same work is in the Dallas Symphony list with Gregor Piatigorsky and, probably, Joseph Hawthorne as solo principals.

Walter will produce Beethoven's great choral work, the "Missa Solemnis," which is not exactly duplicated on the Dallas programs. Dorati, however, has a whole choral festival for January including Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Verdi's Requiem, Kodaly's "Psalmus Hungaricus," Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater," Bach's St. Matthew Passion.

Bruno Walter rather features in his announcement the first performance in New York of a new work by Paul Hindemith entitled "Symphonia Serena." This will be played in Dallas next season. And it has already been played in Dallas, last Feb. 1 and 2 to be exact, for "Symphonia Serena" was commissioned by the Dallas Symphony Society and received its world premiere here. It is gratifying to find the composition that was beckoned and financed by Dallas now entering the repertoire of other orchestras.

-◆-

Philharmonic patrons will hear a premiere of Douglas Moore's Symphony in A Major. Dallas paralleled such programming last season with a first performance of a new Morton Gould symphony. This year the new Aaron Copland Third Symphony will have its first playing here. Vladimir Horowitz will play the Brahms B Flat Major Concerto which won't be heard in Dallas next season. Hephzibah Menuhin played it last March and the season before had Claudio Arrau as soloist.

-◆-

Leopold Stokowski headlines for his term on the Philharmonic podium the unusual bracketing of all three Debussy Nocturnes, the choral "Sirenes" along with "Nuages" and "Fetes." Dorati gave all three in January, 1946, with Miss Marion Flagg's Dallas Symphony Singers.

Stokowski will do De Falla's "El Amor Brujo," a work in which Dorati has specialized. Dorati, as a matter of fact, tried to persuade Marian Anderson to sing the hoarse gypsy songs for her appearance next season but she begged off. Instead she will be heard with the orchestra in Gustav Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," a work equally as ambitious.

Dorati will not pass up De Falla, however, having programmed "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" with Artur Rubinstein at the piano.

-◆-

Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" is a spotlighted Philharmonic project for next season with Set Svanholm and Kathleen Ferrier as soloists. It was given in Dallas last January with the same Mr. Svanholm and Suzanne Sten.

Traditional items by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky et al., making up most symphonic activity everywhere, need no collation.

If New York is to hear the Tchaikovsky Sixth, then Dallas is to hear the Fifth and so on.

It is in the comparison of featured novelties that one finds the Dallas Symphony giving to Dallas what other resident orchestras offer to the most sophisticated publics in the world.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
AUG 24 1947

On a Diet

Kathleen Bolton, always best cast in character parts, gave unrestrained joy to comedian Charles Pursell (who sat with us) in the bundling scene when the bed collapsed in its slat section just after the Hessian had been routed out. Miss Bolton leaped in beside her stage daughter, Nina Prescott; immediately Bartholomew had left his first experience with New England economy in firewood.

Pursell had been brought for an introduction by Edgar Viens, who was requested to present him. "I had so little time before I went South, but I wanted to meet you before I went away for good, and to tell you how much we appreciate your coming to see us every week." It was surprising to have such recognition for one who had never had opportunity to toss more than a fragment of a kind word here and there.

It was of interest to hear about Pursell's ambitions, how he has a skit ready for an act and thinks of producing it himself.

The presence of our two lo[illegible] debutante actresses in the same play and in such different roles makes for harmony and goodwill in the company. Martha Lewin just now is on the road to being typed, but she has served [illegible] ably in importantly [illegible] roles. She was the lure that held Colonel Sherwood in the Connecti- cut farmhouse long enough for Prudence to marry Max and has an hilarious line when accused of hayloft activities, "What I done, I done patriotic." No Hessians for her. A pleasing wench for the military eye and a knowing one.

* * *

Guests

Clement Lenom and Mrs. Lenom of New York, who have spent the Summer in and around Paris, are arriving home by plane this week. After a few days in New York, they will go to Boston. Mr. Lenom was for many years first oboist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, musical coach and director of several orchestra groups, later heading the solfeggio department at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Mrs. Lenom recently received her Master's degree in piano from Columbia and with her husband is teaching in New York. Jose Da Costa, who was for some time assistant to Mr. Lenom in teaching solfeggio at the New England Conservatory of Music, is to be host for the two musicians this week- at his Summer

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
[illegible]

Men's Lemonade Opera May Go On Tour

BY W. G. ROGERS

NEW YORK, Aug. 23.—(AP)—If you want "lemonade opera," now is the time to ask for it. Greenwich men's opera, which has attracted hundreds of New Yorkers to a Greenwich Village church basement this summer, is thinking of taking to the road.

There are two pianists, a director, a musical director and two casts, totaling about 20 persons. The cast for Mozart's "Don Giovanni" ushers and takes tickets while the other cast presents the double bill of Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" and Pergolesi's "La Serva Padrona," and then they switch around for the next performance. Lemonade is the intermission beverage.

It's a homemade affair which has won the praise of professionals, the performers fixed up their own sets, made their own costumes, even translated the operas into English. To start the ball rolling, they chipped in $25 apiece and each one, besides the invaluable experience, will get about $250 at the end of the 10-week season. They are graduates of music schools, sing in church choirs, have given their first New York recitals or have appeared with traveling opera companies.

Greenwich Men's opera is an activity of the Village Presbyterian church's "Village House" (139 W. 13th st., New York 11), of which Mr. and Mrs. Charles V. Erickson are co-directors. This summer it has presented three programs a week, and is considering a tour this fall. At every performance, Erickson estimates, from 50 to 100 persons have been turned away . . . The house seats 260 and admission is from 60 cents to $1.80.

Next season there are more ambitious plans for an "opera workshop," with a succession of small groups singing for experience. The idea was started when a soprano at the church discussed it with Musical Director Kenneth Hieber. Hieber and Director Max Leavitt assembled the current casts.

Composer Aaron Copland is on his way to Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay to lecture on a grant-in-aid from the state department. Copland is the new chairman of the United States group for Latin-American music, of which the members are Paul Bowles, Gilbert Chase, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen and Carleton Sprauge Smith. This group, under the sponsorship of the Empire Tractor Corp., offers composition scholarships in the three countries which Copland is visiting. Winners will study at the Berkshire ~~Music~~ Center, of which Copland is associate director.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 24 1947

Books and the Arts

Greenwich Mews "Lemonade Opera" May Take to Road—Prize Winning Novels Announced

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Arts Reporter

New York, Aug. 23—(AP)—If you want "lemonade opera," now is the time to ask for it. Greenwich Mews opera which has attracted hundreds of New Yorkers to a Greenwich Village church basement this summer is thinking of taking to the road.

There are two pianists, a director, a musical director and two casts, totaling about 20 persons. The cast for Mozart's "Don Giovanni", ushers and takes tickets while the other cast presents the double bill of Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" and Pergolesi's "La Serva Padrona," and then they switch around for the next performance. Lemonade is the intermission beverage.

It's a homemade affair which has won the praise of professionals. The performers fixed up their own sets, made their own costumes, even translated the operas into English. To start the ball rolling, they chipped in $25 apiece, and each one, besides the invaluable experience, will get about $250 at the end of the 10-week season. They are graduates of music schools, sing in church choirs, have given their first New York recitals or have appeared with traveling opera companies.

Plans Opera Workshop Next Season

Greenwich Mews Opera is an activity of the Village Presbyterian church's "Village House" (139 West 13th Street, New York 11) of which Mr. and Mrs. Charles V. Erickson are co-directors. This summer it has presented three programs a week, and is considering a tour this fall. At every performance, Erickson estimates, from 50 to 100 persons have been turned away . . . The house seats 260 and admission is from 60 cents to $1.80.

Next season there are more ambitious plans for an "opera workshop," with a succession of small groups singing for experience. The idea was started when a soprano at the church discussed it with Musical Director Kenneth Hieber. Hieber and Director Max Leavitt assembled the current casts.

Composer Aaron Copland is on his way to Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay to lecture on a grant-in-aid from the State Department. Copland is the new chairman of the United States Group for Latin-American Music, of which the members are Paul Bowles, Gilbert Chase, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen and Carleton Sprague Smith. This group, under the sponsorship of the Empire Tractor Corporation offers composition scholarships in the three countries which Copland is visiting. Winners will study at the Ber[illegible] of which Copland is associate director.

Hymn To Joy

Among the quiet New England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing ~~the mighty~~ symphony to its triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhood of man.

During the last war a young anti-Nazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the Beethoven Ninth, when the chorus joined in the Schiller hymn, she wrote, they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst of uneasy atomic peace. ~~The same~~ stars looked down—the stars that spoke to Schiller of a loving Father's reign.

The young anti-Nazi wrote that she wept as she listened, yet felt in her heart the joy of knowing that the law of brotherhood could not be forever hidden by the anarchy of war. Did any troubled heart the other night reach out through the botched, unhappy peace of today to the exultant joy that created the Ninth Symphong and that ordered the shining architecture of the stars?

In spite of the stupid slumbers and nightmares of men, reality breaks through to listening hearts.

This Clipping From EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW
AUG 25 1947

In This Corner

Later versions of the Tommy Dorsey-Benny Goodman bout in Hollywood have simmered down somewhat, but early editions, hot from the ringside, had Benny kicking Tommy and Tommy slugging Benny.

This all was supposed to have happened during the recording of the title song for the Danny Kay picture, "Song Is Born." On the basis of this evidence, the song already is a hit.

Trouble seems to have started when Benny kept on playing his clarinet when the music said stop. He had arrived two hours late and apparently was making up for lost time.

Speaking of time, Tommy seems to have thought they were playing 2-4 time, as in the old one-two. Benny must have thought it was a conga, one-two-three—kick.

This must indicate that Tommy, a brass man, likes to disagree with reed players. Efforts should now be made to arrange a bout with, say, the English horn player of the Boston Symphony.

This may show what happens when temperamental talent is assembled in large quantities. Artists present besides the principals in the main bout included Louis Armstrong, Charlie Barnet, and Lionel Hampton. It's too bad Jimmy Dorsey wasn't there. If his favorite sparring partner had been available, Tommy might not even have bothered with Benny.

Ballet, Duo-Pianists Among Five Cynwyd Concerts Planned This Year

A ballet troupe, a soprano, violist, duo-pianists, and a baritone will provide the five concerts planned for this fall and spring by the thriving Bala-Cynwyd Community Concert Association, now in its second season.

With more than 1200 members again subscribed, all the concerts will again be given in the Bala-Cynwyd Junior High School auditorium. George W. R. Kirkpatrick, president, has announced that membership tickets will again be mailed out before the first concert.

The chairman of the artist committee, Mrs. Wesley Dunnington, announces the following program: November 10, Virginia MacWatters, soprano; December 8, William Primrose, violist; January 30, Vronsky and Babin, duo-pianists; February 20, Slavenska and her Ballet Variante; April 5, Walter Cassel, baritone. Last year four concerts were presented.

A native Philadelphian, Virginia MacWatters, opening soloist, is currently appearing at the International Festival of Music and Drama in Edinburgh, under the direction of Conductor George Szell. Her career includes concert appearances in New York Philharmonic Stadium and Chicago Symphony Concerts, operettas, and coast-to-coast radio broadcasts.

Mr. Primrose, generally considered the world's finest viola player, left the NBC Symphony Orchestra in 1942, where he was principal violist, to devote his time to radio and concert engagements. These include Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra appearances and an extensive tour of Latin America.

Russian-born Vita Vronsky and her husband, Victor Babin, duo-pianists, are one of the leading two-piano teams. Miss Vronsky toured principal European capitals as a solo pianist. Her husband, who studied piano under Artur Schnable and composition under Franz Schreker, has had his Concerto for Two Pianos played by the Chicago Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic Society, with himself and his wife at the piano.

Mia Slavenska, the star of the movie "Ballerina" and the dancer of principal roles of such ballets as "Giselle," "Swan Lake," "Les Sylphides," "Coppelia," and "Scheherazade," brings six dancers and two pianists to Bala-Cynwyd to display a program of some of her most famous dance roles and original choreography.

Walter Cassel, baritone, is a native of Iowa who broke into concert work through radio and now sings with the Metropolitan Opera Company in such roles as Bretigny in "Manon," Valentin in "Faust" and Silvio in "Pagliacci." Among the radio programs on which he has sung are Andre Kostalanetz' program and the Sunday Evening Hour.

This Clipping From MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
AUG 24 194

Recording Tested With 'Live' Music

LENOX, Mass.—(UP)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this Summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
[illegible]

Men's Lemonade Opera May Go On Tour

BY W. G. ROGERS

NEW YORK, Aug. 23.—(AP)—If you want "lemonade opera," now is the time to ask for it. Greenwich men's opera, which has attracted hundreds of New Yorkers to a Greenwich Village church basement this summer, is thinking of taking to the road.

There are two pianists, a director, a musical director and two casts, totaling about 20 persons. The cast for Mozart's "Don Giovanni" ushers and takes tickets while the other cast presents the double bill of Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" and Pergolesi's "La Serva Padrona," and then they switch around for the next performance. Lemonade is the intermission beverage.

It's a homemade affair which has won the praise of professionals, the performers fixed up their own sets, made their own costumes, even translated the operas into English. To start the ball rolling, they chipped in $25 apiece and each one, besides the invaluable experience, will get about $250 at the end of the 10-week season. They are graduates of music schools, sing in church choirs, have given their first New York recitals or have appeared with traveling opera companies.

Greenwich Men's opera is an activity of the Village Presbyterian church's "Village House" (139 W. 13th st., New York 11), of which Mr. and Mrs. Charles V. Erickson are co-directors. This summer it has presented three programs a week, and is considering a tour this fall. At every performance, Erickson estimates, from 50 to 100 persons have been turned away . . . The house seats 260 and admission is from 60 cents to $1.80.

Next season there are more ambitious plans for an "opera workshop," with a succession of small groups singing for experience. The idea was started when a soprano at the church discussed it with Musical Director Kenneth Hieber. Hieber and Director Max Leavitt assembled the current casts.

Composer Aaron Copland is on his way to Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay to lecture on a grant-in-aid from the state department. Copland is the new chairman of the United States group for Latin-American music, of which the members are Paul Bowles, Gilbert Chase, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen and Carleton Spraugе Smith. This group, under the sponsorship of the Empire Tractor Corp., offers composition scholarships in the three countries which Copland is visiting. Winners will study at the Berk~~shire Music~~ Center, of which Copland is associate director.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 24 1947

Books and the Arts

Greenwich Mews "Lemonade Opera" May Take to Road—Prize Winning Novels Announced

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Arts Reporter

New York, Aug. 23—(AP)—If you want "lemonade opera," now is the time to ask for it. Greenwich Mews opera which has attracted hundreds of New Yorkers to a Greenwich Village church basement this summer is thinking of taking to the road.

There are two pianists, a director, a musical director apd two casts, totaling about 20 persons. The cast for Mozart's "Don Giovanni" ushers and takes tickets while the other cast presents the double bill of Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" and Pergolesi's "La Serva Padrona," and then they switch around for the next performance. Lemonade is the intermission beverage.

It's a homemade affair which has won the praise of professionals. The performers fixed up their own sets, made their own costumes, even translated the operas into English. To start the ball rolling, they chipped in $25 apiece, and each one, besides the invaluable experience, will get about $250 at the end of the 10-week season. They are graduates of music schools, sing in church choirs, have given their first New York recitals or have appeared with traveling opera companies.

Plans Opera Workshop Next Season

Greenwich Mews Opera is an activity of the Village Presbyterian church's "Village House" (139 West 13th Street, New York 11) of which Mr. and Mrs. Charles V. Erickson are co-directors. This summer it has presented three programs a week, and is considering a tour this fall. At every performance, Erickson estimates, from 50 to 100 persons have been turned away . . . The house seats 260 and admission is from 60 cents to $1.80.

Next season there are more ambitious plans for an "opera workshop," with a succession of small groups singing for experience. The idea was started when a soprano at the church discussed it with Musical Director Kenneth Hieber. Hieber and Director Max Leavitt assembled the current casts.

Composer Aaron Copland is on his way to Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay to lecture on a grant-in-aid from the State Department. Copland is the new chairman of the United States Group for Latin-American Music, of which the members are Paul Bowles, Gilbert Chase, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen and Carleton Sprague Smith. This group, under the sponsorship of the Empire Tractor Corporation offers composition scholarships in the three countries which Copland is visiting. Winners will study at the Be[illegible] of which Copland is associate director.

Hymn To Joy

Among the quiet New England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing ~~the mighty~~ symphony to its triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhood of man.

During the last war a young anti-Nazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the Beethoven Ninth. when the chorus joined in the Schiller hymn, she wrote, they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst ~~of uneasy atomic peace. The same~~ stars looked down—the stars that spoke to Schiller of a loving Father's reign.

The young anti-Nazi wrote that she wept as she listened, yet felt in her heart the joy of knowing that the law of brotherhood could not be forever hidden by the anarchy of war. Did any troubled heart the other night reach out through the botched, unhappy peace of today to the exultant joy that created the Ninth Symphong and that ordered the shining architecture of the stars?

In spite of the stupid slumbers and nightmares of men, reality breaks through to listening hearts.

This Clipping From EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW
AUG 25 1947

In This Corner

Later versions of the Tommy Dorsey-Benny Goodman bout in Hollywood have simmered down somewhat, but early editions, hot from the ringside, had Benny kicking Tommy and Tommy slugging Benny.

This all was supposed to have happened during the recording of the title song for the Danny Kay picture, "Song Is Born." On the basis of this evidence, the song already is a hit.

Trouble seems to have started when Benny kept on playing his clarinet when the music said stop. He had arrived two hours late and apparently was making up for lost time.

Speaking of time, Tommy seems to have thought they were playing 2-4 time, as in the old one-two. Benny must have thought it was a conga, one-two-three—kick.

This must indicate that Tommy, a brass man, likes to disagree with reed players. Efforts should now be made to arrange a bout with, say, the English horn player of the Boston Symphony.

This may show what happens when temperamental talent is assembled in large quantities. Artists present besides the principals in the main bout included Louis Armstrong, Charlie Barnet, and Lionel Hampton. It's too bad Jimmy Dorsey wasn't there. If his favorite sparring partner had been available, Tommy might not even have bothered with Benny.

Ballet, Duo-Pianists Among Five Cynwyd Concerts Planned This Year

A ballet troupe, a soprano, violist, duo-pianists, and a baritone will provide the five concerts planned for this fall and spring by the thriving Bala-Cynwyd Community Concert Association, now in its second season.

With more than 1200 members again subscribed, all the concerts will again be given in the Bala-Cynwyd Junior High School auditorium. George W. R. Kirkpatrick, president, has announced that membership tickets will again be mailed out before the first concert.

The chairman of the artist committee, Mrs. Wesley Dunnington, announces the following program: November 10, Virginia MacWatters, soprano; December 8, William Primrose, violist; January 30, Vronsky and Babin, duo-pianists; February 20, Slavenska and her Ballet Variante; April 5, Walter Cassel, baritone. Last year four concerts were presented.

A native Philadelphian, Virginia MacWatters, opening soloist, is currently appearing at the International Festival of Music and Drama in Edinburgh, under the direction of Conductor George Szell. Her career includes concert appearances in New York Philharmonic Stadium and Chicago Symphony Concerts, operettas, and coast-to-coast radio broadcasts.

Mr. Primrose, generally considered the world's finest viola player, left the NBC Symphony Orchestra in 1942, where he was principal violist, to devote his time to radio and concert engagements. These include Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra appearances and an extensive tour of Latin America.

Russian-born Vita Vronsky and her husband, Victor Babin, duo-pianists, are one of the leading two-piano teams. Miss Vronsky toured principal European capitals as a solo pianist. Her husband, who studied piano under Artur Schnable and composition under Franz Schreker, has had his Concerto for Two Pianos played by the Chicago Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic Society, with himself and his wife at the piano.

Mia Slavenska, the star of the movie "Ballerina" and the dancer of principal roles of such ballets as "Giselle," "Swan Lake," "Les Sylphides," "Coppelia," and "Scheherazade," brings six dancers and two pianists to Bala-Cynwyd to display a program of some of her most famous dance roles and original choreography.

Walter Cassel, baritone, is a native of Iowa who broke into concert work through radio and now sings with the Metropolitan Opera Company in such roles as Bretigny in "Manon," Valentin in "Faust" and Silvio in "Pagliacci." Among the radio programs on which he has sung are Andre Kostalanetz' program and the Sunday Evening Hour.

This Clipping From MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
AUG 24 1947

Recording Tested With 'Live' Music

LENOX, Mass.—(UP)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the ~~Boston Symphony Orchestra~~ during this Summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

[266]

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 25 1947

These Days

How Old Is Old?

By George E. Sokolsky

Herbert Hoover is now 73 years old. Bernard Baruch is 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert, and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this Country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian — which must be horrible — he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say —not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

AUG 2

DIAL DATA. A panorama of the light opera and operetta fields will be offered WELL listeners at 8:30 p. m. today when Josef Stopak conducts the third and final of ABC's Light Opera Festival series . . . On Thursday, WJR and CBS will present "Dear Mother—I'm In Jail," which deals with the parental problem of curbing the juvenile wanderlust. It will be heard at 9 p. m. on the Hallmark Reader's Digest program. . . . Two of ABC's great programs, America's Town Meeting and the Boston Symphony orchestra, are featured in the new March of Time documentary film, titled "Is Everybody Listening?" which will be released September 5.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

AUG 26 1947

A Brooklynite may be the winner of a music scholarship to be awarded a student in the metropolitan or Long Island area who enters Adelphi College at Garden City in the Fall of 1948. The scholarship will provide a year's tuition in the Adelphi music department followed by a Summer course in 1949 in the opera department at Berkshire Music School. The scholarship will be made possible by a benefit concert to be given Sept. 19 at the college by Rise Stevens of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

AUG 28 1947

Music

Interracial Symphony Orchestra Established

Through the cooperation of Musicians' Union Local 802 Everett Lee, brilliant young conductor, has organized an interracial Symphony Orchestra, with the expressed purpose of giving more young musicians of professional calibre experience in performing symphonic repertoire.

Mr. Lee, who is only 28 years old, first attracted attention and was hailed by music critics as a promising young American conductor when he took over the conductor's baton on a ten-minute notice and conducted the score of Carmen Jones. As assistant conductor of this Broadway hit he later conducted the show many times, thus attracting the attention of Leonard Bernstein, composer of the score of On the Town who engaged him as conductor for this show. He later worked with Mr. Bernstein as an assistant conductor of the New York City Symphony.

EVERETT LEE

During the war Mr. Lee was signalled out by servicemen for his efforts in bringing U. S. O. camp shows to camps, hospitals and service clubs. Among these were the Stage Door Canteen, Harlem Servicemen's Center, Fort Meade, St. Albans Hospital, Halleran Hospital and Kingsbridge Road Hospital.

Mr. Lee is a product of Cleveland Institute of Music and Juilliard School of Music. During the summer of 1946 he studied at the Berkshire Festival where he conducted symphonic and operatic scores. He is one of the conductors of the Dra-Mu Opera Company of Philadelphia and New York.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

AUG 26 1947

McManus

ABC Going Serious On Tuesday Nights

Positively the newest trend in network radio (if one network's policy can be considered a trend) is American Broadcasting Company's build-up of Tuesday nights for serious listening one night a week in the coming season.

The ABC (WJZ) Tuesday nights, by the first week in October, will shape up like this (after you retrieve the radio from the kids and The Lone Ranger, 7:30; and Lum 'n' Abner, at eight):

8:30-9:30—American's Town Meeting of the Air.
9:30-10:30—The Boston Symphony.
10:30-10:45—Labor U. S. A. (CIO and AFL alternating).
10:45-11:00—Voice of Business (NAM and U. S. Chamber of Commerce alternating).

Town Meeting, the discussion kernel of the evening, moves over on Sept. 2 from the Thursday night period it has occupied since it began some 13 seasons back. The Boston Symphony will return to the air on Oct. 6. Labor USA and The Voice of Business used to occupy early evening time Saturdays. The Voice of Business may be alternately known as It's Your Business on Chamber of Commerce nights. It is in the closing half-hour, at any rate, that the post-operational shock of the Taft-Hartley Bill may be expected to be exposed to public attention weekly by both labor and business. Following this exchange comes the regular 11 p.m. news period and music until the network shuts down at one a.m.

ABC is radio's youngest network (although it had a long pre-flight period as NBC's Blue Network) and it therefore deserves a pat on the back for taking the lead in packaging one night a week for serious-minded listeners. However, it may be fairly said that if ABC's public-spirit fathered the innovation, necessity was nevertheless its mother.

For some seasons past, Tuesday night has offered the toughest competition in the radio business, due to NBC's full bill of comedy and variety topflighters that night.

Few sponsors care to buck such audience-getters as Fibber McGee & Molly, Bob Hope, Amos 'n' Andy or even Red Skelton. Even so seasoned a competitor as CBS seems to have written Tuesday night off for its experimental and documentary efforts such as Studio One and Return Engagement opposite Fibber, Hope and Skelton although it has such standbys as We the People and Big Town in earlier hours. Mutual's big competitors on Tuesday are The Falcon and Gabriel Heatter's nightly talks but the most excitement usually results from its American Forum of the Air.

Whatever the motivating circumstances, the Tuesday night air benefits notably all around by ABC's move.

ABC's bid for comedy and variety audience comes on Wednesday nights, where this season they are very apt to collect most of the date-night audience. Lionel Barrymore with Mayor of the Town starts things off at 8 p.m. At 8:30 Vox Pop takes over with Parks Johnson and Warren Hull and their touring curiosity hunt. At nine come ABC's coups of the season, the new Abbott & Costello show and, at 9:30, Jack Paar, ex-GI comic who has been Jack Benny's Sunday night replacement this summer on NBC. At 10 Bing Crosby takes over and at 10:30 Henry Morgan.

—John T. McManus

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 28 1947

OPERA BY BRITTEN TO BE SUNG HERE

Metropolitan Acquires Rights to 'Peter Grimes'—Plans Presentation Next Season

Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," has been acquired by the Metropolitan Opera for production next season, it was learned yesterday. The work, which was first presented two years ago in London, has already become one of the most famous operas of modern times.

It was originally commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and had its première in this country Aug. 6, 1946, at the Berkshire Music Center, where two student casts played it on alternate nights with Leonard Bernstein conducting. It has also been performed in Switzerland, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Italy.

The official announcement of the production is expected from the Metropolitan Opera Association next week. Yesterday an official of Boosey & Hawkes, the publishing firm which controls the rights, would neither confirm nor deny that a contract had been signed for the production of the opera.

The Metropolitan will have a more adventurous season than it has had for a number of years, for Prokofieff's new opera, "War and Peace," is also in the offing. It was announced for last season, but the production was not ready in time to be presented.

"Peter Grimes" is based on "The Borough," a long poem by George Crabbe. The libretto was prepared by Montague Slater. It tells the story of a Suffolk (England) fisherman, who is suspected by the townsfolk of murdering two boy apprentices, and who is finally driven by the townspeople to drown himself in the sea.

The title role was sung at Tanglewood by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute, but it has been most closely associated with Peter Pears, English tenor, who took the role when the opera opened at Sadler Wells Theatre in London, June 7, 1945. Since then he has sung it in two other languages, in German in Zurich and in Italian at La Scala.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played excerpts from the opera at a concert at Carnegie Hall in March, 1946. Once it was said that Eddie Dowling was going to present the opera on Broadway, since at that time the Metropolitan seemed disinclined to present it.

"Peter Grimes" is commonly thought to be Mr. Britten's first opera, but he earlier wrote "Paul Bunyan," a choral operetta which was presented for the first time in May, 1941, at Brander Matthews Hall, Columbia University. Since the production of "Grimes," he has composed two more, "The Rape of Lucretia," which had its American première recently in Chicago, and "Albert Herring," which was played for the first time this summer at Glyndebourne in England. "Grimes" is expected to open the new London opera season at Covent Garden on Nov. 2.

INDIANAPOLIS on the AIR

By Martha McHatton

Indianapolis Ind

A special report on the 80th Congress will be heard tonight at 7:15 o'clock on WIBC in a speech y Representative Forest Harness, of the Fifth Indiana District. Representative Harness is a member of the House Committee on Military Affairs. His talk will include a discussion of the armed forces unification law, appropriations, military establishments and the orthcoming debate on universal military training.

Now that the Berkshire Music estival is finished and the Boston Symphony is taking a vacation, the ime allotted to the orchestra will e taken over for three weeks starting tonight at 7:30 o'clock on WISH-ABC for a light opera festival. Joseph Stopak, returning from his summer season as conductor of the Pittsburgh Light Opera Company, will preside over the festival, which will feature Polyna Stoska, soprano, and Ernest McChesney, tenor. Tonight's program includes Strauss' "Overture to The Bat," Friml's "Joy of Life," a medley from "Girl Crazy" (Gershwin-Caswell), Romberg's "One Alone" from "The Desert Song," Friml's "Ma Belle" from "The Three Musketeers," a medley of Vincent Youman's songs arranged by Datz Kern's "Touch of Your Hand" from "Roberta," Herbert's "Dream Melody" from "Naughty Marietta," Weill's "A Boy Like You" from "Street Scene," a medley from "Finian's Rainbow" (Lane-Datz and "Strange Music" from Wright's "Song of Norway."

Warden's Crime Cases relates the story of a murderer whose mania for chocolate led him on a one-way trip to the electric chair at 7 o'clock tonight on WIBC-Mutual.

This Clipping From DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

JUL 15 1947

George E. Sokolsky

HOW OLD IS OLD?

(Editor's note: Views expressed in this column are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the opinion of this newspaper.)

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a graying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N.B.C. Symphony.

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

New Zealand, 67 years; Sweden, 66; Netherlands, 66; United States, 65; Great Britain, 62; Germany, 61; France, 57; Italy, 55; Russia, 45, and India, 27.

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant.

George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From SUFFOLK, VA.
NEWS-HERALD

AUG 15 1947

How Old Is a Man?

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age. his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84 He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. Symphony.

THE MAGAZINE, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Breat Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young— those of my generation— we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 percent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

PHYSICAL YOUTH is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and, improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life— these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian —which must be horrible— he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek although some would say —not I, however — that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were beggins the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how— which is more than their great grand-children can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From READING, PA.
EAGLE

AUG 15 1947

George E. Sokolsky

How Old Is Old?

These Days

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the N. B. C. Symphony.

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
weden	66
etherlands	66
nited States	65
reat Britain	62
ermany	61
rance	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

hysical youth is, of course, ot the sole question. Medical cience can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
NEW ULM, MINN.
JOURNAL

AUG 11 1947

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY —

Mature America Shows Taste for Fine Music

IT WAS NOT a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "what shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne, and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were no professional musicians. Most of them cannot reconize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, many thousands were GI's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York, and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC, and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance, and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

THESE DAYS Dayton Ohio

George Sokolsky

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

Average Life Span

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Not Sole Question

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

SEATTLE, WASH.
POST INTELLIGENCER

AUG 12 1947

George E. Sokolsky

TANGLEWOOD

(Copyright, 1947, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

IT WAS NOT a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in ~~the~~ Beethoven symphonies in succession, from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?' It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

* * *

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them have never—nor could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, satisfied a yearning for perfection. This was a young audience. Many thousands were G. I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years, but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

* * *

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite, but to great masses, as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

Oldsters Have An Important Place

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Recently, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

Sokolsky

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

* * *

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Av. Span	Countries	Av. Span
New Zealand	67	Germany	61
Sweden	66	France	57
Netherlands	66	Italy	55
United States	65	Russia	45
Great Britain	62	India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way.

That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From
ALBERT LEA, MINN.
TRIBUNE

AUG 11 1947

By George E. Sokolsky

American Culture Is Now on the Upgrade

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialities in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

Mature America

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever — read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I. 's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

Cultural Upsurge

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

The above expresses the opinion of the writer only, and may not coincide with the editorial views of the TRIBUNE.

THESE DAYS Dayton Ohio

George Sokolsky

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven ~~symphonies~~ symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

Average Life Span

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Not Sole Question

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

SEATTLE, WASH.
POST INTELLIGENCER

AUG 12 1947

George E. Sokolsky

TANGLEWOOD

(Copyright, 1947, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

IT WAS NOT a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in ~~the~~ Beethoven symphonies in succession, from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire Hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?' It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

* * *

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them have never—nor could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, satisfied a yearning for perfection. This was a young audience. Many thousands were G. I.s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years, but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

* * *

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite, but to great masses, as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

Oldsters Have An Important Place

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Recently, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

Sokolsky

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods.

Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

* * *

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Av. Span	Countries	Av. Span
New Zealand	67	Germany	61
Sweden	66	France	57
Netherlands	66	Italy	55
United States	65	Russia	45
Great Britain	62	India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove.

Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way.

That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From
ALBERT LEA, MINN.
TRIBUNE

AUG 11 1947

By George E. Sokolsky

American Culture Is Now on the Upgrade

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the world series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialities in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listen—and drove back to New York—an eight hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

Mature America

The ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year—stood there facing mature America.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever — read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I. 's and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

Cultural Upsurge

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood bowl, the Robin Hood dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

The above expresses the opinion of the writer only, and may not coincide with the editorial views of the TRIBUNE.

This Clipping From
FARGO, N. D.
EVENING FORUM
AUG 15 1947

Tanglewood, America At Its Best

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Sokolsky

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration.

The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive—in spots primeval.

But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's ba fell on the last note, the audience was on feet cheering, shouting, applauding, wavi The old man—73 this year—stood there f mature America.

And that at Tanglewood means. It is something more than good music brilliantly exec Most of that huge assembly were professional musicians. Most of them not recognize a fluff by the French h r a missed note by a pianist. Most em have never—or could ever—read S 's "Ode to Joy" in the original. F them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

✣ ✣ ✣

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the N. B. C. and the Detroit symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

✣ ✣ ✣

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

And what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste.

Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state.

I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that as a constant overtone.

This Clipping From RAVENNA, OHIO
RECORD & COURIER-TRIBUNE

AUG 11 1947

GEORGE SOKOLSKY

It was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obsecne novelty. It was Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight'' It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive — in spots primeval. But Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night — listened — and drove back to New York — an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitzky's baton fell on the last note, the audience was on its feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man — 73 this year — stood there facing mature American.

And that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them can not recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never — or could ever — read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured.

Youngstown Ohio

Olivier, Orchestra, Chorus Record 'Henry V' Excerpts

By Col. L. R. Boals

RCA Victor present Laurence Olivier in spoken excerpts from Shakespeare's "Henry V" with the original music written by William Walton, supported by the Philharmonic Orchestra and Chorus, conducted by the composer, in Masterpiece album M/DM-1128.

The album is of the "recordrama" sort, containing, beside the four 12-inch disks, eight pages of illustrations and text. Notes are by Dr. J. Duncan Spaeth, professor emeritus of Princeton University. The English of Shakespeare's time being somewhat different from that of today, the printed texts are valuable. Olivier makes effective use of every oratorical device known to actors, and delivers the lines in masterly fashion.

Included are some of the speeches of the Chorus. It will be remembered that so great a Shakespearean actor as David Garrick chose for himself the part of the Chorus when he produced "Henry V," so important are these pieces of poetic declamation.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony

The Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, has recorded for RCA Victor Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, called the "Pathetique," in the six-disk album M/DM-1105. This is a brilliant performance of the beautiful and familiar music, and the recording is excellent. As is usual with Stokowski's reading, his interpretation is subjective, particularly in the 5-4 movement.

Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet"

In September, 1935, Prokofieff ompleted the music for his ballet, 'Romeo and Juliet." In its orignal form it was somewhat unwieldy because of its length, and the omposer arranged the music into wo suites. From the second of hese the Boston Symphony Orchesra, under Serge Koussevitzky, has ecorded the first, second, fourth nd seventh sections in RCA Vicor's two-disk album M/DM-1129. oussevitzky and his players exact the full flavor of this brilliant usic, and the engineers do full stice to the orchestra's gorgeous one.

Red Seal Single Records

On the two sides of 10-inch disk o. 10-1310, the Hollywood Bowl ymphony Orchestra, under Leo old Stokowski, plays waltzes from ohann Strauss's comic opera, "Di ledermaus" (The Bat). Stokowsk and the orchestra give this lilting music top-notch performance and the recording is fine.

"THESE DAYS"

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

HOW OLD IS OLD?

Copyright 1947, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitsky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

The magazine, World Report, some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young — those of my generation — we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this Country. Maybe that was low. But the United States life insurance companies having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent., have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at 73, and the little drips who complain about him.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
AUG 24 1947

These Days

Great Music By Preference

By George E. Sokolsky

IT was not a fight between Joe Louis and some contender; it was not the Army-Notre Dame game; it was not the World Series. It was not a mob that had gathered to see some obscene novelty. It was Serge Koussevitsky directing the Boston Symphony in the Beethoven Symphonies in succession from the First to the Ninth.

Twenty-four thousand Americans, socialites in boxes, students on rugs and blankets bringing their lunch with them, came from every state to hear the Fifth on a Saturday night in the Berkshire hills, far from any big city. This was no accidental response to "What shall we do tonight?" It took a great effort for many of these visitors to come to our green hills where Longfellow, Bryant, Hawthorne and a century of brilliant Americans found their inspiration. The music festival has outrun the hotels and boarding houses, the telephone system, the roads. The Berkshires remain primitive —in spots primeval. But the Americans who love music come. I met a friend who drove up that Saturday night—listened—and drove back to New York—an eight-hour trip for an hour of Beethoven.

The Ninth was done on a Tuesday night in midsummer and the audience was enormous, perhaps as many as 12,000. A chorus of 250 young music students, between the ages of 18 and 22, sang as Beethoven's chorals had never been sung before. When Koussevitsky's baton fell [illegible] feet cheering, shouting, applauding, waving. The old man—73 this year— stood there facing mature America.

AND that is what Tanglewood means. It is something much more than good music brilliantly executed. Most of that huge assembly were not professional musicians. Most of them cannot recognize a fluff by the French horn or a missed note by a pianist. Most of them have never—or could ever—read Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the original. Few of them can explain the growth of Beethoven's personality from the First to the Ninth.

But all of them, voluntarily, by a conscious effort, in accordance with their means, satisfied a yearning for perfection. As I milled in the crowd, during the intermissions, it came upon me more and more that this was a young audience, that many thousands were G. I.'s and their girls, such as decades ago might have gone to Coney Island or Brighton Beach or some such place. They are young in years but their tastes have matured. The taste of the nation has matured. The culture of the American people has been elevated from the trivialities of the moment to the eternal humanities.

For Tanglewood is but one expression of this cultural upsurge among our people. What other nation can speak of at least 35 symphonic groups spread from coast to coast, playing not only to the elite but to great masses as in the Hollywood Bowl, the Robinhood Dell concerts in Philadelphia, the Stadium Concerts in New York and in so many other cities that it is hard to keep them all in mind? And over the radio, the Philharmonic, the NBC and the Detroit Symphonies, week after week, enrich a nation with their contributions to American culture.

I speak here only of music, for at the moment it is music that has captured the imagination of American youth. This lust for a better life will pour itself into poetry, art, the dance and in time even the theater will respond to its stimulus. We are on the upgrade.

AND what is so glorious about it is the utter freedom of participation. No government plays any part in any of this. No government subsidizes, controls, lays down rules and regulations. No government official decides what shall or shall not be played, who is to perform, who is to listen. A free people choose between Beethoven and Irving Berlin and choose by taste. Tanglewood, as every noteworthy cultural development in the United States, is a voluntary product of a free people who ask nothing but the unimpaired right to pursue their own courses without interference by the state. I listened to Beethoven's Ninth at Tanglewood with that [illegible] constant overtone.

(Copyright, 1947, King Features [illegible])

New Records Set at Music Festival

Total Attendance of 145,000 Heard All Events

Interpretation of Ravel's "Bolero" by Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Dr. Koussevitzky At Closing Concert Draws Tremendous Applause. —Robert Shaw Gets Ovation.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the tenth Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a crowd of 12,000 present, which brought the total attendance for the concerts for the year to more than 106,000, a new record for the events. Counting the student concerts and the rehearsals, the total attendance this season was estimated by the directors at 145,000, a gain of 20,000 over last year.

The twelfth and final concert of the festival took place Sunday afternoon under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. It began with Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by Bohuslax Martinu, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, piano soloists. With a vigorous and brilliant opening, the pianos furnished a flashing filigree to the sharp harmonies of the orchestra. The cellos introduced the second movement with an interesting melody, the strings taking it later. It all was in striking scoring. A fast-moving third movement with the pianos executing brilliant musical maneuvers in the grand manner, the orchestra playing superbly. Mr. Martinu came down to the front of the auditorium to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" followed. It began softly with a haunting melody, subdued but smoldering like an opal, with exquisite contrasts in strings and horns. It was a delicate lace of musical beauty with harp arabesques, Dr. Koussevitzky giving a transparently beautiful reading of the score.

Ravel's famous "Bolero" concluded the first part of the program. Opening with its ingratiating melody with the snare drum emphasizing the rhythm and gradually increasing in force, the same melody runs throughout the score in different instruments and reaches a tremendous climax with full orchestra. It made a terrific impression and elicited great applause.

Tchaikovsky's great Symphony No. 4 in F minor finished the program. The symphony began with the triumphant melody of the brass. Then followed the graceful melodies of the andantino with its beautiful, quiet ending, followed by the exciting scherzo with pizzicato strings. The finale, fiery and full-blooded music played at a breath-taking [illegible] tremendous verve by the orchestra, finished in a blaze of musical fireworks.

The audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and orchestra the usual farewell ovation. The Berkshires can well thank Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and management for their efforts to make Tanglewood the musical goal of the world. Greater things are expected as the years go by, and now we look forward to the 1948 Berkshire Festival.

The eleventh program of the festival, Robert Shaw conducting, opened Saturday evening with Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft" for double chorus and orchestra. With no introduction it proceeded on its stately way with its majestic harmonies, the chorus singing with beautiful tone and precision.

Symphony of Psalms for Orchestra and Chorus by Igor Stravinsky followed the Bach number. A highly dramatic work of great difficulty, with striking effects with chorus against the astringent harmonies of Stravinsky, there were lovely passages of flowing complex harmonies, vigorous passages of flashing brilliance by the orchestra, and wonderful singing by the chorus under Mr. Shaw's brilliant direction.

After the intermission Mozart's great Requiem Mass in twelve parts was sung. Soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, [illegible] and James Pease, bass. Opening with a majestic orchestral introduction, the Mass unfolded Mozart's [illegible] music in stunning choruses, [illegible] ized with inspiring orchestral accompaniment. The soloists and chorus gave a great performance [illegible] an ovation followed for Mr. Shaw and the assisting artists.

'Hymn To Joy'

(From The Christian Science Monitor)

Aug-4-47

Among the quiet New England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of BEETHOVEN loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing the mighty symphony to its triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through SCHILLER'S "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhood of man.

During the last war a young antiNazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the BEETHOVEN Ninth. When the chorus joined in the SCHILLER hymn, she wrote, they seemed to "sing from the bottom of their hearts, as though they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst of uneasy atomic peace. The same stars looked down—the stars that spoke to SCHILLER of a loving Father's reign.

The young antiNazi wrote that she wept as she listened, yet felt in her heart the joy of knowing that the law of brotherhood could not be forever hidden by the anarchy of war. Did any troubled heart the other night reach out through the botched, unhappy peace of today to the exultant joy that created the Ninth Symphony and that ordered the shining architecture of the stars?

In spite of the stupid slumbers and nightmares of men, reality breaks through to listening hearts.

Then, speaking of an orchestra already "arrived," the Boston Symphony with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offers the Bach Suites [illegible] in B minor and D Major respectively and with Georges Laurent as solo flute, RCA Victor Album DM 1123. The third suite contains that famous Bach Air. And all performed with the customary Koussevitsky artistry.

Aug. 47

Boston Symphony Ends Season At Tanglewood

Tchaikowsky's Fourth Is Grand Climax To Tenth Season

On Sunday, August 10, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts completed its tenth season. Under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed works by Martinu Ravel, and Tchaikowsky. Assembled under the huge music shed and on the grounds of this music center was an enthusiastic audience of 12,000 people. Many members of our own community and surrounding towns took advantage of the good weather to enjoy a scenic drive north to hear this fine music.

The program opened with a o Grosso" by the modern mposer. Bohuslav Mar- is work, composed in the sic form and containing odern orchestral effects, hallenge for the orchestra and its director. Noteworthy was the performance of the strings, especially during the second movement where they were effectively muted. The second work on the program was Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte", originally composed in 1899 as a piece for piano and some years later prepared for orchestra. This soulful little melody proved to be a restful interlude between the previous work and the tempestuous one which was to follow. Ravel's "Bolero", always a popular feature, was a perfect vehicle to display the technical perfection of the Boston Symphony, particularly among the brass and woodwinds. Except for one passage where a horn foundered momentarily, the tonal brilliance achieved during most of the piece, especially the climax, was proof enough of the greatness of this orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra created a gigantic musical explosion which reverberated for miles around.

The second part of the program consisted of the familiar Symphony No. 4 in F minor by Tchaikowsky. Dr Koussevitzky, a renowned interpreter of his fellow Russian, conducted the orchestra in this symphony with his usual mastery. The crispness of the brass section could not but evoke favorable comment, particularly in the opening and final movements. At the conclusion of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received a tremendous ovation from the thousands present. It was many minutes before the cheering audience would let the orchestra and its leader leave the stage. There could not have been a more fitting climax to the 1947 Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 15 1947

By MILTON WIDDER

The tongue-in-the-cheek-writing of Sergei Prokofiev is beautifully illustrated in his ROMEO AND JULIET ballet suite recorded by RCA-Victor for this month's release. Played with brittleness and understanding by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky, the work makes good summer listening and you'll get a few good laughs out of it, too. (M-1129, $2.85.)

Two of Cesar Franck's symphonic poems, PSYCHE and LE CHASSEUR MAUDIT—rather saccharine and romantic—are played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under its ex-leader, Desire Defauw, also for Victor for Victor (M-1122, $4.85). The beauty in both compositions is without substance, and the performance on both mediocre.

Victor also announces the signing of Igor Stravinsky—the bad boy of classical music of a quarter century ago—as an exclusive recording artist for the company. The contract calls for Stravinsky to conduct recordings of his own compositions with a specially assembled orchestra. The recordings will be done in Hollywood.

Another new arist for Victor is Virginia MacWatters, coloratura soprano of England.

Strangely pleasing is Lily Pons album for Columbia Masterworks called CHANSONS, in which the Metropolitan Opera star sings French songs, poetic and meaningful, without her coloratura pyrotechniques. Such impressionistic songs as LES ROSES D'ISPAHAN by Faure; four Milhaud songs and works of Duparc are included in this highly recommended album.

There is grace and true artistry in the Pons delivery. The finesse and shadings of her voice are in this case beautiful. Two conductors and orchestra help her—her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, and Maurice Akravanel. (M-689, $4).

Richard Tucker's single for Columbia of the traditional Hebrew Day of Atonement song, KOL NIDREI, is a tearful rendition but movingly done. The other side has ELI, ELI, equally sad and dramatic.

Rensselaer, N.Y.
Review
8/1/47

. . . . .

TUESDAY . . . .

Just over the hill from us Tanglewood in the Berksh comes the Boston Symphony Dr. Serge Koussevitzky cond ing Beethoven's Ninth Symph in its entirety — broadcast having been extended until to assure this. Robert Shaw ducts the final movement, concert begins at 8:30 p.m. WOKO . . .

PERSONALITIES

Minneap

Koussevitzky

ANNOUNCED: Marriage of Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Olfa Naumoof, 46, niece of his late wife and his secretary for 18 years. After the ceremony at Koussevitzky's Lenox, Mass., estate yesterday, the bride and groom boarded the Queen Elizabeth in New York for a European honeymoon.

* * *

OBSERVED: His eighty-second birthday, by Dennis Cardinal Dougherty, one of four Roman Catholic cardinals in the United States, at the seat of the Philadelphia archdiocese whose 980,000 communicants he leads.

* * *

DEFENDED: By Alberto Varga, creator of air-brushed calendar girls, his right to four "constitutional rights: Life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness—and the right to put down on paper the beautiful women I see in my dreams." Attacker of the right: Esquire Editor David Smart, who said Varga's drawings belong exclusively to Esquire, should not be put on calendars.

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY:

Music Is for Non-Musicians

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics, and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party, with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics, but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune, and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge, or the Golden Gate Bridge, or the Empire State Building, and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama, or Mount Shasta, or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it, no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma!" and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music, and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony. All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exa noises of industrial productio Besides, what are they tryi to say? Whether it is Beetho en's Ninth, or Brahms' First, a Sousa march, the compo speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end I could have shouted, "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me who go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

CARMEL, N.Y
COURIER
7/31/47

Ruth Shaffner has been attending the concerts at Tanglewood featuring the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. Miss Shaffner manages to attend these performances in spite of a busy teaching schedule at her home in Patterson and studio in New York.

Caldwell, N.J.
Progress
8/1/47

MONTCLAIR CLUB PLANS 8th BENEFIT RECITAL

The Women's Educational Club of Montclair plans to present Carol Brice, contralto, in a recital at Montclair High School on November 5 at 8:30 P.M. Miss Brice's appearance will be the eighth benefit recital sponsored by the club since its organization in 1935. Proceeds will go to the group's scholarship fund.

The singer, since winning a Naumberg Foundation award in 1944, has appeared on the radio, in New York recitals and as soloist with orchestras as the Boston Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony and others.

New Records Set at Music Festival

Total Attendance of 145,000 Heard All Events

Interpretation of Ravel's "Bolero" by Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Dr. Koussevitzky At Closing Concert Draws Tremendous Applause. —Robert Shaw Gets Ovation.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the tenth Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a crowd of 12,000 present, which brought the total attendance for the concerts for the year to more than 106,000, a new record for the events. Counting the student concerts and the rehearsals, the total attendance this season was estimated by the directors at 145,000, a gain of 20,000 over last year.

The twelfth and final concert of the festival took place Sunday afternoon under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. It began with Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by Bohuslax Martinu, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, piano soloists. With a vigorous and brilliant opening, the pianos furnished a flashing filigree to the sharp harmonies of the orchestra. The cellos introduced the second movement with an interesting melody, the strings taking it later. It all was in striking scoring. A fast-moving third movement with the pianos executing brilliant musical maneuvers in the grand manner, the orchestra playing superbly. Mr. Martinu came down to the front of the auditorium to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte" followed. It began softly with a haunting melody, subdued but smoldering like an opal, with exquisite contrasts in strings and horns. It was a delicate lace of musical beauty with harp arabesques, Dr. Koussevitzky giving a transparently beautiful reading of the score.

Ravel's famous "Bolero" concluded the first part of the program. Opening with its ingratiating melody with the snare drum emphasizing the rhythm and gradually increasing in force, the same melody runs throughout the score in different instruments and reaches a tremendous climax with full orchestra. It made a terrific impression and elicited great applause.

Tchaikovsky's great Symphony No. 4 in F minor finished the program. The symphony began with the triumphant melody of the brass. Then followed the graceful melodies of the andantino with its beautiful, quiet ending, followed by the exciting scherzo with pizzicato strings. The finale, fiery and full-blooded music played at a breath-taking pace and with tremendous verve by the orchestra, finished in a blaze of musical fireworks.

The audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and orchestra the usual farewell ovation. The Berkshires can well thank Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and management for their efforts to make Tanglewood the musical goal of the world. Greater things are expected as the years go by, and now we look forward to the 1948 Berkshire Festival.

The eleventh program of the festival, Robert Shaw conducting, opened Saturday evening with Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft" for double chorus and orchestra. With no introduction it proceeded on its stately way with its majestic harmonies, the chorus singing with beautiful tone and precision.

Symphony of Psalms for Orchestra and Chorus by Igor Stravinsky followed the Bach number. A highly dramatic work of great difficulty, with striking effects with chorus against the astringent harmonies of Stravinsky, there were lovely passages of flowing complex harmonies, vigorous passages of flashing brilliance by the orchestra, and wonderful singing by the chorus under Mr. Shaw's brilliant direction.

After the intermission Mozart's great Requiem Mass in twelve parts was sung. Soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. Opening with a majestic orchestral introduction, the Mass unfolded Mozart's glorious music in stunning choruses, richly harmonized with inspiring orchestral accompaniment. The soloists and chorus gave a great performance and an ovation followed for Mr. Shaw and the assisting artists.

'Hymn To Joy'

(From The Christian Science Monitor)

Aug-4-47

Among the quiet New England hills the other night, under the lonely reaches of the stars, the Ninth Symphony of BEETHOVEN loosed its splendor on the air.

People far from the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival—in city rooms, on suburban porches—heard over their radios the Boston Symphony Orchestra bringing the mighty symphony to its triumphant last movement, where the chorus joins the instruments in proclaiming through SCHILLER'S "Hymn to Joy" the blessedness and universal brotherhood of man.

During the last war a young antiNazi German girl wrote a letter to American friends which was smuggled out of Germany. In it she told of listening over her radio to the Vienna Philharmonic playing the BEETHOVEN Ninth. When the chorus joined in the SCHILLER hymn, she wrote, they seemed to "sing from the bottom of their hearts, as though they were expressing the deepest longings of all the people of the earth for peace."

That was in the midst of total war. The other night it was in the midst of uneasy atomic peace. The same stars looked down—the stars that spoke to SCHILLER of a loving Father's reign.

The young antiNazi wrote that wept as she listened, yet felt in her the joy of knowing that the brotherhood could not be forey by the anarchy of war. Di bled heart the other night through the botched, today to the exultan the Ninth Sympho the shining archit

In spite of the nightmares of men, through to listening heart

---

Then, speaking of an orchestra already "arrived," the Boston Symphony with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offers the Bach Suites in B minor and D Major respectively and with Georges Laurent as solo flute, RCA Victor Album DM 1123. The third suite contains that famous Bach Air. And all performed with the customary Koussevitzky artistry.

Aug 1 47

Boston Symphony Ends Season At Tanglewood

Tchaikowsky's Fourth Is Grand Climax To Tenth Season

On Sunday, August 10, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts completed its tenth season. Under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed works by Martinu Ravel, and Tchaikowsky. Assembled under the huge music shed and on the grounds of this music center was an enthusiastic audience of 12,000 people. Many members of our own community and surrounding towns took advantage of the good weather to enjoy a scenic drive north to hear this fine music.

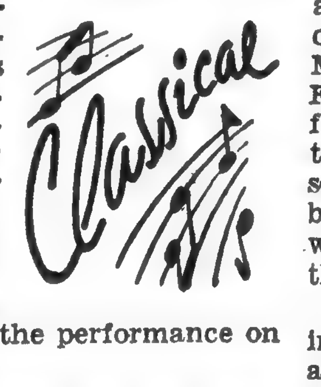
The program opened with a "Concerto Grosso" by the modern Czech composer. Bohuslav Martinu. This work, composed in the usual classic form and containing many modern orchestral effects, was a challenge for the orchestra and its director. Noteworthy was the performance of the strings, especially during the second movement where they were effectively muted. The second work on the program was Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte", originally composed in 1899 as a piece for piano and some years later prepared for orchestra. This soulful little melody proved to be a restful interlude between the previous work and the tempestuous one which was to follow. Ravel's "Bolero", always a popular feature, was a perfect vehicle to display the technical perfection of the Boston Symphony, particularly among the brass and woodwinds. Except for one passage where a horn foundered momentarily, the tonal brilliance achieved during most of the piece, especially the climax, was proof enough of the greatness of this orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra created a gigantic musical explosion which reverberated for miles around.

The second part of the program consisted of the familiar Symphony No. 4 in F minor by Tchaikowsky. Dr Koussevitzky, a renowned interpreter of his fellow Russian, conducted the orchestra in this symphony with his usual mastery. The crispness of the brass section could not but evoke favorable comment, particularly in the opening and final movements. At the conclusion of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received a tremendous ovation from the thousands present. It was many minutes before the cheering audience would let the orchestra and its leader leave the stage. There could not have been a more fitting climax to the 1947 Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 15 1947

By MILTON WIDDER

The tongue-in-the-cheek-writing of Sergei Prokofiev is beautifully illustrated in his ROMEO AND JULIET ballet suite recorded by RCA-Victor for this month's release. Played with brittleness and understanding by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky, the work makes good summer listening and you'll get a few good laughs out of it, too. (M-1129, $2.85.)



Two of Cesar Franck's symphonic poems, PSYCHE and LE CHASSEUR MAUDIT—rather saccharine and romantic—are played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under its ex-leader, Desire Defauw, also for Victor for Victor (M-1122, $4.85). The beauty in both compositions is without substance, and the performance on both mediocre.

Victor also announces the signing of Igor Stravinsky—the bad boy of classical music of a quarter century ago—as an exclusive recording artist for the company. The contract calls for Stravinsky to conduct recordings of his own compositions with a specially assembled orchestra. The recordings will be done in Hollywood.

Another new arist for Victor is Virginia MacWatters, coloratura soprano of England.

Strangely pleasing is Lily Pons album for Columbia Masterworks called CHANSONS, in which the Metropolitan Opera star sings French songs, poetic and meaningful, without her coloratura pyrotechniques. Such impressionistic songs as LES ROSES D'ISPAHAN by Faure; four Milhaud songs and works of Duparc are included in this highly recommended album.

There is grace and true artistry in the Pons delivery. The finesse and shadings of her voice are in this case beautiful. Two conductors and orchestra help her—her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, and Maurice Akravanel. (M-689, $4).

Richard Tucker's single for Columbia of the traditional Hebrew Day of Atonement song, KOL NIDREI, is a tearful rendition but movingly done. The other side has ELI, ELI, equally sad and dramatic.

Rensselaer, N.Y.
Review
8/1/47

TUESDAY . . . .

Just over the hill from us Tanglewood in the Berkshi comes the Boston Symphony w Dr. Serge Koussevitzky condu ing Beethoven's Ninth Sympho in its entirety — broadcast ti having been extended until 9 to assure this. Robert Shaw co ducts the final movement, concert begins at 8:30 p.m. o WOKO . .

PERSONALITIES

Koussevitzky

ANNOUNCED: Marriage of Serge Koussevitzky, 73, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Olfa Naumoof, 46, niece of his late wife and his secretary for 18 years. After the ceremony at Koussevitzky's Lenox, Mass., estate yesterday, the bride and groom boarded the Queen Elizabeth in New York for a European honeymoon.

* * *

OBSERVED: His eighty-second birthday, by Dennis Cardinal Dougherty, one of four Roman Catholic cardinals in the United States, at the seat of the Philadelphia archdiocese whose 980,000 communicants he leads.

* * *

DEFENDED: By Alberto Varga, creator of air-brushed calendar girls, his right to four "constitutional rights: Life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness—and the right to put down on paper the beautiful women I see in my dreams." Attacker of the right: Esquire Editor David Smart, who said Varga's drawings belong exclusively to Esquire, should not be put on calendars.

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY:

Music Is for Non-Musicians

I recently wrote about attending some concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival and brought down on my head the maledictions of the elite. Apparently no one may discuss music except those who are professionally in the business. Yet a mother sings a lullaby without the consent of A. S. C. A. P., Petrillo or the music critics.

True, I have listened to musicians and music critics talk politics and economics, and they sound like musicians. Jo Davidson, a sculptor, ran a political party, with which Paul Robeson, a musician, was associated. It seems perfectly all right for musicians to talk politics, but not for political writers to talk music. The assumption is that there is something mystical, something esoteric and mysterious about music. And yet a small boy can whistle a tune, and most of the themes of Beethoven's great symphonies are simple enough for small boys to whistle. Perhaps that is why Beethoven is greater than Copland or Stravinsky.

A layman may look at the George Washington Bridge, or the Golden Gate Bridge, or the Empire State Building, and marvel at their beauty. He is not an engineer or an architect; he knows nothing about stresses or strains. But he knows beauty. He also knows what is ugly.

One may gaze upon Fujiyama, or Mount Shasta, or the Grand Canyon without knowing anything about geology. One may, on a glorious summer night, stand under the blue of the skies watching the stars dance in the firmament without being an astronomer or a theologian. He might even in such a glorious moment have a poetic idea without being a poet, or a tune may flit through his mind without his being a musician. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know love, nor an economist to earn a living.

The expert has his place, but it is not exclusive or monopolistic. If 165,000 persons want to listen to such music as Koussevitzky provides, they will go to it, no matter what the experts say. But if they prefer Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers or Duke Ellington, they will listen to their music. "Carmen" may be a classic, but to a great many people so are "Porgy and Bess," "Show Boat" and "Oklahoma!" and who shall say them nay?

It is a matter of taste, not of knowledge. My old friend, Henry Eichheim, loved Oriental music, and he and I used to wander about Chinese cities capturing tunes. Eichheim wrote beautiful music, in the Oriental manner, seeking to adapt the quarter tone to the Western scale. I used to visit Eichheim in Santa Barbara to hear him play music that was familiar to me and pleased my ear. But I have not heard any of the orchestras play him. Again, it is a matter of taste. Debussy's Orientalia is European; Eichheim's is Asiatic. The experts prefer Debussy. Shall I argue with them?

They tell me, the experts do, that what I call noise is dissonance. The music is unadorned. It goes straight to the point without creating atmosphere and moods. It has something to do with linear counterpoint and acrid harmony. All that I ask, when I buy a ticket for a concert, is that I shall be able to enjoy the music without finding myself suddenly transported to a steel mill. Is that too much to ask?

These experts say that art must not be photographic. Then why do they reproduce exa noises of industrial productio Besides, what are they tryi to say? Whether it is Beethoven's Ninth, or Brahms' First, a Sousa march, the compo speaks to me. At Tanglewood, one of the moderns, Arthur Honnegger, was played—his "Symphony for Strings." It spoke as though with words of despair of France in 1940-1. And at the end I could have shouted, "Viva la France!" But what is said by the mathematical musicians who produce musical doodles?

After all, no orchestra, no opera, no musical comedy could be played only for the experts. There are more of me who go to concerts than of him. He has his little place to note the weakness of the brass. I just like music.

CARMEL, N.Y
COURIER
7/31/47

Ruth Shaffner has been attending the concerts at Tanglewood featuring the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. Miss Shaffner manages to attend these performances in spite of a busy teaching schedule at her home in Patterson and studio in New York.

Caldwell, N.J.
Progress
8/1/47

MONTCLAIR CLUB PLANS 8th BENEFIT RECITAL

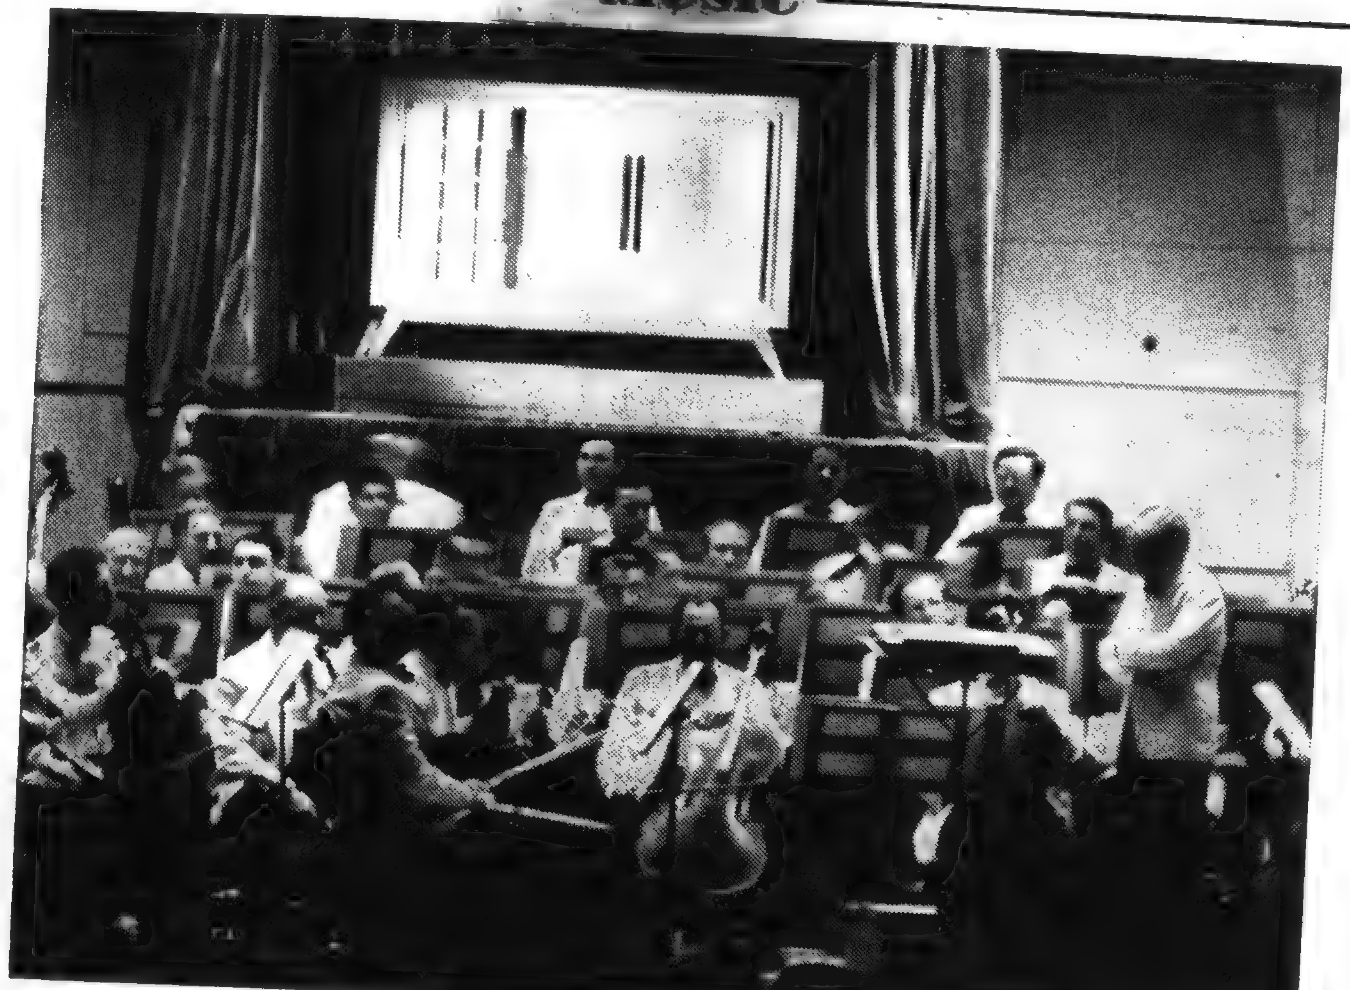
The Women's Educational Club of Montclair plans to present Carol Brice, contralto, in a recital at Montclair High School on November 5 at 8:30 P.M. Miss Brice's appearance will be the eighth benefit recital sponsored by the club since its organization in 1935. Proceeds will go to the group's scholarship fund.

The singer, since winning a Naumberg Foundation award in 1944, has appeared on the radio, in New York recitals and as soloist with orchestras as the Boston Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony and others.

Cir. [illegible]

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
AUG 11 1947

MUSIC



Koussevitzky (right) steps down as the Berkshire takes over

Golden Ears and Tin Ears

On Tuesday morning, July 29, a seven-car special train left Grand Central Terminal for Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Festival. The 80-odd passengers, about a third of them representing the press, were aboard as guests of RCA Victor, and they were on their way to the unveiling of RCA Victor's newest baby, a radio-phonograph called the Berkshire.

By early afternoon, when the special had reached Pittsfield, Mass., and the unwieldy group had been herded into chartered buses for the drive over to Tanglewood, all concerned were agreed that, as music junkets went, this shaped up as a real lulu. RCA Victor representatives aboard, said a sheet of instructions, were all wearing white carnations. Just ask them for "anything whatever."

When at 2 a.m. the special finally left Pittsfield for the return trip and the once crisp carnations drooped wearily from their buttonholes, even the most cynical critic had to admit he had been impressed by the Berkshire—however exhausting its unveiling. Previewed in the afternoon in Tanglewood's small Chamber Music Hall, it was presented with full theatrical pageantry in the big Music Shed that night.

Stealing a page from the old Edison demonstration tours, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky began to play Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Midway, Koussevitzky held up his hand and stopped the orchestra. From a small stage above, the Berkshire took over, playing an "Egmont" recording which Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony had made at Tanglewood a short time ago. The effect was startling. It was canned music, all right, but served with a faithfulness of tone and dynamic range which were remarkable.

Gold vs. Tin: Considering the Berkshire's price, it should be remarkable. Dependent on which of four cabinet designs is chosen—and whether television is included—the machine ranges in price from around $1,800 to about $4,000. For what would appear to be so limited a market, why, then, the elaborate and expensive promotion? One obvious reason is that RCA Victor wants to get its new custom-products department off to the right start.

Much more basic is the effect a revolutionary group of dissenters is slowly having on the phonograph and record industry as a whole. Known in the trade as the "golden ears," they range from the fanatic to the sensible. They argue that the music which the American public hears over the radio and from phonographs—whether home models or juke boxes—is distorted, particularly by a booming, overemphasized bass.

Improved equipment, they point out, can eliminate these customary distortions. And a wider range—or increased frequencies—will bring out the overtones, or those colorings of a musical tone which give each instrument its characteristic quality. Accomplishment of this dream up to now has meant a set which cost a great deal of money.

Ranged against the "golden ears" are the "tin ears," or the manufacturers of most of the phonographs America plays. They argue that few records are made at high frequencies, so why make sets capable of something seldom on the record to begin with? An 8,000 frequency, the "tin ears" continue, is all anyone needs—or wants—to get the full range of a symphony. Furthermore, they doubt that the average listener can even hear higher frequencies. An oscillator signal at 15,000 cycles, for example, sounds rather like what one would imagine those inaudible dog whistles would sound like—if the human ear could hear them.

Tests show, they argue, that most people, when exposed to high frequencies, vote against them. To this argument, the "golden ears" offer the rebuttal that people must be reeducated to what recorded music ought to sound like—as close to live music as science can make it.

Keeping Up: As high-frequency talk grew more persistent, a few record companies began to encompass a wider range on their disks, the most spectacular of these being the imported English Decca Full Frequency Range Recordings—said to be recorded at 14,000 cycles (NEWSWEEK, Dec. 16, 1946). Most critics were forced to point out, however, that it took a remarkable phonograph to get the full values of this wider range. The Fisher ($845 to $1,650) and the imported London Gramophone (from a little table model at $119 to a de luxe job at $2,950) were most discussed. As the company most prominently identified with recorded music through the years, it behooved RCA Victor to keep up with the Joneses.

Hence, the Berkshire, first of a "Festival" series to which other models will be added. Thus, while one mitt is still busy with assembly-line production for the "tin ears," RCA Victor will have the other hand ready with quality if the public begins to demand what the golden boys think it should have.

Significance ~

What the other big radio-phonograph manufacturers are doing has not yet come out in the open. Most of them claim that their machines are more than adequate and show high sales figures to prove their point. But now the RCA Victor has gone this far, evidence is at hand to prove that the "golden ears," however fanatical they seemed at first, have influenced the industry as a whole.

And from these developments may come shortly an answer to the question which many new and old record fans have been asking since the war: Should I buy a new phonograph now, and, if not, how long should I wait? The much-talked-of tape, film, and wire recording has yet to make a real dent in the recorded music field. The best engineers still maintain that what we have is more satisfactory—provided that the industry keeps up with its scientific potential.

Thus, how long the interested buyer needs to wait appears to rest solely with the size and willingness of his pocketbook.

How Old Is Old?

By George E. Sokolsky

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

* * *

The magazine "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries—	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognized that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

* * *

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at [illegible], and the little drips who complain about him (a)

Records

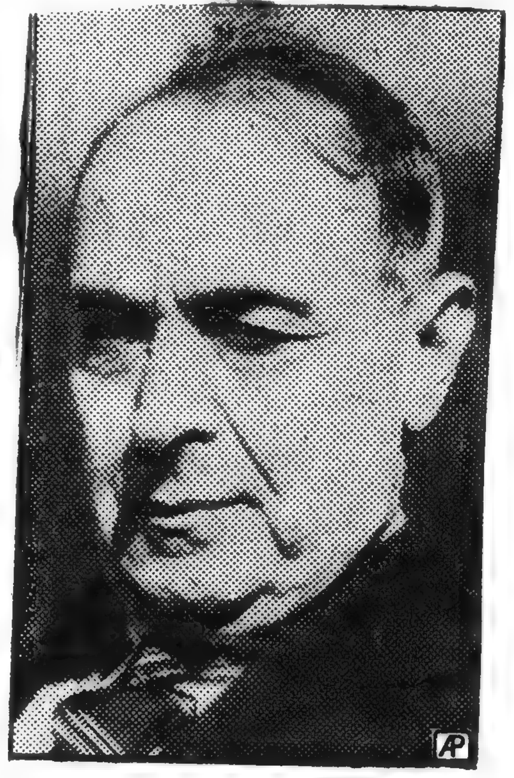
B. H. HAGGIN

RCA Victor has issued Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 played by Koussevitzky with a small group from the Boston Symphony (Set 1123; $5.85). Comparison with the Busch Chamber Players' performances in the old Victor sets is again inevitable. I have only one record of the Busch version of No. 3, containing the Bourré and Gigue played with grace and sensitive contours that are in extraordinary contrast with Koussevitzky's headlong pounding. If I remember correctly, Busch's solo performance of the famous Air is pallid and dull; but Koussevitzky's performance—silken in tone, leaden in pace—is inferior to Toscanini's (in the set of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony), with the continuity of impetus in its quiet flow, the life in its inflection. On the other hand, the Boston performance of No. 2 has clarity, grace, and good tempos (except for a stodgy Polonaise) which enable it to stand comparison with the Busch version—though the Busch remains superior (with things like Moyse's phrasing of the Bourré II, and the subtle accentuation of the accompaniment in the Badinerie and the middle section of the Polonaise). Some of the surfaces in my copy of the new set are noisy.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.
HERALD
8/15/47

Musical Week-end

John Geller, George Geller, and Robert Vignola left early Saturday morning by automobile for Tanglewood, Massachusetts, for a week-end of musical enjoyment—being particularly anxious to hear Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival, which was held over the week-end at the Berkshire Music Center. According to word received the boys enjoyed all the concerts, arriving in time to listen-in on rehearsals. While walking along on the spacious grounds George Geller, Jr., met a war buddy from Brooklyn, whom he had last seen when they were together in Japan.

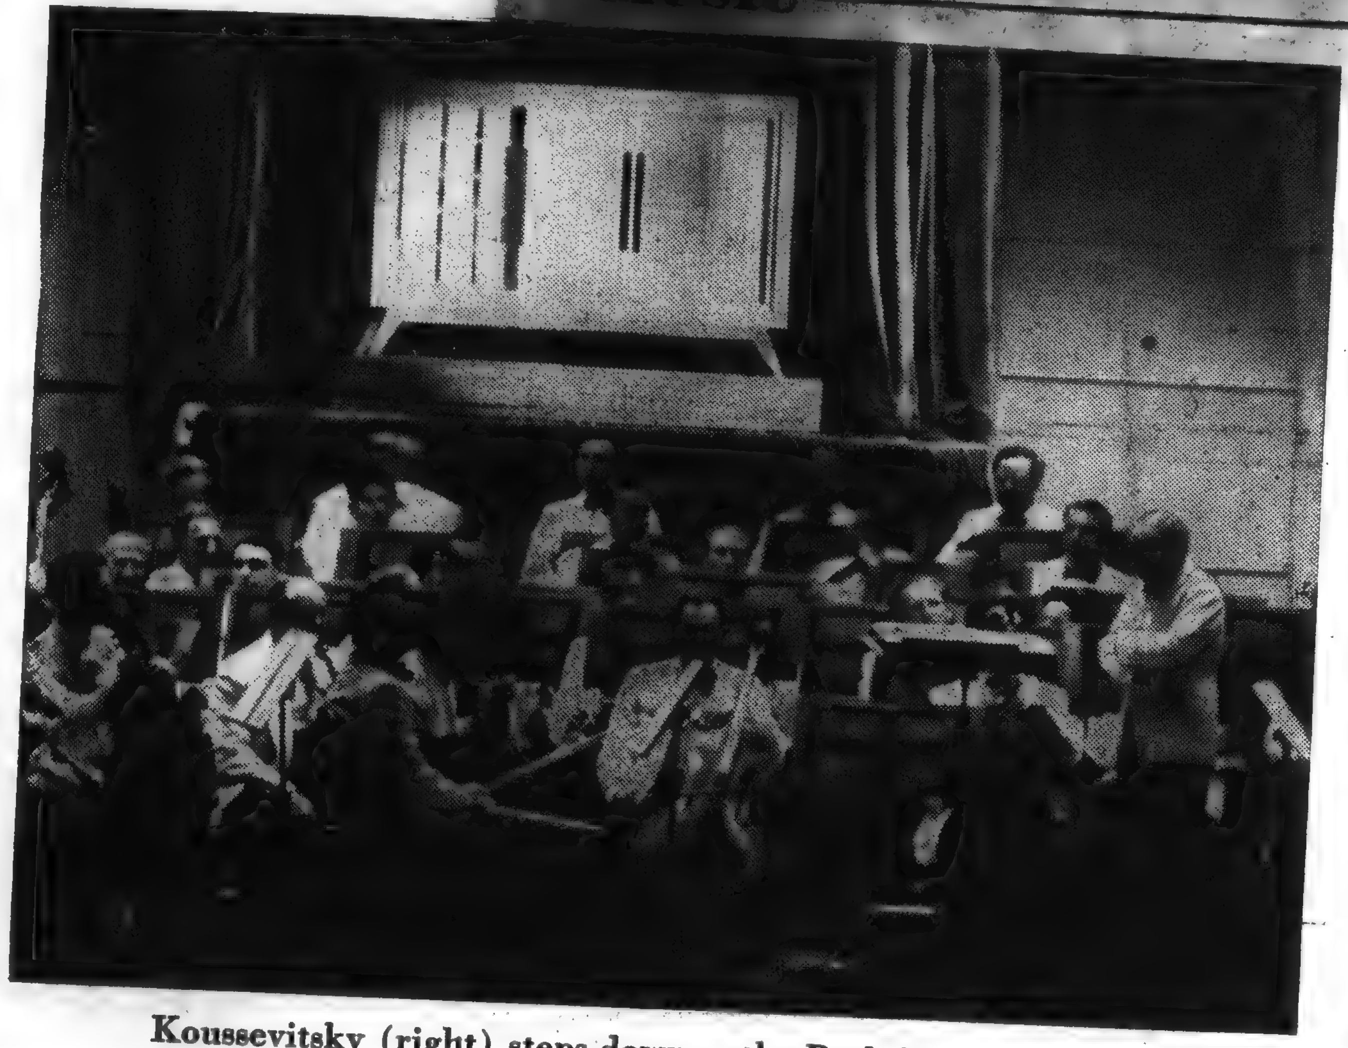


SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Marries Secretary

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last 18 years, Miss Olga Naumoof, 46. Koussevitzky told of the marriage as he and his bride boarded the liner Queen Elizabeth at New York for a vacation trip through Europe. The bride is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
AUG 11 1947

MUSIC



Koussevitzky (right) steps down as the Berkshire takes over

Golden Ears and Tin Ears

On Tuesday morning, July 29, a seven-car special train left Grand Central Terminal for Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Festival. The 80-odd passengers, about a third of them representing the press, were aboard as guests of RCA Victor, and they were on their way to the unveiling of RCA Victor's newest baby, a radio-phonograph called the Berkshire.

By early afternoon, when the special had reached Pittsfield, Mass., and the unwieldy group had been herded into chartered buses for the drive over to Tanglewood, all concerned were agreed that, as music junkets went, this shaped up as a real lulu. RCA Victor representatives aboard, said a sheet of instructions, were all wearing white carnations. Just ask them for "anything whatever."

When at 2 a.m. the special finally left Pittsfield for the return trip and the once crisp carnations drooped wearily from their buttonholes, even the most cynical critic had to admit he had been impressed by the Berkshire—however exhausting its unveiling. Previewed in the afternoon in Tanglewood's small Chamber Music Hall, it was presented with full theatrical pageantry in the big Music Shed that night.

Stealing a page from the old Edison demonstration tours, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky began to play Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Midway, Koussevitzky held up his hand and stopped the orchestra. From a small stage above, the Berkshire took over, playing an "Egmont" recording which Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony had made at Tanglewood a short time ago. The effect was startling. It was canned music, all right, but served with a faithfulness of tone and dynamic range which were remarkable.

Gold vs. Tin: Considering the Berkshire's price, it should be remarkable. Dependent on which of four cabinet designs is chosen—and whether television is included—the machine ranges in price from around $1,800 to about $4,000. For what would appear to be so limited a market, why, then, the elaborate and expensive promotion? One obvious reason is that RCA Victor wants to get its new custom-products department off to the right start.

Much more basic is the effect a revolutionary group of dissenters is slowly having on the phonograph and record industry as a whole. Known in the trade as the "golden ears," they range from the fanatic to the sensible. They argue that the music which the American public hears over the radio and from phonographs—whether home models or juke boxes—is distorted, particularly by a booming, overemphasized bass.

Improved equipment, they point out, can eliminate these customary distortions. And a wider range—or increased frequencies—will bring out the overtones, or those colorings of a musical tone which give each instrument its characteristic quality. Accomplishment of this dream up to now has meant a set which cost a great deal of money.

Ranged against the "golden ears" are the "tin ears," or the manufacturers of most of the phonographs America plays. They argue that few records are made at high frequencies, so why make sets capable of something seldom on the record to begin with? An 8,000 frequency, the "tin ears" continue, is all anyone needs—or wants—to get the full range of a symphony. Furthermore, they doubt that the average listener can even hear higher frequencies. An oscillator signal at 15,000 cycles, for example, sounds rather like what one would imagine those inaudible dog whistles would sound like—if the human ear could hear them.

Tests show, they argue, that most people, when exposed to high frequencies, vote against them. To this argument, the "golden ears" offer the rebuttal that people must be reeducated to what recorded music ought to sound like—as close to live music as science can make it.

Keeping Up: As high-frequency talk grew more persistent, a few record companies began to encompass a wider range on their disks, the most spectacular of these being the imported English Decca Full Frequency Range Recordings—said to be recorded at 14,000 cycles (NEWSWEEK, Dec. 16, 1946). Most critics were forced to point out, however, that it took a remarkable phonograph to get the full values of this wider range. The Fisher ($845 to $1,650) and the imported London Gramophone (from a little table model at $119 to a de luxe job at $2,950) were most discussed. As the company most prominently identified with recorded music through the years, it behooved RCA Victor to keep up with the Joneses.

Hence, the Berkshire, first of a "Festival" series to which other models will be added. Thus, while one mitt is still busy with assembly-line production for the "tin ears," RCA Victor will have the other hand ready with quality if the public begins to demand what the golden boys think it should have.

Significance

What the other big radio-phonograph manufacturers are doing has not yet come out in the open. Most of them claim that their machines are more than adequate and show high sales figures to prove their point. But now the RCA Victor has gone this far, evidence is at hand to prove that the "golden ears," however fanatical they seemed at first, have influenced the industry as a whole.

And from these developments may come shortly an answer to the question which many new and old record fans have been asking since the war: Should I buy a new phonograph now, and, if not, how long should I wait? The much-talked-of tape, film, and wire recording has yet to make a real dent in the recorded music field. The best engineers still maintain that what we have is more satisfactory—provided that the industry keeps up with its scientific potential.

Thus, how long the interested buyer needs to wait appears to rest solely with the size and willingness of his pocketbook.

Records

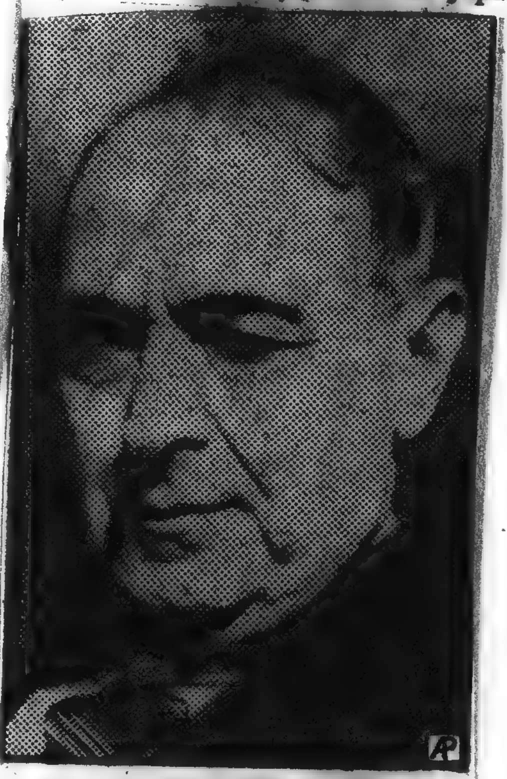
B. H. HAGGIN

RCA Victor has issued Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 played by Koussevitzky with a small group from the Boston Symphony (Set 1123; $5.85). Comparison with the Busch Chamber Players' performances in the old Victor sets is again inevitable. I have only one record of the Busch version of No. 3, containing the Bourré and Gigue played with grace and sensitive contours that are in extraordinary contrast with Koussevitzky's headlong pounding. If I remember correctly, Busch's solo performance of the famous Air is pallid and dull; but Koussevitzky's performance—silken in tone, leaden in pace—is inferior to Toscanini's (in the set of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony), with the continuity of impetus in its quiet flow, the life in its inflection. On the other hand, the Boston performance of No. 2 has clarity, grace, and good tempos (except for a stodgy Polonaise) which enable it to stand comparison with the Busch version—though the Busch remains superior (with things like Moyse's phrasing of the Bourré II, and the subtle accentuation of the accompaniment in the Badinerie and the middle section of the Polonaise). Some of the surfaces in my copy of the new set are noisy.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.
HERALD
8/15/47

Musical Week-end

John Geller, George Geller, and Robert Vignola left early Saturday morning by automobile for Tanglewood, Massachusetts, for a week-end of musical enjoyment—being particularly anxious to hear Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival, which was held over the week-end at the Berkshire Music Center. According to word received the boys enjoyed all the concerts, arriving in time to listen-in on rehearsals. While walking along on the spacious grounds George Geller, Jr., met a war buddy from Brooklyn, whom he had last seen when they [illegible] together in Japan.



AP

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Marries Secretary

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, disclosed today that he was married yesterday to his secretary of the last [illegible] Miss Olga Naumoff. [illegible] Koussevitzky told [illegible] he and [illegible] the liner Queen [illegible] New York for [illegible] through Europe. [illegible] is a niece of the conductor's late wife, who died in 1942.

How Old Is Old?

By George E. Sokolsky

Last Sunday, Herbert Hoover was 73 years old. Next Tuesday, Bernard Baruch will be 77. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted nine Beethoven symphonies and two concertos in a week, besides many other programs at Tanglewood, at a Summer music festival, looked like a greying youth at the final concert and he is 73.

How old is old? When does a man really become old? I do not recall the time when I did not think of my father as an old man; yet, he must have been young some time or other. They tell me that most children think of their parents as old, while the parents imagine themselves veritable babes in the woods. Yet, Nicholas Murray Butler only aged during the past five or six years, although he is now 85 and in spite of the infirmities of what we call old age, his mind has been crystal clear throughout those decades when, according to tradition, one seems to live on borrowed time. A few years ago, when I dined with him, I was astonished at the vivid youthfulness of his attitude toward life.

William Randolph Hearst was in financial difficulties some years ago. He saved his enterprises and manages them today with unbelievable vigor at 84. He not only edits his newspapers, but directs the business of his properties, setting a pace that is hard for a young man to follow. And Toscanini, at 80, directs the NBC Symphony.

* * *

The magazine, "World Report," some time ago listed the average span of life in various countries. They gave the following data:

Countries—	Average Span
New Zealand	67
Sweden	66
Netherlands	66
United States	65
Great Britain	62
Germany	61
France	57
Italy	55
Russia	45
India	27

When we were young—those of my generation—we were taught that the average span was 35 years in this country. Maybe that was low. But the U. S. life insurance companies, having recognised that the life span has increased by more than 50 per cent, have announced that next year they will discard as obsolete the tables of mortality used for 80 years. Their actuaries have finally caught up with their own statistics. Perhaps when the American life span reaches 100, we shall not need mortality tables.

* * *

Physical youth is, of course, not the sole question. Medical science can find ways of saving life and improving those whom they save. Mental youth, the flexibility of the mind, continued usefulness, the capacity to earn a living and to enjoy life—these are even more significant. George Bernard Shaw at 91 has a whale of a good time. In spite of his being a vegetarian—which must be horrible—he manages to keep chipper. It is his mind. When that old boy talks about being in his second childhood, he has his tongue in his cheek, although some would say—not I, however—that he never escaped his first childhood.

During the depression years, they were laying off men at 50 as finished. The dopes who thought up that gimmick lacked understanding of the world in which they live. They were old-fashioned. When the war came, they were begging the old boys to come back, because the old boys knew how—which is more than their great-grandchildren can prove. Experience and wisdom come with age and if the oldsters, in addition, are mentally vigorous, they are worth infinitely more than the bright boys fresh out of college who know how to read a statistical curve but lack the experience and wisdom to know what made it curve that way. That is the difference, for instance, between Jesse Jones, at [illegible], and the little drips who complain about [illegible]

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Orchestra have given us two Bach albums, the one containing the "Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2 and 5" and the other the "Suites Nos. 2 and 3."

Ten years ago Adolf Busch and his Chamber Players gave us all six of the Brandenburgs and all four of the suites in performances which were in every way perfection and which remain in the catalogues today as among the very highest achievements in recording and performing art. Upon careful comparison I find that Busch has a decided edge on Koussevitzky and is without question the better Bachian. Here and there Kossevitzky rises to sublime heights, but indulges in rubati of which Busch is not guilty. Kossevitzky employs strings only in the "Suite No. 3" while Busch uses the wind instruments scored. I am struck with the marvellous flute tone of Laurent of the Boston Orchestra, but stylistically he comes off second to Moyse in the Busch Players. The piano work of Lukas Foss in the "Fifth Brandenburg" is exquisitely done, but some will not relish the use of the piano when it is evident the clavier was intended by Bach. Generally, the recording level of today is better than 10 years ago, but this is not at all enough of a point to offset the greater sense of intimacy and musical acumen which Busch contrives. Victor sets 1118 and 1123.

Columbia has given us the entire set of 12 "Concerti Grossi" of Handel in a magnificent performance by the Busch Chamber Flayers. A dose of 12 is, of course, rather difficult to imagine at one setting, but if you will divide the listening into several sessions, remembering that Handel wrote the entire set in less than a single month, you will marvel at the inventiveness and total grasp of craftmanship which Handel possessed. This is the first time we have had complete recordings of any of the "Concerti Grossi" except for two, and in this performance they will long maintain prior place. The solo violins are played by Adolf Busch and Earnest Drucker, solo cello by Herman Busch and solo clavier by Mieczyslaw Horszowski. One of the great additions to the catalogues. Columbia set 685 in three volumes with an exhaustive descriptive booklet.

Music and Musicians

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

THE LATE Frederick Delius, the blind English composer, is supposed to represent the sunset of the Romantic period in music, with Beethoven being its morning and Wagner its high noon.

Rachmaninoff could well be the twilight, and the early Schoenberg, as revealed in neoWagnerian "Verklaert Nacht," somewhere in the middle of the night.

But the Delian moods and scenes, for all their emotional intensity, are vaguer, more nebulous than those of Schoenberg, Rachmaninoff or any other carryover from the 19th century.

They might indeed be described as quasi-Debussyan, except that the great Frenchman had a Gallic clarity and incisiveness even in picturing the most fleeting phenomena, such as clouds, festivals, Spanish evenings and the restless, ever changing face of the sea.

NEVERTHELESS, such a major work as the Delius violin concerto, composed in 1916, is a good deal like Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" prolonged well into the evening.

The difference in treatment is that Debussy is actually painting a dreamy state with music, and Delius is making the music do the dreaming.

They are two ways of conjuring up a vision, and one is as legitimate as the other. The only judgment is the pragmatic one—does it work?

The patrons who wish to venture beyond the Romantic high noon and yet are a little fearful of the next Modernist dawn might try steeping themselves in Delius befor they take the plunge.

This dreamy concerto is a fine fireside companion for lotus eaters.

Now and then its hazily pleasant brooding is shaken by a strong emotion, but otherwise there is little to disturb the violin's long, reflective monologue or the soothing phrases from the hovering choirs of the orchestra.

As with most Delius, there is little about it you can remember except that it casts a spell. That, of course, is a function of spells.

One theme seems to dominate the entire concerto — a sweetly plaintive five note motto which is the main substance of the overture to Delius' early opera, "Irmelin."

Prospective samplers will find this haunting music in an eloquent performance by the original soloist, Violinist Albert Sammons, and the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra under Malcolm Sargent (Columbia M-672.)

NOW IF DELIUS is too advanced, try Wieniawski's old fashioned garland of melodies, the Violin Concerto, No. 2 in D minor.

It is filled with passages dear to the heart of the virtuoso and contains that lush "Romance" which the movies and popular song writers are some day going to appropriate.

The superb soloist in the new disc performance with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Efrem Kurtz is that brilliant young violinist, Isaac Stern, whom Milwaukee heard in a recent season and will hear again the coming year.

IF THIS IS TOO SYRUPY, you are ready for some of the brilliant moderns, particularly those like Prokofieff and Bartok whose music cools the fevered brow and alkalizes the system.

For an overdose of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture there is nothing like a few excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet. This was on the last Milwaukee program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not that Prokofieff isn't romantic and tender. He almost gets into the "Peter and the Wolf" mood in this work.

That is, he is lucid and sparkling rather than cynically brilliant, as he is in the "Classical Symphony," a georgeous piece of music in spite of its impudent aping of Mozart and Haydn.

WHAT WE GET from the Boston Symphony Orchestra via concert and records (Victor M-1129) is only a small part of the full length ballet of the Shakespearean tragedy.

But it is enough to stimulate the imagination — its harsh, angry harmonies, half barbaric themes, its poignantly sweet interludes, its vibrant lament at Juliet's tomb.

For the unspoken drama, this would be the ideal score, pungent in its commentary, violent in its action - just what you have been taught to expect from the brawling families of Shakespeare's drama.

NOW PROKOFIEF is nowhere near as fluent a composer as Tschaikowsky, Gounod or the others who were inspired by the play, but one suspects that he gives a sharper, more civilized report on the alleged doings in Verona some centuries ago.

The other gentlemen were inclined to let their romantic sympathies, even their tears, get the better of their judgment.

From Prokofieff you get the feeling of a tragedy that is universal and not a simple obituary or even a double suicide in the police reports.

This and his later Fifth Symphony certainly entitle him to the post of Russia's No. 1 composer and to sit in the top rank of contemporary workers in the tonal vineyard.

And as contemporary wines go, Prokofieff's is a magnificent sparkling Burgundy.

THAT LEAVES Shostakovitch in the class of champagnes, of which his Ninth Symphony is an exceptionally good vintage, more palatable and less bloating than the rest of his output.

Some haughtily call it trivial, but if it is, then all Shostakovitch is trivial, for this is a symphony with the poses and posturing removed.

Here for a recorded concert you have the choice between a brilliant, virtuoso version by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky (Victor M-1134) and an equally penetrating, if less brilliant performance by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Columbia M-[illegible]) under Kurtz.

PIANO PROFILES

John Kirkpatrick Plays Magically But His Wand Fails in Box-office Trick

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The piano is an instrument of many moods. So are the artists who sit down before it. This is the third of a series of revealing glimpses into the lives—and the art—of some eminent personalities of the keyboard. The fourth will appear next Sunday.

JOHN KIRKPATRICK, American pianist, may well be the greatest virtuoso of the present; which is to say that his command of his instrument equals the mechanical resource of any of his colleagues and is used with a musical and acoustic imagination that constantly opens new worlds of sound, new vistas, new possibilities that invite exploration.

He is no box-office hero and no one knows why. He is a strapping six-footer, handsome and virile. He plays more new and unusual music each season than all of the headliners put together. On occasion he uses methods to develop the new sounds of this music that are unorthodox and that should excite the curiosity of the multitude as well as the cogniscenti. His admirers, however, would not fill Carnegie Hall once a season, nor do the headline merchants make a practice of engaging him in commercial recital series.

* * *

A GOOD press agent might correct this. Propaganda and promotion might remove John Kirkpatrick from the academic seclusion of Cornell and set him in the Hollywood spotlight for which he has every qualification. For example, he occasionally comes on the stage carrying what seems to be a magic wand. This wand is about 18 inches long and is padded with black velvet. It is used in some mysterious fashion to release and expand the induced sonorities of the piano.

To the layman that is so much black magic. Exactly what does Kirkpatrick do with this magician's wand? How does it aid him in his quest for new sounds?

Stokowski and Koussevitzky get vast amount of newspaper linage and stimulate keen interest with their experiments in the field of electrically amplified tone. Here is a magician who needs no laboratory and no engineer to aid him in creating tonal amplifications far more subtle, beautiful and exciting. Why isn't the public interested?

Kirkpatrick uses his magic wand in Charles Ives' "Concord" Sonata, a monumental work, quite possibly the greatest in the literature. Its message is vast in scope and noble in content. It is defined in the most extraordinary vocabulary used by any composer. Not even Prokofieff, writing many years later and with all dramatic power and daring originality characteristic of the Russian masters, has made piano sound, as such, take on greater depth, range, subtlety, or variety.

* * *

KIRKPATRICK'S wand, which really is the invention of Ives, evokes these new sounds by depressing silently selected groups of keys, thus releasing a bewildering wealth of overtones. These are superimposed upon the immediate piano utterance to create an eerie, ghostly sonority that hovers cloudlike in the acoustic background.

It is an effect not to be obtained through the ordinary mechanism of the instrument. Nor can the modern orchestra duplicate it. Stokowski tries to do so with his concealed strings —players hidden in the ranks who add harmonics, or hold legitimate tones above and beyond the chief orchestral utterance—but it is not the same effect though somewhat the same idea.

* * *

IVES, whose music has anticipated the whole gamut of modern tonal art by three, or even four decades; Kirkpatrick, his expert recreative agent, and Stokowski, indefatigable explorer of new acoustic worlds, all recognize the need for new sounds and for a new vocabulary. So has every leader in his generation from Bach to Debussy and Prokofieff.

Now comes this American, Charles Ives, a wealthy insurance executive in private life—so Americans should respect him—who proves to be a prophet and a leader such as Europe has not produced.

Ives is not the only American composer to profit by the art of John Kirkpatrick. He has canvassed the whole surprisingly large field of native piano music from Foster and Gottschaik to MacDowell and the exciting contemporaries. He makes interesting and amusing programs of this music.

Washington has heard several since the National Gallery of Art, under the progressive administration of David Finley, holds an annual festival of American music, directed and conducted in part by Richard Bales.

* * *

KIRKPATRICK has been a frequent guest and one of the vital figures in the gradual Americanization of the music life of the American Capital. (Hans Kindler is another, and Richard Bales, of course.) His American propaganda apart, Kirkpatrick remains one of the most formidable virtuosi. He also is a great musician. Like Toscanini he has an interpretative motto which reads, "Comme scrito" (As written) a limitation which the amateurs among the headliners reject.

So he's a great artist though an American. Does that explain his lack of box office appeal?

Next Sunday: Rudolf Serkin.

Record Lending Department Added to Amityville Library

Start Is Made with Small Donated Collection; Expansion Expected as More Discs and Funds Become Available

Good news for Amityville music lovers, whether of th long or short hair category, was forthcoming this weel with the announcement that the phonograph record department of the Amityville Library is now in operation an adherents of swing or symphony, Beethoven or bebop may now borrow records on the same basis they take out rental books. In preparation for some time, the new department has been instituted as a result of numerous requests and because of the success of similar ventures in libraries in other parts of Long Island. Admittedly of an experimental nature, its permanence will depend upon its reception by the public and the support it receives.

A start is being made with a small collection and the maintenance and growth must be self-supporting as there are no funds appropriated for operation. Several organizations and individuals to whom the library staff are deeply grateful, have contributed toward the purchase of the initial selection. Further contributions of playable records of worthwhile music, classic or popular, or of cash will be appreciated. The library realizes that the initial small selection will not satisfy everyone, but it is believed that, with patience and cooperation, it will be expanded and improved. A sheet is posted in the library for suggestions and selections. Recordings shown to be in demand by this indicator will be purchased for the collection as more funds become available.

As the record department must be self-supporting, a rental fee will be charged. This will be 5 cents for a single record or 10 cents for three. The fee for albums will depend upon the number of records contained therein. All records will be charged out for one week and those overdue will accumulate fines as do overdue books. With this arrangement all revenue will go toward the purchase of more records. All discs will be inspected carefully by the librarian before issuance and will again be inspected upon their return. If scratched or broken, the borrower will be responsible for the cost of the record.

Included in the library's selection, and now available to borrowers are the following: Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, NBC Symphony Orchestra, Rubenstein at the piano; Jerome Kern album; Victor Herbert album (Bing Crosby); DeBusey, Claire de Lune; Schubert's Ave Maria, Marian Anderson; Wiffenpoff Song (Robert Merrill); Peter and the Wolf; Bozo at the Circus; Uncle Don's Playland; and several popular pieces.

These Accomplished Miami Beach Women

By MAUDE MASSENGALE

● "Friendship is the keynote of life." That jewel of a statement was made by Louise (Mrs. E. R.) Treverton when asked to tell something of her views. For this talented Miami Beach musician who loves Miami Beach with a passion has met all sorts of people in her travels here and abroad. Her interests in them never wanes, nor does her love of the piano and organ which are the treasures in her home on Royal Palm ave.

Mrs. Treverton starts reminiscing with her days at Wilson college in Chambersburg, Pa., where she studied piano and organ although she had played the organ in church long before she started to college. She says some of the Wilson girls whom she met in her earliest days have remained lifelong friends. She is one of the active members of the Wilson college club here, which often meets in her home

● Mrs. Treverton was born in a house on the top of a hill with a white paling fence, flag stone walks, flowers and many porches. It overlooked the Ohio valley across the river from Wheeling, West Va. and the Ohio river with its many islands is a memory that lingers through.

Even in her childhood days Louise wanted to be a musician. Teaching was her ambition, much to the distress of her parents. For in those days "ladies" just didn't work so she evaded the issue by saying she worked with art!

Mrs. Treverton attnded the New England conservatory in Boston where she says "we had many famous professors.' She recalls George Chadwick as the director who was held in the highest esteem because his days were never too busy to give advice to the student. Mrs. Treverton spent four years at the conservatory with each week highlighted by hearing the Boston symphony Saturday evening and the Boston Opera Co., Wednesday night.

Louise remembers that a group of older students took her under their wings and coached her in things to do and not to do in the student world.

● Also . . Louise recalls with a smile, romance was just around the corner and it was while studying in Boston that she met her husband, then in New York, who went over for the student parties.

After her marriage she studied seriously in New York, went to Washington, D. C., during World War I where she taught in a school. Then to Rock Hill, S. C., where she taught piano and organ four years at Winthrop college, then to Cleveland where she and her husband lived for a number of years. In 1923 she was studing at Fountainebleu, France, also in Paris.

● But 1935 saw the end of the wanderings of the Trevertons, for they took a motor trip through Florida and found Miami Beach, immediately saying that "this is to be our home." They have an interesting residence at 3717 Royal Palm, filled with treasures and flowers. Here they entertain many talented people, friends they have met from all parts of the world who come to Florida at one time or another. Unlike a lot of people, Mrs. Treverton likes newspaper people. Especially the women. Perhaps she is ONE who recognizes a kinship for newspaper people who recognize values, and she is a valuable link in that golden chain which she describes as friendship.

Louise Treverton has served as president to Miami Alumnae chapter of Sigma Alpha Iota, national music fraternity; Miami Music Teachers' association, Miami chapter, American Guild of Organists and is a member of the Coral Gables Music club, the Miami Music club, Past Presidents' assembly, Miami Garden club, American Association of University Women and the Miami Lions auxiliary.

Have you ever enjoyed one o her delightful buffet dinners? O listened to her play?

Tanglewood closed Sunday night with a tallied attendance of 146,000 for the events at the Berkshire Music Festival, an increase of [illegible],000 over last season. Salvos of applause were given Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and others who contributed to the success of season's [illegible] activities. Eight Negroes attended the Berkshire Music Center on scholarships and many living in and near Lenox, Mass., shared in the concerts, lectures and operas presented. Clarence Cameron White and wife made their annual trek there as unsual. The last of the various concerts will be given in Saratoga, the Saratoga Spa Music Festival from September 6 to 18, conducted by F. Charles Adler with [illegible] seven Philharmonic Symphony Musicians. The list of works scheduled are interesting in that many are by contemporary composers. Last season William Grant Still was represented but we could find no Negro listed this season. Which raises the idea that our composers, few though they may be, should send their work to festivals all over the country for appraisal and possible performance.

[illegible]ER, MASS.
[illegible]GRAM

AUG 8 - 1947

Ruth Posselt Is Soloist At Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Friday—Leonard Bernstein resumed his position on the Tanglewood podium last night and conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the final series of three concerts in the Berkshire Music Festival.

Ruth Posselt, as soloist in the Hindemith "violin concerto," was heard by an audience of 7500.

As in the first series two weeks ago, when Bernstein was accorded the honor of being the first guest conductor to appear at Tanglewood, last night he chose a program that illustrated his approach toward classic, modern, and romantic works, for the program also included Haydn's "Symphony No. 102, in B-flat," and Schumanns "Symphony No. 2 in C Major."

An Individualist

As in his first appearance, Bernstein again proved himself an individualist of modern inclinations. In fact, the Haydn impressed more as a vehicle for the conductor metier.

Although the introductory largo was related with effective poise the succeeding allegro vivace received over-energetic treatment, and was detailed in its direction to a point not required by the Boston Symphony. While the adagio was heavyladen dynamically, the minuet was measured in sturdy beat but not excessive and the trio was smoothly interwoven. The tempo of the finale, marked presto, was somewhat driven nevertheless causing obscurity in some of the transitory passages.

At Best in Andante

Miss Posselt demonstrated exceptional violinistic talents both interpretively and technically. Her handling of Hindemith's intricate structure was admirable, and Bernstein provided a beautifully pliant background being constantly alert to the soloist's motives.

The violinist was at her best in the Andante, extracting sensitive poetry from the instrument with tones of crystaline purity. In spite of the score's suppression of much of the bristling difficulties in the vivace, Miss Posselt projected its materials with eclat, even the hazardous cadenza being subject to few moments of imperfection.

Excellent Summation

The Schumann symphony adapted itself more happily to Bernstein's style and temperament than did the Haydn. One might take issue with the retarded tempo and somewhat affected reading of the Adagio, and with the accelerated tempo of the Scherzo, but it was nevertheless an excellent summation of its salient qualities.

The program will be resumed on Saturday night with Bach's "Cantata No. 50," Stravinskys "Symphony of Psalms,' and Mozart's "Requiem Mass." Robert Shaw will conduct the orchestra and festival chorus.

WORLD OF MUSIC: OPERA AND UNIONS AGREE

New York Times

By ROSS P[illegible]TER

THE Metropolitan Opera's two outstanding labor contracts—those with the Musicians Union and the American Guild of Musical Artists—are drawn up and ready for final ratification. The one with the orchestra requires merely the initialing of a correction already agreed upon. The one with AGMA needs only agreement on one or two questions of wording.

AGMA will announce no details till those minor questions are settled, but the musicians announced that the basic wage scale remains the same as last year and that this year the Metropolitan has put in writing what it put in practice last spring—that it would pay room and board for the players on the spring tour.

Agreement on the contracts this early in the year will facilitate arrangements for the forthcoming season. Last year plans could not be finally drawn up till mid-September, for a difference over the size of the chorus delayed the the AGMA contract.

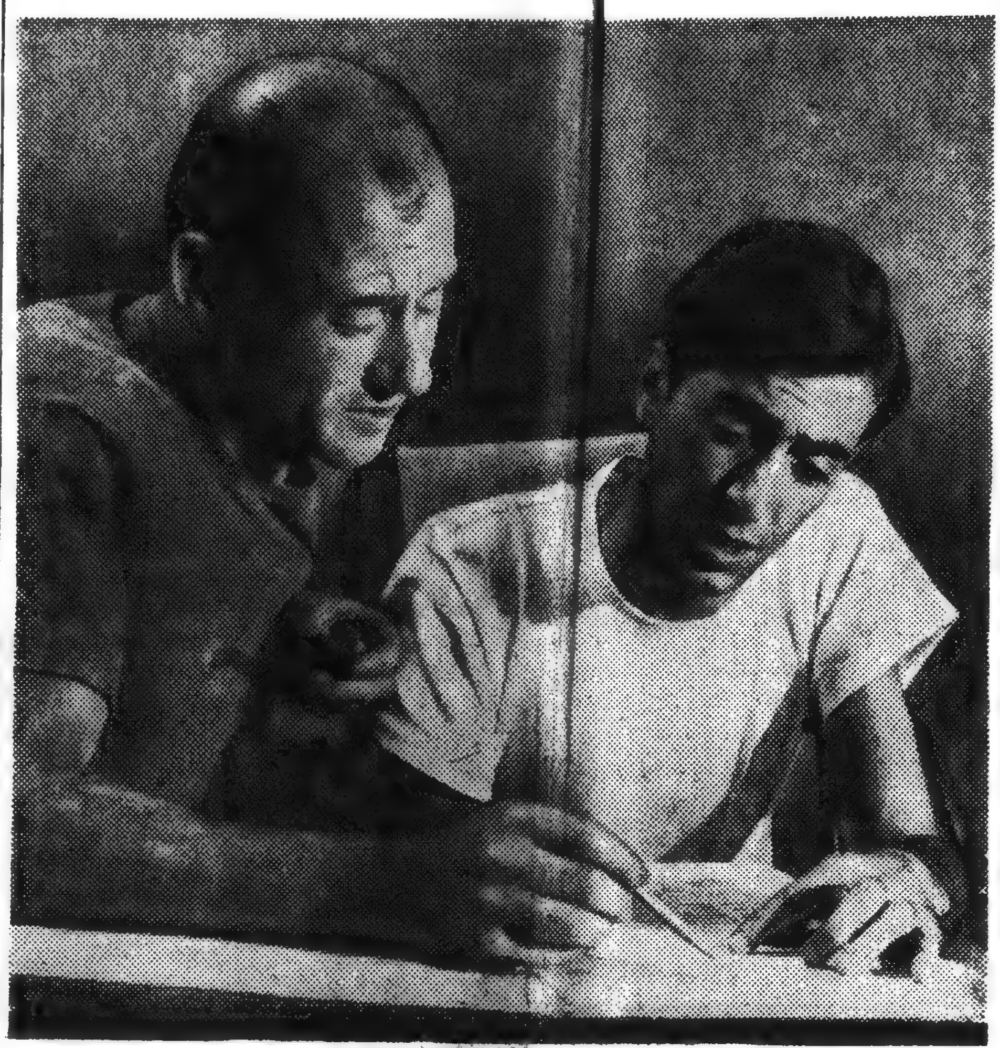
LOEWE: Frederick Loewe, composer of "Brigadoon," is returning to the field of concert music next week when he appears with the Toronto Philharmonic at the Aug. 28 "Prom" concert. He will appear as the piano soloist in Liszt's A major Concerto. He will also be represented on the program with two short orchestral sketches, "The Spider and the Fly" and "The Mosquito." Franz Allers will conduct. Mr. Loewe will also play selections from "Brigadoon" on the piano. Later he plans to work them up into a piano concerto.

MAESTRO: Arturo Toscanini, who in past seasons has conducted "Fidelio," "Bohême" and "Traviata" with the NBC Symphony, will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with the orchestra this coming season. Again it will be divided between two broadcasts, one on Dec. 6 and the other Dec. 13. One of the singers will be Nan Merriman, who will take the role of Emilia. This means Mr. Toscanini is the fourth conductor who has selected Miss Merriman to sing with him in New York this season. The others are Bruno Walter, Leopold Stokowski and Leonard Bernstein.

OUR OWN: Eastern universities are not the only ones with a lively interest in contemporary American music. The University of Oregon gave a three-day festival of modern American work in May, and starting tomorrow the University of Washington in Seattle is giving a four-day festival devoted to Americans. The opening work will be Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball." Tuesday will be given over to works for chamber orchestra, Wednesday to works for full orchestra and Thursday to works for chorus and orchestra. Eugene Linden will conduct the opera and Frederick Fennell the three concerts. Three works by Northwestern composers will be played for the first time. They are Dorothy Cadzow's "Northwestern Sketches," Gerald Kechley's Variations on an Original Theme and George Frederick McKay's choral suite, "That All Men May Aspire."

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Dusolina Giannini has sung Carmen this summer in Amsterdam and Stockholm. . . . Richard Tucker, Metropolitan Opera tenor, recently sang in "La Gioconda" in Verona, Italy. . . . The New Orleans Symphony, under Massimo Freccia, will open its new season Oct. 28. . . . Ginette Neveu, French violinist who will play with the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played in this country ten years ago with less fanfare, for she appeared as a child prodigy with the Philharmonic Society of Elizabeth, N. J. . . . Ruth Freeman will play the solo part in Norman Dello Joio's Concertino for flute and strings at the final concert of the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday. . . . The San Francisco Opera has engaged William Wymetal to stage six of its [illegible] productions. . . . Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra will introduce Samuel Barber's "Medea" Ballet Suite in New York and Philadelphia in December.

AT CHAUTAUQUA



Franco Autori and Norman Dello Joio.

The New Records

RCA Victor's release of excerpts from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" in a performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to records the most important portions of a composition destined to figure prominently in the annals of music history. The espisodes from "Romeo and Juliet" featured on these discs are four in number and comprise the first, second, fourth and seventh movements from the second of two suites arranged by the composer when he found the original form of the ballet somewhat unwieldy because of its length.

Prokofieff began work on the score for "Romeo and Juliet" following the completion of his lyrical and brilliant Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, which is available in a recording by Jascha Heifetz and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Completed in September, 1935, and first played in concert form a month later in Moscow with the composer conducting, the ballet was the subject of furious controversy when it became known that it was to have a happy ending, contrary to Shakespere's drama. Later, it was decided to adhere to the original Shakespearean plot.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony extract the full flavor of this brilliant music, which alternates between profound tragedy and exquisite tenderness. Throughout can be detected musically the bitter irony of a situation brought about by the hostility of the lovers' families.

* * *

For many a lover of Paris, Lucienne Boyer symbolizes the allure and traditional chic of that romantic city before the war. Columbia presents the first American pressings of songs which Mlle. Boyer has made world famous: the dream provoking "Parlez-Moi D'Amour," "Beaucoup," "Un Amour Comme Le Notre," "Si Petite," "J'ai Laissé Mon Coeur." These songs invoke the cafe and the Bois and the boulevards and will delight all who love the spirit of France. They have an extra appeal as the symbol of resistance to Nazi oppression, since [illegible] great chanteuse, an active member of the underground movement, used these songs all through the war to remind the faint-hearted of the insouciance which had been France.

* * *

Abe Lyman and his orchestra unfurl some old favorites in an album called Waltz Time. This Columbia release contains "Charmaine," "La Golondrina" "Down by the Old Mill Stream," "Missouri Waltz" and "I'm Falling in Love with Someone."

The familiar piano novelty "The Glow Worm" offers a challenge which Frankie Carle meets on Columbia 37567, with "Penguin at the Waldorf" on the reverse.

Doris Day, with backing supplied by an orchestra under Frank Comstock, sings "I'm Still Sitting under the Apple Tree" and "When Tonight Is Just a Memory" (Columbia 37568)

Melodies suited to the lush piping of Tony Martin are "You're not so Easy to Forget" and "Don't Tell Me," two movie populars, on Victor 20-2328. Meanwhile the piano technique of Larry Green gleams on "Bewitched" from "Pal Joey" and "Spring Is Really Spring This Year," on Victor 20-2329. Other excellent Victors are "The Echo Said No" and "An Apple Blossom Wedding" by Sammy Kaye (Victor 20-2330)

The popular First Piano Quartet play their [illegible] signature, the Paganini Variations with three Chopin etudes on the reverse. (Victor 46-0016)

Boston Symphony Rates High In Poll Of Music On The Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which next season launches its 22nd consecutive year of radio broadcasting and which since 1942 has been an exclusive music feature of the American Broadcasting Company, was named the outstanding symphony orchestra in the fourth annual poll of music on the air announced in New York recently by "Musical America," national music magazine.

Taking top honors among all symphonic organizations the Boston symphony won the overwhelming support of 600 music and radio critics from coast to coast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble, was named second in the group of outstanding conductors, while Bruno Walter, who was a guest leader of the orchestra, won first honors as a guest conductor. Charles Muench, who also conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, won third honors in this classification.

For the fourth consecutive year Milton Cross was chosen the outstanding announcer. Cross long has been identified with the Metropolitan opera, Saturday symphony and other ABC features. With the Metropolitan opera a classification in itself and without competition, the critics chose as the outstanding broadcast of this annual ABC feature the presentation of "Tristan und Isolde." Second place went to "Boris," revived this year in response to requests of listeners, while "Romeo et Julliette" was third.

Music lovers in the Sheboygan area will be interested in these awards inasmuch as both of these ABC features have been heard over Station WHBL during the past season.

In the instrumental ensembles classification, ABC's Fine Arts quartet, which this year has given the American Premiere to two quartets by Shostakovich, took third place.

The reviewers took to task many of the scripts used in connection with musical programs, although 67 per cent expressed themselves as satisfied. A large percentage voted the Metropolitan opera intermission features, arranged by Henry Souvaine, producer of these broadcasts, as "the best" script material on the air.

The "Musical American" poll was conducted under the direction of Miss Quaintance Eaton, associate editor.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUL [illegible] 1947

Albeneri Trio's Concert Received Enthusiastically

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The second chamber music concert in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood last night in the series of three which is being presented by the Berkshire Music Center with the ~~co-operation of~~ the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress was a program by the Albeneri trio. The enthusiasm aroused by the famous ensemble accumulated as the remarkable program progressed until at the final note they were accorded some of the most spontaneous and demonstrative acclaim ever tendered a visiting musical organization.

Exciting Evening

It was an exciting evening in several aspects; the program was tremendously interesting, and the performances were on the loftiest plane. Two of the trios were of the year 1945: that of Artur Schnabel was receiving its premier performance; the other, by Heitor Villa-Lobos, had had only one previous playing, at the Library of Congress. The members of the trio are Alexander Schneider, violin, Benar Heifetz, cello, and Erich Itor Kahn, piano. The Schnabel piece, in three movements, is formidably difficult to absorb. The strange part of his writing is his totally and diametrically opposed position as a composer to his manner of piano playing, in which he has won such renown as a Beethoven interpreter and purist. Last night he showed himself a disciple of the Schoenberg and Alban Berg School, indicating and requiring modes of expression which his personal performances will scarcely lead one to believe were by one and the same individual.

The preparation had been apparently diligent, but still did not suffice to give contour, line, or goal to this listener. It hardly sems fair to dismiss with a short impertinence the product of serious and no doubt long application by an artist so universally revered as is Schnabel. Mood he has not made unplausible, but coherence has indeed been strained beyond ordinary limits in respect to both the single instrument and the ensemble.

The Villa Lobos which followed was thus comparatively transparent. It is written for string trio, and here the pianist was replaced by a viola for which the assisting artist was Milton Katims. Lobos first of all writes within much more popular and extrovert style. The canonical introduction was never in doubt, nor was the construction obscured. The themes are pleasing and conform to an easy understanding, with possibly a flavor of a movie background, while the decorative accompaniment of whichever two instruments may be supplying the setting and frame are illuminating and in readily acceptable idioms, even though they tax even the virtuosity of three such sterling artists as occupied the boards last night. The music is voiced in the best registers of the instruments and the tonal grouping is done with special judgment. The tonal beauty of the performance was enhanced by episodes of heroic dramatic portrayal, and, in turn, feats of technica audacity which were nothing les than thrilling. Lobos' interpolatio of hip-swaying dance rhythms and passages of furious agitation relieved by melodies of alluring charm gave the composition pac and intrigue, and the virtuosity o the execution carried the audience to heights of vehement approval. After intermission the Albeneri returned to play the Schubert B flat major trio, Opus 100. After two courses of such exotic fare, the endearing music of Schubert may have seemed doubly dolce, but last night's performance was the superlative culmination of all the factors which are needed to make such a masterful and unified rendition. Above and beyond the beauties of the individual playing and the sensitive interplay and high musical consideration, was the magnificent over-all conception of this lovable music. This, one could recognize, was authority. From the refined details to the gratifyingly contrasted tempos, from the tonal beauty in the most subdued passages, the proper balance of the instruments, to the eloquent restraint in the statement of the themes, to the freely released utterances of the bolder and gayer spirits, there was nothing to mar the perfection of great music ideally realized.

Mrs. Coolidge Acclaimed

Mrs. Coolidge, seated in the front row of the hall, was again acclaimed not alone for her generosity but for the keen perspicacity with which the series has been organized and the shrewd discrimination with which the programs have been arranged. The final concert in this series will be the Berkshire Wood Wind ensemble Wednesday next, July 16.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (61,018)
This Clipping From CUE
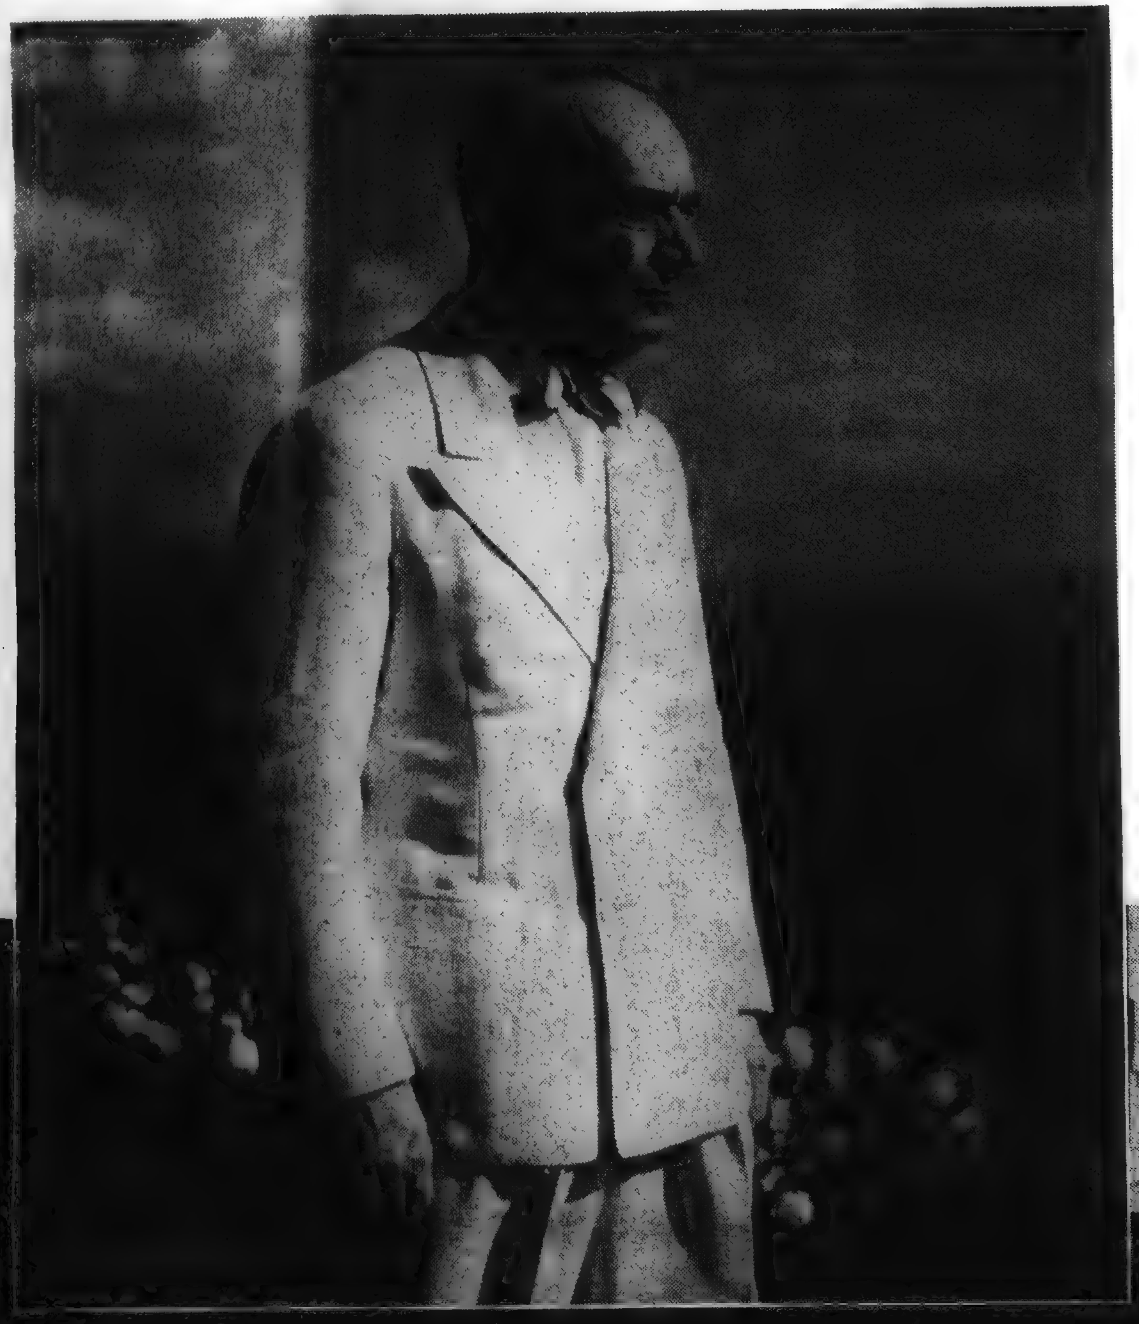
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUL 20 1946

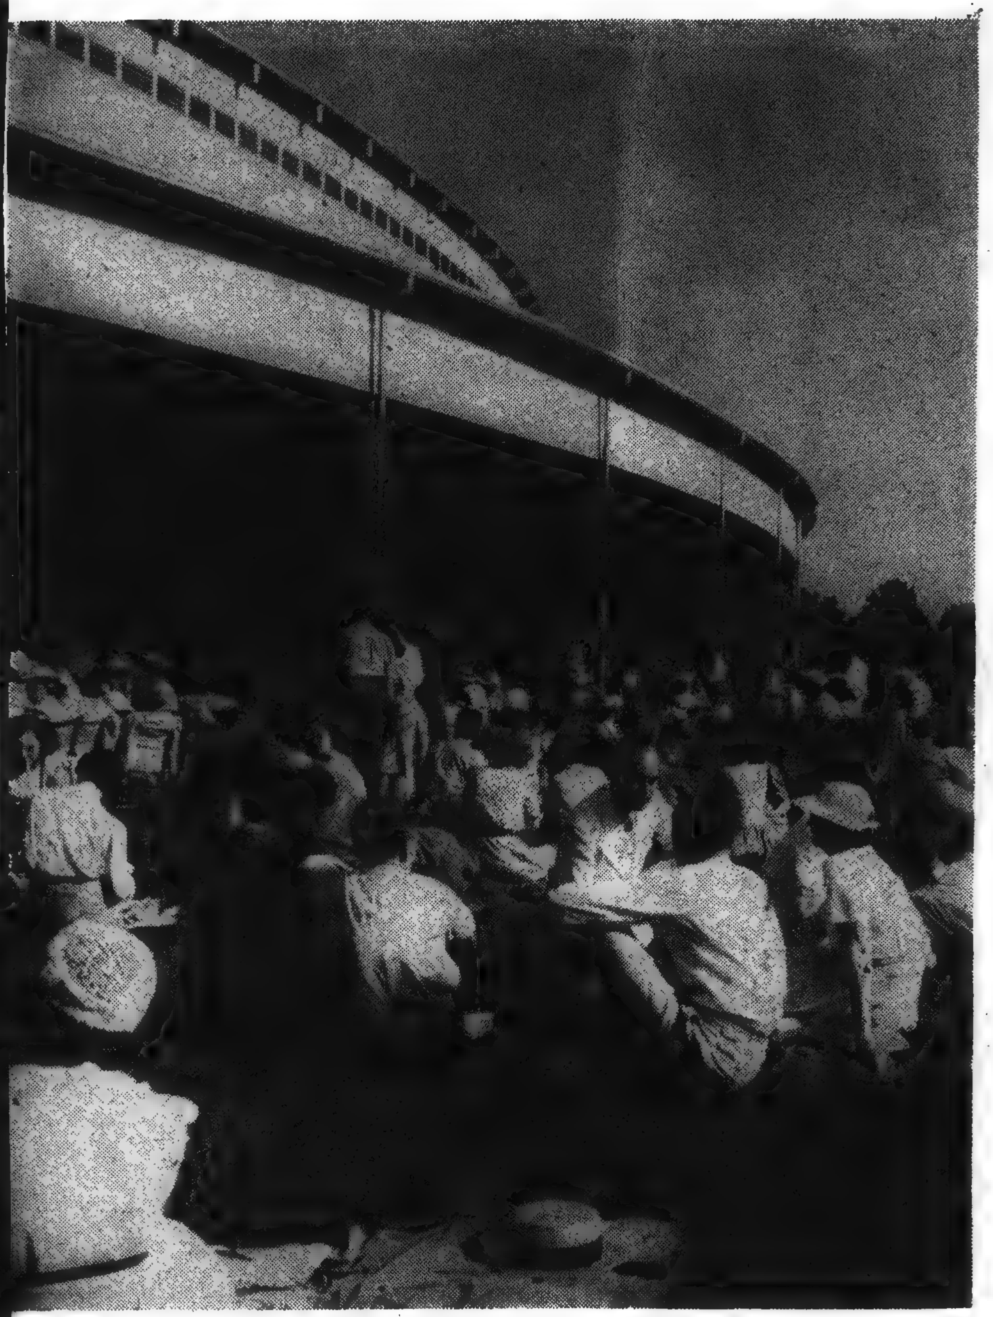
Egone Camera Artist



◀ From his terrace at Lenox, Mass., Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, looks out over the opulent Berkshire Hills that he turned into the Summer music capital of the United States

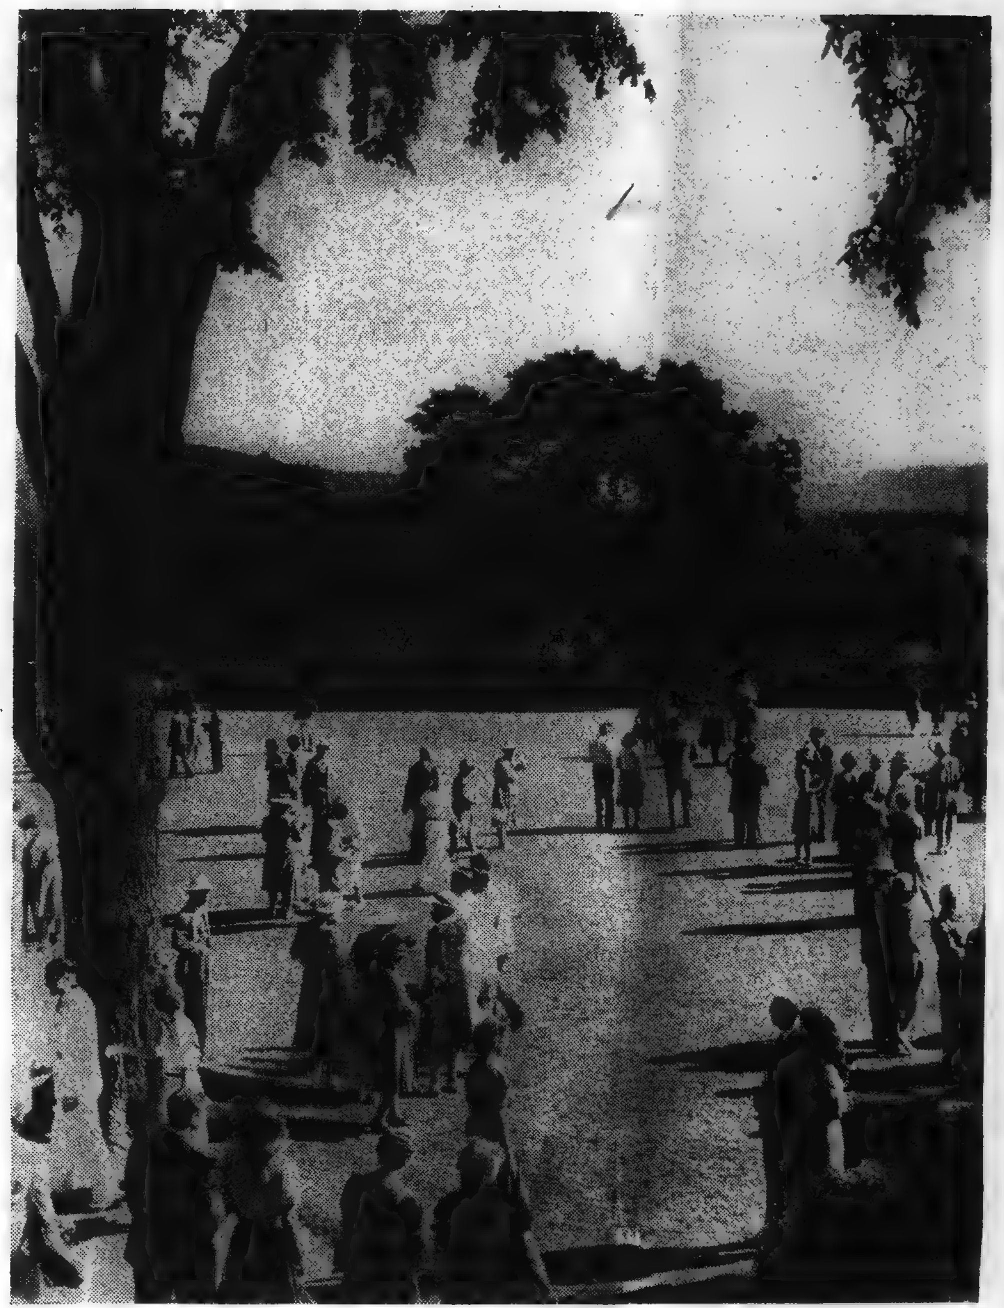
▼ Below, Dr. Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed at Tanglewood, built in 1938, after the estate became the permanent property of the Berkshire Music Center

Kosti Uohomaa from Black Star



Egone Camera Artist

Many listeners still prefer to lounge on the grass outside the shed as they used to in the Festival's early days



During intermissions festival-goers stroll about the verdant grounds of Tanglewood midway between Stockbridge and Lenox

MUSIC AGAIN IN THE BERKSHIRE AIR

Symphonic Festival's Big Postwar Season

FOUR HAS always been a significant number of distinguished, choleric conductor Serge Koussevitzky. He was born in 1874, became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, founded the Berkshire Music Center in 1934 and the Berkshire Music School in 1940. His twentieth anniversary in America and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's tenth both fell in 1944, a year in which even serious music felt the stultifying effects of world conflict. But Sergei Alexandrovitch, as maestro Koussevitzky would be called in his native Russia, and his Berkshire Festival are once more hitting on all cylinders in this Summer of 1946.

The Festival itself, in which the whole Boston Symphony plus a variety of guest soloists (Claudio Arrau and Eugene List, pianists; Carol Brice, contralto; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist; Misha Elman and Erica Morini, violinists) will take part consists of nine concerts spread out over a three-week period.

But these are not, by any means, all. A total of 42 musical performances are scheduled during the course of the Berkshire Music Center's six-weeks term (July 1-August 10). Of these, 16 will be open to the public by paid admission. Twenty-two concert and operatic performances of the Berkshire Music Center and four Coolidge Chamber Concerts are by invitation. But all members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited. And this organization is hardly exclusive. A voluntary contribution to the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., makes you a member.

The Festival's opening on July 25 will be made notable by the first performance in America of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9, preceded by the first movement from his Symphony No. 6 and followed by Beethoven's Eroica symphony. The second week will be all Brahms and the third, a musical melange ranging from Beethoven to Prokofieff with bits of Wagner and Strauss, Schumann and Tchaikovsky in between.

Dr. Koussevitzky is considered to have the most violent facial mannerisms of any contemporary conductor. His normally serene visage changes from white to red to purple as the show progresses. He mutters and hums to the orchestra. As one unbiased observer expressed it. "You think he'll burst a blood vessel before the second movement." But he hasn't yet.

Paragons for "Park Avenue"

IN ANSWER TO a clarion call from Max Gordon's office for "young, beautiful, well-bred, elegant and exquisite" girls who could sing and dance, we betook ourselves to the Gordonian lair above the Lyceum theatre one recent afternoon. Not, be assured, as an aspirant. Your reporter is male, grizzled and strictly G-I—but if a cat can look at a queen, he can leer at a "mouse."

As it turned out Mr. Gordon was looking for just twelve of these paragons, six singers and six dancers, to embellish his Autumn production, Park Avenue, which, if we are to credit advance reports, promises to be a "beautiful, well-bred, elegant and exquisite" production.

The state of affairs at the Gordon office when we appeared there on the second day of the search for youth and beauty was not, however, too encouraging. The interviews, which were merely a preliminary sifting of possibilities, were in the hands of an harassed young man named Saint Subber who turned out to be "production supervisor" for Park Avenue.

3X

"I've already interviewed over 300 girls," he lamented, "but so far there's only been one real possibility. Ninety-eight per cent of them come from the Bronx. If things don't pick up we're going to have to change the name of the show to Grand Concourse.".

Mr. Subber, like all men committed to large ventures, had worked out a system. He took names, addresses and telephone numbers of all who seemed likely to succeed. Opposite each name was a rating —A, A–, B+, etc. on down to C. Chances are that come time for final auditions, only the A's will be called and only a few of them will be chosen.

Neither the brash and brassy chorine type nor the serious little ballet dancer who is typical of today's musical stage will do for Park Avenue.

"These girls," explains Mr. Subber, "have to look like 17-year-old debutantes, the kind that would be bridesmaids in a Park Avenue wedding. Of course we've had some real debutantes come in, but they didn't look like debutantes."

As Mr. Subber interviewed, we drooped alongside his desk. Often he'd say simply, "Not the type," looking rather sad as he said it. "Says you," replied one peroxided and bare-midriffed miss.

At last a demure and naturally blonde "mouse" clad in decent black, gloved and hatless, slid gracefully into the inquisitorial chair. "Experience?" asked Mr. Subber laconically.

"I sing in the choir at St. Bartholomew's" she replied in a nice, finishing school accent.

"Address?" he queried optimistically.

"1024 Park Avenue," said the fair young maiden.

"Hallelujah!" said Mr. Subber.

Getting High in the Sky

As mid-Summer descends upon our vertical city, wise denizens of Manhattan go as high as the tall buildings permit to spend the days' waning hours. Call this part of day what you will—tea time, the cocktail hour or five o'clock shadow—it's a time for relaxation, conversation and comfort. New York has many high crannies perched atop its hotels where you may sip (be it tea or gin, rum or lemonade), marvel at the most famous skyline in the world and revel in the prevailing southwest breeze of Manhattan Island.

Highest cocktail lounge in the city is the Rainbow Lounge on the 65th floor of the RCA Building, Rockefeller Center. The Lounge is open from four to seven (except Sundays) and usually people are waiting to enter when the rope is removed from the doors. Though blinds are drawn to keep out the late afternoon sun, do take a peek through the slats, for the view looking south is magnificent. So is William Adler's string ensemble.

You may sip your cocktails or highballs before luncheon or dinner in the air-conditioned Penthouse Rooms or on the outdoor terrace (cooled by Nature) on the St. Regis Roof. With windows dressed in gay chintz, chairs and couches covered with bright materials and arranged in chummy groups, the Penthouse Rooms give the impression of pleasant country-house living rooms.

Gary Wagner Associates

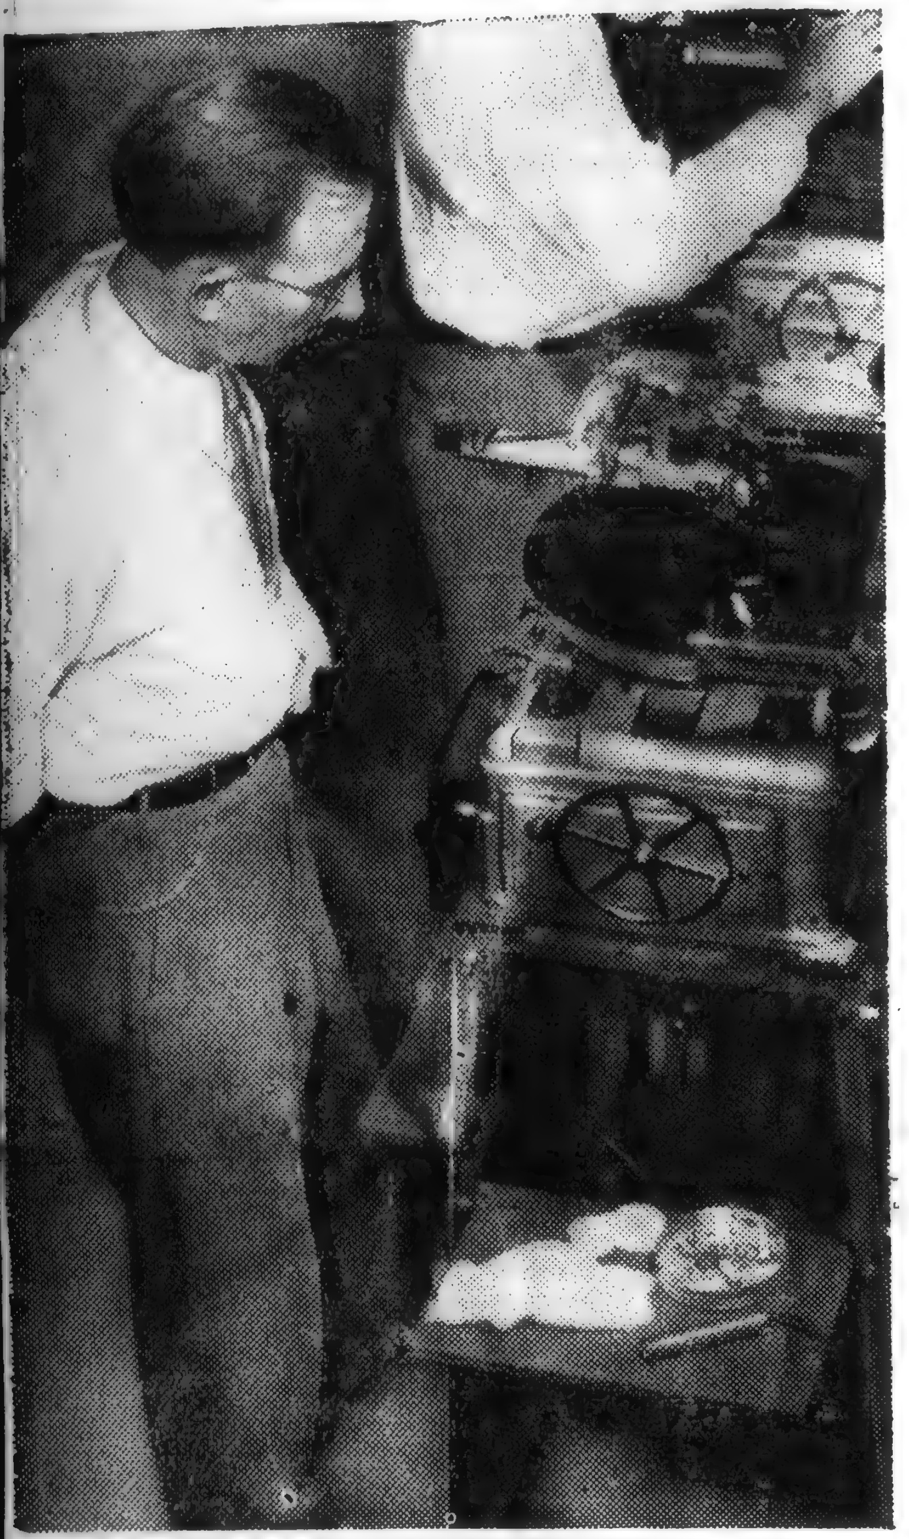
It's hard to imagine, when you're lolling away "the children's hour" on the broad, umbrageous outdoor roof of the Astor Hotel, that the largest city in the world lies beyond the green hedges and Times Square is ten stories below

PARAGOULD, ARK.
PRESS

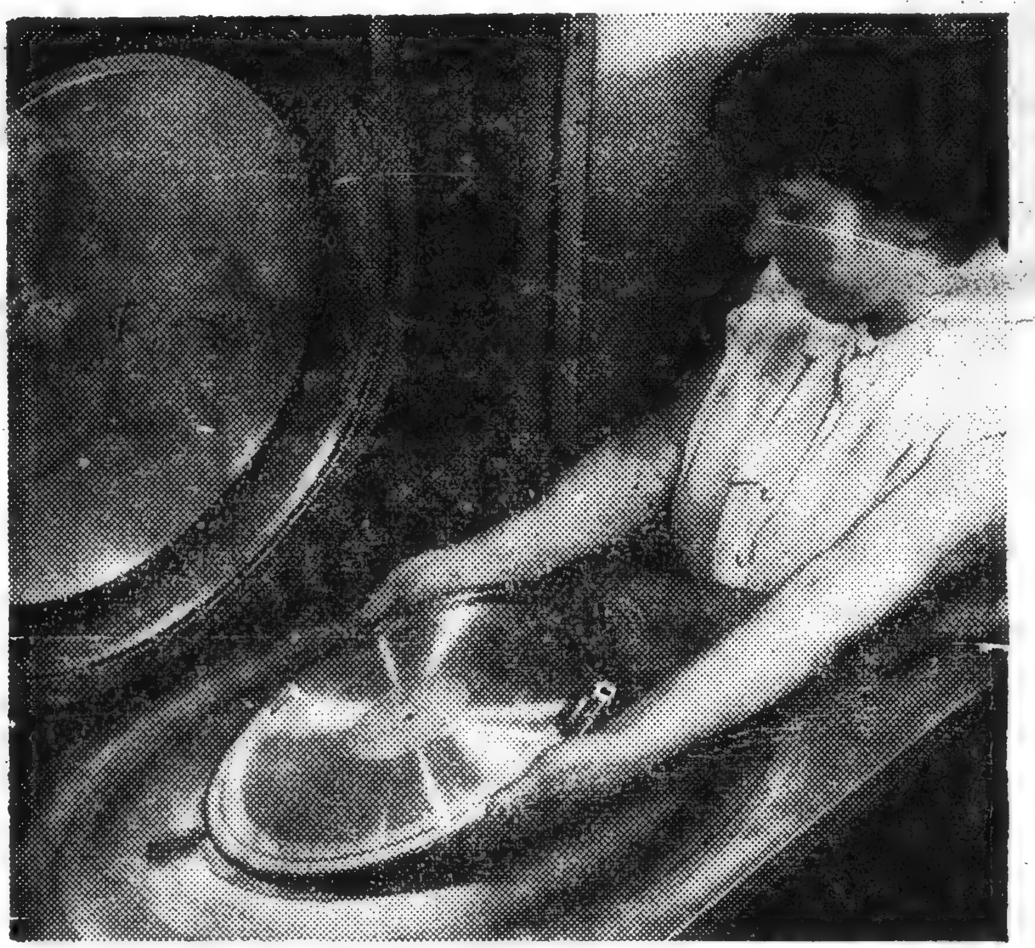
[illegible] 1946

CREATING A RECORD

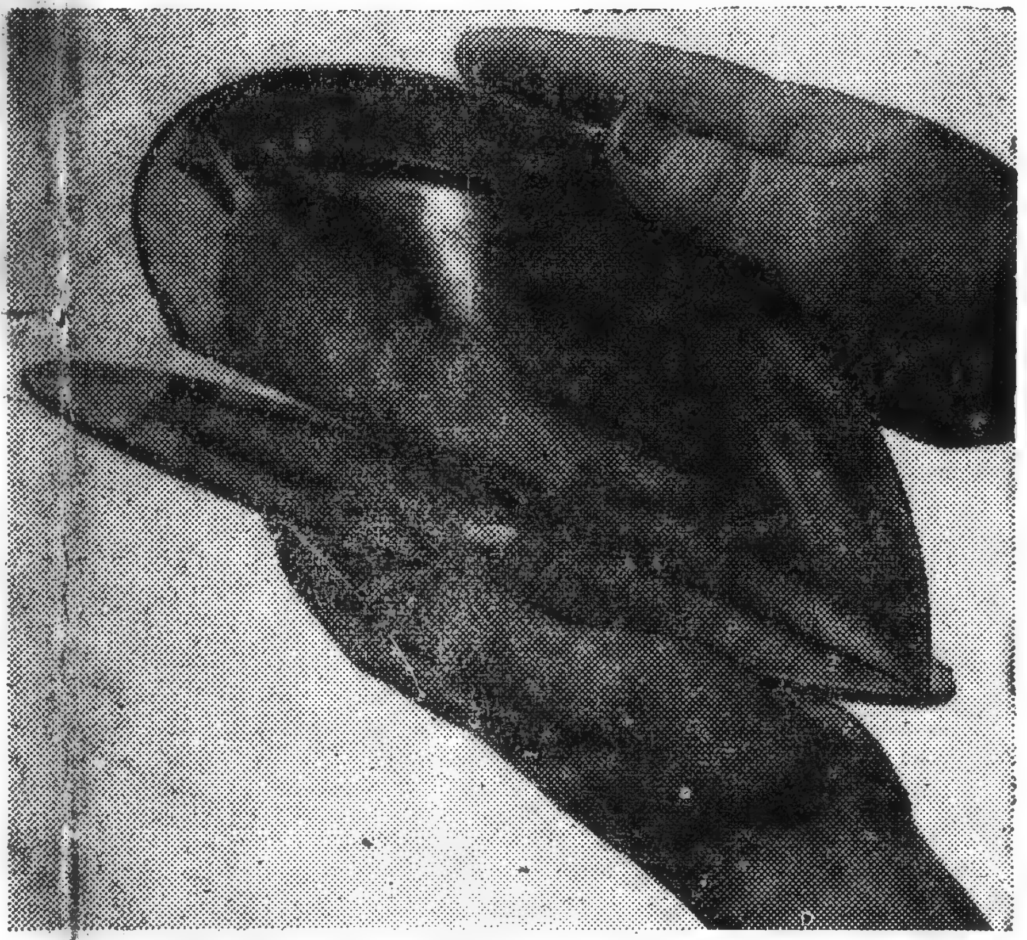
RECORDED music, which has been "on its way out" about three times in 70 years, is having its biggest season, with more than 260,000,000 records scheduled for manufacture by more than 150 American companies in 1946. The modern phonograph disc has come a long way since 1877, when Thomas A. Edison invented his crude tinfoil-wrapped cylinder which recorded and reproduced sound. Today's record contains ingredients from all parts of the world—shellac from India, gums from the Philippines and Africa, fine limestone from Indiana, red slate from Pennsylvania—and a series of manufacturing processes which are constantly being changed and improved. Last year the non-breakable plastic record was produced. Pictured here are the various steps taken in the making of a record—a recording of a symphony played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the manufacture of the finished disc at the RCA Victor record plant in Camden, N. J.



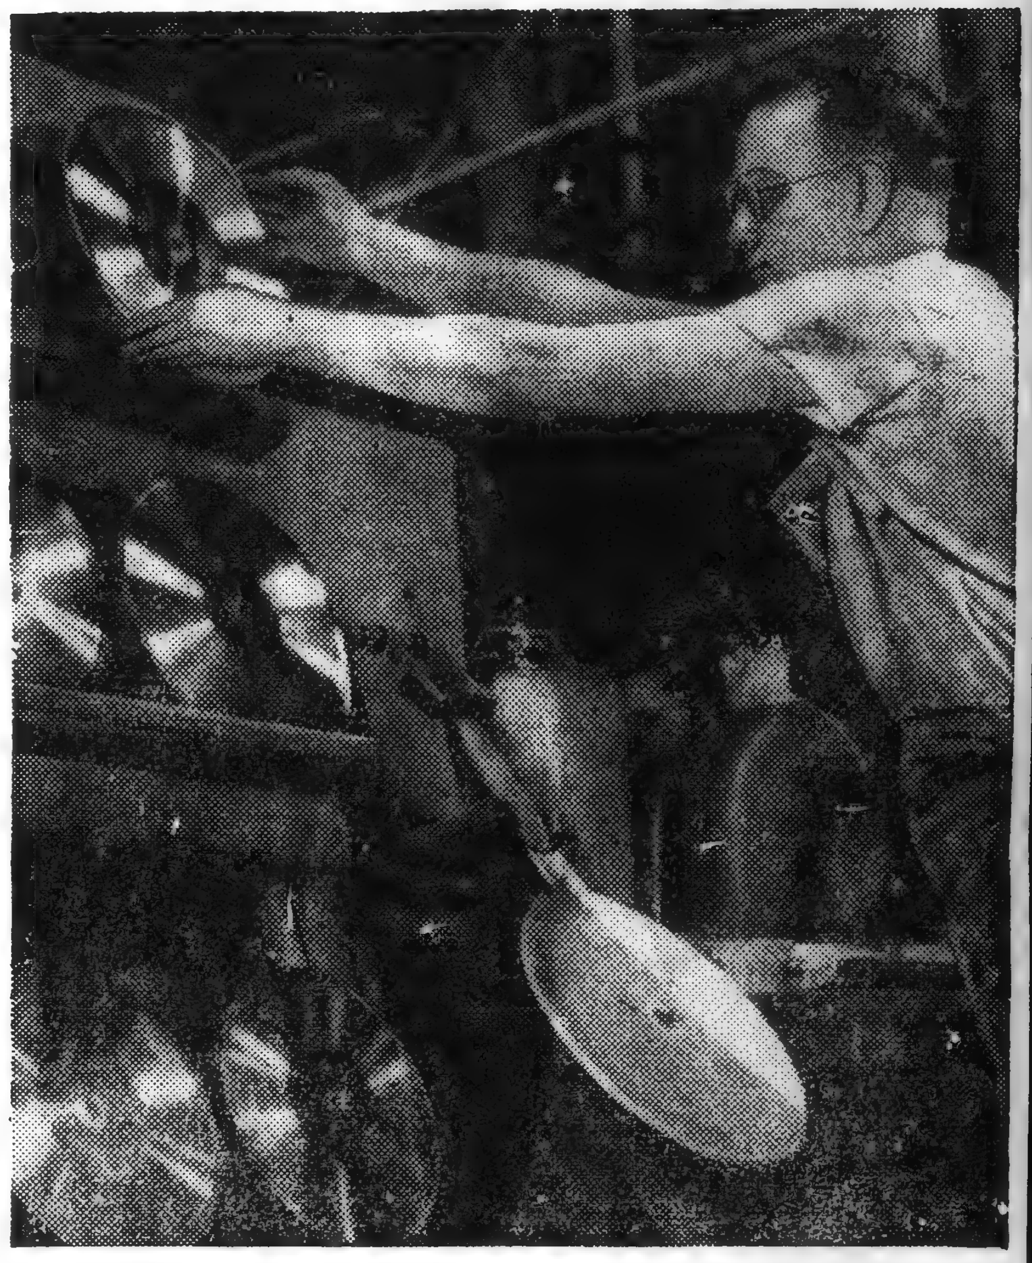
1. IN WINGS OF CONCERT THEATER recording engineers supervise turntables which record the music on lacquer discs. These are then re-recorded.



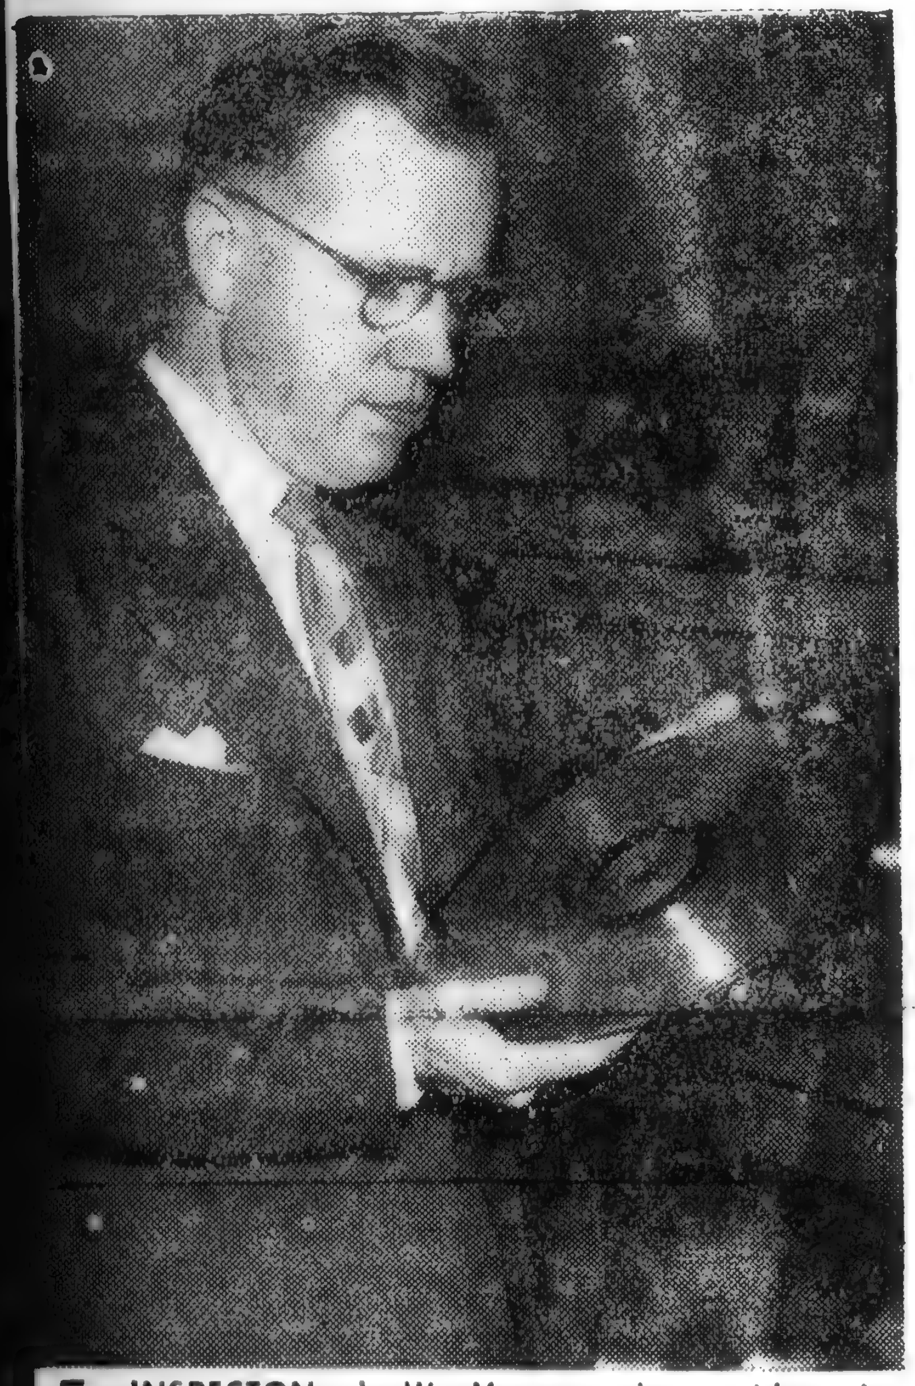
2. SURFACE OF "MASTER" is treated electrically by placing disc in vacuum chamber, covering it with extremely thin film of gold, then removed, ready for copper plating.



3. ONE BECOMES MANY. To produce many records, duplicate molds and stampers are made. A stamper, which will press out the record, is separated from mold.

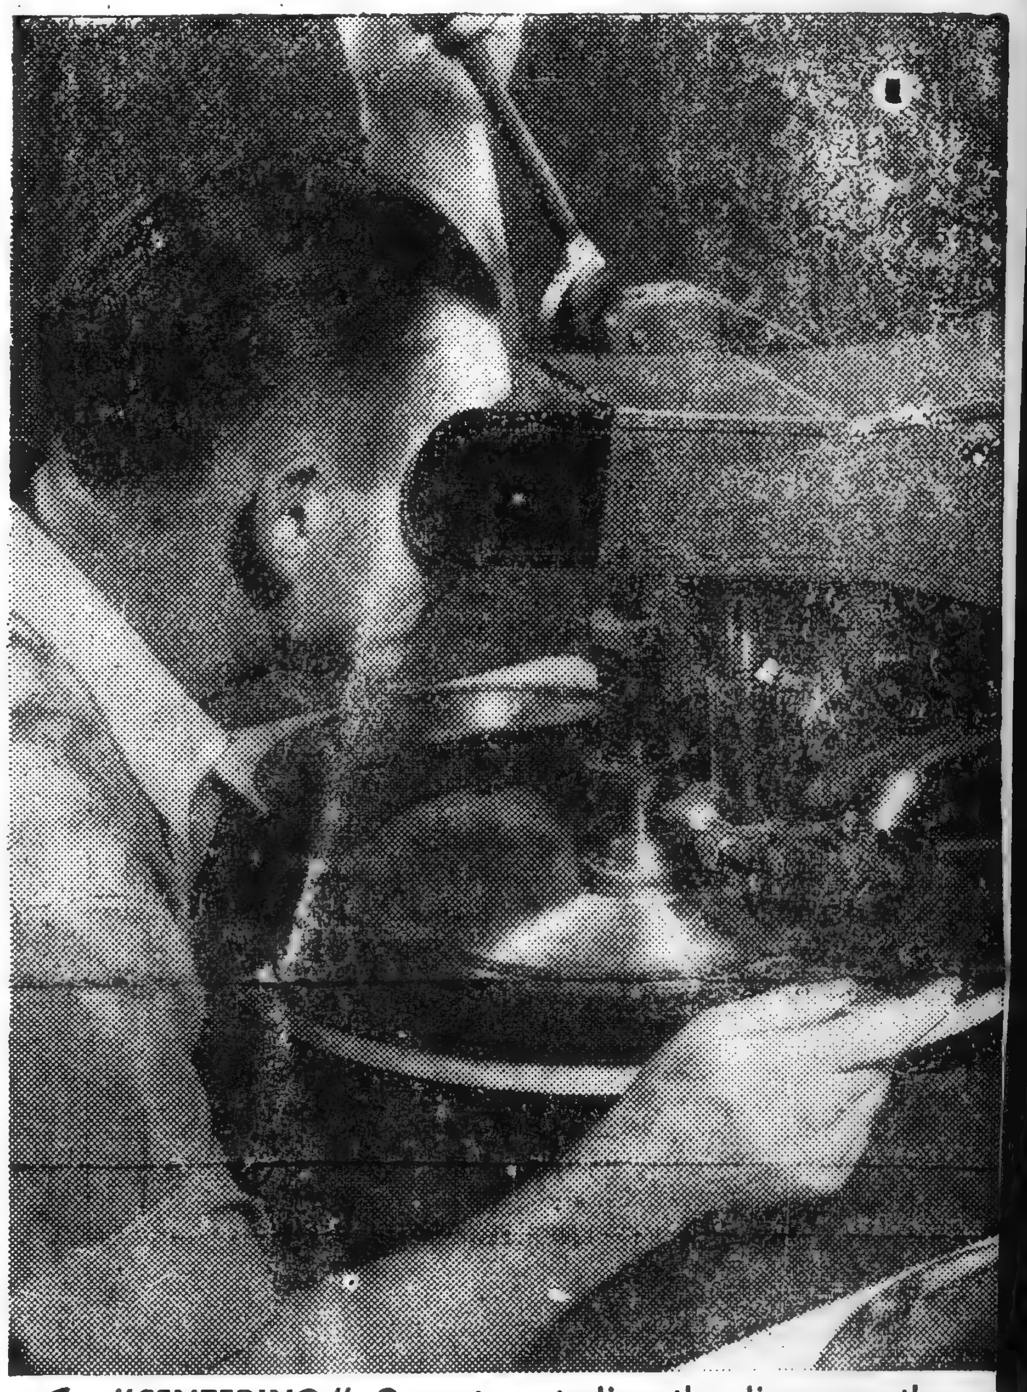


4. MADE IN QUANTITY from the mold, stampers are negatives from which actual records are pressed. Placed carefully on racks, as shown, they await centering.

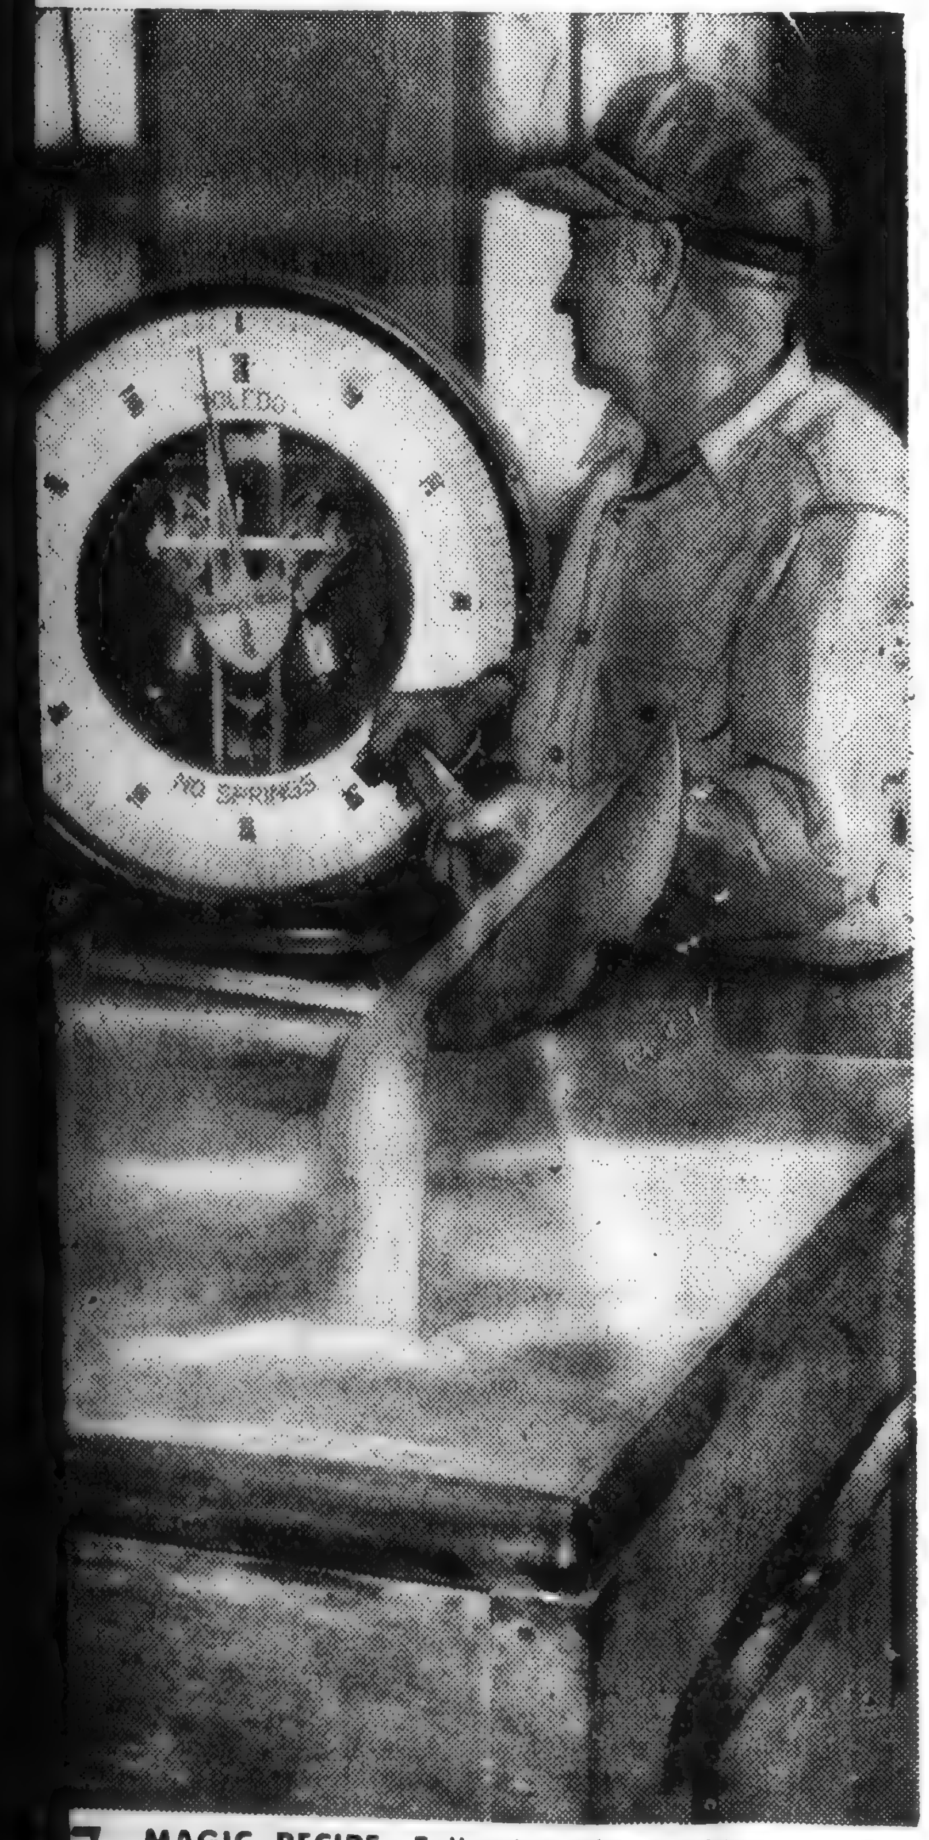


5. INSPECTON. J. W. Murray, vice-president in charge of RCA Victor record activities, inspects stamper. The "master record" is consigned to vault.

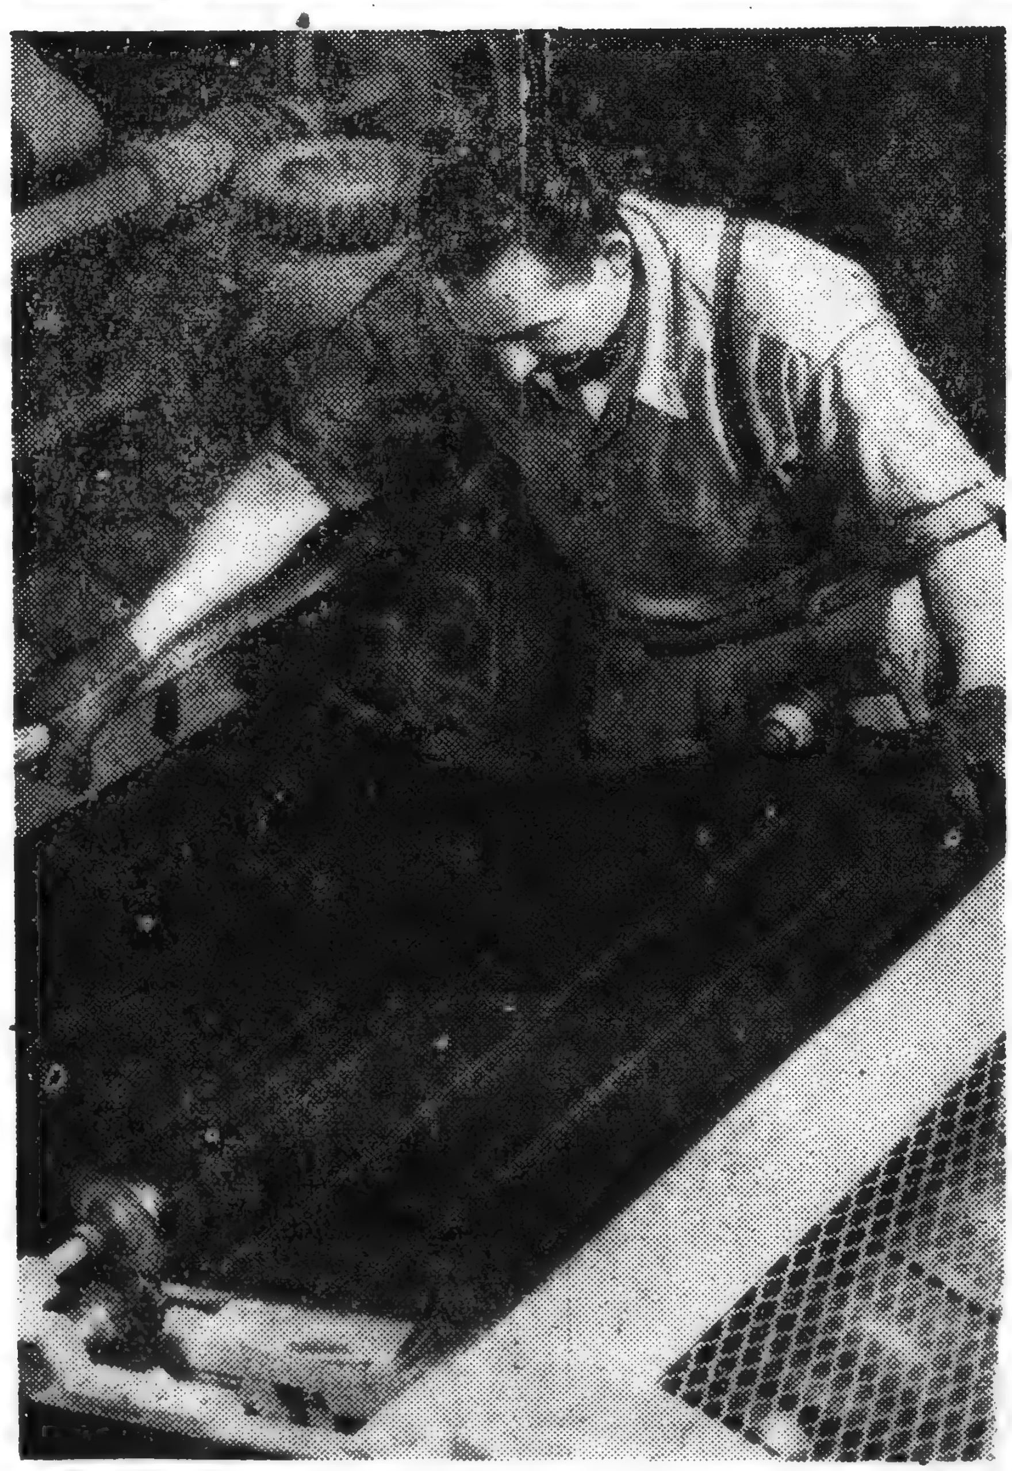
A PERFORMANCE by conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony is recorded in a studio.



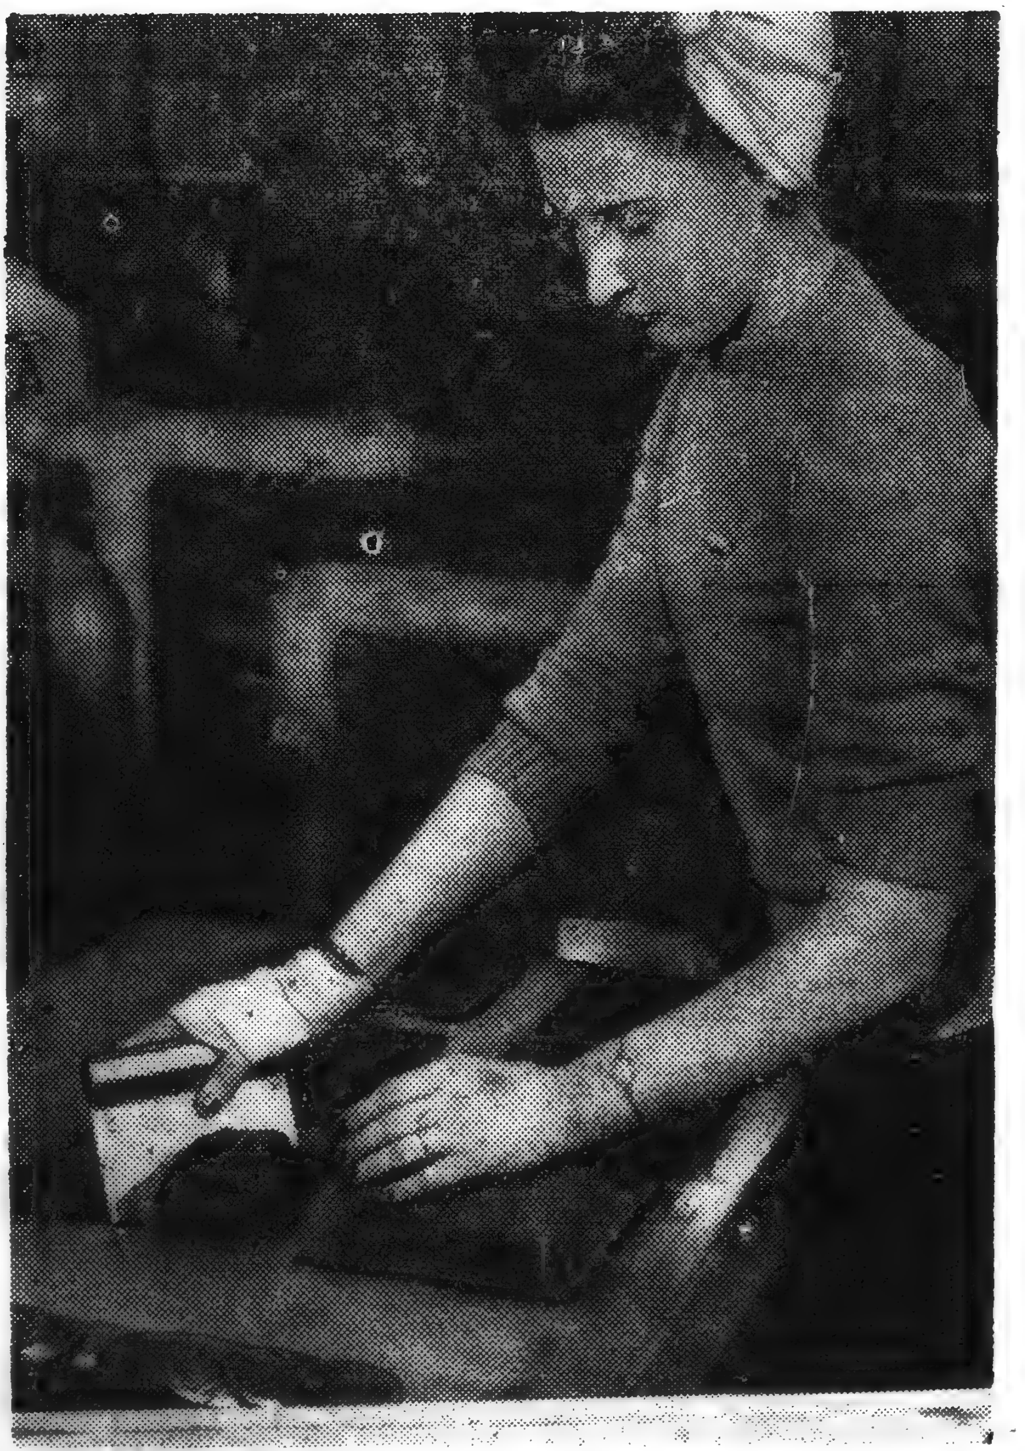
6. "CENTERING." Operator studies the lines on the stamper through shadowgraph and taps rim until dead center is reached. He then bores hole in stamper.



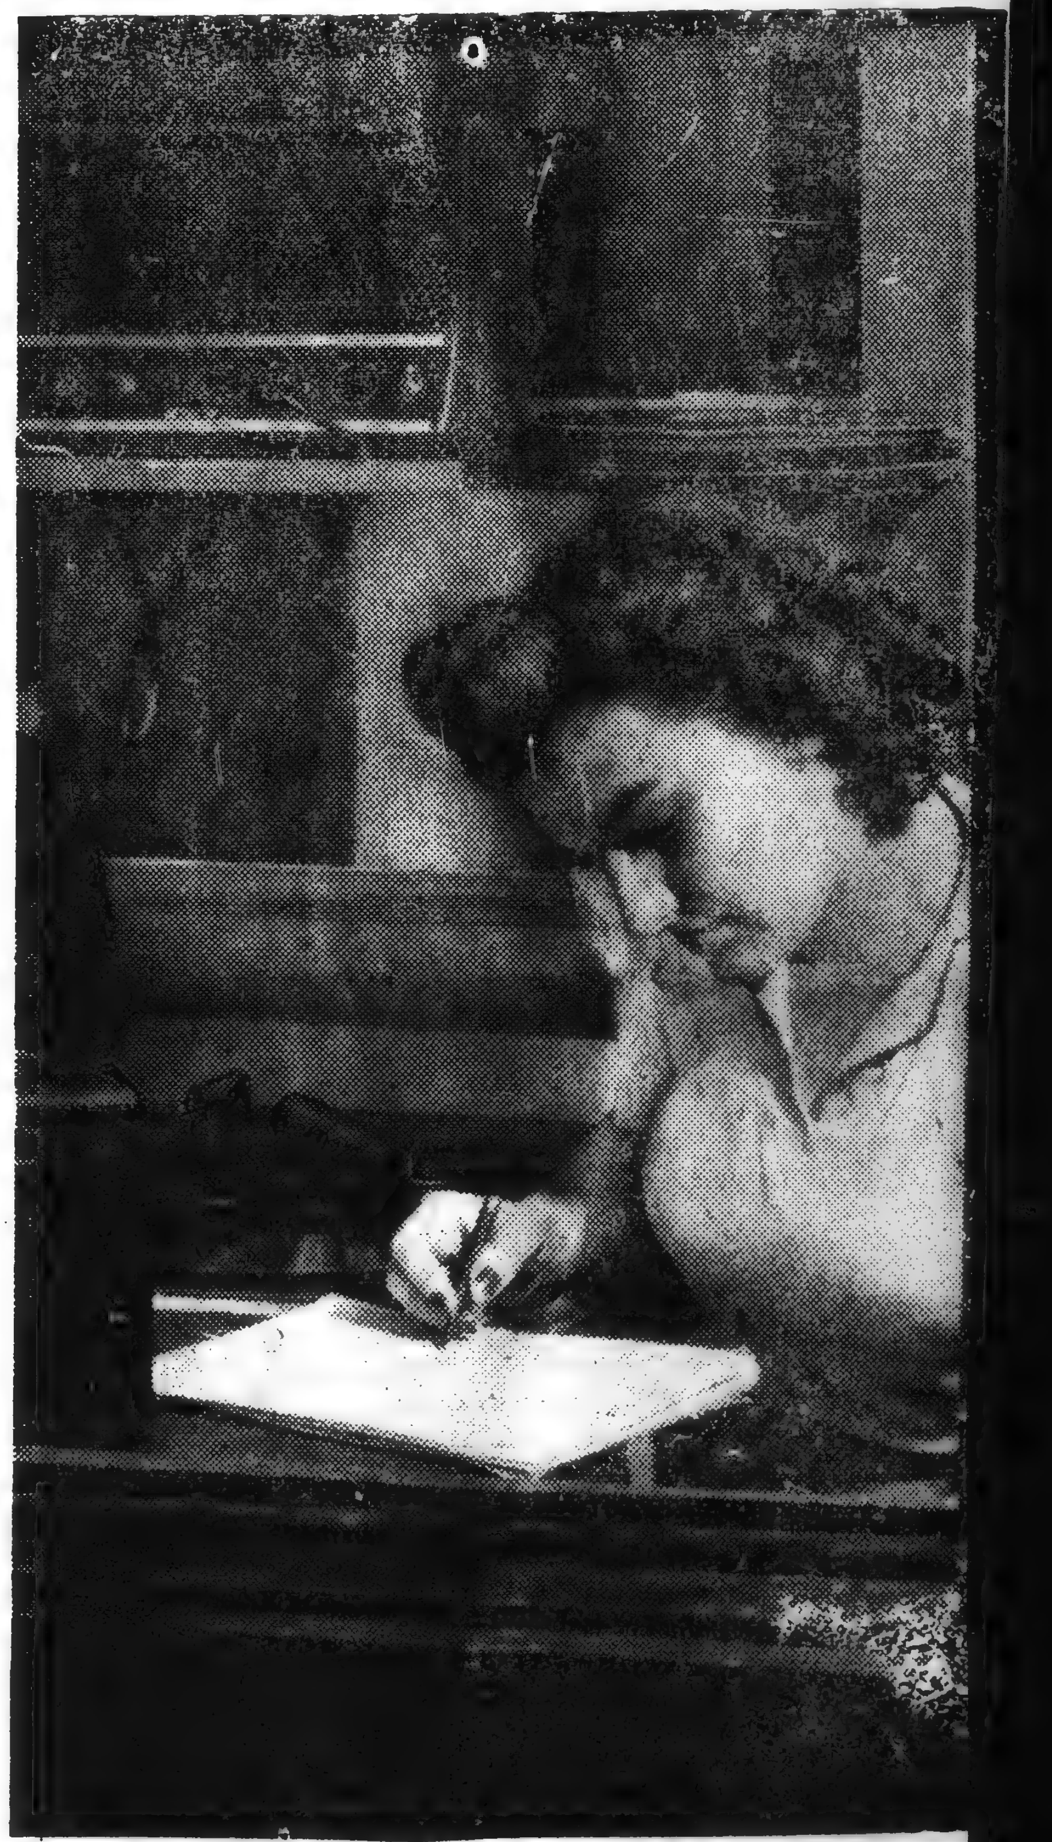
7. MAGIC RECIPE. Following the making of the "master record" and stampers, workmen mix and blend the dozen ingredients found in the record.



8. RECORDS IN THE RAW. Circular knives are poised to mark off long ribbons of hot black plastic compound into sections, called "biscuits," then sent along conveyor.



9. WORKING OVER STEAM TABLE, operator folds a "biscuit" for waiting press nearby. The base of shellac, limestone and lamp black is about to become a record.



10. THE NEWLY BORN RECORD, fresh off the press, is played for first time in test booth. Operator checks quality, freedom from noise and surface imperfections.

This Week's PICTURE SHOW—AP Newsfeatures

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
FEB 23 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY CASE

By VIRGIL THOMSON

SERGE (or Sergei) Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since ~~1924, is an~~ aristocrat among American conductors and in Boston music circles something of an autocrat. Born seventy-two years ago in Russia and reared there in poverty (his family, though Orthodox Jews, never lived in a ghetto), he has attained wealth, world-wide fame and the highest distinction in his profession. As a virtuoso on the double-bass viol and as a conductor his ranking, by any standards, has been for many years among that of the very greatest in our time. As a composer he has contributed to the reputable literature of his instrument. As a publisher and a patron of contemporary music he has probably made a more lasting contribution to the art than any other single person living, excepting five or six composers. His place in its history is already assured and glorious.

• • •

The Official Story

JUST to make assurance doubly sure, the Boston immortality machine has started issuing this winter what looks like a series of books bearing the papal imprimatur of the good Doctor (LL. D., honoris causa, Harvard, 1929, and elsewhere). M. A. DeWolfe Howe, official biographer to the Bostonian great, has furnished "The Tale of Tanglewood, Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals" (Vanguard Press, New York, 1946, $2), prefaced by Mr. Koussevitzky himself. And Hugo Leichtentritt, a musicologist of repute and a former Lecturer of Harvard University, has fathered "Sergei Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music" (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass., 1946, $3).

Both volumes are slender, and their tone is unctuous. The first sketches ever so lightly the history of the celebrated summer festivals that have now grown into a training school for composers, conductors and orchestral musicians. The second enumerates the American compositions played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (sometimes under other leaders) since 1924. The list is large and impressive. If Mr. Leichtentritt's critical paragraphs are weakened by the fact that he has neither heard many of the works nor had access to their scores, the tabulation of Mr. Koussevitzky's public encouragements to American composers alone is of value as proving once and for all (if Walter Damrosch, Frederick Stock, Pierre Monteux and Leopold Stokowski had not proved it before) that a sustained program policy supporting contemporary composition does not keep subscribers away from symphony concerts.

• • •

The Unofficial Biography

AND now to supplement these two books, which are clearly official and more than a little superficial, arrives a full-length biography of the maestro which is neither. It is entitled simply "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne, and Heath, New York, 1947, $4). Announced for sale on Feb. 15, its distribution has been held up for the time being by an injunction that prohibits its publication, sale and distribution till Justice Sheintag of the New York Supreme Court shall have determined whether the book's circulation will do its subject "irreparable harm." If the present writer, who has read an advance copy received before the injunction was issued, is in any way typical of the American reading public, it certainly, in his opinion, will not. The only possible harm he can envisage to so impregnable a reputation as that of Serge Koussevitzky is that already done by his own efforts to suppress the book.

Moses Smith, a trained newspaper man, for many years music critic of "The Boston Evening Transcript," as well as a friend of Mr. Koussevitzky, has produced a far more thorough study, a better work of scholarship than either Mr. Howe or Mr. Leichtentritt, scholars both by trade. There seems little in the book of factual statement that is subject to question. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky, in view of his great devotion to the memory of his second wife, is made unhappy by mention of his first marriage, hitherto not publicized in America, is scarcely germane. Neither is his possible sensitivity to reports of his quarrels with musicians and with blood relatives. These are, as a matter of fact, common knowledge; and they legitimately form part of the whole story of his musical life, just as his first marriage does of any complete biography.

Judgments and opinions, expressed over any writer's signature, are, of course, personal. The conductor's legal complaint objected to Mr. Smith's statement that Koussevitzky had succeeded as a conductor in spite of imperfect training as a young man in musical theory and score-reading. This also, if I may make so bold, has long been common knowledge among musicians. Nor is the estimable Doctor unique among the conducting great for being in a certain sense self-taught. Leopold Stokowski, Sir Thomas Beecham and Charles Muench, great interpreters all of them, did not come to conducting through early mastery of the conservatory routines. They bought, muscled or impressed their way in and then settled down to learn their job. They succeeded gloriously, as Koussevitzky has done. All honor to them. They have all, Koussevitzky included, contributed more of value to the technique of their art than most of the first-prize-in-harmony boys ever have.

• • •

The "Last Infirmity of Noble Mind"

BUT great pedagogues, and the good Doctor is one, do hate hearing that their own education has not been conventional, though it rarely was. And all great artists loathe criticism. They do; they really do. What they want, what they need, what they live on, as Gertrude Stein so rightly said, is praise. They can never get enough of it. And sometimes, when they have come to be really powerful in the world they take the attitude that anything else is libel and should be suppressed. Dr. Koussevitzky's complaint, as I remember, did not use the word libel. It spoke of possibly "irreparable injury." Well, criticism is often injurious; there is no question about that. Many a recitalist, receiving unfavorable reviews, finds it more difficult to secure further engagements than if his reports had been less critical. Minor careers have been ruined over night that way. Major careers are rarely harmed by criticism, because major artists can take it. They don't like to; but they have to, so they do. All the same, it is the big boys, the great big boys that nothing could harm, that squawk the loudest. I know, because I have been in the business for several years now.

Mr. Smith's book makes Koussevitzky out to be a very great man indeed, but it also makes him human. Gone is the legend of his papal infallibility. Renewed is one's faith in his deep sincerity, his consecration, his relentless will to make the world permanently better than he found it. Nobody, I am sure, can read the book through without admiring him more. And the faith of the pious need not be shaken by reading that he has not always been toward his fellowman just and slow to anger. Civilization would be just a racket if we had to learn the lives of its great men from their official biographers and their paid agents. And if infallibility must be proved by suppressing all the arguments against it, any pope who tries this, even if he succeeds, has by that very action relinquished the point.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not the only first-class conductor in the world, though he is one of the best. Nor is he the only first-class conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed. Nor does he any longer play the double-bass in public, though when he did he was, by common consent, world champion. His unique position in a world full of excellent conductors, many of them devoted to contemporary music, is that he has played more of it, launched more of it, published more of it and paid for more of it than anybody else living. That is the clear message of Mr. Smith's biography. Everything else, a petulant gesture here and there, a musical or family quarrel, a pretentious remark, a vainglorious interview, the present court action, all these things serve the picture; they bring him more vividly to life. How can any one mind knowing them? Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity apotheosis that has already begun, would see any value in posing before an already worshiping universe without the customary habiliment of one human weakness. His lawsuit, of course, adds to the tableau that he has ayed to compose so carefuly just that.

Feb 13 '47

AMUSEMEN

CONDUCTS CONCERT

Leonard Bernstein

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

As Guest on Podium Here, He Presents Major Works by Schubert and Stravinsky

By OLIN DOWNES

Music is completely a psychological thing. The fact is nowhere more evident than in the wholly invisible relations which exist between a conductor, the music he interprets and the orchestra which he endeavors to infuse with his interpretation. And so it was last night when the young Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Bernstein, invited by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was in the audience, to conduct this concert, had arranged for himself a program which would have given any conductor pause: the great Schubert C major symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps." The symphony, despite its years and the vast honor in which it is properly held, has a secret which eludes even brilliant and authoritative conductors of today. As for the "Sacre," the mere practical problem that it offers the leader is one that none but a highly accomplished musician and technician should dream of facing.

The results of this situation afforded an exact revelation of the nature of Mr. Bernstein's remarkable talent, his instinct for conducting, his youth, his artistic tendencies and his precise degree of maturity as man and musician. He gave a highly creditable reading of the symphony. There were details which could be argued about, and it would be well if conductors, young and old, heeded more carefully than was done last night the tempo directions of the main body of the opening movement, which are "allegro"—fast—but also "non-troppo"—not too fast.

But as a whole, this was a musicianly, enthusiastic reading. And it fell quite flat because, with all his qualities, Mr. Bernstein got just as much as, and no more, than an orchestra of players who were in a majority older than he chose to give him. Hence the performance was pedestrian, despite a brilliant finale, in which the orchestra sounded more noisy than brilliant. The famous Boston Symphony tone was not often present; the music did not float but was pushed, as it were, from the instruments; the playing was fundamentally routine.

In turn the "Sacre du printemps" got off to a poor start. But here Mr. Bernstein would not be gainsaid, and presently he struck fire. He gave a performance that was electrifying. There was a degree of immoderation in the first part of it. Fine! One had gotten rather tired of moderation and there are higher virtues, anyhow. Furthermore, there was an orchestra to be gotten in hand, which might do something temporarily to impair balances. Mr. Bernstein flung himself tigerishly into the music, which became as fresh and as wildly exciting, in his hands, as it must have sounded when it caused a riot at its première in Paris of a bygone decade.

One wholly believed, all over again, in this amazing piece, with its atomic energy and its primitive emotion. To state that the performance fully restored its primordial ferocity is to state one part of the matter. The greatest moment was that of precisely its greatest page—perhaps the most tender and poignant page of music Stravinsky ever has written—the introduction of the second part, the music of the gestating earth and the brooding spring night.

This was the prelude to the best and the strongest build-up of the final pages that we remember. Despite the sectional character of certain of these pages, and the extremely irregular rhythmic patterns, there was one continuous line, with one climax, long and gradually prepared, from those preliminary pages to the last measure. There is such power and novelty in the first part of the "Sacre" that the last part can become an anti-climax. Mr. Bernstein understood the music too well for that. He felt its whole structure and germination, felt it in his bones, and so released it that it seemed almost to rend the orchestra itself with its elemental power. He is a born conductor, a musician of his period, and one of its voices in his art.

Boston Plays 2 New Works

By Samuel L. Singer

Two compositions new here and the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony comprised the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky conducted last night, in its annual concert presented by the Philadelphia Forum at the Academy of Music.

The local premieres were by two living composers. One was "The Song of Songs," Biblical cantata by Lukas Foss, 24-year-old Berlin-born American composer, with Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, soloist in this composition for the eighth time in nine days. The other was a Concerto Grosso by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech composer, for two pianos and chamber orchestra. Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera were at the keyboards.

In Modern Idiom

Both works were in the 20th-century idiom harmonically, but here the similarity ended. The cantata, 23 minutes long, uses selections from the Song of Solomon. It is unusual in that the orchestral writing contrasts with rather than complements the vocal portions.

The solo part has a certain seductiveness and languor, and melodic appeal, while the orchestration throughout is bold and sharp, especially in the purely instrumental passages.

Singer Impressive

The work scored a great success, and Miss Davis enlarged on the impression she made with the Philadelphia Orchestra last November. In vocal flexibility and interpretive power she projected well the varying moods of the Biblical passages.

The Martinu work, not one of his best, is a concerto grosso in spirit rather than substance. Using modern harmonies and a vigorous scoring in the two fast movements, it frankly entails no formal development. The slow movement featured a broad melody for the strings, while the finale alternated passages between the orchestra and the pianos.

"Monitor" — Nov. 21 1946

Noted British Pianist Played Amid Crash of Falling Bombs

By Theodore N. Cook
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

After more than six years of wartime performing in blitz-shattered halls in Europe, Dame Myra Hess, famed British pianist, has come to the United States "for a rest."

But it is a vacation in the traditional Hess manner, which is to say that probably no one but Dame Myra would consider it a rest. The dynamic artist is on a concert tour covering cities from Chicago to Baltimore.

Playing Mozart and Beethoven concertos to the accompaniment of buzz-bombs, exploding anti-aircraft shells, and the general background din of London air raids, became a routine experience during the war, Dame Myra said in an interview in Boston recently.

Had to Play Loud

"Occasionally I had to play very loud to make myself heard, but I didn't mind and no one else seemed to, so it didn't matter," she continued.

It was for her work as founder of the London National Gallery's wartime concerts that Dame Myra was called to Buckingham Palace to receive the decoration of Dame Commander of the British Empire. This is the feminine equivalent of knighthood, and the award expressed the gratitude of Londoners for her wartime music.

More than 800,000 persons heard the daily concerts at one shilling a head. "But we didn't advertise them as concerts, because that might have scared some away. We just called it music," she explained.

Dame Myra played at 147 of the 1,698 concerts. There was no time for temperament, she asserted with a laugh. In one week she played 21 Mozart concertos.

Key Broke Off

"Most of the time the floor was wet where rain had come in through broken windows. We had no heat and we never knew when the air raid alarm would go off." During one performance, the piano on which she was playing broke down three times. But it was hastily repaired, and the concert continued.

During one performance, when she was playing Beethoven's "Appassionata," a key broke off under her finger in the middle of the selection. During another concert, she had to play above and below an octave where the keys were out of order.

The concerts were organized within a week after the war began. "We didn't expect many to attend," she said, "but it wasn't long before we had 1,000 persons standing in Trafalgar Square, waiting to get in."

Dame Myra, and her secretary, Miss Gunn, arrived in the United States in the middle of August. They traveled incognito, and went directly to a small cottage—with a piano but no telephone — near Conway, N. H., for several weeks of comparative relaxation.

They are still staggered by the abundance of food in the United States. "When we first came over, a waiter in a small hotel apologized that he had no meat, just chicken and turkey," Dame Myra related. "We told him to please not apologize—that we had not seen either a chicken or a turkey for several years."

Noted Pianist in Boston

By a Staff Photographer

At the outbreak of World War II, Dame Myra Hess, celebrated British pianist, cancelled an American tour to return to London for war service. She is shown above at a piano in the Hotel Vendome in Boston, where she is preparing for rehearsals with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra after a more than six years' absence from the United States.

Symphony Plays Condemned '9th' at 66th Opening

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 66th season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the opening piece was the newly condemned Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich. Condemned by one Soviet critic, that is. The Friday audience, which is basically conservative, listened attentively and applauded cordially.

Yet it was obvious that a good deal of their approval was directed to conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston orchestra. It was equally evident that they did not get anywhere near so much of a kick out of Shostakovich as they did from Brahms' First Symphony, which ended the program.

See SYMPHONY Page 14

Symphony

Continued from the First Page

I learned on pretty good authority, last Thursday, that the bitter criticism of the Shostakovich Ninth by I, Nestiev in Culture and Life probably is not official, even though the Soviet newspaper is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Communist Party central committee.

Nestiev's comments that the Ninth has "ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," according to this authority, are likely his own narrow opinions. Nevertheless Shostakovich was once disciplined by the party, and if anything unfavorable to him should appear in Pravda, that likely would mean he again was under a Soviet ban.

Amiable About It All

The mere fact that the Boston audience listened as cordially as they did is a small commentary on the gulf between democratic liberty and authoritarian restriction. I dare say many in the Friday audience think as little of the Soviet political system as I do, and as little of the nonsence that music, an abstract art, can express the ideological side of anything. Yet, they listened and they applauded, and they were amiable about it all.

Heard once at the American premiere at Tanglewood last Summer, and again yesterday, the Shostakovich Ninth still seems clever, flippant, superficial and cheerful. The first movement does indeed reflect a lot of Prokofieff and the two slow sections are reminiscent of the lon[illegible] slow movement in Shostakovich [illegible] own Sixth Symphony. The [illegible] probably is too long. Taken [illegible] and all, however, it is agreea[illegible] good fun. Why ask [illegible] Kousse-

It is interesting that [illegible] when he vitzky, following a pe[illegible]asm for the had no inner enth[illegible] should find "The music of Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy" once more does move him. Yesterday he gave it a glorious performance, vivid, glowing, mo[illegible] carefully planned and all details [illegible] order. The "Poem" is still [illegible] impressive work, a naive [illegible] conception expressed in a highly sophisticated orchestral style that owes more than a little to Debussy of the "La Mer" period. You don't need to share Scriabin's half-baked esthetic theories to enjoy the "Poem." It has form [illegible] continuity and logic, and therefore it can be enjoyed simply as music.

Affectionate Greeting

Up to this point the Friday listeners had heard the widely differing art of two Russian composers, one who lives under the Soviet regime, the other a subject of the last of the Czars. No doubt it was only because Scriabin is lush sensuous, where Shostakovich [illegible] ontreal ....73 46 Los Angeles .79 — sonant, that Scriabin had the bigger hand.

Until Mr. Kousevitzky reached Measure No. 385 (and I'm not joking) in the finale of the Brahms, the performance had been the finest I had ever heard of this grave and monumental symphony. The tone was rich, deep and lustrous, beautiful beyond description; the proportions were perfect, the tempi right; all was neat and clear, and the horn solo of the last movement was absolutely noble. Then, at Measure No. 385 the conductor's passion ran away with him, and in a frenzy of speed the music became confused and threatened to fall apart.

As always at a season's opening, the audience rose in affectionate greeting to Mr. Koussevitzky when he first walked upon the stage. It is an appropriate, even a touching custom. It is also proof that while Bostonians may seem to take their great orchestra and their great conductor for granted, they really have a reverential feeling for the town's musical glory.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 13 1947

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, conductor. ~~Heard~~ last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony No. 7 in C major.........Schubert
"Le Sacre du Printemps"...........Stravinsky

You Can Listen to Him

STRAVINSKY'S "Rite of Spring," which closed last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is probably the most influential work of music composed in our century and the most impressive in performance. Not having heard its execution in November by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski, the present writer has no basis for a comparison of that reading, which was much admired, with last night's by Leonard Bernstein. He has heard many another, however; and none has seemed to him more straightforward or more moving.

The work does not stand much interpretative tinkering, as a matter of fact. The more rigid its beat the greater its expressive power. What it needs is clean rhythm, clean tonal balances and understanding. Its subject, human sacrifice, is too grand and terrible to require the aid of personal posturing. And Mr. Bernstein, often a sinner in that regard, gave it none. If he did not extract from the score one-tenth of the detailed refinement that older hands at it do—conductors like Monteux and Ansermet and Désormière—he nevertheless got the rhythm right and made the meaning more clear than usual. One felt that he loved the music, understood it and submitted his will in all modesty to its relentless discipline.

* * *

The work is not a clear masterpiece, like the same composer's "Petrouchka"; but it is more original. It cuts farther below the surface of musical convention, goes straight to the heart of the whole stylistic problem of Romantism, comes out both deeply expressive and completely impersonal. Its complex rhythmic interest, its high harmonic tension and its rigid orchestral textures are justly famous. Its patent of mobility, however, lies in the extreme beauty of its melodic material. Partly Russian folklore and partly inventions in the same manner, its themes are short, diatonic and narrow. They rarely cover a larger range than the perfect fifth. They are as plain as granite and as resistant to time. If the work did not lose intensity in the early part of its second half, it would be the solidest single monument of musical art our century has erected. Just possibly it is that in spite of everything.

* * *

Mr. Bernstein's reading of the Schubert C-major Symphony, which preceded the Stravinsky work, was open-hearted, animated, youthful and full of life. Texturally it was a little rough, and at no point was it particularly Viennese in lilt. But it was passionate and sweet. Anybody can question another artist's interpretation. What seems to be beyond question in Mr. Bernstein's case is that he is a real interpreter. His orchestral hand is still young and a little heavy, and sometimes his personal projection is overweaning. But his is a real temperament for making music. What he conducts rarely sounds beautiful to a sensuous spirit. And his musical culture is far from mature. But you can listen to him. That is the first and the last test of any interpreter.

Leonard Bernstein

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Cir. (D 330,138) (S 336,005)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 14 1947

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Heard Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony No. 7 in C major.........Schubert
"Le Sacre du Printemps"...........Stravinsky

You Can Listen to Him

STRAVINSKY'S "Rite of Spring," which closed Wednesday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is probably the most influential work of music composed in our century and the most impressive in performance. Not having heard its execution in November by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski, the present writer has no basis for a comparison of that reading, which was much admired, with Wednesday's by Leonard Bernstein. He has heard many another, however; and none has seemed to him more straightforward or more moving.

The work does not stand much interpretative tinkering, as a matter of fact. The more rigid its beat the greater its expressive power. What it needs is clean rhythm, clean tonal balances and understanding. Its subject, human sacrifice, is too grand and terrible to require the aid of personal posturing. And Mr. Bernstein, often a sinner in that regard, gave it none. If he did not extract from the score one-tenth of the detailed refinement that older hands at it do—conductors like Monteux and Ansermet and Désormière—he nevertheless got the rhythm right and made the meaning more clear than usual. One felt that he loved the music, understood it and submitted his will in all modesty to its relentless discipline.

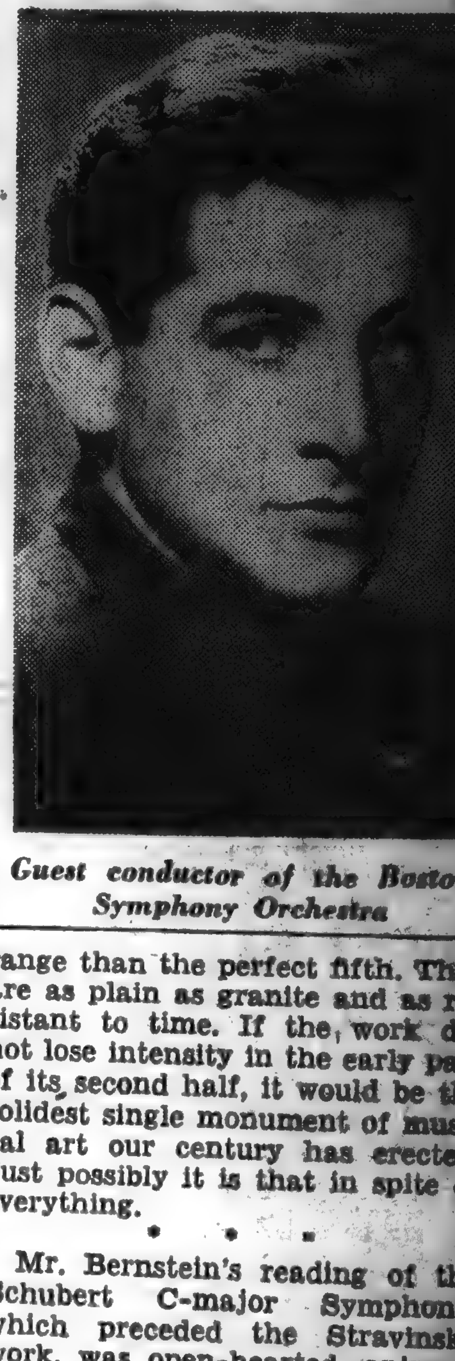
* * *

The work is not a clear masterpiece, like the same composer's "Petrouchka"; but it is more original. It cuts farther below the surface of musical convention, goes straight to the heart of the whole stylistic problem of Romantism, comes out both deeply expressive and completely impersonal. Its complex rhythmic interest, its high harmonic tension and its rigid orchestral textures are justly famous. Its patent of mobility, however, lies in the extreme beauty of its melodic material. Partly Russian folklore and partly inventions in the same manner, its themes are short, diatonic and narrow. They rarely cover a larger range than the perfect fifth. They are as plain as granite and as resistant to time. If the work did not lose intensity in the early part of its second half, it would be the solidest single monument of musical art our century has erected. Just possibly it is that in spite of everything.

* * *

Mr. Bernstein's reading of the Schubert C-major Symphony, which preceded the Stravinsky work, was open-hearted, animated, youthful and full of life. Texturally it was a little rough, and at no point was it particularly Viennese in lilt. But it was passionate and sweet. Anybody can question another artist's interpretation. What seems to be beyond question in Mr. Bernstein's case is that he is a real interpreter. His orchestral hand is still young and a little heavy, and sometimes his personal projection is overweaning. But his is a real temperament for making music. What he conducts rarely sounds beautiful to a sensuous spirit. And his musical culture is far from mature. But you can listen to him. That is the first and the last test of any interpreter.

Leonard Bernstein



Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Sonata a due.....................Jaubert
2nd Suite from the Ballet,
"Ariane et Bacchus"..........Roussel
Symphony for Strings..........Honegger
Symphony No. 3 in C minor
(with organ) Op. 78.......Saint-Saens

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Our distinguished French visitor, Charles Muench, who made his American debut yesterday as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, won and deserved an ovation for his interpretations of three modern and unfamiliar works and the sonorous and well-known Symphony of Saint-Saens. Not since the memorable first appearance here a good many years ago of Dmitri Mitropoulos have I witnessed a more remarkable or rewarding occasion in which a guest conductor so impressed his artistic personality on the public.

As I wrote last Sunday, I was prepared for M. Muench's great talents as a musician and conductor by having heard him in Europe two years ago, when he was guest conductor of the Brussels Philharmonic. He is a musician of great intelligence and integrity and an inspired conductor. There was nothing histrionic about his interpretations yesterday. They were dramatically sound recreations of the music and at every point M. Muench graciously acknowledged the superb co-operation which he had from the orchestra. Indeed, he got the best out of them and would be the first to admit it.

Over and above the fire and excellence of the interpretations there was a wealth of most interesting music to be heard. Most surprising of the unfamiliar scores was the Roussel Suite from "Ariane et Bacchus." Roussel is an intellectual composer who certainly in his 3rd and 4th Symphonies achieved inspiration as well. But here is a brilliant ballet suite from which the intellectual element has been largely erased. It is an exciting and exotic score, and I venture to say that you have to go back to Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" for anything comparable in its effect. Why on earth so fascinating a work has been untouched by the Boston Symphony heretofore I cannot imagine.

Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a Due" for violin, 'cello and strings and Honegger's Symphony for Strings were played for the first time in the United States. Honegger is a composer who has been far too much neglected in Boston, if not in the country at large. This composition is a masterly piece of writing for strings and a work of high artistic merit. Particularly moving are the adagio and the arresting finale. Here is neo-classicism at its strongest and best. If we are going to hear Copland's Symphony repeated during a season, neither the Honegger nor the Roussel of this concert should be allowed to languish on the shelf.

By contrast the Jaubert work suffered, though it is far from a negligible composition. It is in fact a concerto grosso in a modern idiom but stemming from Handel. Especially charming are the divertimento and the toccata, but the entire work is well-written and interesting. The fact that the composer was killed in the French army in 1940 adds to the regret one feels that so talented an artist should have been cut off by war.

The Saint-Saens Symphony was given a gorgeous performance, that at the same time was never forced. If to a certain extent the sentiments to which Saint-Saens gives utt ance date, the masterly way which re says them does not. made a tremendous effect yesterday and had the audience remaining afterwards to applaud M. Muench and the orchestra for a memorable concert.

This concert will be repeated tonight and Sunday afternoon. Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct the first performance in America of Strauss' "Metamorphosen," Martinu's Concerto Grosso and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
POST

OCT 8 - 1946

Boston Symphony Returns Tonight

Dr. [redacted] celebrating his 22nd year as conducto the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the podium that ensemble returns to Station WQBC and the ABC r tonight at 8:30.

Ann Arbor News

TUESDAY, DEC. 10, 1946

Boston Symphony Plays Brilliantly Under Burgin

By Edmund Haines

The climax of the Boston Symphony concert last night in Hill auditorium was the performance of the Sibelius First Symphony. Despite the fact the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, was unable to appear, the orchestra was in its usual brilliant form. Under Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor, nothing of the perfection of phrasing, quality of ensemble, was lost.

The first half of the program was composed of the early Prokofieff ballet, "Chout," and a Haydn Symphony. It was interesting to hear a revival of the Prokofieff—to compare the devices in this work by a master of 21 years of age (the piece was composed in 1916) with his later pieces, such as Nevsky and the Fifth Symphony.

Potentially, all of Prokofieff's genius is in "Chout." The handling of the instrumentation is effective, and the thematic materials are personal. The orchestra and the conductor of the evening understood the brilliance of the music, and gave the audience an unforgettable performance.

The Boston has been for several decades now the envy of all other groups of its type in its excellence in 18th century music. To do Haydn and Mozart, to walk the fine line of technique balanced against musicianship, is the test of any musical organization.

The Haydn was carried off in precisely the perfect fashion one expects. The Symphony was the 95th work in the Haydn catalog, and is one of the most economical of his works. The piece is spare and lean, and the orchestra entered into the mood of the music. The balance between fat and bare phrases was exceptionally well calculated.

Naturally one wished for the permanent conductor. Dr. Kousevitsky has spent a half generation building the orchestra to its present nonpareil status, and the orchestra without him seems nearly like a body without its arms.

Burgin Praised

But Koussevitsky has trained so well that the orchestra responds to any conductor. And Mr. Burgin is a fine conductor to whom the orchestra for the most part did respond sensitively.

The absence of Dr. Koussevitsky served to remind one that the Boston is a cultural problem in America—a major problem, in much the same way the Chicago Symphony was several years ago. Upon Mr. Stock's retirement and demise, the Chicago was faced with the same impasse which may confront the Boston at any time.

Not to see Koussevitsky on the podium only served as a similar reminder, then. One wonders whether the orchestra will eventually have a future without him. It is no time to bid farewell to the maestro, for he stands at the apothetical point of his career right now; but one wishes him to see the Boston through what it is hoped will be better days to come.

THE PITTSBURGH POST GAZETTE -
WEDNESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 4,1946

Koussevitzky Pleases With Varied Repertoire

Boston Symphony Gives New Work By Aaron Copland Its Premiere Here

By Donald Steinfirst

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Syria Mosque under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership listed a novelty, a symphonic war-horse and a transition piece. The new work, completed less than three months ago and heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, was the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland. The familiar work was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the shorter work was Ravel's delicious "Pavanne pour une Infante Defunte."

It is a tribute to Pittsburgh concert-goers that Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to let us hear a new work. He has long been an acting supporter of young American composers and has insisted that auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on the road, listen to new music. And rightly so, for unless music continues to draw from fresh wellsprings to renew itself it will stagnate and die. Then too, the concerts of the visiting orchestras have too long been drawn from the classics of the repertoire. It is fresh and more or less daring to offer Pittsburgh Mr. Copland's new work, and the deafening and obviously spontaneous applause and "bravos" that were heard at the conclusion of the Symphony must have confirmed Dr. Koussevitzky's good judgment.

Large Ovation Given

The very last pages of the Copland work were the kind that lead to large ovations. They brought the music to a terrific climactic crescendo conclusion and as such they were truly evocative. Previously however, much of the last movement had been confused and complicated. And it may as well be said here also that this last movement was far too long for the content.

The opening brass fanfare was rather typical of Mr. Copland's continual engrossment in the percussive which also appeared in the second movement where there was far too much sound and fury. With a profound and wise knowledge of the extensive qualities of the modern symphonic orchestra, it is possible for as honest and sincere a composer as Mr. Copland to build tremendous walls of brass and tympani and other percussion to terrifying sounds and this was the net result of the 2nd and 4th movements.

The opening section was rather stark. Here one heard the familiar devices which the composer had used to such good advantage in the far superior "Appalachian Spring." In the 3rd slow section, the conductor was on his firmest ground. He handled the string writing beautifully and if there were an unconscious reference here and there to Shostakovich, why not? He is a good composer, too.

Pavanne Pleased

After the Copland Symphony, and like so much cool fresh air after a sultry day, the Ravel Pavanne with its delicate stately theme and its quasi-modern harmonic structure that always looks back to the ancients, seemed a delightful few minutes. The Bostonians played it with so much grace, so much elegance and so much restraint that it at once became a high spot of the concert.

The concluding "Scheherazade" was an ideal work for the highly colored pallete of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra. If "Scheherazade" has a place at all in the modern serious repertoire of symphonic orchestras, performances of the kind heard last night will certainly help to keep it there. The many violin solos were eloquently played by Richard Burgin and a long list of other soloists were heard particularly among the winds and the solo cellist played beautifully and warmly.

The concert was heard by a large and highly enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 9 - 1947

Composer and Soloist

Left, Lukas Foss, whose new cantata, "The Song of Songs," will be performed by Ellabelle Davis, soprano (right), and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next Wednesday, Friday and Saturday

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston Post Dec 28

Although it came two days late, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was in the nature of a very nice Christmas present. The all-French program, to be repeated this evening and tomorrow afternoon, was conducted by a man well qualified for the job, Charles Muench of Paris, now on his first visit to the United States. That well-known adjective, dynamic, suits Mr. Muench admirably, but there is something very solid about him, too, and there is reason to regret that his present visit is so short.

Unlike his countryman, Paul Paray, who visited us a year ago, Mr. Muench elected to introduce himself to Boston through unfamiliar music. The only number on his program already known here was the concluding item, Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor with organ, which we last heard in February, 1938, and not too often in the years immediately preceding.

The new pieces, none of them hard to get or difficult to take, were a "Sonata a due" by Maurice Jaubert, who was killed in action in 1940; the Second Suite from Roussel's Ballet, "Ariane et Bacchus," and Honegger's Symphony for strings, with optional trumpet in the coda of the finale. It was used yesterday and with electrifying effect. To fall back on an always-useful metaphor, Jaubert's piece, for strings with solo violin and cello, is a case of new wine in an old bottle. However, the wine is not new enough to endanger the container. Mr. Jaubert writes discreetly and skilfully in frank simulation of the ancient manner. Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti as the soloists, and the small group of string players acquitted themselves admirably. This high level of performance was sustained throughout the afternoon.

You could sum up the other novelties briefly by saying that Honegger's Symphony has something in it and Roussel's Suite everything, including Wagner and Strauss as well as Ravel and Roussel himself. However, it made such excellent and satisfying listening that you wonder d why a piece that good, on the market for 14 years, had been withheld from us so long. Composed in Paris during the German occupation, Honeggar's Symphony expresses not a little of the sorrow and bitterness that filled the minds and hearts of the French people at that time. The finale is exciting and the whole work bespeaks its composer's mastery.

In a performance less discerning, less intense than the one accorded it yesterday, Saint-Saens' 60-year-old Symphony can seem no more than a well constructed bit of musical mechanics, with a sentimental slow movement and a sententious conclusion. As presented by Mr. Muench, it was good to hear again.

Approve Increase in Boston Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch made his first appearance in the United States yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The distinguished French musician, conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, impressed me immediately as an interpreter and technician of high rank.

His all-French program brought one piece new to this country, Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a due"; two new to Boston: the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Ariane et Bacchus" and Honegger's Symphony for Strings. The final number was Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with the organ part taken by E. Power Biggs.

Mr. Munch conducted from memory; there were no scores before him. Such can be a stunt, but here you felt that, the music thoroughly detailed in his mind, Mr. Munch did not need the printed notes to guide him.

He is an interpreter of passionate temperament and a remarkable sense of elasticity and rhythm. The afternoon through, you felt rhythmic vitality in every measure. He makes music "sing", and he also is fastidious about having everything clear and well-proportioned. Even when the orchestra was surging along at terrific volume almost the tiniest inner voices were perceptible.

As might be expected from a Gallic musician, Mr. Munch seems to favor a tone somewhat brighter and thinner than we are accustomed to hear, yet of good body, unforced color and consistent polish. He is exacting as to tempo, energetic but not flamboyant in his gestures. It would be rewarding to hear him in other styles of the symphonic repertory. Certainly he ought to be invited to return, and the sooner the better.

The late Jaubert's "Sonata a due" is really too small for a large hall. It is a chamber sonata with violin and 'cello solos, calling for about 30 musicians. The style, far from radical, is perhaps on the neo-classical side. Honegger's Symphony, conversely, is a big piece, and it is at once intellectual and full of emotional tensions. Both the Jaubert and Honegger are beautifully written for their expressive medium, yet both are a little dry and preeminently musicians' music.

Roussel has been unjustly neglected here in the last eight or 10 years. The "Ariane et Bacchus" Suite, a sinewy and muscular score, is also colorful and large, winding up with a thumping, pulse-quickening bacchanale. If in its color, descriptive power and full-bodied orchestral texture it may suggest late 19th Century German music like that of the younger Strauss or even Mahler, it nevertheless is highly original and it is not inflated or pompous. We should hear this work again.

As Mr. Munch read it, the Saint-Saens Third Symphony took on momentarily the significance, weight and deep seriousness of a great masterpiece. Actually it is much less than that, but it contains luscious sounds and is a grand show.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting; Program: Haydn: Symphony in C minor, No. 95; Prokofieff: Suite from the Ballet, "Chout," ("Buffoon"), Op. 21; Sibelius: Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY returned to Hill Auditorium last night and the combination of this great orchestra with a first rate program made for an overwhelming musical experience.

The orchestra was without its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, but years of working together have so fused the talents of this fine group that it doesn't seem to make much difference whether Dr. Koussevitzky directs personally or not. If possible, the orchestra was better than ever last night under Mr. Burgin.

What made for a particularly happy evening was the choice of an exceptionally well integrated program. Dr. Koussevitzky has always showed taste in his selection of new or relatively new music and when he uses a standard concert piece it has guts to it.

Of immediate interest was the performance of the Prokofieff "Choud" ballet suite. There may be a tendency to compare this music to Stravinsky — and certainly the opening passages are reminiscent of Petrouchka—but to say any more than that is unfair to the music. It is well able to stand on its own feet and once into the music proper it shows unmistakable traces of the crystallization that we associate with the composer's later music. The last half of it, beginning with "The Arrival of the Merchant" and "The Dance of Servility," develops into an arresting and exciting work. I, for one, didn't bother to associate the program with the music, but program or no, I'd like to hear it again.

The Sibelius symphony was played, making full utilization of the rich orchestration and with an earnestness and sincerity that gave it renewed stature. Mr. Burgin and the Orchestra performed in a way that I have come to associate with the Boston orchestra —they played as if they liked it.

—Harry Levine

Whatever else it does not accomplish, this UN Assembly has taken what might be the first step towards world disarmament. This was rendered possible by what looks like a complete reversal of the previous position taken in the Atomic Energy Commission by the Soviet delegation. As a result, for just about the first time since this talk-fest started, smiles could be observed on many faces milling through the endless corridors of this converted factory.

—Edgar Ansel Mowrer

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting; Program: Haydn: Symphony in C minor, No. 95; Prokofieff: Suite from the Ballet, "Chout," ("Buffoon"), Op. 21; Sibelius: Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY returned to Hill Auditorium last night and the combination of this great orchestra with a first rate program made for an overwhelming musical experience.

The orchestra was without its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, but years of working together have so fused the talents of this fine group that it doesn't seem to make much difference whether Dr. Koussevitzky directs personally or not. If possible, the orchestra was better than ever last night under Mr. Burgin.

What made for a particularly happy evening was the choice of an exceptionally well integrated program. Dr. Koussevitzky has always showed taste in his selection of new or relatively new music and when he uses a standard concert piece it has guts to it.

Of immediate interest was the performance of the Prokofieff "Choud" ballet suite. There may be a tendency to compare this music to Stravinsky — and certainly the opening passages are reminiscent of Petrouchka—but to say any more than that is unfair to the music. It is well able to stand on its own feet and once into the music proper it shows unmistakable traces of the crystallization that we associate with the composer's later music. The last half of it, beginning with "The Arrival of the Merchant" and "The Dance of Servility," develops into an arresting and exciting work. I, for one, didn't bother to associate the program with the music, but program or no, I'd like to hear it again.

The Sibelius symphony was played, making full utilization of the rich orchestration and with an earnestness and sincerity that gave it renewed stature. Mr. Burgin and the Orchestra performed in a way that I have come to associate with the Boston orchestra —they played as if they liked it.

—Harry Levine

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra
By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch made his first appearance in the United States yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The distinguished French musician, conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, impressed me immediately as an interpreter and technician of high rank.

His all-French program brought one piece new to this country, Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a due"; two new to Boston: the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Ariane et Bacchus" and Honegger's Symphony for Strings. The final number was Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with the organ part taken by E. Power Biggs.

Mr. Munch conducted from memory; there were no scores before him. Such can be a stunt, but here you felt that, the music thoroughly detailed in his mind, Mr. Munch did not need the printed notes to guide him.

He is an interpreter of passionate temperament and a remarkable sense of elasticity and rhythm. The afternoon through, you felt rhythmic vitality in every measure. He makes music "sing", and he also is fastidious about having everything clear and well-proportioned. Even when the orchestra was surging along at terrific volume almost the tiniest inner voices were perceptible.

As might be expected from a Gallic musician, Mr. Munch seems to favor a tone somewhat brighter and thinner than we are accustomed to hear, yet of good body, unforced color and consistent polish. He is exacting as to tempo, energetic but not flamboyant in his gestures. It would be rewarding to hear him in other styles of the symphonic repertory. Certainly he ought to be invited to return, and the sooner the better.

The late Jaubert's "Sonata a due" is really too small for a large hall. It is a chamber sonata with violin and 'cello solos, calling for about 30 musicians. The style, far from radical, is perhaps on the neo-classical side. Honegger's Symphony, conversely, is a big piece, and it is at once intellectual and full of emotional tensions. Both the Jaubert and Honegger are beautifully written for their expressive medium, yet both are a little dry and preeminently musicians' music.

Roussel has been unjustly neglected here in the last eight or 10 years. The "Ariane et Bacchus" Suite, a sinewy and muscular score, is also colorful and large, winding up with a thumping, pulse-quickening bacchanale. If in its color, descriptive power and full-bodied orchestral texture it may suggest late 19th Century German music like that of the younger Strauss or even Mahler, it nevertheless is highly original and it is not inflated or pompous. We should hear this work again.

As Mr. Munch read it, the Saint-Saens Third Symphony took on momentarily the significance, weight and deep seriousness of a great masterpiece. Actually it is much less than that, but it contains luscious sounds and is a grand show.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1946

IN PERSPECTIVE

Music Over There

Listening to Myra Hess in her recent appearance here with the Boston Symphony set me to thinking back over the musical adventures I enjoyed during my term with the army overseas. I had considerable luck in this direction, and the English pianist was part of it.

Dame Myra's magnificent labors as impresario of the lunchtime concerts at London's National Gallery are by now almost a legend among people who are fond of music. She arranged and ran the whole show, and played herself in something like 140 of the concerts. I managed to squeeze into half a dozen of her performances (which were always jammed), and recall each of them with delight. One, however, particularly sticks in my memory, because in addition to the music, it provided the most dramatic moment I have ever experienced in a concert hall.

* * *

The National Gallery concerts went on uninterrupted during the buzzbomb era, even when cloudy weather hampered interception along the coast and made it likely that things would be noisy. On just such an afternoon I paid my shilling and shouldered my way into a Hess performance. Sure enough, shortly after the concert started, an alert sounded. V-1 was an old story by then, and I don't believe a single person left the Gallery.

The first buzzer came in just after Dame Myra began to play—a Chopin prelude, if I remember correctly. Artist and audience ignored the thing to begin with, but that soon became impossible. The bomb seemed headed straight for us (a common illusion), and its tooth-rattling clatter began to drown out the music. Suddenly the pianist broke off in the middle of the prelude, and sat immobile, with one hand resting on the piano above the keyboard. The roar of the buzzbomb grew louder and louder, then cut off into that skin-prickling silence that always preceded the explosion. Still Dame Myra sat motionless, her back to the audience. The blast came, fairly close at hand, echoing and re-echoing. As the noise died away, Myra Hess lifted her hands and began the prelude again, exactly as though she had just come on stage. If she had been ruffled, her music never betrayed it.

* * *

My musical luck in the army began the day I reached London. Two other GI's and myself got permission to find our own living quarters. Completely by accident, we encountered a British couple who wanted to sublet their apartment—flat, they called it—in Earl's Court to a "suitable" tenant. By suitable, they meant somebody who would take good care of their magnificent custom-built radio-phonograph and their excellent collection of records. That was us. Within 24 hours, we had signed a lease containing one sentence in capital letters—"TENANTS AGREE TO USE ONLY CACTUS NEEDLES ON LESSOR'S GRAMOPHONE."

For the next five months, I spent the majority of my evenings stretched out on a couch in front of a coal fire, listening to Mozart, Chopin, Beethoven and Brahms. As we used to say in the army, I never had it so good.

* * *

The day eventually came when I had to leave London for Germany, but even in that battered and unhappy land there were musical interludes. By all odds the most memorable was the evening I heard Walter Gieseking.

Gieseking, certainly one of the finest pianists now living, was holed up at the time near my outfit's headquarters outside Wiesbaden. He had co-operated enthusiastically with the Nazis, and the high American brass was considering the wisdom of putting his name on an artists' blacklist—an almost cosmic piece of stupidity since unhappily consummated. While the decision was still pending, however, we asked him to play at the Biebrich Officers' Club, and of course he jumped at the chance.

Our energetic Special Services officer dug up in Wiesbaden a concert grand and a man to tune it (you could find the most incredible things in Germany if you really looked). Suggestions were solicited as to program. Friends were invited from other units. It was a real occasion.

The night of the concert was a typical late Summer evening in southern Germany—warm, quiet and—outside the ruined city—lovely. When I arrived at the club with some friends, we found the small room already filled. So we went around to the terrace outside, just under the window beside the piano. Walther, the young German waiter, produced a bottle of cool white wine. We had just filled our glasses when Gieseking appeared, bowed obsequiously, and began to play.

I doubt that I shall ever enjoy another concert quite so much. For nearly three hours we sat there as twilight deepened into dark and listened to that liquid, golden stream of music pour forth. Cesar Franck, Mozart, Schubert, Bach, Beethoven—above all, Beethoven. Nazi or not, nobody can play Beethoven like that man.

J. B.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 12 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at Academy of Music

By JOHN BALL JR.

The only thing regrettable about the concert presented last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music is that it marked the last such event this season. In commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms, Dr. Koussevitzky offered an all-Brahms program made up of the "Academic Festival Overture," "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and the "Symphony No. 1." As is always the case when the Boston orchestra appears at the Academy, the house was full and a few standees took up their stations at the rear.

From start to finish the performance of the orchestra was to be commended. We have long admired the considerable respectability of the Boston Symphony and its ability to rise to a musical climax without becoming flustered in the process. The orchestra plays with a composure that is much to be esteemed, particularly since it seems in no wise to detract from the ability of this ensemble to make music that is full-blooded and virile when the occasion so requires.

The music of Brahms, particularly as the Boston Symphony plays it, reminds us at times of the view over the countryside from a hilltop in Autumn when a mild haze is in the air. Everything is discernible and visible to the eye and ear, but the sharp edge of too-violent reality is mellowed by the perspective of the whole scene. This was noticeable particularly in the last movement of the "Symphony No. 1." The main theme, which is curiously reminiscent of the "Hymn to Joy" from the Beethoven Ninth, was stated with clarity, but with a soft and broad focus which added depth and richness to the whole movement. The orchestra members, being human, may have reacted to the Springlike air of last night, and so also may have their conductor. Be that as it may, the fact remains that the entire performance was of a very high order and deserved only praise.

While we are about it we should like to report favorably on another part of the concert last night—the audience. It has been our privilege to hear a good many concerts in many different cities, both here and abroad. During this time we have never encountered an audience which we consider superior to the faithful patrons of the Boston Symphony who gather on Friday nights at the Academy of Music. There is no restless stirring during soft passages, there is a minimum chatter while music is being played, and there are almost never any unwelcome outbursts of applause at inappropriate moments and consequent shushing. The audience is there to listen to fine music and knows how to do so properly. To the orchestra, then, to Dr. Koussevitzky, and to their audience we offer our sincere "well done."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

OCT 2 - 1946

NAMED 'FIRST DESK' PLAYER

BOSTON, Oct. 1—(AP) A native-born American has been installed as a "first desk" player for the first time in the 66-year history of the famed Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced toda [redacted] at the conclusion of the orchestra's first 1946 rehearsal—said 28-year-old John Holmes of Rochester, N. Y., would lay first oboe. The conductor explained that "first desk" is orchestra jargon for a leading instrument position.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance yesterday of a new and remarkable modern score, the Third Symphony by Aaron Copland. Thereafter came the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Erica Morini, the soloist, appearing with this orchestra for the first time in Boston. The program ended with Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Copland's Third Symphony was composed between August of 1944 and last Sept. 29 (barely in time for the parts to be copied). It takes its place with the Third Symphony of Roy Harris as the two finest works in the form by American composers. Conservatives may find it difficult at first, although yesterday's reception, in which Mr. Copland himself shared, was one of the warmest I ever have heard from the conservative Friday audience.

The new Symphony is full-sized, in four movements for a very large orchestra. It is big both in size and ideas, the texture is heavy apart from the slow movement. Occasionally it is rhythmically tricky and contrapuntally involved, and it is not exactly sensuous or caressing. But it is beautifully clear and ordered, logical, with admirable development and continuity. Although there are still traces of Mr. Copland's academic or "pattern-music" style, it is mostly vigorous and theatrical in the sense that his "Appalachian" Suite and "Quiet City" are theatrical.

You could not call it passionate, in spite of the terrific sound it makes much of the way. Call it, then, cool and poised but never dry. Possibly Mr. Copland has overwritten, especially the long last movement. Possibly he will make some cuts himself after awhile. Nevertheless, I think that with the Third Symphony, Mr. Copland has hit his stride in the big forms. We may expect even finer things from him in the future.

Miss Morini gave the well-worn Tchaikovsky Concerto a marvelously fine-grained and musicianly performance. Her technique was clean, her expression thoroughly in style without exaggeration. The orchestra was in top form, too, apart from just a few loose technical hairs, and it never overbore the solo violin. This was a performance in a thousand. The audience gave Miss Morini, the conductor and all hands a really tumultuous round of applause and stamping.

As for "Till Eulenspiegel," that was re-created with uncanny orchestral virtuosity. Such rare, intense and crystal-clear playing makes you wish time could stand still and forever preserve the combined beauties of music, performance and interpretation.

Author Unruffled By Koussevitsky

By ENID GREER

(Photo by Enrlich, Miss Ida Pottinger.

Current controversy over the facts and comments included in the proposed biographical publication on Serge Koussevitzky that has arched the eyebrows of music lovers and ruffled the composure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, doesn't bother the author one bit, because he was "pretty careful in writing the book."

Moses Smith, who became music critic of the Boston American at the same time Koussevitzky appeared first with the Boston Symphony in 1924, feels that he has watched the conductor closely enough during his entire American career and researched the subject so thoroughly that Kousse-

Continued on Page Four

Moses Smith Unruffled

Continued from Page One

vitzky has no ground for his charges.

Dr. Koussevitzky has charged that the book invades his right of privacy. Entitled simply "Koussevitzky," (Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., New York,) the biography was originally scheduled for publication on February 15. Its sale and distribution was held up at first while Justice Shientag of the New York Supreme Court entertained arguments for a temporary injunction. In Justice Shientag's decision, handed down on March 4, he refused to grant a temporary injunction restraining the book.

Since that decision an intermediate stay restraining publication and delivery has been issued by Associate Justice Albert Cohn of the Appellate Division in New York State to remain in effect until March 14 when the Appellate Division will hear an appeal by Dr. Koussevitzky from Justice Shientag's ruling.

Commenting on the conductor's charges, newspaperman Smith, who watched Koussevitzky's career in Boston from his posts on the Boston Evening American and the Boston Evening Transcript, explains that he sifted out all the possible evidence and weighed it very carefully, giving special attention to previously printed material in books, magazines and newspapers. "As a newspaper man I realize fully that it is possible to make libelous mistakes, and I had the manuscript gone over carefully by an attorney before it was submitted for publication," he remarks.

"Biographies of prominent men in the public eye serve a very definite purpose," the author insists, "for they provide increased enjoyment and understanding of the subjects in question."

According to the author, a music critic has been recognized as having a pretty well established place in our civilization. "The [illegible]," Mr. Smith says, "has a right to express a responsible opinion. The book was not hastily thrown to-[illegible] nor is it debunking in any way. It is a serious work about an important figure in the world today. Koussevitzky is a big man and has had a big career; an although I disagree with him o certain artistic grounds, I thin the public will have a better ap preciation of the conductor's ir terpretation of music through bi ography."

As to the biography being un authorized, the author explains "at first Dr. Koussevitzky agreed to help me in the work but after I had spent months doing personal research and had gotten the help of other researchers, it became apparent to me that I could not rely on the conductor's assistance. So I went ahead on my own. I never intended to have any strings attached to the work. I would not have undertaken it on that premise."

The biography in question is based on previously printed material, personal interviews with friends of the conductor, Mr. Smith's own observation of Koussevitzky and contacts with him. 'Only one chapter of the book departs from this objective approach,'" the author declares, "and I feel as a critic that I have every right to include that section in the biography."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 2 - 1946

Shostakovich's New Symphony Called Out of Tune With Party Line

Moscow Communist Critic Holds Composer Lacks Conviction, Assails Classicism and Mourns Possible Influence of Stravinsky

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, Oct. 1—The Ninth Symphony, Dmitri Shostakovich's latest work, has ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people, I. Nestiev said in Culture and Life, a newspaper published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist party. Boris Pasternack's poetry was also criticized in the newspapers.

The Ninth Symphony produces fears, according to Mr. Nestiev, that Mr. Shostakovich "has not overcome in himself the ironical skeptic," The composer, whose Leningrad Symphony written during the war was regarded as a triumph of Soviet art, was accused of lack of "warm ideological conviction."

Mr. Nestiev described the Ninth Symphony as a "certain respite, a facile and light incident among the considerable creations of Shostakovitch, a temporary forgetting of big serious problems for a playful and fanciful trifle." He asked whether this was the time for "a famous artist to take a vacation, to rest from modern problems."

Another aspect of the symphony, Mr. Nestiev noted, was "the cynical and evil grotesque, the tone of merciless joking and ridicule * * * the cold irony of stylization." This may result, Mr. Nestiev declared, from the influence of Igor Stravinsky, "an artist without a fatherland, without confidence in the leadership of high ideals and without deep ethical principles." Mr. Nestiev said that the public had expected from Mr. Shostakovich the truthful embodiment of the ideas and emotions of the Soviet people during the war.

Almost all the first part of the Ninth Symphony "seems to be just like the stylization of manner of the ancient classics, Mr. Nestiev asserted; "tiny, archaic, simplified forms, joyful, traditional, classical rhythm, toylike instrumentation with an abundance of high whistling and screaming timbres."

2 Russians Refuse Boston Bids

BROOKLINE, Mass., Oct. 1 (U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky revealed tonight that Mr. Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff had declined to serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra until conditions between the United States and Russia were "more settled." Dr. Koussevitzky said that he had invited them to lead the orchestra in their own compositions. At first they signified their intention of accepting, he said. Later, however, both sent their "regrets."

Attacked Similarly in 1936

The attack on Mr. Shostakovich, long regarded as one of the foremost Russian composers, repeats a similar tirade launched against him in Russia in 1936, when he was 29 years old. That outbreak was provoked by his ballet, "Limpid Stream," which was condemned with others of his works as "un-Soviet, unwholesome and cheap" by Pravda and other critics.

ON THE AISLE

Koussevitzky Introduces Copland's Brilliant Third Symphony in Memorable Concert

By Claudia Cassidy

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 6, 1946. The program:

Prelude to "Khovantschina" .... Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 3 .... Copland
Symphony No. 1, C. minor .... Brahms

Good music is like good bread, and you don't know how much better it is than cake until you try to live without it. But great music is rather like eating your bread and having your cake, too, as the Boston orchestra proves on what has happily come to be its annual visit to Orchestra hall. Its director, Serge Koussevitzky, stands quietly yet imperiously at the pinnacle of his fame a magnificent maker of music. And it must disconcert those pessimists who are convinced that anything as supreme as the Boston orchestra is courting decadence and collapse to hear with what fiery young splendor it rises to the challenge of a complex and vigorous new score.

This was true last season when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a superb performance of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, and it was true last night when Copland's Third Symphony stirred a capacity audience to shouts of approval. For Mr. Koussevitzky has something more than enthusiasm and a great orchestra to offer contemporary music. He knows a good score when he sees it, and he takes the most exquisite pains to communicate that knowledge to his audience. And it must be, too, that he has the gift of inspiring music, for Copland's work, like "Peter Grimes," was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, which is twice blessed.

◆

If this Third Symphony is not Aaron Copland's finest work, and it seemed to me to be so last night, it is at least his largest in scale and most complex in design. Into it have gone the individuality, the craftsmanship, and the "something to say" that make "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring" live happily in memory, and the bold clarity, the probing into music that make the piano sonata a challenge.

To attempt to do such a symphony justice in a brief review after one hearing, however revealing, is rather like pole vaulting with too short a pole. But it is at once remarkable for its design, its intricate use of material, and what seemed to me rather like his own musical finger prints from "Rodeo," in the sense of haunting memories from that lovely score which open vistas in the deep distance and are uniquely American. This is not a copy, but it is the same man thinking aloud, and worth hearing.

◆

The three themes of the opening movement are the intimations of a powerful and sinewy structure. The scherzo, so brilliant the audience burst into unaccustomed applause, is rather like the wild horses of that "Rodeo" curtain, gallant and un tamed, yet never out of its own con trol. The third movement opens almost imperceptibly as the high violins remember the trombones of that earlier third theme, and interest, already fully captured grows more and more intense as the brass and percussion play a brilliant interlude, the higher woodwinds bewitch the ears, and slowly the whole structure rises to a massive but never topheavy climax.

◆

As I seem to have neither time nor space left for the rest of the concert, perhaps it is enough to say that the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" was perfection in its handling of Russian timbres and moods, fading away so quietly you felt nostalgic about it before it had vanished, and that Brahms' First Symphony was a glorious example of what such an orchestra can do with such music. I rather thought the climactic phrase a jubilant shout, but my companion insisted it was a 21 gun salute. Either way, it was a fine way to sign off such a concert.

The orchestra reappears in Orchestra hall tomorrow afternoon.

* *

---

mu-unfor several of all other type in its excellence century music. To do Mozart, to walk the of technique balanced musicianship, is the test any musical organization.

The Haydn was carried off in precisely the perfect fashion one expects. The Symphony was the 95th work in the Haydn catalog, and is one of the most economical of his works. The piece is spare and lean, and the orchestra entered into the mood of the music. The balance between fat and bare phrases was exceptionally well calculated.

Naturally one wished for the permanent conductor. Dr. Koussevitsky has spent a half generation building the orchestra to its present nonpareil status, and the orchestra without him seems nearly like a body without its arms.

Burgin Praised

But Koussevitsky has trained so well that the orchestra responds to any conductor. And Mr. Burgin is a fine conductor to whom the orchestra for the most part did respond sensitively.

The absence of Dr. Koussevitsky served to remind one that the Boston is a cultural problem in America—a major problem, in much the same way the Chicago Symphony was several years ago. Upon Mr. Stock's retirement and demise, the Chicago was faced with the same impasse which may confront the Boston at any time.

Not to see Koussevitsky on the podium only served as a similar reminder, then. One wonders whether the orchestra will eventually have a future without him. It is no time to bid farewell to the maestro, for he stands at the apothetical point of his career right now; but one wishes him to see the Boston through what it is hoped will be better days to come.

THE PITTSBURGH PRESS, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1946

FILTON BUHL PLANETARIUM

Koussevitzky's Concert Here Is Unforgettable

Orchestra's Amazing Powers Revealed In Last Night's Performance

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

We are grateful for the annual concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. For in the revealment of the orchestra's amazing powers and its conductor's communicative interpretative gifts listeners are always stirred and provided with an unforgettable artistic experience.

This was repeated last night. A huge audience came to absorb an impelling musical message and to pay homage to the performers.

The program comprised Mendelssohn's 4th (Italian) symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony.

Mr. Lewando

From every angle the performance was perfect, but more than perfect was the extraordinary expressional force evinced by the players under the inspiring and galvanic leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Perfect Performance

Each of the program items many have been heard time and again, but as performed on the occasion new vistas of loveliness and tonal beauty were opened in a manner that kept the audience enrapt.

For instance, Mendelssohn's works are supposed to be losing their hold. Not as Dr. Koussevitzky interprets it, though, through the medium of his excellent musicians. The "Italian" symphony took on added warmth and brilliancy, poesy and charm under his ministrations. The entire work glowed like a bright summer day.

Artistry at Peak

To listen to them perform is overwhelming. One need not be of the cognoscenti to realize that here is a great orchestra that is unsurpassed in every department, thanks to the guidance of Dr. Koussevitzky who has brought it to its present high estate and maintains its artistry at the peak.

Debussy's "The Sea" was extraordinary in exotic unfoldment.

Its poetic vitality and splashing tonal colors, its marvelous depiction of the ocean and wind was set forth with inspiring articulation. Like the playing of the Mendelssohn work it was received with tremendous approbation that recalled the conductor to share the success with the orchestra.

A brilliant presentation of the Tschaikowsky work brought the memorable concert to an end amid a demonstration of applause.

Tonight the Orchestra will play Aaron Copland's new 3rd symphony, Ravel's Pavane and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite.

PITTSBURGH PRESS, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 194

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Give Rousing Concert at Mosque

Conductor Still Vibrant Leader at 70; Presentation of Copeland Work Praised

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

To observe Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to know the meaning of intense, vivid and vibrant leadership and to realize its communicative power.

To listen to this orchestra is to know what ensemble artistry is and should be.

The marvelous blending of this amazing conductor's personality with that of his musicians produces a result that is rousing to the soul and a contribution to those experiences that make real living worth while.

Mr. Lewando

Last night at Syria Mosque this eminent leader and magnificent orchestra played another program to a full house. The audience not only enjoyed the performance— it was thrilled, and it evidenced its appreciation with sustained applause.

The program consisted of Aaron Conland's new Third Symphony, Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante, defunte, and Rimsly-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." The last two numbers were broadcast over a network via WCAE.

Mr. Copland is in the forefront of American composers. He has created many interesting works in various forms. He is a master craftsman, full of imagination and inventiveness.

Pretentious Work

His 3rd symphony is a pretentious composition. In four movements—the third and fourth are played without pause—the work as a whole is of commanding interest.

This symphony is modern in every sense of the term. That means that Mr. Copland indulges in the engaging art of applied dissonance, which may not be so pleasing to those who like their music simple and conservative.

his is music of our times. It breathes vigor, reveals skilled handling and is full of rhythmic complexities of definite exciting appeal. Even jitterbugs would reveal in listening to the clever time schemes. But do not think this is jitterbug music. It isn't by any flight of imagination.

Conductor Still Energetic

When one listens to the remarkable fanfares that open and close this glowing work one is aware of the wholesomeness of Mr. Copland's broad endowments. It is a symphony that bears repetition.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his endless capacity for energetic effort performed a herculean feat in interpreting this brilliant work, and the orchestra responded in kind.

Dr. Koussevitzky has done yeoman service in the cause of the American composer. They are indebted no end to his perserving interest and desire to bring American works to the attention of the musical public. At 72 this grand man of the baton is as full of exuberance in his art as he was years ago.

Praises Reiner

We had an intimate chat with him during intermission. He dwelt for some time upon Dr. Fritz Reiner. He said that Pittsburgh should be proud of its conductor. He said Dr. Reiner "is a great man of music who has done wonders for the Pittsburgh Symphony and for this city."

He was much interested in what music our orchestra is performing and showed excited interest in a piece he'd like to perform in Boston which the Pittsburgh Orchestra is playing this week-end. It is Bartok's music from the pantomine "The Miraculous Mandarin," parts of which Dr. Reiner has extracted and arranged in the form of a suite.

Back to the program. The Pavane was revealed in all of its exquisite color, and the Korsakoff piece, always an audience favorite, was played with poetic charm.

The violin solos of Concertmaster Richard Burgin were played with superlative tonal quality and fullness of expressional warmth.

46

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE,

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

NEW YORK CITY SYMPHONY, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, concert last night at the New York City Center with Paul Wittgenstein, pianist, as soloist. The program:

Le Tombeau de Couperin	Ravel
Piano Concerto for the Left Hand	Ravel
Symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Eroica")	Beethoven

Our Musical Dick Tracy

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who conducted the New York City Symphony last night at the City Center, would be a delightful conductor if he could ever forget during one piece, or even during one movement of a piece, that he is considered by Warner Brothers to be a potential film star. He has a gift for making music; and as American conductors go, he is not badly educated. He has been considered a good student by Harvard College, the Curtiss Institute, Fritz Reiner and Serge Koussevitzky. His experience, moreover, as a successful composer in both the dramatic and the concert forms has given him a familiarity with the orchestra as a medium of thought communication not easily obtainable by other means.

* * *

Yet with all these advantages, he seems to have turned in the last two years ever more and more firmly away from objective music making and to have embraced a career of sheer vainglory. With every season his personal performance becomes more ostentatious, his musical one less convincing. There was a time when he used to forget occasionally and let the music speak. Nowadays he keeps it always, like the touring Italian bandmasters of forty years ago, a vehicle for the waving about of hair, for the twisting of shoulder and torso, for the miming by facial expression of uncontrolled emotional states.

If all this did not involve musical obfuscation, if it were merely the prima donna airs of a great artist, nobody would mind. Revelations of musical meaning excuse everything. But his conducting today, for all the skill and talent that lie behind it, reveals little except the consistent distortion of musical works, ancient and modern, into cartoons to illustrate the blithe career of a sort of musical Dick Tracy.

* * *

Three works less easily adptable to this end than those that made up last night's program would be hard to find. But our intrepid hero was downed by none. In Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" the consistent substitution of lilting rhythms for the author's (straight out of Couperin and out of the harpischord itself, measured ones was sufficient to destroy any dignity in the music that might, if left intact, have triumphed over brashness. In the same composer's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand alone, the soloist, Paul Wittgenshein, offered à hasard. This artist, for whom the work was written, came very near, by old familiarity as well as by false notes, to taking over the piece as his show. Exacerbated gestures from teh conductor recalled to us regularly, however, where we had better look, or else.

Even Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was no match for the intrepid Lennie. He had to wrestle with it some, but he ended by making it sound angry rather than heroic, an interminable old bore that a kind-hearted and sentimental young doctor was keeping alive by sheer genius.

* * *

One wishes Mr. Bernstein well in his chosen career. But one does wish also that it bore more relation than it seem to do at present to the service of music as something just a shade more important to civilization than what it can serve him for.

Paul Wittgenstein

James Kriegsmann

Piano soloist last night with the New York City Symphony

Worcester Festival

4,000 at Opening Concert of 87th Annual Event

WORCESTER, Mass., Oct. 14.—More than four thousand persons filled the Worcester Memorial Auditorium tonight for the opening concert of the eighty-seventh annual Worcester Music Festival, again with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy and the Worcester Festival Chorus of 400 under Walter Howe.

This initial program showed no zest for adventure, and was composed of well thumbed mainstays of the repertoire—Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Liszt-Lamartine "Les Preludes," three spirituals sung a capella by the chorus, the Gershwin "Rhapsody in Blue," and a Strauss waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube."

The soloist in the Gershwin piece was the Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, once the pianistic attache of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Sanroma has a glib and brittle style and a brilliance of tone and technique admirably suited to the character and nostalgic impudence of the Gershwin score. He played it adroitly, and with the proper emphasis upon rhythmic impulse.

Mr. Howe's chorus is much like all festival choruses made up of the earnest laity. It sings well and sturdily, yet lacks the sensitivity inherent in a more practiced and professional group. But the training has been careful and persistent, and the result can be called highly creditable.

A Wagnerian program tomorrow will employ the services of Astrid Varnay, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Association, in Elsa's dream from "Lohengrin," the prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan," the spring song from "Die Walküre," and Brünnhilde's immolation from "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Ormandy will conduct the orchestra in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Rhine Journey from "Götterdämmerung," and the orchestra and chorus in the suite from Prokofieff's film score to "Alexander Nevsky." J. S.

G. I.'s Must Conserve Meat

TOKYO, Oct. 14 (AP).—General Douglas MacArthur today ordered a general tightening up on meat consumption by all United States Army personnel in the Pacific, in the face of the meat shortage in the United States. The action was taken to conserve stocks now on hand.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Sonata a due	Jaubert
2nd Suite from the Ballet, "Ariane et Bacchus"	Roussel
Symphony for Strings	Honegger
Symphony No. 3 in C minor (with organ) Op. 78	Saint-Saens

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Our distinguished French visitor, Charles Muench, who made his American debut yesterday as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, won and deserved an ovation for his interpretations of three modern and unfamiliar works and the sonorous and well-known Symphony of Saint-Saens. Not since the memorable first appearance here a good many years ago of Dmitri Mitropoulos have I witnessed a more remarkable or rewarding occasion in which a guest conductor so impressed his artistic personality on the public.

As I wrote last Sunday, I was prepared for M. Muench's great talents as a musician and conductor by having heard him in Europe two years ago, when he was guest conductor of the Brussels Philharmonic. He is a musician of great intelligence and integrity and an inspired conductor. There was nothing histrionic about his interpretations yesterday. They were dramatically sound recreations of the music and at every point M. Muench graciously acknowledged the superb co-operation which he had from the orchestra. Indeed, he got the best out of them and would be the first to admit it.

Over and above the fire and excellence of the interpretations there was a wealth of most interesting music to be heard. Most surprising of the unfamiliar scores was the Roussel Suite from "Ariane et Bacchus." Roussel is an intellectual composer who certainly in his 3rd and 4th Symphonies achieved inspiration as well. But here is a brilliant ballet suite from which the intellectual element has been largely erased. It is an exciting and exotic score, and I venture to say that you have to go back to Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" for anything comparable in its effect. Why on earth so fascinating a work has been untouched by the Boston Symphony heretofore I cannot imagine.

Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a Due" for violin, 'cello and strings and Honegger's Symphony for Strings were played for the first time in the United States. Honegger is a composer who has been far too much neglected in Boston, if not in the country at large. This composition is a masterly piece of writing for strings and a work of high artistic merit. Particularly moving are the adagio and the arresting finale. Here is neo-classicism at its strongest and best. If we are going to hear Copland's Symphony repeated during a season, neither the Honegger nor the Roussel of this concert should be allowed to languish on the shelf.

By contrast the Jaubert work suffered, though it is far from a negligible composition. It is in fact a concerto grosso in a modern idiom but stemming from Handel. Especially charming are the divertimento and the toccata, but the entire work is well-written and interesting. The fact that the composer was killed in the French army in 1940 adds to the regret one feels that so talented an artist should have been cut off by war.

The Saint-Saens Symphony was given a gorgeous performance, that at the same time was never forced. If to a certain extent the sentiments to which Saint-Saens gives utterance date, the masterly way in which re says them does not. It made a tremendous effect yesterday and had the audience remaining afterwards to applaud M. Muench and the orchestra for a memorable concert.

This concert will be repeated tonight and Sunday afternoon. Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct the first performance in America of Strauss' "Metamorphosen," Martinu's Concerto Grosso and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

Symphony Plays Condemned '9th' at 66th Opening

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 66th season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the opening piece was the newly condemned Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich. Condemned by one Soviet critic, that is. The Friday audience, which is basically conservative, listened attentively and applauded cordially.

Yet it was obvious that a good deal of their approval was directed to conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston orchestra. It was equally evident that they did not get anywhere near so much of a kick out of Shostakovich as they did from Brahms' First Symphony, which ended the program.

See SYMPHONY Page 14

ices Urged r Sermons

Symphony

Continued from the First Page

I learned on pretty good authority, last Thursday, that the bitter criticism of the Shostakovich Ninth by I, Nestiev in Culture and Life probably is not official, even though the Soviet newspaper is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Communist Party central committee.

Nestiev's comments that the Ninth has "ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," according to this authority, are likely his own narrow opinions. Nevertheless Shostakovich was once disciplined by the party, and if anything unfavorable to him should appear in Pravda, that likely would mean he again was under a Soviet ban.

Amiable About It All

The mere fact that the Boston audience listened as cordially as they did is a small commentary on the gulf between democratic liberty and authoritarian restriction. I dare say many in the Friday audience think as little of the Soviet political system as I do, and as little of the nonsence that music, an abstract art, can express the ideological side of anything. Yet, they listened and they applauded, and they were amiable about it all.

Heard once at the American premiere at Tanglewood last Summer, and again yesterday, the Shostakovich Ninth still seems clever, flippant, superficial and cheerful. The first movement does indeed reflect a lot of Prokofieff, and the two slow sections are reminiscent of the long slow movement in Shostakovich's own Sixth Symphony. The work probably is too long. Taken all in all, however, it is agreeable and good fun. Why ask more?

It is interesting that Mr. Koussevitzky, following a period when he had no inner enthusiasm for the music of Scriabin, should find "The Poem of Ecstasy" once more does move him. Yesterday he gave it a glorious performance, vivid, glowing, most carefully planned and all details in order. The "Poem" is still an impressive work, a naive esthetic conception expressed in a highly sophisticated orchestral style that owes more than a little to Debussy of the "La Mer" period. You don't need to share Scriabin's half-baked esthetic theories to enjoy the "Poem." It has formal continuity and logic, and therefore it can be enjoyed simply as music.

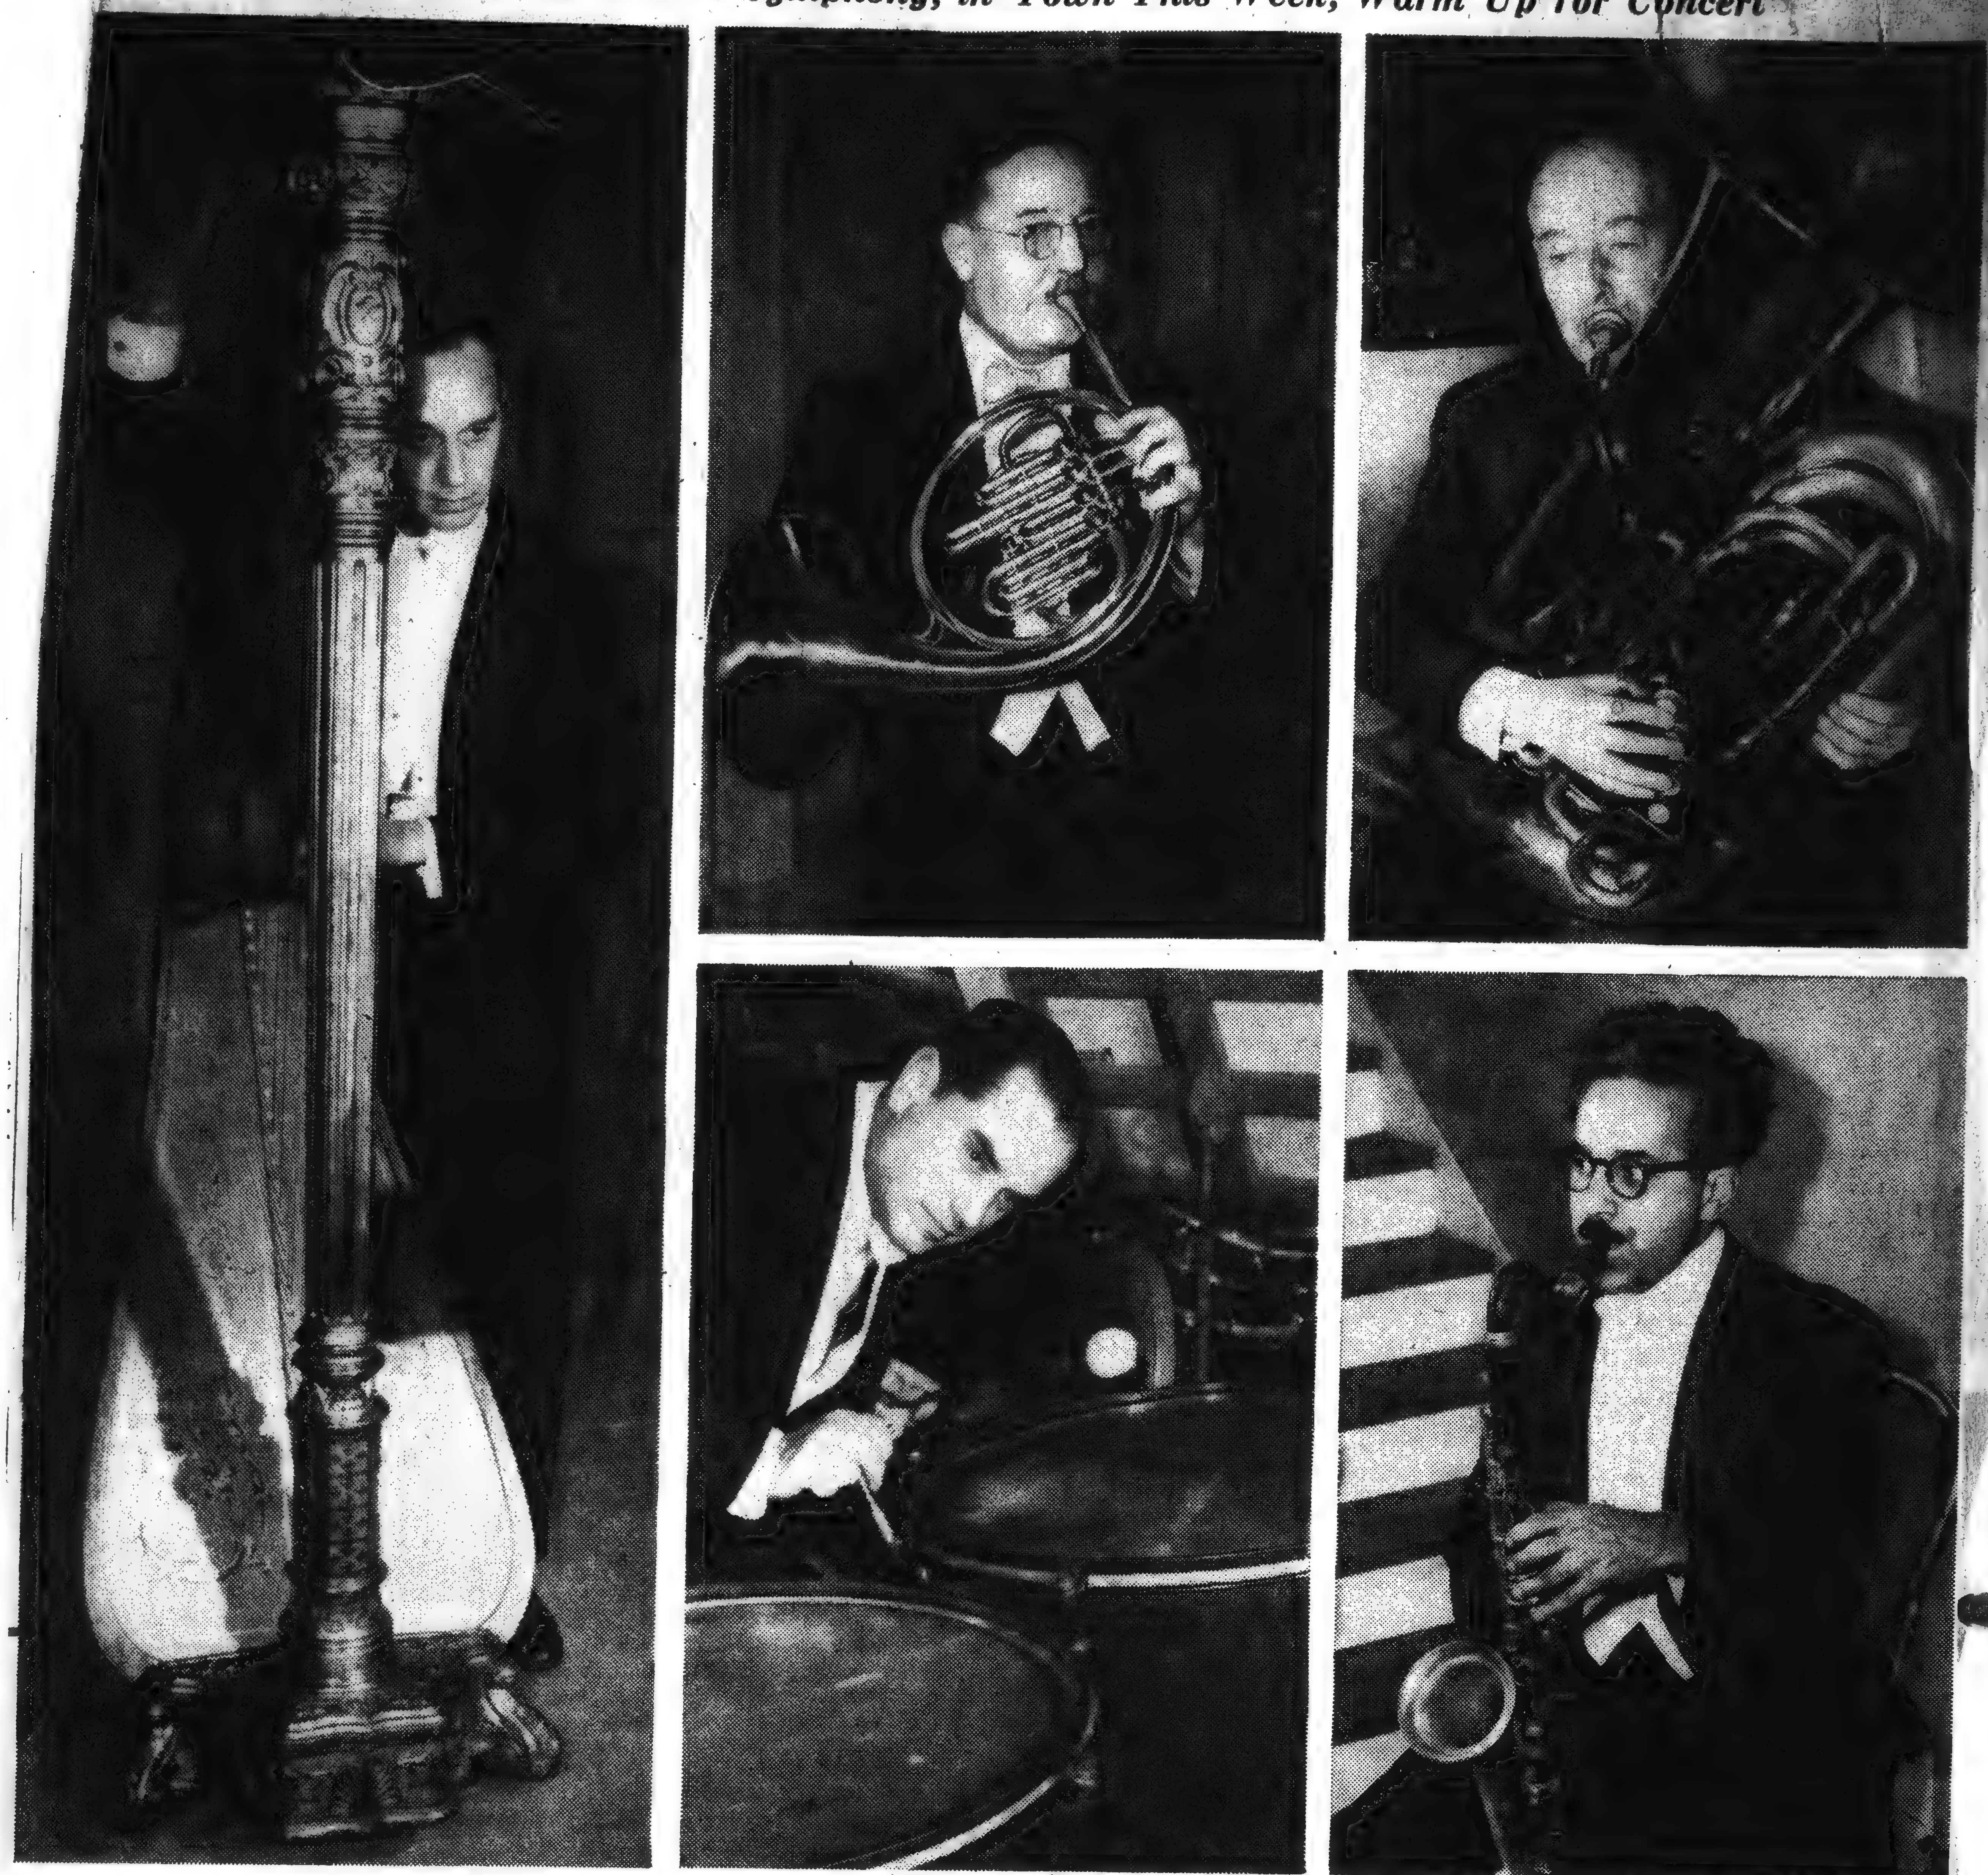
Affectionate Greeting

Up to this point the Friday listeners had heard the widely differing art of two Russian composers, one who lives under the Soviet regime, the other a subject of the last of the Czars. No doubt it was only because Scriabin is lush and sensuous, where Shostakovich is dissonant, that Scriabin had the bigger hand.

Until Mr. Kousevitzky reached Measure No. 385 (and I'm not joking) in the finale of the Brahms, the performance had been the finest I had ever heard of this grave and monumental symphony. The tone was rich, deep and lustrous, beautiful beyond description; the proportions were perfect, the tempi right; all was neat and clear, and the horn solo of the last movement was absolutely noble. Then, at Measure No. 385 the conductor's passion ran away with him, and in a frenzy of speed the music became confused and threatened to fall apart.

As always at a season's opening, the audience rose in affectionate greeting to Mr. Koussevitzky when he first walked upon the stage. It is an appropriate, even a touching custom. It is also proof that while Bostonians may seem to take their great orchestra and their great conductor for granted, they really have a reverential feeling for the town's musical glory.

Members of the Boston Symphony, in Town This Week, Warm Up for Concert



David W. Nilsson

It's usually the conductor on whom the spotlight falls. For a change, then, we turn to some of the less publicized players. Left, Bernard Zighera tunes his harp. Upper left, Willem Valkeneier, first horn player, and upper right, Eugene Adam, bass tuba player, try out a few preparatory notes. Lower left, Roman Szulc tunes up his kettle drums. Lower right, Rosario Masseo tries out his bass clarinet. The Boston Symphony will be directed by Leonard Bernstein on this visit to New York.

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

JAN 2 5 1947

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and [redacted] Hancock Mutual Life, express pleasure in the sponsorship by the insurance company of the orchestra's network program. The Boston Symphony is heard over ABC on Tuesday evenings.

This Clipping From PITTSBURGH, PA.
COURIER

MAR 1 5 1947

Theodore Stone Okay In New York Debut

By GLADYS P. GRAHAM

NEW YORK—(ANP)—Theodore Charles Stone of Chicago showed evidence of excellent artistry and style when he appeared here at Times Hall last week in his first New York recital. He was accompanied by Carl Diton, noted composer-pianist.

Composer and Star— Soprano Ellabelle Davis, who is scheduled to give the world premiere performance and seven subsequent hearings within eight days of Lukas Foss' Biblical solo cantata, "The Song of Songs," with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets some last-minute pointers on the score from Mr. Foss, who wrote the work especially for her on a commission from the League of Composers.

BLANK PAGE

Music

Koussevitzky's Dream

The Berkshire Festival, which recently completed its tenth season, has become one of America's healthiest musical institutions. One record-breaking Saturday night, more than 14,000 people, from Lenox aristocrats in Bergdorf Goodman frocks and white suits to girls in dungarees and men in T-shirts, came to Tanglewood to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Beethoven program. From 9,000 to 13,000, depending on the weather, attended the other nine Boston Symphony concerts. Any night you could easily spot licenses from a dozen states near your own car in the huge parking lot.

When Koussevitzky started the Berkshire Festival 10 years ago, we were told that he dreamed of making it an American Salzburg. The tone of chi-chi implied by that description no longer colors anyone's thoughts. Tanglewood has grown spontaneously into a center so thoroughly American that any mention of its Americanism seems beside the point. The people have taken it over, particularly the thousands who stretch out comfortably on the lawn behind the 6,000 who have paid extra to sit on hard little camp chairs inside the music shed. The Tanglewood audience makes itself as much at home as a summer-evening crowd in Central Park. Yet everyone comes to listen, and everyone respects the music.

There have been three phases in Koussevitzky's master plan for Tanglewood. First, he established summer concerts by his orchestra, both to extend the best music into the vacation area and to provide additional work for his players. In the first two seasons the concerts were given in relatively simple surroundings near Stockbridge.

The second phase of the plan was realized when the festival acquired a permanent home by being given the present beautiful grounds near Lenox, Massachusetts, overlooking the Stockbridge Bowl and the Taconic mountains beyond. Money was raised to construct three buildings from designs by Eliel Saarinen—the big music shed, shaped like a wedge of pie, and smaller halls for stage productions and chamber music.

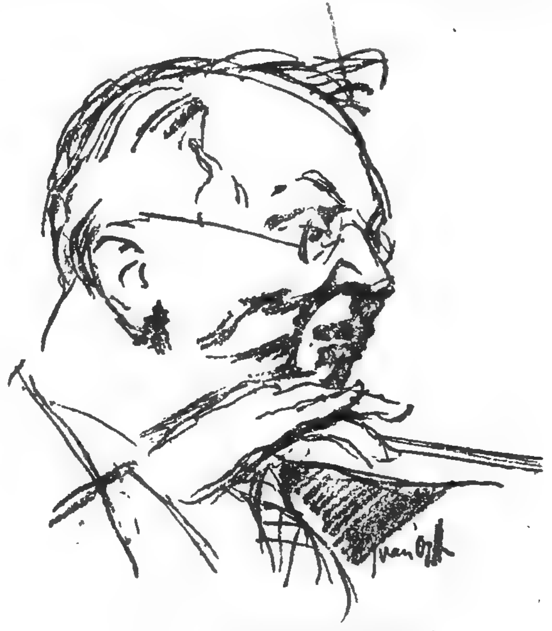
The aspect of the plan closest to Koussevitzky's heart, however, was the formation, just before the war, of the Berkshire Music Center. With this school, which he directs with the assistance of Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein, Koussevitzky is endeavoring to strike a new level of summer musical education, with intensive and expert training in performance, theory and composition. With discernment and artistic integrity, he has brought together a faculty of high-ranking composers and practical musicians who also know how to teach.

As if to prove that his seventy-third birthday was of no consequence, Koussevitzky conducted the four concerts I heard with a vigor and inspirational quality unusual even for him. Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony gained greater structural cohesiveness than he had given it before, without sacrificing any of its flamboyant orchestral theatricalism. In the course of a complete cycle of the Beethoven symphonies he gave the fourth symphony a symmetry and an eloquence that were close to perfection. The ninth symphony, with the choral finale for once raised to its full magnificence by Robert Shaw's remarkable student chorus, had taken on a new and less mannered character in Koussevitzky's mind, and the music gave that wonderful and rare sense of coming to life for the first time. No less remarkable in its way was Leonard Bernstein's conducting of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," so urgent in rhythmic power and so clear in articulation that it may be a long time before we hear the work played this well again.

The daily student programs covered an immense range of music, new and old, and though supported by much smaller audiences, were in their way as valuable as the Boston Symphony concerts. A unique project was the first American production of Mozart's opera "Indomeneo." The vagaries of a complicated plot and the lack of printed parts of the music have kept this touching and supremely melodious score out of the ordinary operatic repertory. Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center, painstakingly and intelligently prepared the performing version that was used at Tanglewood.

New records. – Both those who missed Koussevitzky's Bach concert at Tanglewood and those who heard it will take pleasure in the Boston Symphony album of Bach's second (B-minor) and third (D-major) orchestral suites (Victor M-1123, five 12-inch records; $5.85). While purists can readily find much that is unorthodox in Koussevitzky's tempo and phrasing, the second suite glories in the incomparable flute playing of Georges Laurent, and the third in the melting string tone given to the famous air . . . Schumann's fourth symphony, in a version of Eugene Goossens and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (Victor M-1124, three 12-inch records; $3.85), moves from a lame start to excellent third and fourth movements, and the orchestra has the sturdy body of German-sounding tone that is right for Schumann's music.

CECIL SMITH



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

AUG 17 1947

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Tanglewood Finishes 10th Annual Music Festival With Record Crowd

By JOHN BALL

The tenth annual music festival to be held at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire music center, ended last Sunday afternoon bringing to a conclusion six weeks of highly successful teaching and concert activities. The crowd which attended the final concert of the series was of record proportions, jamming the famed music shed to capacity and overflowing far out over the wide lawns. All during the short Summer season the popular response to the Tanglewood program was full and enthusiastic.

Tanglewood, the estate immortalized by Nathaniel Hawthorne, was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936 by Mary Aspinwall Tappen and Mrs. Andrew Hepburn. Its 210 acres lie adjacent to Lake Makeenac, between Stockbridge and Lenox in Massachusetts' Berkshire hills. The whole area is one of restful beauty, ideally suited to its present use as a distinguished Summer music school and festival concert grounds. In 1938 the now celebrated music shed was built and in 1941 the theater-concert and chamber music halls were added. The original mansion of the estate serves as the school's headquarters.

HIGH TARIFF HITS SOUR NOTE

Visitors to the just concluded Berkshire symphonic festival found that their enjoyment of the music was soured by sky-high and beyond prices demanded for every sort of accommodation throughout the surrounding area. Ordinary rooms, without bath or running water, brought $16 and beyond. While a few restaurants resolutely held the line on price, many others handed out menus with 250 blue plate specials and dinners from $4 on up. In the festival grounds the situation was a little better. Here a routine hot dog could be had for 20 cents and a short cup of root beer to go with it only costadime.

The Summer activities at Tanglewood may be roughly divided between the activities of the music school and the festival concerts presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Each year some 400 students are selected from approximately ten times this number of applicants. Auditions are held throughout the country in order to find the most talent of young musicians. Those who are selected pay a tuition fee of $120 for their six weeks of study. At Tanglewood they have the opportunity to learn from such outstanding musicians as Dr. Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Samuel Barber, William Primrose, Boris Goldovsky, Arthur Honegger, Hugh Ross, Robert Shaw and 30 of the best known members of the Boston orchestra. This impressive faculty offers concentrated courses in orchestral and choral conducting, composition, opera, orchestral playing and chamber music. Toward the close of the Summer period a number of concerts are presented by the students of the school and those who comprise the chorus appear in festival programs with the Boston Symphony itself.

This year students were enrolled from all over America and a number of other countries. South America and Canada were well represented, as were many countries of Europe. In addition to more usual programs the students of the school, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, this year presented the first American performance of Mozart's masterful but seldom-heard opera, "Idomeneo." Long consigned to limbo, the remarkable and captivating score was composed by Mozart during the Winter of 1780-81. The young musical genius was then 24. He often later referred to "Idomeneo" as one of his particular favorites. Part of the reason for its long neglect may be traced to the fact that in its original form it runs some five hours and the network of plots and counterplots is almost too much with which to contend. According to Mr. Goldovsky, no uncut performance of the work has ever been given.

On Sunday evening, Aug. 3, the press was invited to attend a special dress rehearsal of the production, a burst of hospitality which this reporter was unable to resist. The performance took place in the little theater-concert hall, which, despite its limited dimensions, manages to accommodate some 1,200 persons. The score was a revelation and a delight from beginning to end. It was, we admit, our first opportunity to hear the work and having attended, we are certain that other opera companies will be quick to put Mr. Goldovsky's neatly edited version of this masterpiece on the boards. Mr. Goldovsky himself conducted and provided commentary before each of the acts. In competition with Mozart he still managed to be a good part of the show. He is a remarkably gifted speaker and held forth on various aspects of the production with engaging ability. The performance was sung in Italian, the English translation having failed to arrive in time for proper rehearsal. The parts of the score have never been printed, plates were prepared but were subsequently destroyed in the bombing of Leipzig. The parts were hand copied for the Tanglewood performance. Mr. Goldovsky was on the point of preparing a translation of the original Italian text when he learned of an excellent existing translation in England. As stated, the translation was delayed in transit so Italian, of necessity, was the language for the performance.

None of the voices in the cast were exceptionally impressive, a fact of secondary importance in view of the greater interest in the work itself. The male lead was originally scored for a castrato, a nearly vanished species of singer which was in wide vogue in Mozart's time. Rather than transpose the part for a tenor, to fit the usual operatic formula, Mr. Goldovsky left the part as it was and assigned a soprano to fill the role. The reception given the old-new work by the preview audience left no doubt that a more than century overdue first performance had at last taken place here in America. The plot in the newly revised version has been simplified to the point of sanity and is about as logical as opera plots of the period can be made. So far as we could tell the editing was intelligently done; the score hung together well and the dramatic action was adequate to the needs of the story.

The principal offering of the season by the Boston Orchestra itself was a cycle which included all nine of Beethoven's symphonies and the last two piano concerti. On the final evening concert Robert Shaw, the talented young choral and orchestral conductor, made an exceptionally auspicious Berkshire festival debut. With the assistance of the festival chorus, which he had prepared for the occasion, and four soloists, he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Bach's Cantata No. 50 "Nun ist das Heil," Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Mozart's "Requiem." Mr. Shaw arrived at Tanglewood armed with a very good reputation and left with a better one. All three of the numbers offered on the program were well performed and warmly received. As is usually the case, the public enthusiasm for the Bach cantata was of a somewhat restrained sort; the great Germanic master can be heavy going at times and even a very good performance can suffer from being given on a warm Summer evening. Just before the concert it rained, which may or may not have helped to put the audience in the proper frame of mind to listen to a Bach opus which, while masterful and great, lacked the flavoring touch of familiarity which makes more palatable many another score from the same illustrious source.

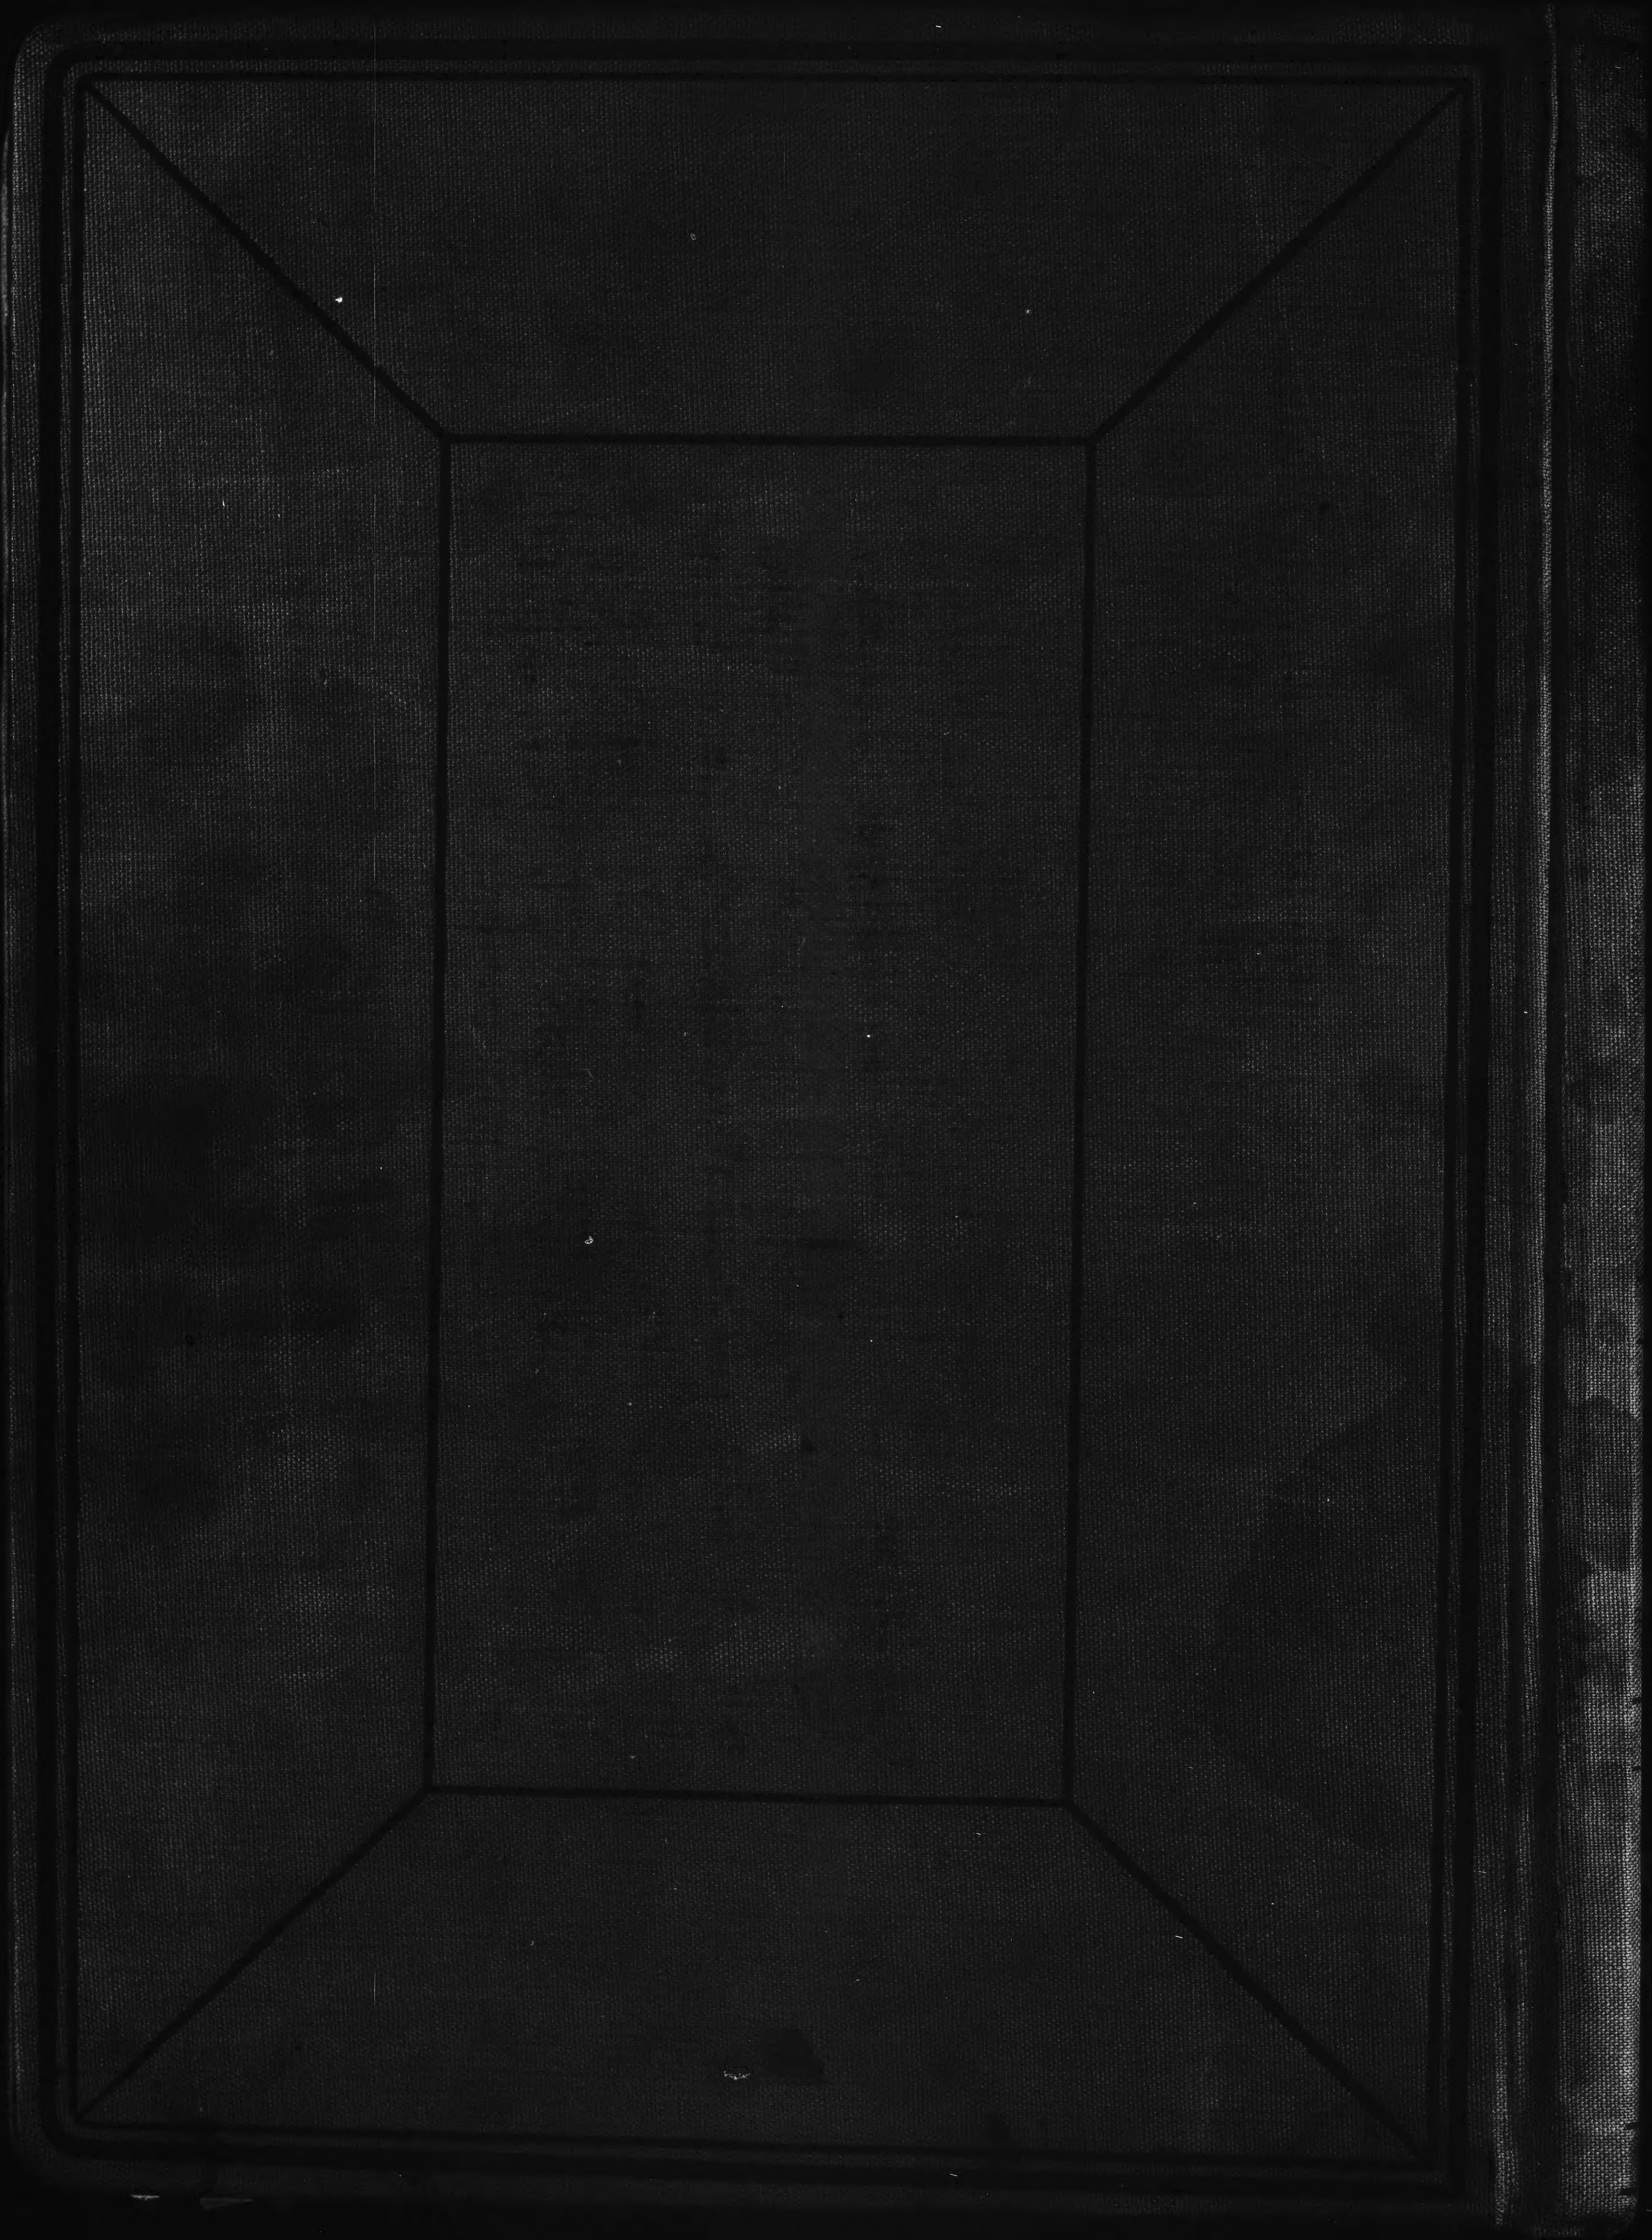
Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" came next and received one of the best readings which we have ever heard of the work. The score was sung in Latin, which again did not help matters, but which was not a sufficiently high hurdle to discourage acceptance of the work by the audience. While the general attitude was one of restrained enthusiasm, we ourselves felt that the performance given deserved a more warm-hearted reception. Young Bob Shaw did wonders with the chorus in the limited time at his disposal and the orchestra gave of their best under his loping gestures.

Following intermission Mr. Shaw introduced his soloists and settled down to the major business of the Mozart "Requiem." Here his careful preparation of the singers and orchestra was most evident and as to the wonderful music unfolded the impression began gradually to permeate the music shed that [illegible] was a performance to be reckoned with. Its vocal soloists [illegible] adequate without being sensational; the chorus somewhat better. As the closing notes were played it became evident that Mr. Shaw was in for a major ovation for his efforts. The music finished, the audience cut loose and awarded to the conductor one of the most tumultuous receptions that Tanglewood has ever heard.

Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitsky himself mounted the podium to bring the festival to a close with a [illegible] gala concert. Armed with a program of considerable popular appeal he proceeded to do just that. The concert began with a performance of Martinu's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra and Two Pianos," a work which Boston Symphony subscribers will recall having heard in Brooklyn during the past Winter season. The Tanglewood presentation of this new music carried considerably more drive and spirit than did the Brooklyn performance of the score and was consequently well received. The composer was present and was repeatedly called upon to acknowledge the applause which his work had earned.

Dr. Koussevitsky then turned to Ravel's "Pavanne for a Dead Princess" and the same composer's irrepressible "Bolero." The Pavanne received a sympathetic and well considered performance. The "Bolero," to our own amazement, Dr. Koussevitzky, at long last elected to take at the tempo specified by the composer, or very nearly so. Instead of a gradual crescendo he brought the orchestral volume up by sharply separated steps, a device which did not detract from the insidious tenacity of the music. As would be expected the final crashing discord, wherein the whole orchestral structure collapses into one vast pile of tone, was the signal for violent and long continued applause.

After intermission Dr. Koussevitzky brought the concert and the festival to a close with Tchaikovsky's "Sympony No. 4," a hardy perennial which gave to the Boston Orchestra plenty of opportunity to sound forth with its celebrated color and precision. The orchestra, redeeming itself for a conspicuous slip or so earlier in the program, notably during the first solo trombone passage in the "Bolero," displayed its full virtuosity with tellin effect. The performance was a good rousing one and the stor of applause which it generated wrote a fine and loud finish one of the most successful major Summer concert seasons th the Berkshire hills have ever witnessed.



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND